For Reference

Not to be taken from this room

√ 229272

Every person who maliciously cuts, defaces, breaks or injures any book, map, chart, picture, engraving, statue, coin, model, apparatus, or other work of literature, art, mechanics or object of curiosity, deposited in any public library, gallery, museum or collection is guilty of a misdemeanor.

Penal Code of California,
1915, Section 623.

BURLINGAME
APR 7 1967
LIBRARY
229272

THE NATION
America's Leading Liberal Weekly Since 1865

INDEX TO VOLUME 203
JULY to DECEMBER, 1966

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
C	Correspondence
D	Drama
E	Editorial Article
M	Music
MP	Moving Pictures
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section, following main entries.

2- 31	July	4	370-399	Oct.	17
34- 63	July	11	402-431	Oct.	24
66-103	July	25	434-463	Oct.	31
106-135	Aug.	8	466-495	Nov.	7
138-167	Aug.	22	498-527	Nov.	14
170-199	Sept.	5	530-559	Nov.	21
202-231	Sept.	12	562-591	Nov.	28
234-263	Sept.	19	594-623	Dec.	5
266-295	Sept.	26	626-655	Dec.	12
298-335	Oct.	3	658-687	Dec.	19
338-367	Oct.	10	690-719	Dec.	26

A

PAGE

- ABM. See Armament—Missiles
- Abortion; common in Mexico 509-510
  - Right pleaded by prominent doctors and in poll; E .... 373; see also C, 466
- Adams, Paul; Conservative candidate for New York governorship 379
- Adams, Thomas Boylston; Massachusetts peace candidate for Democratic Senate nomination .... 172; see also 576
- Adderley v. Florida. See United States—Supreme court
- Advertising; factor in food price rise; E 341
  - Hard-sell type on overseas TV, much by U.S. firms. H. I. Schiller; S 609
- Africa; U.S. welfare imperialism in 85, 86
- Aggression; violent type not innately human but inculcated by society, as in war and popular entertainment; E 340
- Agriculture; Chinese changes .... 302 ff., 309
  - Disappearance of U.S. surpluses as factor in food price rise; E 341
  - FAO: the imperative of altruism. G. Myrdal; S 666
  - Higher farm prices and low-paid labor 546
  - In Vietnam under France and U.S. .... 77 ff.
  - Latin America: economic integration for progress. F. C. Gil; S 280
  - Latin-American feudal tradition and token reforms .... 182 ff.
  - Latin-American problems 146
  - Report on food: prescription for a sick industry by National commission on food marketing. J. Cross; S 245
  - Sabotaged in South Vietnam; E 404
  - Soviet improvement 176
  - Stake in "food for freedom" 121
- Aidit, D. N.; Indonesian Communist leader, murdered in 1965 .... 565 ff.
- AIFLD; AID-sponsored group bolsters anti-Communist unions in Latin America .. 250, 543
- Air pollution. See Pollution
- Airlines, Airplanes. See Aviation
- Alabama; Federal highway and defense funds should be withdrawn to enforce school integration; E 300
  - No choice for Negroes in 1966; Republicans swamped 570, 572-573, 574
- Albee, Edward. Play A delicate balance reviewed by H. Clurman; D 361

PAGE

- Alchemist, the (Lincoln center production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 460
- Alexander defense committee; required by Justice department to register as agent of South African government, which it opposes; E .... 69; see also C, 170
- Alfie. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 229
- Allen, Woody. Play Don't drink the water reviewed by H. Clurman; D 652
- America hurrah. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 587
- American African affairs association (4A); conservative propaganda group's tax-exempt status 481
- American assembly; influential 1966 Arden house conference on state legislatures .... 475 ff.
- American civil liberties union (ACLU). See Civil liberties
- American federation of labor-Congress of industrial organizations (CIO). See Labor—Union
- American friends of the Middle East; allegations in R. G. Sherrill's Foundation pipe lines: the beneficent CIA (May 9) disputed by director. E. Bunting; C 34
- American hospital association. See Medicine
- American medical association. See Medicine
- Amery, C.
  - Letter from West Germany: a sword too heavy?; crisis between army and defense ministry; S 346
  - No fun in Bavaria over election returns giving status to National democrats; S 637
  - Whither West Germany?; S 88
- Anderson, Senator Clinton P.; critical of HEW's generosity to hospitals 515
- Apartheid. See South Africa, Republic of
- Apple tree, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 493
- Aptheker, Dr. Herbert
  - Clarification demanded of H. Swados' reference to self; C, with Swados reply, 498 and 516; see also 350, 351
  - Speaker at seminar on Marxism at St. Vincent college, Latrobe, Pa. 405
- Arab nations. See Middle East
- Archaeology. Salvage archaeology: saving the past from the present. J. O. Brew; S 117
- Architecture; Aspen, Colo., hodgepodge ...... 70 ff.
  - For reviews, see Galantay, E.
- Arena theatre; Washington resident group reviewed by J. Novick; D 27
- Arendt, Hannah
  - Plea for contributions to de Madariaga scholarship fund for Spanish exiles; C .. 690
- Arkansas; Arkansas prison farm: the whip pays off. R. Pearman; S 701
- Armament
  - Missiles
    - ABM (anti-ballistic missile) schemes; U.S. hawks on wing; E 563
  - U.S.-Soviet rivalry in supplying nations of Middle East, Pandora's ammunition box. J. A. Morris, Jr.; S 109
- Arnall, Ellis; LBJ backlash as factor in failure to win Georgia Democratic gubernatorial nomination; E 340
  - Write-in vote for Georgia moderate threw gubernatorial election in doubt .... 640 ff.
- Art; Manet as founder of modern movement. M. Kozloff; A 588
  - For reviews, see Kozloff, M.
- Artists' liberation front; new San Francisco theatrical group 256
- Asia; Johnson's overcommitment to; E 530
- Aspen, Colorado; Will success spoil Aspen?; shortcomings of cultural-sports center. P. G. Ernst; S .... 70; see also C, 106
- Association of producing artists (APA). Production of The school for scandal and Right you are reviewed by H. Clurman; D 651

PAGE

- Aswan dam. See United Arab Republic
- Asylum. D. Hoffman; P 364
- At 35. B. Spacks; P 260
- Atlanta; authorities' insurrection buildup against SNCC. P. Good; S 534
- Atomic weapons
  - ABM testing would require repeal of test-ban treaty; E 563
  - China and the bomb; E 532
  - French and Soviet attitudes toward non-proliferation treaty 694
  - Horror of limited on TV, as in Peter Watkins film The war game; E 269
  - Optimism on non-proliferation treaty 402
  - Truman's alleged doubts of Soviet capability .... 445; see also C, 626
  - U.S. should agree to Chinese proposal for mutual non-use 314
- Attleboro, Massachusetts; Birchite infiltration opposed by "Birch watchers." A. Forster; S 73
- Auburn, Wash.; cross section of citizens on Vietnam war. R. S. Johnson; S 502
- Augstein, Rudolf; Spiegel editor's analysis of West German emergency laws .... 88 ff.
- Australia, letter from: whites and aborigines, immigration, U.S. influence and British tradition, Vietnam participation. H. Weston; S .... 512; see also C, 594
  - Resentment over Johnson visit. J. A. Kane; C 690
- Automobiles; "Autoart" paint jobs as road menance; E 501
  - Role in transit snarl: is it back to the rails? C. Dreher; S 11
- Aviation; airline strikers urged by J. Hoffa not to accept 5% settlement 546
  - Airlines strike as Mr. Johnson's labor problem; E 106
  - Competition with railroads .... 11 ff.
  - Industry's opposition to economy reforms in Defense 697
  - Pilot shortage. K. M. Ruppenthal; S 481
  - "Value" of crash victims' lives compared with that of civilian Vietnamese; E 372

B

- Baker, Bobby; evidence in trial of former Senate aide obtained by wiretapping, sparking J. E. Hoover-R. F. Kennedy feud; E 690
- Balaguer, President Joaquín. See Dominican republic
- Baldwin, James
  - A report from occupied territory; police arrogance and brutality with Negroes, as in case of Harlem six; S .... 39; see also C, 66
- Baller, Albert H.
  - Objections to editorial on unidentified flying objects; C .... 498; see also E, 436
- Ballet. For reviews, see Clurman, H.
- Baltimore, Maryland; Center stage resident theatre reviewed by J. Novick; D 28
- Banks and banking; Manufacturers-Hanover merger aided by Senator A. W. Robertson; banks' aid to his re-election campaign; E 5
  - Savings and loan industry, easy lenders, in for trouble. M. Harris; S 152
  - Usurious mortgage-interest charges; E 301
- Baran, Paul; testimony on proposed National data center 450, 451
- Barnstein, Harold
  - New York Times man J. Reston suppressed knowledge of U-2 spy flights; C .... 594; see also E, 437

PAGE

Bartley, Lynwood H.
  Western Michigan U. professors didn't forbid students to read None dare call it treason; C .... 370; see also 206
Barus, Carl
  Touchstones for vigilant citizens to detect Hitlerian power-madness in national leader; C .... 156; see also E, 141
Bates, Ralph
  On Spanish civil war 101
Bay area. See California
Bean, Louis H.
  Mathematics of consensus; analysis of 1966 election results; S 373
Beetle, David H.
  Legislatures: the 100-year lag; S .... 475; see also Beetle correction, C, 530
Bellow, Saul. Play under the weather reviewed by H. Clurman; D 523
Bentley, Eric
  Encounter editors fail to deny receipt of CIA funds; C 90
Berger, John
  Familiars of death: sculptor E. Neizvestny and other Soviet artists; A 553
Berman, Daniel M.
  Professor, like newsmen, target of Assistant Defense Secretary A. Sylvester; C .... 2; see also June 6 editorial
Berman, Harold J.; cited on danger of U.S.-Soviet conflict in Vietnam 170
Berry, Wendell
  Boatmen's paradox: consumers of the river; S 381
Bess, Donovan
  View from Hunters Point, San Francisco: no way downtown to slum dwellers; S 606
Between Thoreau and me. S. Touster; P 131
Beyers, Bob
  Emendation to D. Donner on lists supplied by Stanford U. to HUAC; C .... 402; see also 175
Bill of rights. See United States—Constitution
Birch society, John; backing of Reagan for California governorship 439
  Birchism at the grass roots, as in school boards, opposed by "Birch watchers." A. Forster; S 73
  Booklet blast against by A. Cranston; E .... 108; see also C, 298
  Connections with Constructive action .... 206 ff. see also C, 370
  Failed to stop Marxist seminar at St. Vincent college, Latrobe, Pa.; E 404
Birth control; family planning in Mexico. M. Larkin; S 508
Bishop, O. E.; Arkansas prison superintendent on punishment system .... 701 ff.
Black power. See Negroes—Civil rights
Blank, Blanche D.
  Big-city slowdown: the battle of bureaucracy, as in New York; S 632
Blau, Herbert; left actor's workshop, San Francisco, for Lincoln center 256
Blue cross, Blue shield; relations with Medicare 514, 515
Bly, Robert
  Hatred of men with black hair; P 192
Bly, Robert (translator)
  Funeral in the East. P. Neruda; P 54
  Ode to my socks. P. Neruda; P 53
Boats and boating. Boatmen's paradox: consumers of the river. W. Berry; S 381
Bolivia; changing role of Catholic church .. 217 ff.
Books: anti-Communist titles distributed gratis on U.S. campuses by Constructive action. W. Wingfield; S.....206; see also C, 370
  Subsidized by U.S. information agency; titles should be publicized; E 373
  For reviews, see Books section of index
Boretz, Benjamin
  Reviews of music
    Jacobs, P. (harpsichordist) 125
    Mr. and Mrs. Discobbolus (opera)........ 126
    New York philharmonic 461
    Purgatory (opera revival) 126
    Recitals in New York; importance diminished 125
      Rhodes, S. (violist) 126
      Stravinsky festival, New York Philharmonic 165
    Stravinsky, I. (Princeton concert) 461
    Trial of Lucullus, the (opera revival) 126
  Reviews of recorded music
    Brahms symphonies 6, 9, and 10 428
    Miscellaneous new recordings 362
    Records: 1966 681
    Stravinsky 557
Bosch, Juan; leader of "loyal opposition" in Dominican republic .... 541 ff.
Boston; resident theatres reviewed by J. Novick; D 130
Bowie, Robert R.; Dulles alumnus appointed counselor to State department; E 205
Bowman, Raymond T.; testimony favoring National data center 450, 451

PAGE

Boycotts; of supermarkets by housewives to lower prices; E .... 341 and 498
Brainard, Maurice W.; co-founder and backer of Constructive action .... 206 ff.
Breuer, Marcel; architect of Whitney museum 292
Brew, J. O.
  Salvage archaeology: saving the past from the present; S 117
Britain. See Great Britain
Brooke, Edward; victorious Negro Republican candidate for Senate from Massachusetts 268, 577
Brown, Governor Edmund G. See California
Brown, Representative George, Jr.; Democratic dissenter from Johnson policies 342, 344, 372
Brown & Root; Mohole contractors, headed by Johnson friend George Brown; E 172
Buchan, Alastair; on Johnson's Vietnam gamble; E 203
Buchanan, Keith
  Visit to a fourth of mankind (China); S 302
Bundy, William P., admitted that U.S. forces are in Thailand; E 234
Bunting, Earl
  Chairman of American friends of the Middle East denies allegations in R. Sherrill article of May 9, Foundation pipe lines: the beneficent CIA; C 34
Burnstein, Malcolm
  Reasons for new left's non-support of Governor Brown in California gubernatorial election; C .... 466; see also E, 372, 377
Burton, Representative Philip; Democratic dissenter on Johnson policies 342, 372
Butter and egg man, the (Cherry lane revival). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 493
By a rich fast moving stream. J. Tagliabue; P 254
Byron, Robert K.
  How to run a peace candidate; independent campaign of Congressional aspirant R. Cook in Connecticut; S 469

C

Cabaret (musical). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 651
California; Birchers' infiltration of school boards .... 73 ff.
  Bay area rapid transit district aided by government and suppliers 12
  Crackdown on reckless savings and loan companies .... 152 ff.
  HUAC demand for lists of university students opposed to Vietnam war combated by ACLU; E 628
  June 20 editorial too favorable to Governor Brown; failures cited. J. Engelbach; C .... 2; see also C, 66
  More furore at Barkeley campus, over Navy recruiting table; E 661
  "New politics" of independents should support Governor Brown; E .... 372; see also C, 434 and 466
  "Paradise" elected Reagan in flight from reality; E 596
  Reagan vs. Brown gubernatorial race: how to succeed with the backlash. C. McWilliams; S 438
  Will Los Angeles Times support Reagan?; E 173
Callaway, Harold (Bo). See Georgia
Cambodia; Prince Norodom Sihanouk leaning to Chinese; cites "de-Asianized Asians" pro-U.S. propaganda: E 173
  U.S. bombing of village conceded. H. Fromm; C 234
Cammer, Robert I.
  Back files of Nation offered; C 516
Campbell, Douglas; director of Tyrone Guthrie theatre 427-428
Campbell, Joseph; efficient Comptroller general resigned in 1965 .... 697, 698
Canada; police "sniping" at dissenters on U.S. Vietnam policy. J. Sewell; C .... 234; see also 149
  Quebec: separatism in a new guise; S 6
Capital punishment; Rosenbergs' fate shows need for abolishment. A. Katz; C 202
Carmichael, Stokely; militant SNCC head's bid for leadership of civil-rights movement; exponent of black power .... 112 ff.
  Target of abuse 534, 537-538
Carnegie endowment; raises furore over study Apartheid and the United Nations 480
Carter, Hodding, III; co-director of OEO's program Mississippi action for progress 501 Carter, James; Georgia moderate defeated for Democratic gubernatorial nomination but still a political factor .... 641 ff.
Cartier, Jacques; head of Hartford, Conn., stage company 131

PAGE

Catholic church; changing role in Latin America. By S. Hempstone; S 216
  Hampers birth control in Mexico .... 508 ff.
  Liberalization exemplified by seminar on Marxism at St. Vincent college, Latrobe, Pa.; E 404
  Pressure on state constitutional conventions 474
Censorship; professor new target of Assistant Defense Secretary A. Sylvester. By D. M. Berman; C 2
Center stage; Baltimore resident theatre reviewed by J. Novick; D 28
Central American common market (CACM); relative success 281
Charities. See Disabled Amreican veterans
Charles playhouse, Boston. Reviewed by J. Novick; D 130
Charter group for a pledge of conscience; funds solicited for defense of Harlem six. A. J. Garro and L. Lander; C .... 66; see also 39
Chase, Oscar G.
  Closed-circuit TV as publicity device for political candidates; C 106
Chessman, Caryl; Governor Brown of California blamed for not saving from execution. J. Engelbach; C .... 2; see also L. P. and R. H. Hudson; C, 66
Chiapetta, Michael
  Education imposed by U.S.: the baited trap in Latin America; S 321
Chicago; Chicago summer: bossism, racism and Dr. King. By P. Good; S 237
  Reasons for frustration of M. L. King campaign for Negro rights; E 68
Child development group of Mississippi (CDGM); poor-controlled Head Start program superseded by Mississippi action for progress (MAP). M. Hoffman and J. Mudd; C .... 411; see also E, 501; 574
Chile; U.S. army snooping through "sociological" study by American University exposed in 1965 140
China, Communist
  Absence from U.N. threatens organization's future 38
  And the bomb; E 532
  China: two views and a proposal. Visit to a fourth of minkind; K. Buchanan; S .... 302. Enormous revival meeting, the R. S. Elegant; S .... 307. Between goals and dogma: an opening for diplomacy. I-Hua Chou; S .... 311. See also C, 370 and 516
  "Culture" riots, the: Mao at bay. I. Deutscher; S 442
  Must be party to Vietnam settlement. I. Lenel; C .... 106; see also E, 69
  Own acts and U.S. opposition ensured continued exclusion from U.N. By A. Weill-Tuckerman; E 626
  Pravda on 695
  Setting stage for new man? B. E. Galitz; C 516
  Would veto Korean-type solution to Vietnam war; E 435
China, Nationalist; trump card in U.S.-Communist Chinese negotiations 314
Chinese; harassed in Indonesia 567
Chisingura. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 526
Chou-I-Kua
  Between goals and dogma: an opening for diplomacy with Commuist China; S .... 311; see also C, 516
Church, Senator Frank; Democratic dissenter on Johnson policies 343, 344
Cicero, Illinois; march of dissident Negroes in all-white town .... 237 ff.
Cincinnati; Playhouse in the park. J. Novick; D 195
  Playhouse's U.S. premiere of Eh? reviewed by R. Pasolli; D 262
Cities, U.S. Big-city slowdown: the battle of bureaucracy, as in New York. B. D. Blank; S 632
  New towns: Reston, Va., and Columbia, Md., as examples. E. Galantay; S .... 652 and 714
  Plight worsened by Federal expenditures on Vietnam and residents' flight to suburbs; mayors speak out at conference; E 3
  Transit snarl, the: is it back to the rails? C. Dreher; S 11
Citizens conference; lobby for reform of state legislatures 476, 478
Citizens' white paper; on synchronized escalation of Vietnam war; E 35
Civil liberties; ACLU's fight against HUAC demand for lists of college students opposed to Vietnam war; E 628
  Supreme court, the, and the Bill of rights. 1. Freedom of expression; 2. Justice for the accused; 3. Discovery of equality. L. Pfeffer; S 315, 351, 385

PAGE

- Civil rights. See Negroes—Civil rights
- Civil service. Big-city slowdown: the battle of bureaucracy, as in New York. B. D. Blank; S 632
- Clark, Senator Joseph S.; Democrat's dissent from Johnson policies .... 341 ff.
  - Questioned R. R. Bowie at confirmation hearings for State department job; E 205
- CLASC; Latin-American confederation of trade unions .... 218, 248 ff.
- CLEAN; California initiative aaginst pornography supported by Reagan 439
- Cleveland, Ohio; art and argot at Karamu, integrated theatre. B. Kremen; D 257
  - Grand jury blames Communists for summer rioting by Negroes; E 138
- Clurman, Harold
  - Reviews of ballet
    - Joffrey ballet, New York city center 333
  - Reviews of plays
    - Alchemist, the (Lincoln center production) 460
    - American hurrah 587
    - Apple tree, the 493
    - Butter and egg man, the (Cherry lane revival) 493
    - Cabaret (musical) 651
    - Country girl, the (City center revival) 398
    - Delicate balance, a 361
    - Dinner at eight (T. Guthrie's revival) .. 397
    - Don't drink the water 652
    - Hand is at the gate, a 363
    - How's the world treating you? 524
    - Investigation, the 395
    - Killing of Sister George, the 459
    - Kitchen, the 334
    - Right you are (if you think you are) (APA production) 651
    - Rose tattoo, the (City center revival) 493
    - School for scandal, the (APA production) 651
    - Under the weather 523
    - Viet rock 586
    - Wilder, T., three one-act plays (Cherry lane production) 334, 398
- Cohen, Daniel
  - Analysis of D. Mallan's "The Russians faked it" in space magazine articles; S .... 445; see also C, 626, with Cohen reply
- Cohen, Jacob
  - What the Warren report on Kennedy assassination omits: the vital documents; S .... 43; see also C, 138
- Cohen, Nathan
  - Stratford, Canada, production of Strindberg's The dance of death superior to that of Minnesota theatre company, C .... 266; see also 198
- Colleges and universities. See Education
- Collier, John; U.S. commissioner of Indian affairs, 1933-1945 .... 275 ff.
- Colombia; agricultural and fiscal problems 144
  - Changing role of Catholic church 218
- Colorado. See Condon, Dr. Edward U.
- Columbia, Maryland. New town reviewed by E. Galantay; S 714
- Committee, the; San Francisco improvisatory theatre. J. Novick; D 613
- Committee of one million against the admission of Communist China to the United Nations; propaganda outfit headed by M. Liebman still going strong despite defections; E 565
- Communications satellites; advertising medium of 1970's? 611
- Communism
  - Chinese ideological struggle. R. S. Elegant; S 307
  - Indonesia; massacre of members and sympathizers .... 566, 568 ff.
  - Latin America; decline 145, 184
  - Opposed by indirect offspring, U.S. welfare imperialism .... 86 ff.
  - Proposed J. E. Hoover center on strategy and tactics of; E 629
  - United States
    - Constructive action's scare campaign against through free distribution of rightist books on campuses. W. Wingfield; S .... 206. See also C, 370
    - Discussed at second socialist scholars conference .... 347 ff.
    - FBI's "standing disclosure" on party's national convention; E 141
    - Linked to Negro civil-rights movement by its opponents; E 138
    - Party as target of McCarran internal security act (1950) and of Weltner bill .... 16 ff.
    - Supreme court's record on rights 317
  - Vietnamese independence role 79
- Community action programs. See Mississippi
- Computers; bill of rights in proposed National data center. A. Prisendorf; S 449

PAGE

- Condit, Carl W.
  - Chicago's Hull house theatre not mentioned by J. Novick in Midwest survey; C .... 298; see also 195
- Condon, Dr. Edward U.; advocated as regent of university of Colorado; E 269
  - Proposal for international schools for world understanding, sponsored by U.N.; E 533
  - To head Air-force investigation of unidentified flying objects; E .... 436; see also C, 498
- Congress for cultural freedom; anecdote implying CIA backing. H. Grundfest; C 51
- Connally, Governor John B.; wounded with President Kennedy .... 44 ff.
- Connecticut; How to run a peace candidate; independent Congressional campaign of R. Cook. By R. K. Byron; S 469
- Conscription. See United States—Defense, national
- Conservative party (New York); unity in New York gubernatorial election 379
- Conservatives. See Birch society, John; Constructive action
- Constructive action; rightist group's free distribution of anti-Communist books in U.S. colleges. W. Wingfield; S .... 206; see also C, 370
- Contoski, Victor (translator)
  - To the heart. T. Rozewicz; P 24
- Conyers, Representative John; dissenter from Johnson policies 342
- Cook, Fred J.
  - Criticism of Warren report .... 44 ff. and C, 138
- Cook, Robert; Congressional campaign as model for peace movement; E 469
- Coordinating council of community organizations (CCCO); omnibus civil-rights group working with M. L. King in Chicago 238, 240
- Corcoran, Judge Howard; injunction restraining HUAC inquiry into campus peace groups 175
- CORE. See Negroes—Civil rights
- Cornejo, Gerardo; director of Mexican planned-parenthood group 511
- Country girl, the. City center revival reviewed by H. Clurman; D 398
- Countryman, Vern
  - The Weltner bill: clear and present danger in proposed criminal conspiracies control act; S 16
- Cowgirl ball, the (for Gene Autry). By M. Silverton; P 526
- Cranston, Alan; California comptroller's courageous blast at Birchers; E .... 108; see also C, 298
- Crazy quilt, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 430
- Crime; in South Vietnam multiplied by dollar inundation .... 602 ff.
  - Supreme court, the, and the bill of rights. 2. Justice for the accused. L. Pfeffer; S 351
  - See also Police, Prisons
- Cross, Jennifer
  - Report on food: prescription for a sick industry by National commission on food marketing; S 245
- Crossword puzzles. F. W. Lewis. See back pages
- Cuba; News from suppressed in U.S., as in Time's refusal to print H. L. Matthews's reports; E .... 437; see also C. 594
- Cyprus; U.N. peacekeeping force not supported financially by France and Soviet Union 38

D

- Daley, Mayor Richard J. See Chicago
- Dance, the. For reviews, see Clurman, H.
- Darcy, S. A.
  - California "new radicals" should support Governor Brown; C .... 434; see also E, 372
- Davis, Ron; director of mime troupe, San Francisco 256
- Dawson, Barry; SNCC worker's testimony on dynamite in Philadelphia 535
- de Gaulle, President Charles. See France
- De Loache, C. D. (Deke); possible successor to J. E. Hoover as FBI director 629
- Dearborn, Mich.; New York Times obscured 40% vote for withdrawal from Vietnam. S. Gillers; C 626
  - Significance of Vietnam referendum; E 659
- DeJong, David Cornel
  - Occupant; P 394
- Delicate balance, a. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 361
- Democracy; Latin-American problems .... 182 ff.

PAGE

- Democratic party
  - Georgia split .... 340, 640 ff.
  - New York: the donkey beats himself in gubernatorial race. J. Desmond; S 379
  - 1966 losses analyzed. H. H. Bean; S 573
  - Prospects for 1968; need for new faces; E .. 562
  - Rival Mississippi factions 116
  - State leaders' misgivings over Johnson Vietnam policy 36, 67
  - Still strong but needs new ideas .... 630 ff.
  - Wedge of dissent: the Democratic rebels in Congress. R. G. Sherrill; S 341
- DeMuth, Jerry
  - Dissident Soviet students not working for peace; C .... 338; see also 142
- Dennis, Robert B.
  - J. G. Smart underestimated loss of Herald Tribune; C .... 370; see also 270
- Derry, J. H.; testimony helped convict M. Sobell in Rosenberg case; E 203
- Desmond, James
  - Warming up for November election. New York: the donkey beats himself in gubernatorial race; S 379
- Deuel, Peter M.
  - Warming up for November 8 election. Illinois: boy wonder C. H. Percy grows up; S 374
- Deutscher, Isaac
  - The "culture" riots in China: Mao at bay; S 442
  - Star speaker at second socialist scholars' conference, New York .... 347 ff.
- Devillers, Philippe
  - Preventing the peace in Vietnam: report from an intermediary; S 597
- Diem, Ngo Dinh; U. S. backing of late South Vietnamese president .... 79 ff., 598 ff.
- Dinner at eight (T. Guthrie's revival). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 397
- Disabled American veterans; funds raised through ident-o-tag and other means misspent. R. L. Smith; S 354
- Doctors. See Medicine
- Dodd, Senator Thomas J. Subject of ethics investigation treated differently from civil-righters and others subjected to Congressional scrutiny; E 37
- Dominican republic; burden of the past. K. Wagenheim; S 541
  - S. Lens article of May 2, The unfinished revolution, disputed. T. Draper; C .... 34, with Lens reply; see also Lens letter, C, 658
  - White House's lack of candor on 1965 intervention 410
- Don Carlos, Saturday afternoon. A. Gregor; P 646
- Donner, Frank J.
  - HUAC: from pillory to farce; S .... 174; see also C, 323 and 402
- Don't drink the water. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 652
- Douglas, Senator Paul H.; uphill fight for re-election in Illinois. P. M. Deuel; S 374
- Draft. See United States—Defense, national
- Draper, Theodore
  - Disputes S. Lens article of May 2, The unfinished revolution (in Dominican republic); C .... 34, with Lens reply; see also Lens letter, C, 658
- Dreher, Carl
  - The transit snarl: is it back to the rails?; S 11
- DRIVE. See Labor—Union
- Drucker, S.
  - Americans have revised priorities, putting life last; C .... 562; see also C, 452
- Drugs; as creating socialist man 348
- Drugs; goof-ball set: addiction in the suburbs. M. Schram; S 242
  - Pharmaceutical manufacturers opposed to vitamin regulation by FDA 579-580
- DuBois clubs; victim of government reprisal for antiwar stand 149, 151
- Duvalier, President François. See Haiti

E

- Eastlake, William
  - Alone on an elephant in wilds of Thailand; parable for U.S. in Vietnam; S 155
  - Dragon train to Singapore through guerrilla-infested Thailand; S 283
  - The night we bombed Peking (satire) 8
  - To die in Vietnam—for Hitler-loving Ky; S 418
- Education
  - Australian traditionalism 513
  - Birchite infiltration of school boards. A. Forster; S 73
  - California Berkeley campus furore over Navy recruiting table; E 661
  - Campus peace-group witnesses defy HUAC. F. J. Donner; S 174

(July-December, 1966)

Index

(Vol. 203)

PAGE
  Campus scare campaign; Constructive action's free distribution of anti-Communist books in U.S. colleges. W. Wingfield; S ... 206; see also C, 370
  Catholic pressure on New York constitutional convention for aid to parochial schools ... 474-475
  Child development group of Mississippi (CDGM), managed by poor Negroes, canceled by OEO ... 413 ff.; see also E, 501
  College students and draft. J. C. Esty, Jr.; S ... 209
  Dominican republic ... 544
  Dr. E. U. Condon advocated as regent of Colorado U.; E ... 269
  Dr. E. U. Condon's proposal for U.N.-sponsored international schools for world understanding; E ... 533
  Federal projects reduced because of Vietnam war; E ... 403
  First U.S. marine junior ROTC, at Jesuit high school in New Orleans, protested. J. J. Frazier; C ... 2
  Fulbright-scholarships article of June 13, by R. Kostelanetz, challenged. O. Handlin; C ... 434; see also Kostelanetz reply; C, 562
  Head start to what?; critique of HEW program for poor pre-schoolers. I. Kraft; S ... 179; see also C, 266
  Homogenized by U.S. in Latin America as baited trap. M. Chiapetta; S ... 321
  HUAC demand for lists of college students opposed to Vietnam war combated by ACLU; E ... 628
  In Vietnam under French ... 77 ff.
  Inefficacy of withdrawing of Federal funds for non-integrating school districts, as in Alabama; E ... 300
  M. McLuhan message in era of big hoax; E ... 596
  Maoist purges and regimentation in China .. 308
  Schools and race: integration for excellence. R. W. Major; S ... 213
  Secret research for government at universities should change to open type; E ... 267
  "Social science" research in foreign countries sponsored by Pentagon and CIA; E ... 140
  Supreme court decisions leading to integration ... 388
  Teachers' new militancy on salaries ... 547
  Teamsters' union's TOP program to train and find jobs for school dropouts; E ... 597
  U.S. education commissioner H. Howe II target of Southern segregationists; E ... 467; 572
Edwards, Representative Don; Democratic dissenter on Johnson policies ... 342, 344, 372
Egypt. See United Arab Republic
Eh? Reviewed by R. Pasolli; D ... 262
  Reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 494
Eisenhower, Dwight D.; 1953 statement on U.S. Vietnam involvement. D. Levy; C ... 170
  Proposal for international school for world understanding; E ... 533
  Valedictory statement on military-industrial complex attributed to pique by A. Yarmolinsky ... 639-640
Elections
  Analysis of 1966 returns shows liberal Republicans strengthened; blueprint for party's renovation; E ... 530
  California: barbecues and other trivia in gubernatorial race. G. Hill; S ... 377; see also C, 466
  California elected Reagan in flight from reality to restore "paradise"; E ... 596
  California gubernatorial race: how to succeed with the backlash. C. McWilliams; S ... 438
  California "new politics" advocates should support Brown; E ... 372; see also C, 466
  Gainesville, Georgia's, unresolved tie vote for city commissioner; E ... 692
  Georgia Democratic gubernatorial primary won by segregationist L. G. Maddox in LBJ backlash; E ... 340
  Georgia gubernatorial — nobody won. S. Meyer; S ... 640
  Illinois: boy wonder C. H. Percy grows up. P. H. Deuel; S ... 374
  Johnson gamble for 1966 and 1968 in escalating Vietnam war; E ... 139
  Look ahead at 1968 and 1972; E ... 562; see also C, 626
  Massachusetts primaries' backlash; E ... 268
  New York state: the donkey beats himself in gubernatorial race. J. Desmond; S ... 379
  1966 returns set 1967 rightward course for Johnson; E ... 659
  1966 too soon for peace candidates. S. Gottlieb; S ... 575

PAGE
  No fun in Bavaria over returns giving status to National democrats. C. Amery; S ... 637
  No real opposition party in 1966; possible Republican peace platform in 1968; E ... 498
  Politics of equivocation: two faces of the GOP. M. Viorst; S ... 630
  Republicans' use of white backlash in 1966; E ... 371
  Resurgence of Nazism feared in rise of West German National democratic party; E ... 596
  Speculation on Presidential candidacy of R. F. Kennedy in 1968 and 1972. J. Newfield; S ... 505; see also C, 562
  Test run for '68 in 1966 contests. Blue notes from Dixie. P. Good; S ... 570. Mathematics of consensus. L. H. Bean; S ... 573. Too soon for peace in Vietnam. S. Gottlieb; S ... 575
  Vietnam "election" of September 11 as mere demonstration; E ... 266
Elegant, Robert S.
  The enormous revival meeting in Communist China; S ... 307; see also C, 388
Elephants; of Asia likened to human inhabitants; behavior as lesson to U.S. By W. Eastlake; S ... 155
Eliot, T. S.; as playwright. C. H. Smith; D .. 325
Emerson, Thomas I.
  Speech without assembly?: the Supreme court v. the demonstrators in Adderly v. Florida case; S ... 704
Encounter; editors fail to deny receipt of CIA funds. E. Bentley; C ... 90
  Tendentiousness charged in May 16 editorial confirmed by C. C. O'Brien essay. A. Lillywell; C ... 51
Engelbach, Jerry
  California Governor Brown's failures; June 20 editorial too favorable; C ... 2; see also C, 66
Epstein, Edward J.; critique of Warren commission in book Inquest ... 44 ff.
Ernst, P. G.
  Will success spoil Aspen, Colo.?; shortcomings of cultural-sports center; S ... 70; see also C, 106
Escalation; idiot logic of in Vietnam war; E ... 170
Eshleman, Clayton
  Explorations in the apolitical; abortion of projected Peruvian cultural magazine Quena by ICPNA, U.S. embassy organization; S ... 285. See also C, 530, with Eshleman reply
Espionage. See Spies
Esty, John C., Jr.
  The future of the draft; S ... 209
Ethiopia; joint complaint with Liberia on South Africa rejected by International court of justice; E ... 107
Europe; French and Soviet concepts of ... 694
Evers, Charles; Mississippi NAACP head's rejection of black-power slogan while wielding political strength ... 113, 115-116

F

Family planning. See Birth control
FAO. See United Nations
Federal bureau of investigation (FBI). See United States—Justice department
Federalist Papers, The; obsolete on Congress's control of military; E ... 405
Ferber, Edna. See Kaufman, G. S.
Fichandler, Zelda; founder of Arena theatre, Washington, D.C. ... 27, 132
Fiction. The night we bombed Peking. By W. Eastlake ... 8
Field, Edward
  Two departures; P ... 558
Films. See Motion pictures
Findley, Representative Paul; amendment to "food for freedom" legislation would handicap nations trading with Cuba or North Vietnam ... 122
Finn, Seamus
  Playing with children; P ... 589
Fleming, D. F.
  Praise for J. McDermott's Welfare imperialism in Vietnam; C ... 202; see also 76
Florida; conviction of student rights demonstrators upheld by Supreme court. T. I. Emerson; S ... 704
  Giveway programs to private interests, as in disposition of sunken treasure; E ... 629
  Governorship won by segregationist Republican, C. Kirk, Jr. ... 572
Flynn, Charles
  Young Americans for freedom not a Birch affiliate; C ... 370, with W. Wingfield reply; see also 206

PAGE
Food; effectiveness of supermarket boycotts by housewives; E ... 341 and 498
  "Housewives' rebellion" over high prices caught Republicans off balance ... 498
  Prescription for a sick industry by National commission on food marketing. J. Cross; S ... 245
Food and agriculture organization (FAO). See United Nations
Forbes, Malcolm S.; publisher on U.S. build-up in Vietnam and Thailand ... 299
Ford foundation; relations with actor's workshop, San Francisco ... 256
  Training-center grant to Hunters Point, San Francisco slum ... 607 ff.
Foreign aid. FAO: the imperative of altruism. G. Myrdal; S ... 666
  Paradox in "food freedom." B. J. Oudes; S ... 120
  Portent for the future: U.S. welfare imperialism in Vietnam. J. McDermott; S .. 76
  To Dominican republic ... 542 ff.
  To Haiti ... 540
  To Iran ... 415 ff.
Forer, Leon
  Impact of truth in A. Werth's French eyes on Vietnam: America's colony in hell (June 13); C ... 51
Forster, Arnold
  Birchism at the grass roots; infiltration of school boards, etc., combated by "Birch watchers"; S ... 73
France; as arms supplier to Middle East ... 111
  Colonialism in Vietnam compared with U.S. welfare imperialism ... 77 ff.
  De Gaulle's proposed timetable of U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam only angers Johnson; E ... 234
  Kosygin in Paris: differences within amity with Soviet Union. A. Werth; S ... 693
  New code of military discipline requires disobedience to orders contravening Geneva convention; E ... 500
  Genesis of rift with U.S. falsified in State department account; E ... 235
Frazier, Jack J.
  First U.S. marine junior ROTC, at Jesuit high school in New Orleans, protested; C ... 2
Freedland, Sylvia R.
  Can't let Nation subscription expire; C ... 498
Freedoms foundation; sponsorship of J. E. Hoover center on strategy and tactics of Communism; E ... 629
Fromm, Harold
  Thankful for Johnson's consistency in lying; C ... 234
Frost, David; New Jersey peace candidate for Democratic Senate nomination ... 67, 172, 576
Fuel oil; price rigging by industry; E ... 499
Fulbright, Senator J. William
  "Loner" in dissent from Johnson policies ... 342, 344, 346
  Warning on further U.S. involvement in Thailand ... 299
Fulbright scholarships; alleged misstatements in R. Kostelanetz article of June 13. O. Handlin; C ... 434; see also Kostelanetz reply; C, 562
Fullman, Christopher E.
  Right-wing infiltration of U.S. press convincingly presented by F. Pollock; C ... 580; see also 479
Funeral in the East. P. Neruda (translated by R. Bly); P ... 54
Furnas, C. C.; testimony on coming water crisis; E ... 205

G

Galantay, Ervin
  Reviews of architecture
    Columbia, Maryland, new town ... 714
    Reston, Va., and other new towns ... 652
    Whitney museum of American art, New York ... 292
Galbraith, John Kenneth; in R. F. Kennedy group working on Vietnam dilemma ... 340
Galitz, Bernard Edwin
  New stage for man in Chinese ideology?; C ... 516
Gall, Norman
  Revolution without revolutionaries in Latin America; Communist guerrillas' decline; S ... 145
Gallagher, Rep. Cornelius E.; hearings on proposed National data center ... 450-451
Game, the. L. Gluck; P ... 229
Gardner, Frederick H.
  The actor's workshop (San Francisco) is dead; D ... 256
Gardner, Isabella
  Salt; P ... 654
Garro, Anthony J., and L. Lander
  Charter group for a pledge of conscience seeks funds for defense of Harlem six; C ... 66; see also 39

PAGE

- Gas, natural; as bomb in the cellar of homes. S. Morrison; S 318
- Gaulle, President Charles de. See France
- Geneva convention; must be obeyed by French forces; E 500
- Georgia; dead-heat gubernatorial race between segregationists Maddox and Callaway .. 571, 572
  - Gainesville's unresolved tie vote for city commissioner; E 692
  - Gubernatorial election nobody won. S. Mayer; S 640
  - LBJ backlash as factor in defeat of moderate E. Arnall in Democratic gubernatorial primary; E 340
  - See also Atlanta
- Georgy girl. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 494
- Gerassi, John; on need for complete rejuvenation in Latin America 539
- Geritol; FDA action against 579
- Germany; problems bearing on Franco-Soviet amity 694
- Germany, West. Letter from Germany: a sword too heavy?; crisis between army and defense ministry. C. Amery; S 346
  - No fun in Bavaria over election returns giving status to National democrats. C. Amery; S 637
  - Real danger in rightist National democratic party victories; E 596
  - Whither West Germany? C. Amery; S 88
- Giaimo, Robert, Representative; threatened by independent peace candidate R. Cook .... 469 ff.
- Gil, Frederico C.
  - Latin America: economic integration for progress; S 280
- Gillers, Stephen
  - 40% of Dearborn voters favored withdrawal from Vietnam—fact obscured in New York Times; C 626
- Ginsburg, Mark
  - Praise for I-Hua Chou proposal on Chinese negotiations; C .... 516; see also 311
- Give me peace. A. Voznesensky; P 162
- Glicksman, Abraham
  - Jingle on "might makes right" theme; C 562
- Gluck, Louise
  - The game; P 229
- Goldberg, Ambassador Arthur J.; "peace offensive" on Vietnam in U.N. By D. Grant; E 338
- Goldman, Eric; failure of mission as "intellectual-in-residence" at White House; E .... 236; see also C, 298, and E, 301
- Goldwater, Barry; legacy to Republican party .... 630 ff.
- Gollins, James
  - Life insurance: the monolithic sect's reaction to book Pay now, die later; S 670
- Good, Paul
  - Blue notes from Dixie in 1966 elections; S 571
  - Chicago summer: bossism, racism and Dr. King; S 237
  - A tale of two cities out to get SNCC—Philadelphia and Atlanta; S 534
  - A white look a black power; S .... 112; see also C, 202
- Good times, wonderful times. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 133
- Goodwin, Richard; in R. F. Kennedy group working on Vietnam dilemma 340
- "Goof balls." See Drugs
- Gottlieb, Sanford
  - 1966 too soon for peace candidates; S 575
- Goulder, Dr. L. Lynton; co-founder of "Birch watchers" .... 74 ff.
- Graham, Frank; would have stood up for beleaguered North Carolina U. English instructor; E 469
- Grant, Donald
  - If Johnson wants peace, he should send Thant to Vietnam with latter's three-point plan; E 338
- Graves, Stewart
  - Mark Twain's war prayer; C 338
- Great Britain; Autralia's ties loosened but traditions remain 512-513
  - Problems with Mauritius .... 447 ff.
  - Salisbury talks with Rhodesians over political status apt to be fruitless; South African pressure. N. M. Shamuyarira; E 5
  - Significance of seaman's strike. R. Williams (letter from Britain); S .... 18; see also correction, 90
- Greeley, Horace; founder of New York Tribune 270
- Greenberg, Selig
  - The Medicare bonanza for hospitals and doctors; S 513
- Gregor, Arthur
  - Don Carlos, Saturday afternoon; P 646
  - Lament for a gifted man; P 622
- Griffin, Ida Ruth
  - I am Mississippi fed; P 522

PAGE

- Gruening, Senator Ernest; Democratic dissenter on Johnson policies 343, 344, 345
- Grundfest, Harry
  - Anecdote implying CIA backing of Congress for cultural freedom; C 51
- Guatemala; Communist-led guerrilla activities 145, 146
- Guthrie, Tyrone; revival of Dinner at eight reviewed by H. Clurman; D 397
  - Minneapolis theatre reviewed by J. Novick; D .... 197 427. See also C, 266
- Gzowski, Peter
  - Television; CBC and public-affairs program This hour has seven days; S 61

H

- Haiti: chaotic and corrupt. G. R. Latortue; S 539
- Hamburger, Michael
  - "U.S. offers condolence and aid to Vietnamese bombed in error"; P 711
- Hand is at the gate, a. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 363
- Handlin, Oscar
  - Misstatements in R. Kostelanetz article of June 13 on Fulbright scholarships; C .... 434; see also Kostelanetz reply; C, 562
- Hardy, Representative Porter; investigation of Defense cost-reduction claims 699-700
- Harlem, See New York city
- Harris, Senator Fred R.; hearings on Defense-subsidized "social science" university research projects abroad 140
- Harris, Michael
  - Savings and loan: the easy lenders in for trouble; S 152
- Hartford, Conn. Stage company reviewed by J. Novick; D 131
- Hartke, Senator Frank; among Democratic dissenters from Johnson policies .. 342, 343, 345
- Hartman, Robert S.
  - C. Roberts naive on Johnson and press; C .... 530; see also 406
- Hassel, Kai-Uwe von; West German defense minister on defensive 346
- Hatch, Robert
  - Reviews of motion pictures
    - Alfie 229
    - Chisingura 526
    - Crazy quilt, the 430
    - Georgy girl 494
    - Good times, wonderful times 133
    - Idol, the 229
    - Joseph Kilian 133
    - Loves of a blonde 526
    - Masculine feminine 366
    - Salto 429
    - Shameless old lady, the 366
    - Uncle, the 134
    - Wrong box, the 134
- Hatcher, Harlan H.; Michigan U. president's acquiescence in HUAC's demand for lists of students opposed to Vietnam war 628
- Hatfield, Mark; anti-war candidate from Oregon victorious in Senate race 576, 577
- Hatred of men with black hair. R. Bly; P 192
- Haughton, James; fiery Negro speaker at socialist scholars' conference 349
- Hayward, Max (translator)
  - Give me peace. A. Voznesensky; P 162
- Head start to what?; critique of HEW program for poor pre-schoolers. I. Kraft; S .... 179; see also C, 266; E, 501
- Helpern, Dr. Milton; on bullets in Kennedy assassination 44, 45
- Helstoski, Representative Henry; misgivings over Johnson Vietnam policy 36
- Hempstone, Smith
  - Latin America: the changing role of the Catholic church; S 216
- Hernandez, Aileen C.; quit do-little Equal employment opportunities commission 660
- Hershan, Stella K.
  - Material requested for book on E. Roosevelt; C 690
- Hershey, General Lewis B.; opposed to changes in Selective service system .... 210 ff.
- Hershon, Robert
  - Report to the blue guard; P 555
- Hicks, Louise Day; Boston school committee chairman; backlash symbol 268
- Hill, Gladwin
  - Warming up for November 8 election. California: barbecues and other trivia in gubernatorial race; S .... 377; see also C, 466
- Hill, John
  - Critique of I. Kraft on Head Start; C .... 266; see also 179
- Hispaniola '66. Haiti: chaotic and corrupt. G. R. Latortue; S .... 539. Dominican republic: burden of the past. K. Wagenheim; S 541

PAGE

- Hitler, Adolf; timely tests for similar power-madness in a country's leader. G. Barus; C 156
- Hochman, Sandra
  - The night harbour; P 134
  - The potential prisoner; P 490
- Hoffman, Daniel
  - Asylum; P 364
- Hoffman, Marvin, and John Mudd
  - Mississippi: the new plantations; OEO's weakening of Community action and other poverty programs keeps Negroes at mercy of whites; S 411
- Holifield, Representative Chet; subcommittee hobbled General accounting office's attempts to save on Defense contracts .... 697 ff.
- Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.; "clear and present danger" test on dissent 317
- Homecoming, the. D. Ray; P 226
- Hong Kong; listening post for Maoist propaganda 307
- Hospitality. D. Ray; P 487
- Hoover, J. Edgar; proposed memorialization in Center on strategy and tactics of Communism at Valley Forge; E 629
  - See also United States—Justice department
- Hospitals. See Medicine
- House Un-American activities committee (HUAC). See United States—Congress
- Housing; backlash issue in California .. 377, 439 ff.
  - Catalyst for Rev. M. L. King's summer civil-rights drive in Chicago .... 238 ff.
  - China's progress in 303, 306
  - Dominican shortage 544
  - Johnson's continuing real-estate operations in Texas; E 628
  - Overselling in California; problems of savings and loan companies .... 152 ff.
  - Usurious mortgage interest rates; E 301
- Howard, Anthony; London Observer article on Korean-type solution for Vietnam war sought by Johnson; E 34
  - On possible No wider war committee formed by R. F. Kennedy group; E 339
- Howe, Harold, II; U.S. commissioner of education target of Southern racialists; E 467; 372, 572
- How's the world treating you? Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 524
- Hubbard, Orville L.; Dearborn, Mich., mayor put Vietnam withdrawal on referendum; E 659
- Hudson, Lois Phillips and Randolph H.
  - Commendation of Governor Brown of California in June 20 editorial deserved; could not have saved C. Chessman; C .... 66; see also J. Engelbach, C, 2
- Humes, Dr. J. J., autopsy surgeon on Kennedy assassination .... 45 ff.; see also C, 138
- Humphries, Rolph (translator)
  - Song of the little death, by F. G. Lorca; P .. 92
- Hussein I, King. See Jordan

I

- I am Mississippi fed. I. R. Griffin; P 522
- I don't mind. C. Jackson; P 520
- Ibarruri, Dolores
  - I become "La Pasionaria"; S 94
- ICPNA. See Peru
- Idol, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 229
- Illinois. Warming up for November 8 election. Illinois: boy wonder C. H. Percy grows up. P. M. Deuel; S 374
  - See also Chicago
- Illinois Business Review; on economics of water pollution 4
- Imperialism. Portent for the future: U.S. welfare imperialism in Vietnam. J. McDermott; S .... 76; see also C, 170, 202, 484
- Imprisonment. See Prisons
- Indiana; Johnson spared sight of antiwar pickets in Indianapolis; E 141
- Indians, American. Indian tests the mainstream, the. D. McNickle; S 275
- Indians, east; majority in Mauritius .... 447 ff.
- Indonesia; hope after massacre of leftists. A. Josey; S 565
- Inflation; contribution of Vietnam expenditures 434, 499, 547
  - Indonesian 566
  - Taste of in food prices; factors in; E 341
- Insurance. Life insurance: the monolithic sect's reaction to book Pay now, die later. J. Gollin; S 670
- Integration. See Negroes—Civil rights
- Intellectuals; reasons for poor relations with Johnson; resignation of E. Goldman as liaison; E .... 236; see also C, 298
  - Chinese purges .... 303, 307 ff.
  - J. P. Roche succeeds E. Goldman as liaison man with Johnson; blast at opponents of Vietnam war; E 301
- International court of justice. See United Nations

PAGE

- Investigation, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 395
- Iran; naval ambitions ... 109
  - Politics of anti-Americanism. M. Tehranian; S ... 415
- Irving, Jules, left actor's workshop, San Francisco, for Lincoln center ... 256
- Isolationism. Who are the isolationists in U.S. —Johnson administration rather than Fulbrights?; E ... 202
- Israel; censured in U.N. for raid into Jordan. A. Weill-Tuckerman; E ... 626
  - Johnson's implication that U.S. commitments depend on Jews' support of Vietnam policy; E ... 268
  - Like Arab foes, purchaser of U.S. armament. J. A. Morris, Jr.; S ... 109
- Izvestia; on treatment of Soviet visitors in Communist China ... 695-696

J

- Jackson, Ann
  - Unwanted child as victim when abortion is denied; C ... 466; see also E, 373
- Jackson, Carolyn
  - I don't mind; P ... 520
- Jacobs, Paul. Harpsichord recital reviewed by B. Boretz; M ... 125
- Jaspers, Karl; on West Germans' anxieties .. 90
- Javits, Senator Jacob K.; ambition to be Republican vice-presidential candidate in 1968 complicated by Governor Rockefeller ... 380
- Jefferson, Thomas; on civil liberties and Bill of rights ... 315 ff.
  - Relations with press ... 406
- Jehovah's witnesses; sect persecuted in Soviet Union ... 143
- Jelliff, Russell and Rowena; founders of Karamu, Cleveland settlement house and theatre ... 257
- Jews: Kosygin on status in Soviet Union 695
  - Wide opposition to Johnson's course in Vietnam; Israel used as leverage; E ... 268
- Joffrey ballet, New York city center. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 333
- John Birch society. See Birch society, John
- Johnson, Daniel; victorious Union Nationale candidate for Quebec premiership ... 6 ff.
- Johnson, President Lyndon B.
  - AFL-CIO's blank check for prosecution of Vietnam war; E ... 204
  - Angered by de Gaulle's proposed timetable for U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam; E 234
  - Asia trip as great road show; E ... 466
  - Australians' resentment over visit. J. A. Kane; C ... 690
  - Brown U.'s conferring of honorary degree to protested by Professor E. Rayack's departure — accompanied by "planted" nurse; E ... 206
  - Coming popularity crisis as Vietnam war continues; E ... 67
  - Consistent lying as reason for thankfulness. H. Fromm; C ... 234
  - Democratic rebels against policies in Congress. R. G. Sherrill; S ... 341
  - Directed TV-press "snow job" on bombing of oil installations near Hanoi and Haiphong; E ... 66
  - Essential isolationism of Vietnam course; E ... 202
  - Gambles politically in escalating Vietnam war; E ... 139
  - Gratuitous castigation of Nixon and fuzzing of facts on Vietnam; E ... 531
  - Implications that U.S. commitments to Israel depend on Jews' support of Vietnam war; E ... 268
  - Interest in Mohole project and friendship with contractor, Brown & Root; E ... 172
  - Jingle inspired by right-does-not-make-right theme. A. Glicksman; C ... 562
  - Labor problem in airline strike; E ... 106
  - LBJ backlash in Georgia Democratic gubernatorial primary; E ... 340
  - Less popular than his program ... 630-631
  - Madness mooted. P. Sievevitz; C ... 690
  - Must be turned out of White House; importance of peace vote; E ... 172
  - 1966 returns set rightward course for 1967; E ... 659
  - Ordered HEW study of rising medical costs ... 513 ff.
  - Past peak of popularity; chances in 1968; E ... 562; see also C, 626
  - Plans for Korea-type solution in Vietnam; E ... 34
  - Policy advisers, such as R. R. Bowie and W. W. Rostow, skeptical of international cooperation; E ... 205
  - Problem of distrust; E ... 370
  - Protestations of desire for peace in Vietnam belied by ignoring of U Thant's three-point plan. D. Grant; E ... 338

PAGE

  - Relations with R. F. Kennedy 340, 506, 507
  - Religious protestations questioned. F. Lundberg; C ... 170
  - Retrograde attitude toward Latin America ... 540 ff.
  - Right on Vietnam when Vice President. W. Landshoff; C ... 19
  - Sanity test for similar national leader. C. Barus; C ... 156; see also E, 141
  - Secrecy on costs of Vietnam war; E ... 434
  - Should order reorganization of Selective service; E ... 660
  - Smoke screens on budget situation; E ... 627
  - Stamp on "food for freedom" legislation ... 120 ff.
  - Strained relations with intellectuals; E. Goldman succeeded by J. P. Roche as White House "intellectual-in-residence"; E ... 236; see also C, 298
  - Texas real-estate operations continue; E 628
  - Unfulfillable promises of economic aid to Asia; E ... 530
  - Viewed as fearsome antagonist by U.S. press. C. Roberts; S ... 406; see also C, 530
  - Where leading with escalation of Vietnam war?; E ... 170
- Johnson, Robert S.
  - Americans view the Vietnam war: "To get the truth . . . I just don't know"; cross section of Auburn, Wash.; S ... 502
- Jones, Kit. Play The key reviewed by R. Pasolli; D ... 718
- Jonson, Ben. Play The alchemist (Lincoln center production) reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 460
- Jordan; like Israel. recipient of U.S. arms .. 110 ff.
  - Target of raid by Israel; latter censured in U.N. By A. Weill-Tuckerman; E ... 626
- Joseph Kilian. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP .. 133
- Josey, Alex
  - Indonesia: hope after massacre of leftists; S ... 565
  - Singapore: one-party democracy; S ... 661
- Justice. See Crime

K

- Kane, J. A.
  - Australians' resentment over Johnson visit; C ... 690
- Kaplan, Robert
  - Constitution should be amended to enable reversal of mistaken foreign policies; C ... 19
- Karamu; art and argot at Cleveland integrated theatre. B. Kremen; D ... 257
- Kastenmeier, Representative Robert W.; Democratic dissenter on Johnson policies ... 342, 344
- Kaufman, George S. Play The butter and egg man (Cherry lane revival) reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 493
- Kaufman, George S., and E. Ferber. Play Dinner at eight (T. Guthrie revival) reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 397
- Keats, Howard
  - Opposition to Negro violence not racism; C ... 530
- Kennedy, Senator Edward M.; on draft reform ... 211 ff.
- Kennedy, President John F.; rational attitude toward Latin America ... 540
  - Relations with press ... 407 ff.
  - See also Warren commission
- Kennedy, Senator Robert F.; African trip made him international figure; presidential prospects; E ... 2
  - Bobby phenomenon, the. J. Newfield; S ... 505; see also C, 562
  - Contribution to split in New York Democratic party ... 379
  - Divergence from Johnson on Vietnam; "shadow cabinet's" possible No wider war committee; E ... 339
  - Feud over wiretapping with J. E. Hoover, sparked by Bobby Baker case; E ... 690
  - Gaining strength from criticism of Vietnam war policy ... 67
  - Possible Vice Presidential candidate in 1966, Presidential in 1972; E ... 562; see also C, 626
- Kerrins, Dr. Joseph F.; co-founder of "Birch watchers" ... 74 ff.
- Key, the. Reviewed by R. Pasolli; D ... 718
- Killing of Sister George, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 459
- King, Joseph A.
  - Limit to A. Cranston's courage; C ... 298; see also E, 108
- King, Rev. Martin Luther, Jr.; Chicago summer's work against bossism and racism. P. Good; S ... 237
  - On black power; participation in Mississippi marches ... 112 ff.
  - See also Negroes—Civil rights

PAGE

- Kinnell, Galway
  - Night in the forest; P ... 398
  - Poem of Negro boys I swam with in the Mississippi seven years ago; P ... 126
- Kitchen, the. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 334
- Kleiman, Harlan; executive director of Long wharf theatre, New Haven ... 132
- Knott, Walter; California rightist and Constructive action trustee ... 208
- Konwicki, Tadeusz. Film Salto reviewed by R. Hatch; MP ... 429
- Koolish, Abraham D.; shady fund raiser's connection with Disabled American veterans ... 354-355
- Korean war; similar end to Vietnam war sought by Johnson; E ... 34. Impracticality of proposal; E ... 435
- Korty, John. Film The crazy quilt reviewed by R. Hatch; MP ... 430
- Kostelanetz, Richard; alleged misstatements in June 13 article on Fulbright scholarships. O. Handlin; C ... 434; see also Kostelanetz reply; C, 562
- Kosygin, Premier Aleksei N.; scientific approach to Soviet economic problems; moderation on Vietnam ... 177-178
  - Visit to Paris: differences within amity with France. A. Werth; S ... 693
- Kozloff, Max
  - Manet as founder of modern art; A ... 588
  - Reviews of art
    - Manet, E. (Philadelphia museum exhibition) ... 621
    - Martin, A. ... 524
    - Samaras, L. ... 525
    - Steinberg, S ... 683
- Kraft, Ivor
  - Head start to what?; critique of HEW program for poor pre-schoolers; S ... 179; see also C, 266; E, 501
- Kremen, Bennett
  - Art and argot at Karamu, integrated Cleveland theatre; D ... 257
- Kuh, Frederick
  - Is peace naive?; collaboration with Soviet Union as key to Vietnam settlement; E ... 69; see also C, 106
- Kupferman, Representative Theodore R.
  - Slapdash analysis by J. G. Smart of Herald Tribune's demise; C ... 388; see also 270
- Ky, Premier Nguyen Ky. See Vietnam

K

- Labor
  - Union
    - AFL-CIO's boss Meany's blank check on Johnson course in Vietnam; E ... 204
    - Air line pilots association and current shortage ... 482
    - Airline strike as Mr. Johnson's labor problem; E ... 106
    - Latin America: between bread and revolution. S. Lens; S ... 248
    - Pressures on labor: Vietnam, race and the unions. B. J. Widick; S ... 545
    - Rank-and-file opposition to open housing .. 441
    - Relations with Reid family's proprietorship of New York Tribune ... 270
    - San Francisco county jail No. 2 prisoners' self-organization; E ... 437
    - SANE group's opposition to Meany-Lovestone foreign policies; E ... 595
    - Significance of British seaman's strike. R. Williams; S ... 18
    - Support of Brown in California gubernatorial election; E ... 372
    - Teamsters' DRIVE program to withstand anti-labor Congress. T. E. Tornek; S .. 663
    - Teamsters' Transportation opportunity program (TOP) to train and find employment to school dropouts; E ... 597
    - Will be fighting Labour government in Britain ... 187
- Labour party (Great Britain); lost illusion during July crisis. R. Williams; S ... 185
- Lament for a gifted man. A. Gregor; P ... 622
- Lander, Louise. See Garro, A. J.
- Landlord, the. S. Parker; P ... 294
- Landshoff, Werner
  - Johnson should follow own advice to President Kennedy on Vietnam; C ... 19
- Langston, Robert H.
  - Alexander defense committee's thanks for July 25 editorial; Justice department order rescinded; C ... 170; see also E, 69
- Larkin, Margaret
  - Family planning in Mexico; S ... 508
- Latin America
  - Economic integration for progress. F. C. Gil; S ... 280
  - Education imposed by U.S. as baited trap. M. Chiapetta; S ... 321
  - Labor between bread and revolution. S. Lens; S ... 248

PAGE

  - Meany-Lovestone-CIA policy toward unionism ... 545
  - R. F. Kennedy on ... 506
  - Rejuvenation needed ... 539
  - Revolution without revolutionaries; Communist guerrillas' decline. N. Gall; S .. 145
  - Search for a politics. A. Triveri; S ... 182
  - U.S. as bastion of counterrevolution ... 271
  - U.S. welfare imperialism in. ... 85, 86
- Latortue, Gérard R.
  - Haiti: chaotic and corrupt; S ... 539
- Latrobe, Pa.; confrontation between Birchites and St. Vincent college on Marxist forum; E ... 404
- Lee Kuan Yew, Prime minister. See Singapore
- Lee, Maryat. Play The tightrope walker reviewed by R. Pasolli; D ... 718
- Legislatures. See States, U.S.
- Leiterman, Douglas; producer of CBC TV program This hour has seven days ... 62
- LeMay, General Curtis; advocates bombing North Vietnam into stone age ... 435
- Lenel, Irmgard
  - China must be party to Vietnam settlement; C ... 106; see also E, 69
- Lens, Sidney
  - Latin America: labor between bread and revolution; S ... 248
  - May 2 article, The unfinished revolution (in Santo Domingo), disputed by T. Draper; C ... 34, with Lens reply; see also Lens letter, C, 658
- Lesage, Jean; Liberal premier of Quebec defeated ... 6
- Letter from Australia. See Australia
- Letter from Germany. See Germany, West
- Letters from Britain. See Great Britain
- Levy, David
  - U.S. in Vietnam for investments, not from benevolence; C ... 170; see also 76
- Levy, Hyman
  - What kind of people are power-drunk Americans?; C ... 452; see also C, 562
- Lewis, Frank W.
  - Crossword puzzles. See back pages
- Liberal party (New York); uncertain factor in New York gubernatorial election 379-380
- Liberalism; Latin-American decline ... 182
- Liberia. See Ethiopia
- Liebman, Marvin; begetter of rightist propaganda groups, notably Committee of one million; E ... 565
- Life; contrasting "value" of U.S. air-crash victims and Vietnam natives; E ... 372
- Life insurance. See Insurance
- Like Swinburne to Sappho. By R. Roseliep; P ... 286
- Lillywell, Andrew
  - May 16 editorial on Encounter's tendentiousness confirmed by C. C. O'Brien essay; C ... 51
- Lin Piao, deputy premier; power in China.... 310
- Liu Shao-chi; former No. 2 man in China target of "cultural" rioters ... 443
- Living arts theatre, Philadelphia; Reviewed by J. Novick; D ... 29
- Livings, Henry. Play eh? reviewed by R. Pasolli; D ... 292. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 494
- Loeffler, Theodore B.; co-founder and official of Constructive action ... 206 ff.; see also C, 370
- Logan, John
  - White Pass ski patrol; P ... 358
- Long, Huey; on fascism in U.S. ... 467
- Long, Senator Russell B.; critical of HEW's generosity to hospitals ... 515
- Long Island. See New York state
- Long wharf theatre, New Haven. Reviewed by J. Novick; D ... 132
- Lorca, Frederico, García
  - Song of the little death (translated by R. Humphries); P ... 92
- Los Angeles Times; stand on Reagan candidacy as test of responsible Republicanism; E ... 173
- Lotteries; New York state referendum on oft-abused sucker trap; E ... 436
- Loves of a blonde. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP ... 526
- Lovestone, Jay; Latin-American strategist for AFL-CIO ... 249 ff., 545, 595
- Lubove, Ray, May 23 article, Social work and the life of the poor, disputed. D. Swisshelm; C ... 51
- Luce, Phillip Abbott; witness for HUAC received fee ... 468
- Lunch hour idyll. S. Touster; P ... 360
- Lundberg, Ferdinand
  - Sincerity of Johnson's religious protestations questioned; C ... 170

PAGE

M

- McCarran internal security act (1950); compared with Weltner bill as clear and present danger to civil liberties. V. Countryman; S ... 16
- McCarthyism; influence on Supreme court 317
- McDermott, John
  - Portent for the future: U.S. welfare imperialism in Vietnam; S ... 76; see also C, 170, 202, 484; E, 565
- McGee, Senator Gale; pro-Vietnam spokesman 345
- McGinty, Colonel William J.; former Air force information chief in Vietnam known to A. Sylvester despite latter's implied denial; E ... 236
- McGovern, Senator George; Democratic dissenter on Johnson policies ... 343, 344
- MacInnes, Colin
  - Mauritius, world strains in microcosm; S .. 447
- McKee, William F.; retired air force general appointed administrator of Federal aviation agency in 1965 ... 50
- McKissick, Floyd; CORE head's bid for leadership of civil-rights movement ... 112 ff.
- McLuhan, Marshall; media-message man's college lecture tour in era of big hoax; E .. 596
- McNamara, Secretary Robert S.; demonstration against at Harvard not without reason; E ... 594
  - Favors draft lottery and universal national service; E ... 660
  - Misunderstood on national service for young Americans ... 210
  - See also United States—Defense, national
- McNickle, D'Arcy
  - The Indian tests the mainstream of American life; S ... 275
- McWilliams, Carey
  - Reagan vs. Brown in California: how to succeed with the backlash; S ... 438
- Madariaga, Salvador de; scholarship fund for Spanish exiles. H. Arendt; C ... 690
- Maddox, Lester G.; Georgia gubernatorial candidate prominent in Southern rebellion against Negro gains ... 340, 372, 467, 468, 571, 572, 640 ff.
- Madison, James; on Bill of rights ... 315, 316
- Mail. See United States—Post office department
- Mailman, the, and das ewig weibliche. J. Schevill; P ... 429
- Major, Reginald W.
  - Schools and race: integration for excellence; S ... 213
- Malik, Adam; Indonesian foreign minister's opposition to Chinese; political maneuvers 657 ff.
- Mallan, Lloyd; magazine articles exemplify "the Russians faked it" school of thought in space exploits. D. Cohen; S ... 445
- Malraux, André; on Spanish civil war ... 101
- Manet, Edouard; as founder of modern art. M. Kozloff; A ... 588
  - See also Kozloff, M.
- Manila conference; Johnson "road show" will not affect Vietnam war; E ... 466
  - Johnson's unfulfillable promises of economic aid to Asia; E ... 530
  - Timing of; essentially a war gathering; E .. 370
- Manitoba centre theatre. Reviewed by J. Novick; D ... 196
- Mann, Thomas; baleful influence as Johnson's adviser on Latin America ... 540
- Mann, Thomas (novelist); on Spanish civil war ... 101
- Manufacturers Hanover. See Banks and banking
- Mao Tse-tung. See China, Communist
- Marcus, Frank. Play Sister George reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 459
- Marshall, Solicitor general Thurgood; reported confrontation with J. E. Hoover of FBI on wiretapping; E ... 37
- Martell, Charles
  - Ouija message from JFK; P ... 460
- Martin, Agnes. Reviewed by M. Kozloff; A .. 524
- Marx, Karl. See Socialism
- Masculine feminine. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP ... 366
- Mason, Sarah
  - War; P ... 522
- Massachusetts; Backlash in primary elections; E ... 268
- Matthews, Herbert L.; firsthand reports on Cuba suppressed by employer, New York Times; E ... 437; see also C, 594
- Mauritius; world strains in microcosm. C. MacInnes; S ... 447
- Maynard, Thomas L.; Maine peace candidate for Congress ... 67
- Meany, George. See Labor—Union
- Mears, Helen
  - Johnson's escalation of Vietnam conflict during 1964 campaign; C ... 298; see also E, 236

PAGE

- Medicine; Chinese health progress ... 306
  - Medicare bonanza for hospitals and doctors. S. Greenberg; S ... 513
  - Medicare provision prompts New York state and city to drop requirement that adult children support indigent parents; E .... [illegible]
  - Medicare raided by profit-minded American hospital association; E ... 36
- Meredith, James; Mississippi route followed by Negro rights marchers ... 112, 113
  - Views on use of violence mistakenly accepted in June 27 editorial. R. Wolseley; C ... 66, with editors' reply
- Mexico; family planning in. M. Larkin; S 508
  - Government-controlled labor union, CTM ... 248-249
- Michigan; conservative constitution produced by disproportionately Republican convention ... 472 ff.
  - HUAC demand for lists of university students opposed to Vietnam war combated by ACLU; E ... 628
- Michigan state university advisory group (MSUG); potent role in South Vietnam .... 81 ff.
- Middle East; As Pandora's ammunition box; effects of U.S. arms sales, as in Israeli-Arab conflict. J. A. Morris, Jr.; S ... 109
- Midwest, U.S.; resident theatres. J. Novick; D ... 195
- Miller, Loren; June 29, 1963, article Freedom now—but what then? quoted ... 68
- Milner, Roger. Play How's the world treating you? reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 523
- Milwaukee; Repertory theatre. J. Novick; D ... 196
- Mime troupe; San Francisco group ... 256
- Minneapolis; Firehouse theatre. J. Novick; D ... 197
  - Tyrone Guthrie theatre. J. Novick; D ... 197
- Missiles. See Armament—Missiles
- Mississippi; double discrimination on draft boards; case of draftee J. O. Sumrall; E .. 564
  - OEO's weakening of Community action and other poverty programs keeps Negroes at mercy of whites. M. Hoffman and J. Mudd; S ... 411; see also E, 501; 574
  - Rights demonstrators in Grenada attacked with police connivance ... 139
  - Solidly segregationist as rival Negro leaders conduct rights march and black power slogan is publicized. P. Good; S ... 112
- Mitford, Jessica
  - Funds sought for 1964 San Francisco sit-downers; C ... 106
- Mohole; Johnson-backed earth-drilling project killed by Congress; E ... 172
- Moore, Barrington, Jr.
  - Why we fear peasants in revolt; S ... 271; see also C, 402
- Morgenthau, Henry, III
  - Tribulations in shooting film of South African natives ... 480. See also Morgenthau letter, C, 658
- Morris, Joe Alex, Jr.
  - Effects of U.S. arms sales to Middle Eastern countries, Pandora's ammunition box; S ... 109
- Morris, Thomas D.; Assistant secretary of defense's study shows volunteer military force not feasible ... 210, 212
- Morrison, Sandy
  - The bomb in the cellar; danger from natural gas; S ... 318
- Morse, Senator Wayne; frequent dissent from Johnson's policies ... 341, 343, 345
- Mortgages. See Housing
- Mossadegh, Mohammed; nationalist Iranian premier overthrown in 1953 through CIA-sponsored coup d'état ... 416
- Motion pictures; for reviews, see Hatch, R.
- Moursund, A. W.; Johnson associate in real-estate operations ... 628
- Moyers, Bill; White House secretary's lack of candor ... 409 ff.
- Mudd, John. See Hoffman, Marvin
- Murray, Michael; artistic director of Charles playhouse, Boston ... 130
- Museums; architecture of Whitney reviewed by E. Galantay; S ... 292
- Music; for reviews, see Boretz, B.
- Myerson, Alan; director of The committee improvisatory theatre ... 614
- Myrdal, Gunnar
  - FAO: the imperative of altruism; S ... 666
  - Speaker at SANE rally against Vietnam killing ... 692

N

- Nader, Ralph; on need for higher safety standards in natural-gas lines ... 320
- Narcotics. See Drugs
- Nash, Philleo; ousted as U.S. commissioner of Indian affairs ... 275, 278

PAGE

- Nasser, President Gamal Abdel. See United Arab republic
- Nation, The
  - On Spanish civil war 91, 92, 94, 96, 101
  - Three letters of praise for; C 202
- National association for the advancement of colored people (NAACP); opposition to black-power slogan 112, 115, 116
- Nazism. See Germany, West
- Nebraska; legislative reforms effected by G. W. Norris 477, 478
- Negroes
  - Civil rights
    - Black power rhubarb; reasons for failure of M. L. King's nonviolent techniques in Chicago; E 68
    - Chicago summer: bossism, racism and Dr. King. By P. Good; S 237
    - Constructive action group's books and pamphlets against 208-209
    - "Counterrevolution" in South to block minimal gains; E 467
    - Deterioration North and South, with Communism linked to movement by its opponents; E 138
    - Equal employment opportunity commission as "lost agency"; E 660
    - Excluded from Mississippi draft boards; E 564
    - In Illinois senatorial election, Douglas and Percy in fundamental agreement .. 374
    - Massachusetts primary elections' backlash; E 268
    - Not issue in colleagues' curtailment of Rep. A. C. Powell's powers; E 300
    - OEO's weakening of poverty and education programs restores complete white domination in Mississippi. M. Hoffman and J. Mudd; S 411
    - R. F. Kennedy on 506
    - Reagan vs. Brown in California: how to succeed with the backlash. C. McWilliams; S 438
    - Report from occupied territory, a; police arrogance and brutality, as in case of Harlem six. J. Baldwin; S .... 39; see also C, 66
    - Republicans' cynical use of white backlash, stressing riots; E 371
    - San Francisco's action against 1964 demonstrators; E .... 109. See also J. Mitford; C, 107
    - Schools and race: integration for excellence. R. W. Major; S 213
    - Setback in Georgia gubernatorial election .... 340, 640 ff.
    - Setback seen in abolishment of civilian review board of New York city police; E 468
    - SNCC as target in Philadelphia and Atlanta. P. Good; S 534
    - Southern conference educational fund
      - New Orleans office ransacked by legislative agents; treatment of evidence compared with kid-gloves handling of Sanator Dodd's office documents; E 36
    - Southern setbacks in 1966 elections. P. Good; S 570
    - Speech without assembly?; Supreme court v. demonstrators in Adderley v. Florida. T. I. Emerson; S 704
    - Supreme court, the, and the bill of rights. 3. Discovery of equality. L. Pfeffer; S 385
    - Violence not the answer, despite June 27 editorial. R. Wolseley; C .... 66, with editors' reply
    - White look at black power, a. P. Good; S 112
    - Withdrawal of Federal funds from nonintegrating school districts, as in Alabama, ineffective as threat; E 300
  - Disproportionate number drafted 211
  - No way downtown for inhabitants of Hunters Point in San Francisco. D. Bess; S 606
  - Whites opposed to violence not necessarily racists. H. Keats; C 530
- Neizvestny, Ernst; Soviet sculptor's life and work. J. Berger; A 553
- Neruda, Pablo
  - Funeral in the East (translated by R. Bly); P 54
  - Ode to my socks (translated by R. Bly); P 53
  - See also Books section
- New England; resident theatres. J. Novick; D 130
- New Haven, Conn.; Long wharf theatre reviewed by J. Novick; D 132
- New Jersey; Democratic politicians' dissatisfaction with Vietnam war policy; E ...... 35; E, 67
- New towns; Reston, Va., and Columbia, Md., as examples. Reviewed by E. Galantay; S .... 652 and 714
- New York City, adult offspring no longer required to support indigent parents; E 4
  - Big-city slowdown: the battle of bureaucracy. B. D. Blank; S 632
  - Harlem six case and police brutality. J. Baldwin; S .... 39; see also C, 66
  - Opposition to cviilian review board of police symbolic of white backlash; E 468
- New York Herald Tribune; obituary; E 173
  - Reasons for death of. J. G. Smart; S .... 270; see also C, 370 and 388
- New York Philharmonic orchestra. Reviewed by B. Boretz; M 461
- New York state; Democrats self-defeating in gubernatorial race. J. Desmond; S 379
  - Legislature repeals law requiring adult children to support indigent parents; E 4
  - Long Island suburbs' drug addicts. M. Schram; S 242
  - Lottery referendum; E 436
  - Voters' indifference to crucial constitutional convention .... 472 ff.
- New York Times; burial of SANE's rally against Vietnam killing; E 692
  - Demonstrated State department's falsification of history of French-U.S. rift; E 235
  - Herald Tribune kept check on. R. B. Dennis; C .... 370; see also 270
  - N. Sheehan on Bourbon-type allies of U.S. in South Vietnam; E 404
  - Obscured big Dearborn, Mich., vote for U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam. S. Gillers; C 626
  - On usurious mortgage practices; E 301
  - Refusal to print staffer H. L. Matthews's firsthand material on Cuba; E .... 437; see also C, 594
- Newfield, Jack
  - The Bobby Kennedy phenomenon; S .... 505; see also C, 562
- Newspapers. See Press
- Nieberg, H. L.
  - Profits of war: the putsch against McNamara's cost-reduction efforts; S 696
- Night harbour, the. S. Hochman; P 134
- Night in the forest. G. Kinnell; P 398
- Nixon, Richard M., considers peace platform for Republicans in 1968; E 498; 575
  - Counsel for Trujillo heirs; E 237
  - Gratuitous castigation by Johnson; E 531
- Norris, George W.; effected reforms in Nebraska legislature 477, 478
- Norris, Harold
  - State constitutions: the politics of power; S 472
- North Atlantic treaty organization (NATO); French-U.S. rift falsified in State department account; E 235
- North Carolina; state university's new chancellor, J. C. Sitterson, failed to defend English instructor attacked by WRAL-TV; E 469
- Novick, Julius
  - Hinterland theatre IV: Washington to Philadelphia; D 27
  - Improvisational theatres in U.S., notably The committee and The second city; D 613
  - Midwestern resident theatres; D .... 195; see also C, 266 and 298
  - New England resident theatres; D 130
  - Stratford (Ontario) and Ypsilanti (Michigan) Shakespeare and Greek theatres; D 259
- Nursing homes; relations with Medicare .. 515-516
- Nutro-Bio; vitamin promotion 579-580

O

- Oaten, Allan
  - Despite H. Weston statement, Australian majority not in favor of all-white immigration policy; C .... 594; see also 512
- O'Brien, Conor Cruise; on tendentiousness of Encounter. A. Lillywell; C 51
  - Speaker at socialist scholars' conference 349
- O'Brien, Dan; Ohio school coach persecuted by Birchers 73
- Obscenity. See Pornography
- Occupant. D. C. DeJong; P 394
- O'Connor, Frank; spiritless campaign [illegible] New York Democratic gubernatorial candidate. J. Desmond; S 379
- O'Connor, James
  - Agit-prop pop opera, Romeo and Pagliacci, by Haight-Ashbury Vietnam committee, San Francisco; S 716
- Ode to my socks. P. Neruda (translated by R. Bly); P 53
- Odets, Clifford. Play The country girl (City center revival) reviewed by H. Clurman; D 398
- Oil industry; interest in Mohole earth-drilling project; E 172
- Okudzhava, Bulat; Soviet minstrel's pacifism 144
- O'Leary, Dennis
  - Quebec: separatism in a new guise; S 6
- Ombudsman; arbitrator needed on Defense contracts? 700
- Opera. For reviews, see Boretz, B.; O'Connor, J.
- Oppen, George
  - R. S. Elegant too logical in analysis of Chinese feelings; C .... 388; see also 307
- ORIT; AFL-CIO-guided Latin-American labor organization .... 248 ff.
- Oswald, Lee Harvey; presumed assassin of President Kennedy. See Warren commission
- Oudes, Bruce J.
  - "Food for freedom": the paradox of foreign aid; S 120
- Ouija message from JFK. C. Martell; P 460

P

- Pachter, Henry M.
  - D. Cohen unfair to Truman on Soviet bombmanship; C .... 626, with Cohen reply; see also 445
- Packaging; factor in food price rise; E 341
- Packard, Vance; opposition to proposed National data center 449-450
- Packard, Walter; tribute to late agricultural economist and social planner; E 532
- Paepcke, Walter; late founder of Aspen, Colo., cultural center 72
- Pain. P. Zweig; P 330
- Parenti, Michael
  - Questions B. Moore, Jr., on Soviet responsibility for cold war; C .... 402, with Moore reply; see also 271
- Parker, Stephen
  - The landlord; P 294
- Parry, Albert
  - Russia's other peace movement; S .... 142; see also C, 338
- "Pasionaria, La"
  - I become "La Pasionaria." D. Ibarruri; S 94
- Pasolli, Robert
  - Reviews of plays
    - Eh? (Cincinnati production) 262
    - Key, the 718
    - Tightrope walker, the 718
- Peabody, Endicott, H., Massachusetts Democratic senatorial nominee soft-pedaled racial issue 268
- Peace and pacifism
  - ACLU's fight against HUAC's demand for lists of college students opposed to Vietnam war; E 628
  - Anti-war meeting brings paint-bomb throwing at Denver Unitarian church; E 373
  - Basis for demonstrations against war-symbol notables at universities; E 594
  - California "new radicals" won't support Governor Brown .... 379; See also C, 434 and 466
  - Congressional campaign of R. Cook in Connecticut as model for movement. R. K. Bryon; S .... 469; see also E, 469
  - Dissenters on Vietnam war and draft sniped at by Johnson administration. M. L. Wulf; S 149
  - Haight-Asbury Vietnam committee, San Francisco, plays agit-prop pop opera, Romeo and Pagliacci, in streets. J. O'Connor; S 716
  - HUAC proposal to penalize campus movement thwarted. F. J. Donner; S 174
  - Is peace naive?; collaboration with Soviet Union as key to Vietnam settlement. F. Kuh; E .... 69; see also C, 106
  - New Jersey Democratic politicians' opposition to Vietnam policy; E .... 35; E, 67
  - Peace candidates must offer means for prosperous society. T. A. Tenor; C .. 498
  - Russia's other peace movement. A. Parry; S 143
  - SANE rally against Vietnam killing buried in New York Times; E 692
  - U Thant on war and peace. A. Weill-Tuckerman; S 38
  - U.S. preventing peace negotiations in Vietnam: report from an intermediary. P. Devillers; S 597
  - Vote for peace candidates for Congress; E 172
  - War resisters league calendar for 1967; E 661
- Pearman, Robert
  - Arkansas prison farm: the whip pays off; S 701
- Peasants; why we fear peasants in revolt. B. Moore, Jr.; S .... 271; see also C, 402

Index

PAGE

- Peking, the night we bombed (satire). W. Eastlake 8
- Percy, Charles H.; Illinois Republican senatorial candidate, former boy wonder, grows up. P. M. Deuel; S 374
- Peru; abortion of projected cultural magazine Quena by ICPNA, U.S. embassy organization. C. Eshleman; S .... 285; see also C, 530
  - Guerrillas and squatters 146-148
- Pfeffer, Leo
  - The Supreme court and the Bill of rights. 1. Freedom of expression; S .... 315. 2. Justice for the accused; S .... 351. 3. Discovery of equality; S 385
- Philadelphia; bomb-plot buildup by police against SNCC. P. Good; S 534
  - Theatre of the living arts reviewed by J. Novick; D 29
- Philippines; contrasting wealth and poverty; E 530
  - See also Manila conference
- Phonograph records
  - Bulat Okudzhava sings his songs (in Russian). Reviewed by S. Karlinsky 550
  - Irish uprising, the, 1916-22. C.B.S. legacy collection produced by G. Lieberson. Book and 2 records 486
  - For reviews, see Boretz, B.
- Pirandello, Luigi. Play Right you are (if you think you are) (APA production) reviewed by H. Clurman; D 651
- Playhouse in the park, Cincinnati. Reviewed by J. Novick; D 195
- Playing with children. S. Finn; P 589
- Plays. For reviews, see Clurman, H., Novick, J., and Pasolli, R.
- Poage, Representative W. R.; amendment to "food for freedom" bill 123
- Poem of Negro boys I swam with in the Mississippi seven years ago. G. Kinnell; P 126
- Poems
  - Asylum. D. Hoffman 364
  - At 35, B. Spacks 260
  - Between Thoreau and me. S. Touster 131
  - By a rich fast moving stream. J. Tagliabue. .. 254
  - Cowgirl ball, the (for Gene Autry). By M. Silverton 526
  - Don Carlos, Saturday afternoon. A. Gregor 646
  - Funeral in the East. P. Neruda (translated by R. Bly) 54
  - Game, the. L. Gluck 229
  - Give me peace. A. Voznesensky 162
  - Hatred of men with black hair. R. Bly 192
  - Homecoming, the. D. Ray 226
  - Hospitality. D. Ray 487
  - I am Mississippi fed. I. R. Griffin 522
  - I don't mind. C. Jackson 520
  - Lament for a gifted man. A. Gregor 622
  - Landlord, the. S. Parker 294
  - Like Swinburne to Sappho. By R. Roseliep 286
  - Lunch hour idyll. S. Touster 360
  - Mailman, the, and das ewig weibliche. J. Schevill 429
  - Night harbour, the. S. Hochman 134
  - Night in the forest. G. Kinnell 398
  - Occupant. D. C. DeJong 394
  - Ode to my socks. P. Neruda (translated by R. Bly) 53
  - Ouija message from JFK. C. Martell 460
  - Pain. P. Zweig 330
  - Playing with children. S. Finn 589
  - Poem of Negro boys I swam with in the Mississippi seven years ago. G. Kinnell .. 126
  - Potential prisoner, the. S. Hochman 490
  - Report to the blue guard. R. Hershon 555
  - Salt. I. Gardner 654
  - Society column. W. Stafford 397
  - Song of the little death. F. G. Lorca (translated by R. Humphries 92
  - Sweet talk. T. Weiss 221
  - Tall figures of Giacometti, the. M. Swenson 224
  - To the heart. T. Rozewicz (translated by V. Kontoski) 24
  - Two departures. E. Field 558
  - Under Cygnus. By R. Wilbur 675
  - Upon seeing a frieze of Greek marbles. P. Zweig 652
  - "U.S. offers condolence and aid to Vietnamese bombed in error" 711
  - Walk in woods. R. Roseliep 326
  - War. S. Mason 522
  - White Pass ski patrol. J. Logan 358
- Police; abuse of powers in Hunters Point slum, San Francisco .... 650 ff.
  - Arrogance and brutality in "occupied territory" of Negro districts, as in case of Harlem six. J. Baldwin; S 40
  - Connivance in attacks on civil-rights demonstrators in Grenada, Miss. 139
  - Opposition to civilian review boards, as in New York city, symbolic of white backlash; E 468
- Pollock, Francis
  - Junkets to South Africa: America's press on safari.; S .... 479; see also C, 580 and 658
- Polls; EMNID on future of West German right-wing extremism 89
  - Fluidity of Johnson's popularity; E 67
  - Harris poll indicated approval of Johnson following bombing of North Vietnamese oil installations; E 66
- Pollution; automobile as source 11
  - Boatman's paradox: consumers of the river. W. Berry; S 381
  - Continued deterioration of water; efficient management required; E 4
- Pool, Representative Joe R., frustration in HUAC investigation of campus peace groups 174, 175
- Pornography; California initiative against, CLEAN, supported by Reagan 439
- Potential prisoner, the. S. Hochman; P 490
- Poverty; New York state and city no longer require adult children to support indigent parents; E 4
  - OEO's weakening of Mississippi programs keeps Negroes at mercy of whites. M. Hoffman and J. Mudd; S 411
  - Of U.S. Indians .... 275 ff.
  - Social workers defended against R. Lubove's indictment in May 23 article, Social work and the life of the poor. D. Swisshelm; C 51
  - Training-employment plan in San Francisco's Hunters Point .... 607 ff.
- Powell, Representative Adam Clayton, Jr.; trimming of Congressional powers not a racial issue; E 300
- Pravda; on Communist China 695
- Press, U.S.; Hysteria over possible trial by North Vietnam of captured airmen; E 108
  - Interpretations of Vietnam war and Vietcong strategy differ from British and other correspondents'; E 204
  - Johnson-directed "snow job" on bombing of oil installations near Hanoi and Haiphong; E 66
  - Junkets to apartheid: America's press on safari. F. Pollock; S .... 479; see also C, 580 and 658
  - Johnson viewed as fearsome antagonist. C. Roberts; S .... 406; see also C, 530
  - New York Herald Tribune's demise leaves opening for national Republican voice, possibly that of Los Angeles Times; E 173
  - New York papers ignore recitals 125
  - Unfriendly to Democratic dissenters in Congress 345
- Princeton university; Stravinsky concert reviewed by B. Boretz; M 461
- Prisendorf, Anthony
  - Budget Bureau's proposed National data center: the computer vs. the bill of rights; S 449
- Prisons; Arkansas prison farm: the whip pays off. R. Pearman; S 701
  - High cost of imprisonment shown in report by National commission on crime and delinquency; E 693
  - "Union" in San Francisco county jail No. 2; E 437
- Privacy; invasion of by proposed National data center. A. Prisendorf; S 449
- Providence, R. I.; Trinity Square Playhouse reviewed by J. Novick; D 131
- Public utilities. See Gas, natural
- Publishing. See Books
- Purgatory. Opera revival reviewed by B. Boretz; M 126
- Puzzles, crossword. F. W. Lewis. See back pages

Q

- Quebec. See Canada
- Quena; abortion of projected Peruvian cultural magazine by ICPNA, U.S. embassy organization. C. Eshleman; S .... 285. See also C, 530

R

- Raby, Al; M. L. King aide in Chicago summer .... 240 ff.
- Radio; commercials from British pirate stations 611
- Railroads. Transit snarl, the: is it back to the rails? C. Dreher; S 11
- Ray, David
  - The homecoming; P 226
  - Hospitality; P 487
- Rayack, Dr. Elton; walked out during Brown U.'s conferring of honorary degree to Johnson; nurse stationed to accompany him; E 206
- Reagan, Ronald. See California
- Real estate. See Housing
- Recitals; death of in New York. B. Boretz; M 125
- Records, phonograph. For reviews, see Boretz, B.
- Reid, Whitelaw and Ogden; proprietorship of New York Tribune and Herald Tribune. J. G. Smart; S 270
- Religion; Johnson's sincerity questioned. F. Lundberg; C 170
- Report to the blue guard. R. Hershon; P 555
- Republican party
  - Good showing in Georgia gubernatorial campaign .... 640 ff.
  - Liberals strengthened in 1966 returns; blueprint for renovation; E 530
  - Lost responsible voice in demise of New York Herald Tribune; E 173
  - More united than Democrats in New York gubernatorial election; Rockefeller victory predicted. J. Desmond; S 379
  - 1966 gains analyzed. L. H. Bean; S 573
  - Party politics and race; use of white backlash; E 371
  - Politics of equivocation: the two faces of GOP. M. Viorst; S 630
  - Prospects and possible candidates for 1968; E 562
  - Reagan gubernatorial candidacy in California shows how to succeed with the backlash. C. McWilliams; S 438
  - Segregationists dominant in 1966 elections in South .... 570 ff.
  - Temptation to be actual opposition party in 1968 with peace platform; E 498; 575
- Research and development; secret research for government at universities should change to open type; E 267
  - Used by McNamara to test feasibility of Defense projects .... 696 ff.
- Reston, Virginia. New town reviewed by E. Galantay; S 652
- Reuther, Walter P.; auto workers' president opposed AFL-CIO's blank check on Vietnam; E 204
  - Chance to provide leadership opposed to Meany-Lovestone foreign policies; E 595
  - Opposition to AIFLD 545
- Rhoads, Rick
  - Witnesses' defiance of HUAC no overnight phenomenon; C .... 323; see also 174
- Rhodes, Samuel. Viol recital reviewed by B. Boretz; M 125
- Rhodesia; Salisbury talks with British officials over political status apt to be fruitless; South African pressure noted. N. M. Shamuyarira; E 65
- Rice-Wray, Dr. Edris; on need for family planning in Mexico 510, 511
- Richardson, H. L. (Bill); California rightist politician's work for Constructive action 208-209
- Right you are (if you think you are) (APA production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D .. 651
- Ripon society; forward-looking proposals for Republican party 530, 533
- Rivers, Representative L. Mendel; armed services committee chairman opposed to changes in draft 212
- Rivers; befouled by boatmen. W. Berry; S .. 381
- Rizzo, Frank; Philadelphia police commissioner's bomb-plot buildup against SNCC .... 534 ff.
- Roads. See Automobiles
- Roberts, Charles
  - The press views President Johnson as fearsome antagonist; S .... 406; see also C, 530
- Robertson, Senator A. Willis; aided Manufacturers-Hanover bank merger; re-election campaign aided by banks; E .... [illegible]
- Robertson, Frank; British correspondent on Vietcong strategy; E 204
- Robinson, Chester; Chicago Negro leader angry over Daley-King agreement 238, 241
- Roche, John P., new Johnson liaison man with intellectuals' blast at opponents of Vietnam stand; E 301
  - New White House "intellectual-in-residence"; E 236
- Rockefeller, Governor Nelson A.; disassociated self from Republican racialist strategy .. 372
  - Re-election seen in New York race. J. Desmond; S 379
- Romeo and Pagliacci. Haight-Ashbury Vietnam committee of San Francisco's agit-prop pop opera reviewed by J. O'Connor; S 716
- Romney, Governor George W.; 1966 Presidential possibility .... 562; see also C, 626
- Roosevelt, Eleanor; material for book on requested. S. K. Hershan; C 690
- Roosevelt, Franklin D., Jr.; Liberal candidate for New York governorship 381
- Rose tattoo, the (City center revival). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 493

Index

PAGE

Roseliep, Raymond
  Like Swinburne to Sappho; P 286
  Walk in woods; P 326
Rosenberg case. After seventeen years; hearing advocated for imprisoned M. Sobell; E 203
  Points up need to abolish capital punishment. A. Katz; C 202
Rosenthal, Representative Ben; Democratic dissenter on Johnson policies 342
Rouse, James; developer of Columbia, Md., new town 714
Rozewicz, Tadeusz
  To the heart (translated by V. Contoski); P 24
Ruppenthal, Karl M.
  The pilot shortage on U.S. airlines; S 481
Ryan, Representative William Fitts; Democratic dissenter on Johnson policies 342
Ryan, William L.; report on corruption in Saigon; E 564

S

Saigon. See Vietnam
Salandria, Vincent J.; criticism of Warren report 44
Salt. I. Gardner; P 654
Salto. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 429
Samaras, Lucas. Reviewed by M. Kozloff; A 525
San Francicco; action against 1964 civil-rights demonstrators; E 109
  Death of actor's workshop. F. H. Gardner; D 256
  Funds sought for jailed 1964 sit-downers. J. Mitford; C 106
  Haight-Ashbury Vietnam committee's agit-prop pop opera, Romeo and Pagliacci. By J. O'Connor; S 716
  Substandard schools, especially those with predominantly Negro and Chinese student body 213-214
  View from Hunters Point: no way downtown for isolated slum dwellers. D. Smith; S 606
SANE. See Peace and Pacifism
Savings and loan institutions. See Banks and banking Schafly, Phyllis; rightist books distributed free by Constructive action .... 207 ff.
Schenley industries; promotion of J. E. Hoover center on strategy and tactics of Communism; E 629
Schevill, James
  The mailman and das ewig weibliche; P 429
Schiller, Herbert I.
  TV overseas: U.S.-type hard-sell advertising almost universal, with much by U.S. firms; S 609
Schlesinger, Arthur, Jr.; in R. F. Kennedy group working on Vietnam dilemma 340
School for scandal, the (APA production). Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 651
Schools. See Education
Schram, Martin
  The goof-ball set: drug addiction in the suburbs; S 242
Schwartzbart, Elias M.
  Praise for P. Good's A white look at black power; C .... 202; see also 112
Scott, Dred; Supreme court decision on fugitive slave disastrous for U.S. 385 Sculpture. For reviews, see Berger, J.
Second city, the; Chicago improvisatory theatre. J. Novick; D 614
Seiler, W. A.
  Tickets for 1968; C .... 626; see also E, 562
Selective service system. See United States—Defense, national Sessions, Roger. Opera The trial of Lucullus (revival) reviewed by B. Boretz; M 126
Sender, Ramón
  On Spanish civil war 96
Sewell, John
  Canadian police also sniping at dissenters on U.S. Vietnam policy; C .... 234; see also 149
Shameless old lady, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 366
Shamuyarira, N. M.
  South African intervention in Rhodesian affairs strengthens white racialists; E 65
Shanahan, Eileen; Times article on usurious mortgage practices; E 301
Sheehan, Neil; New York Times article on Bourbon-type allies of U.S. in South Vietnam; E 404
Sheridan, Richard Brinsley. Play The school for scandal (APA production) reviewed by H. Clurman; D 651

PAGE

Sherrill, Robert G.
  Allegations concerning American friends of the Middle East, in Foundation pipe lines: the beneficent CIA (May 9), disputed. E. Bunting; C 34
  The brass pyramid; retired military in government jobs; S 49
  Wedge of dissent: the Democratic rebels in Congress; S 341
Shinbrot, Mrs. Marvin
  G. Hill imperceptive on California campaign; C .... 466; see also 377
Shriver, Sargent. See United States—Office of economic opportunity Sievevitz, Philip
  Is Johnson mad?; C 690
Sihanouk, Prince Norodom. See Cambodia
Sills, Paul; work in improvisatory theatres 614
Silverton, Michael
  The cowgirl ball (for Gene Autry); P 526
Simms, Robert; editor of Hunters Point, San Francisco, proverty-program paper on conditions of people .... 606 ff.
Simon, R. E.; developer of Reston, Va., new town 652-653
Singapore; one-party democracy. A. Josey; S 661
Sinyavsky-Daniel trial; prisoners lose some support among Soviet intellectuals 178
Sklar, Martin J.; facetious paper at socialist scholars' conference 349-350
Smart, James G.
  Death of the Herald Tribune; S .... 270; see also C, 370 and 388
Smith, Carol H.
  Eliot (T.S.) as playwright; D 325
Smith, Desmond
  Saigon: drowning in dollars; S 602
Smith, Lillian; resignation from SNCC over black-power slogan 117
Smith, Ralph Lee
  Million-dollar trinket; Disabled American veterans' misspent funds raised through ident-o-tag; S 354
  Showdown on vitamins; proposed FDA regulations; S 578
SNCC. See Negroes—Civil rights
Sobell, Morton. See Rosenberg case
Social sciences; "angled" research sponsored by Pentagon and CIA; E 140
Socialism; Latin-American obstacles 184
  Marx and shame: socialism today; second socialist scholars' conference, New York. H. Swados; S .... 347; see also C, 498 and 516
Society column. W. Stafford; P 397
Sologuren, Javier
  Denial of statements attributed in C. Eshleman article; C, with Eshleman reply, 530; see also 286
Song of the little death. F. G. Lorca (translated by R. Humphries); P 92
South, U.S., as Bavaria for U.S. Hitler; E 467
South Africa, Republic of; Alexander defense committee, U.S. group opposed to South African government, required by Justice department to register as its agent; E .... 69; see also C, 170
  Intervention in Rhodesian affairs strengthens white racialists. N. M. Shamuyarira; E 5
  Junkets to apartheid: America's press on safari. F. Pollock; S .... 479; see also C, 580 and 658
  R. F. Kennedy in; E 2
  Unenforceable U.N. resolution ending jurisdiction over South West Africa; E 691
  Victory in International court of justice's rejection of Ethiopian-Liberian complaint on apartheid; E 107
South West Africa. See South Africa, Republic of Southern conference educational fund. See Negroes—Civil rights
Space; Ambassador Goldberg optimistic on peaceful-uses treaty; E .... 141 and E 402
  Communications satellites as advertising medium of 1970's? 611
  "The Russians Faked It" school of thought exemplified in L. Mallan's magazine articles. D. Cohen; S 445
Spacks, Barry
  At 35; P 260
Spain; I become "La Pasionaria" (in civil war). I. Ibarruri; S 94
  O. G. Villard on civil war 98
  R. Sender on civil war 96
  Spanish refugee aid's de Madariaga scholarship fund. H. Arendt; C 690
  T. Wolfe on civil war 94
Specter, Arlen; Warren commission staff member on autopsy documents 46
Spelman, Seymour; peace candidate for Maryland Democratic House nomination 172
  Reasons for low vote 576

PAGE

Spies; snooping on foreign countries through "social science" research by U.S. universities sponsored by Pentagon and CIA; E 140
Spiro, Herbert J.; professor's suggestion for safeguarding academic integrity in Federal research projects; E 267
Staats, Elmer; appointed Comptroller general 697, 699
Stafford, Frank; Negro victim of New York city police's brutality 39-40
Stafford, William
  Society column; P 397
Stamler, Dr. Jeremiah B.; recalcitrant witness cited by HUAC 468
Starfighter; plane's crashes and cost as factors in West German military crisis 346
States, U.S. 50 dinosaurs (restyling the states). Constitutions: the politics of power. H. Norris; S .... 472. Legislatures: the 100-year lag. D. H. Beetle; S .... 475. See also Beetle correction, C, 530
Steinberg, Saul. Reviewed by M. Kozloff; A 683
Stern, Richard
  Yarmolinsky and the military-industrial cannibal; former Defense official on uses of U.S. power; S 639
Stratford, Ontario; Shakespeare festival reviewed by J. Novick; D 259
Strauss, Franz Josef; probable short-term victory of Bavarian's political strategy. C. Amery; S 637
Stravinsky, Igor. Festival in honor of at New York Philharmonic hall reviewed by B. Boretz; M 165
  Records of reviewed by B. Boretz; M 557
  Works at Princeton concert reviewed by B. Boretz; M 461
Strikes: See Labor—union
Student non-violent coordinating committee (SNCC). See Negroes—Civil rights
Subandrio; trial of former Indonesian foreign minister 566, 570
Suburbs, U.S.; drug addiction in. M. Schram; S 242
  Obligation to central cities; E 3
Sugar; politics in Dominican quota 542
Sugrue, Frank; managing director of Charles playhouse, Boston 130
Suharto, General; head of Indonesian military junta .... 567 ff.
Sukarno, President. See Indonesia
Supermarkets. See Food
Swados, Harvey
  Marx and shame: socialism today; second socialist scholars' conference, New York; S .... 347; see also C, with Swados reply, 498, 516
Sweet talk. T. Weiss; P 221
Swenson, May
  The tall figures of Giacometti; P 224
Swisshelm, Dorothy
  Social workers defended against R. Lubove article of May 23, Social work and the life of the poor; C 51
Sylvester, Assistant Defense secretary Arthur; testimony on news management before Fulbright committee; despite implied denial, knew former Air Force information chief, Col. W. J. McGinty; E 236
  Tries to intimidate professor as well as newsmen. D. M. Berman; C 2

T

Tagliabue, John
  By a rich fast moving stream; P 254
Tall figures of Giacometti, the. M. Swenson; P 224
Taxes. See United States—Economics
Teamsters' union. See Labor—Union
Tehranian, Majid
  Iran: politics of anti-Americanism; S 415
Television; Canadian broadcasting corp. and public-affairs program This hour has seven days; S 61
  Closed circuits as publicity device for political candidates. O. G. Chase; C 106
  Coverage of Johnson's trip to Asia 466
  Johnson-directed "snow job" on bombing of oil installations near Hanoi and Haiphong; E 66
  Johnson's good behavior on 406
  Limits horror, as in P. Watkins' The war game; E 269
  U.S.-type hard-sell advertising adopted abroad; much by U.S. firms. H. I. Schiller; S 609
  Violence on accustoms public to aggression 340
Tenor, Theodore A.
  Peace candidates must offer means for prosperous society; C 498

PAGE

- Terre des hommes; Swiss movement to aid Vietnamese war-wounded children rebuffed by U.S. government; E 141
- Terry, Megan. Play Viet rock reviewed by H. Clurman; D 586
- Texas; Johnson's continuing real-estate operations; E 628
- Thailand; alone on an elephant in jungle (parable for U.S. in southeast Asia). W. Eastlake; S 155
  - "Idealist" U.S. major interviewed in northern base. W. Eastlake; S 418
  - Ride on dragon train toward Saigon through guerrilla-infested territory. W. Eastlake; S 283
  - U.S. forces and airbases in; E 234
  - U.S. intervention in follows Vietnam pattern; E 299
- Thant, Secretary-general U. See United Nations
- Theatre
  - Art and argot at Karamu, integrated Cleveland theatre. B. Kremen; D 257
  - Death of actor's workshop, San Francisco. F. H. Gardner; D 256
  - Eliot (T. S.) as playwright. C. H. Smith; D 325
  - Hinterland theatre IV: Washington to Philadelphia. J. Novick; D 27
  - Midwestern resident theatres. J. Novick; D .... 195; see also C, 266 and 298
  - New England resident theatres. J. Novick; D 130
  - Stratford, Ontario, Shakespearean festival and Ypsilanti, Michigan, Greek theatre; D 259
  - For reviews of plays, see respective titles and Clurman, H.; Novick, J.; Pasolli, R.
- This hour has seven days; CBC public-affairs TV program. P. Gzowski; S 61
- Thom, Mel; on integration of U.S. Indians 276
- Tightrope walker, the. Reviewed by R. Pasolli; D 718
- To the heart. T. Rozewicz (translated by V. Contoski); P 24
- Tornek, Terry Eliot
  - DRIVE: Teamsters' union in politics to withstand anti-labor Congress; S 663
- Torres, Camilo; Colombian revolutionary priest killed in guerrilla skirmish 218
- Touster, Saul
  - Between Thoreau and me; P 131
  - Lunch hour idyll; P 360
- Trade; Latin America: economic integration for progress. F. C. Gil; S 280
- Transportation. See Railroads
- Treasure; Florida giveaway to private interests in Spanish-fleet salvage; E 629
- Trettner, Heinz; resignation of West German inspector general in military crisis 346, 347
- Trial of Lucullus, the. Opera revival reviewed by B. Boretz; M 126
- Trinity Square playhouse, Providence, R.I. Reviewed by J. Novick; D 131
- Triveri, Edgar A.
  - Latin America II: search for a politics; S 182
- Trujillo Molina, Rafael Leonidas; legacy in Dominican republic .... 541 ff.
- Trujillo, "Ramfis"; intransigent co-heir of Dominican dictator subject to arrest for ignoring court order; R. M. Nixon as joint counsel in case; E 237
- Truman, President Harry S.; alleged doubts of Soviet ability to produce atomic bomb .... 445; see also C, 626
  - Relations with press 407
- Twain, Mark; war prayer quoted. S. Graves; C 338
- Two departures. E. Field; P 558
- Tyrone Guthrie theatre, Minneapolis. Reviewed by J. Novick; D 197, 427

U

- Uncle, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP 134
- Under Cygnus. By R. Wilbur; P 675
- Under the weather. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 523
- Unidentified flying objects; U.S. air force's sponsorship of study headed by E. U. Condon; E .... 435; see also C, 498
- Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
  - And the United States
    - Both anxious for Thant to remain U.N. head; E 298
    - Cold-war responsibility .... 274; see also C, 402
    - Collaboration as key to Vietnam settlement. F. Kuh; E .... 69; see also C, 106
    - Danger of clash in Vietnam; E 170
    - Detente rides again, the. A. Weill-Tuckerman; E 402

PAGE

    - Prospect for agreement on U.N. treaty providing for peaceful uses of outer space; E 141
    - Threatened confrontation over Vietnam; E 202
    - U.S. welfare imperialism in Vietnam and elsewhere opposed to but formed by Communism .... 86 ff.
  - Kosygin in Paris: differences within amity with France. A. Werth; S 693
  - Mao's policies preclude rapprochment with China. I. Deutscher; S 442
  - Prime weapons supplier to Arab nations .. 110 ff.
  - Pro-Arab policy in U.N. 626
  - Relations with China .... 303, 311 ff.
  - Relations with Iran .... 416 ff.
  - Russia's other peace movement. A. Parry; S .... 143; see also C, 338
  - Sculptor E. Neizvestny and other unofficial artists. J. Berger; A 553
  - Well-being marred by Vietnam war. A. Werth; S 176
- Unitarian Universalist church; paint bombs thrown at Denver building by objectors to anti-war meeting; E 373
- United Arab Republic; President Nasser's arms purchases from Soviet Union and pressure on Jordan .... 110 ff.
  - Salvage archaeology in, as in saving temples from Aswan dam inundation 118, 119
- United Nations
  - E. U. Condon proposal for international schools for world understanding; E 533
  - Food and agriculture organization (FAO): the imperative of altruism. G. Myrdal; S 666
  - Prospects for treaty on peaceful uses of outer space; E .... 141 and E 402
  - Running hard to stand still in keeping Middle East from war and China from membership. A. Weill-Tuckerman; E 626
  - Thant's disclosure on North Vietnamese peace feelers in 1965 denied by White House 410, 601
  - Thant's threatened resignation and organization's impotence in Vietnam conflict [illegible] storm signals. A. Weill-Tuckerman; E 298
  - Thant's three-point Vietnam peace plan, like others, ignored by Washington. D. Grant; E 338
  - Thant's warning of U.S.-Soviet confrontation over Vietnam; E 202
  - U Thant on war and peace. A. Weill-Tuckerman; S 38
  - Unenforceable resolution ending South Africa's jurisdiction over South West Africa; E 691
  - Victory for South Africa in International court of justice's rejection of Ethiopian-Liberian complaint on apartheid; E 107
- United States
  - And the Soviet Union. See Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
  - Agency for international development.
    - Tightened credit terms in "food for freedom" to needy countries .... 121 ff.
    - Vietnam role .... 80 ff.
  - Budget bureau
    - Proposed national data center: computer vs. bill of rights. A. Prisendorf; S 449
    - Vagueness on budget details 627
  - Central intelligence agency
    - Anecdote concerning R. Wright and implied backing of Congress for cultural freedom. H. Grundfest; C 51
    - Encounter editors fail to deny receipt of funds. E. Bentley; C 90
    - Sponsorship of U.S. universities' "social science" research abroad; E 140
  - Civil service
    - Mass influx of military retirees, constituting "brass pyramid." R. G. Sherrill; S 49
  - Congress
    - Anti-union tendencies combated by Teamsters' DRIVE program. T. E. Tornek; S 663
    - Attacks on General accounting office for economy efforts in Defense .... 696 ff.
    - Draft runaround; E 660
    - Draft-law hearings .... 210 ff.
    - Hawks on wing in proposed anti-ballistic missile legislation; E 563
    - House hearings on proposed National data center .... 450 ff.
    - HUAC: from pillory to farce. F. J. Donner; S .... 174; see also C, 323 and 402
    - HUAC breeds contempt; should be abolished; E 171
    - HUAC's demand for lists of college students opposed to Vietnam war opposed by ACLU; E 628

PAGE

    - HUAC's payment of friendly witnesses; E 468
    - Impotence in ruling military establishment; blanket powers to President to call up reserves; E 405
    - Liberal arms spending and decrease for Great society seen for 1967; E 658
    - Pressure for tighter terms to needy countries receiving "food for freedom" .... 120 ff.
    - Republican gain not apt to undo recent social legislation. M. Viorst; S 630
    - Senate confirmation hearings on appointment of R. R. Bowie as State department counselor; E 205
    - Senate Foreign relations committee given little information by USIA head; E 173
    - Senators, e.g., T. J. Dodd, treated differently from civil-righters and others when under scrutiny; E 36
    - Trimming of Rep. A. C. Powell's powers not a racial issue; E 300
    - Wedge of dissent from Johnson's policies: the Democratic rebels in Congress. R. G. Sherrill; S 341
  - Constitution
    - Should be amended to enable reversal of mistaken foreign policies. R. Kaplan; C 19
    - Supreme court, the, and the Bill of rights; performance in freedom of expression, justice, and equality. L. Pfeffer; S .... 315, 351, and 385
  - Council of economic advisers
    - Wage-price guidelines obsolete .... 545 ff.
  - Defense, national
    - Air force study of unidentified flying objects headed by E. U. Condon; E 435
    - Arms budget to be flexibly high, with heat taken off McNamara; E 658
    - Congress's failure to control; blanket powers delegated to President to call up reserves; E 405
    - Covert sponsorship of U.S. universities' "Social science" research projects abroad; E 140
    - Double discrimination on Mississippi draft boards; E 564
    - Draft calls will increase, despite McNamara's optimism; E 531
    - Draft protesters victims of governmental reprisal .... 149 ff.
    - Draft runaround; E 660
    - Future of the draft, the. J. C. Esty, Jr.; S 209
    - Hawks on wing in anti-ballistic missile (ABM) plans; E 563
    - Marine ROTC at Jesuit high school, New Orleans, protested. J. J. Frazier; C 2
    - Profits of war: the putsch against McNamara's cost-reduction efforts. H. L. Nieburg; S 696
    - Retired officers' mass influx into Federal civilian jobs. R. G. Sherrill; S 49
    - Three-fourths of Federal budget; matter of priorities; E 403
    - Vietnam-war costs top secret; E 434
    - Yarmolinsky and the military-industrial cannibal; former official on uses of U.S. power. R. Stern; S 639
  - Economics
    - Military priority for 1967 spending indicated by 1966 election returns; E 659
    - Priorities: war expenditures squeeze out constructive projects; E 403
    - Taxes should be raised if people support Vietnam war; E 627
    - Vietnam as "painless war"; E .... 236; see also C, 338
    - War-heated economy and end of wage-price guidelines .... 545 ff.
  - Equal employment opportunity commission
    - "Lost agency"; E 660
  - Executive branch
    - Presidents' relations with press .... 406 ff.
  - Federal aviation agency
    - W. F. McKee, retired air force general, appointed administrator in 1965 50
  - Foreign policy
    - Armaments sales in Middle East, Pandora's ammunition box. J. A. Morris, Jr.; S 109
    - Britain's subordination to 187
    - Constitution should be amended to enable reversing mistaken undertakings, R. Kaplan; C 19
  - Foreign policy
    - Democratic wedge of dissent in Congress. R. G. Sherrill; S 342
    - Double Israeli-Arab standard in U.N.; continued exclusion of China. A. Weill-Tuckerman; E 626
    - Escalation in Asia by Johnson; E 530
    - Essential isolationism of Johnson's course in Vietnam; E 202

Index

PAGE

 Portent for the future: welfare imperialism in Vietnam. J. McDermott; S 76
 Why we fear peasants in revolt. B. Moore, Jr.; S .... 271; see also C, 402
 Wide disapproval at home and abroad of Vietnam war; E 67
Foreign relations
 With Australia 512-513
 With Communist China. Between goals and dogma: an opening for diplomacy. I-Kua Chou; S 311
 With Dominican republic: burden of the past. K. Wagenheim; S 541
 With Haiti. G. R. Latortue; S 539
 With Iran; its politics of anti-Americanism. M. Tehranian; S 415
General accounting office
 Economy efforts in Defense under attack in Congress ...... 696 ff.
Health, education and welfare department
 Food and drug administration's hearings on vitamin regulations. R. L. Smith; S 578
 Head start to what?; critique of program for poor pre-schoolers. I. Kraft; S .... 179; see also C, 266; E, 501 Study of climbing medical costs ...... 513 ff.
Information agency
 Little information for Senate on Vietnam; E 173
 Midwife for books supporting U.S. foreign policy; titles should be publicized; E 373
Interior department
 Bureau of Indian affairs ...... 275 ff.
Justice department
 FBI's "startling disclosure" on Communist party's national convention; E 141
 "Folk hero" J. E. Hoover of FBI's high-handed methods, including wiretapping, under scrutiny; E 37
 Hoover's autonomy in wiretapping; E 690
 Should rescind order for registration of Alexander defense committee as agent of South African government, which it opposes; E .... 69; see also C, 170
Office of economic opportunity
 Operation of Head start program .... 180, 181; E, 501
 Program for Hunters Point, San Francisco slum 608-609
 Weakening of Mississippi programs keeps Negroes at mercy of whites. M. Hoffman and J. Mudd; S 411
Post office department
 Continuing deterioration of service ascribed to Farley profit doctrine; E 500
State department
 Falsification of history in account of Franco-American rift; E 235
 Limited sponsorship of U.S. universities' "social science" projects abroad; E 140
 R. R. Bowie, Dulles alumnus, appointed counselor; E 205
Supreme court
 And the Bill of rights. 1. Freedom of expression; 2. Justice for the accused; 3. Discovery of equality. L. Pfeffer; S 315, 351, 385
 Speech without assembly?; ruling against student demonstrators in Adderley v. Florida case. T. L. Emerson; S 704
Unruh, Jesse; leader in campaign to modernize state legislatures ...... 475 ff.
Upon seeing a frieze of Greek marbles. P. Zweig; P 652
Urey, Harold; on Rosenberg case 204
"U.S. offers condolence and aid to Vietnamese bombed in error." M. Hamburger; P 711
Utilities. See Gas, natural

V

van Itallie, Jean-Claude. Play America hurrah reviewed by H. Clurman; D 587
Viet rock. Reviewed by H. Clurman; D 586
Villard, Oswald Garrison
 On Spanish civil war 98
Vietnam
 AFL-CIO's blank check for Johnson's course; E 204; 545
 Australia's participation in war 513
 Background of preventing the peace: report from an intermediary. P. Devillers; S 597
 Big Dearborn, Mich., vote for U.S. withdrawal. S. Gillers; C .... 626; E, 659
 Civilian victims' lives valued at $34 by U.S.; E 372
 Contagion of corruption in South; E .... 564; see also 76

PAGE

De Gaulle's withdrawal timetable for U.S. only angered Johnson; E 234
Facts of war fuzzed by Johnson and McNamara; E 531
HUAC's demand for lists of U.S. college students opposed to war combated by ACLU; E 628
Idiot logic of escalation; E 170
Impact of truth in A. Werth's June 13 article, French eyes on Vietnam: America's colony in hell. L. Forer; C 51
Inflationary pressures of war in U.S. 434, 499, 546-547, 627
Jewish opposition to war in U.S. irks Johnson; E 268
Johnson-directed "snow job" in U.S. news media on bombing of oil installations near Hanoi and Haiphong; E 66
Johnson's essentially isolationist course; E .. 202
Johnson's lack of candor with press on war 408, 410-411
Johnson's political gamble in escalating war; E 139
Johnson's problem of distrust on at eve of Manila conference; E 370
Korean-type solution planned by Johnson; E 34
Korean-type end to war would be vetoed by Chinese; E 435
Moral question of war brings heckling of administration notables at universities; E 594
Opponents of Johnson stand blasted by J. P. Roche, liaison man with intellectuals; E .. 301
Our Bourbon allies in south exposed by N. Sheehan in New York Times; E 404
"Painless war" for U.S.; E .... 236; see also C, 338
Parable of U.S. presence in article Alone on an elephant. W. Eastlake; S 155
Peace negotiations could begin if Johnson would send U Thant with latter's three-point plan. D. Grant; E 338
R. F. Kennedy on war 505, 506
R. F. Kennedy's "shadow cabinet" working on dilemma of war; possible No wider war committee; E 339
Risk of China's involvement in war ...... 311 ff.
Saigon: drowning in dollars. D. Smith; S .. 602
SANE rally to protest killing buried by New York Times; E 692
September 11 "election" as mere demonstration; E 266
Synchronized escalation of war demonstrated by U. of California professors' study, The politics of escalation; E 35
Terre des hommes; Swiss organization to air war-wounded children rebuffed by U.S. government; E 141
To die in Vietnam—for Hitler-loving Premier Ky. By W. Eastlake; S 418
Too soon for peace candidates in 1966 U.S. elections. S. Gottlieb; S 575
U Thant on war and peace. A. Weill-Tuckerman; S 38
U.N.'s impotence in settling conflict. A. Weill-Tuckerman; E 298
U.S. dissenters on war sniped at by Johnson administration. M. L. Wulf; S .... 149; see also C, 234
U.S. furore over North's possible trial of captured airmen; E 108
"U.S. offers condolence and aid to Vietnamese bombed in error." M. Hamburger; P 711
U.S. opposition to war partly hidden from Johnson; E 141
U.S.-paid junkets for foreign newsmen; E .. 173
U.S.-Soviet collaboration as key to peace. F. Kuh; E .... 69; see also C, 106
U.S. welfare imperialism in. J. McDermott; S .... 76; see also C, 170, 202, 484
Varying interpretations of war and Vietcong strategy by U.S. and foreign newspapermen; E 204
Vice President Johnson's valid objections to involvement of U.S. troops. W. Landshoff; C 19
Views of war by citizens of Auburn, Washington. R. S. Johnson; S 502
War blocks peaceful coexistence of U.S. and Soviet Union 694
War bringing popularity crisis for Johnson; E 67
War costs kept top secret by Johnson administration; E 434
War expenditures harm U.S. cities; mayors advocate policy reassessment; E 3
War expenditures in U.S. take priority over constructive projects; E 403

PAGE

War likened to Hitlerian adventurism. C. Barus; C 156
War mars well-being of Soviet people. A. Werth; S 176
War not affected by Johson's road-show Manila conference; E 466
Viorst, Milton
 Politics of equivocation: the two faces of the GOP; S 630
Vitamins; showdown on; proposed FDA regulations. R. L. Smith; S 578
Voznesensky, Andrei
 Give me peace (translated by M. Hayward); P 162

W

Wagenheim, Kal
 Dominican republic: burden of the past; S 541
Walk in woods. R. Roseliep; P 326
Wallace, George; former Alabama governor prominent in South's rebellion against Negro gains; Presidential ambitions 468, 570, 574-575
War; horror of nuclear conflict limited on TV, as in P. Watkins' The war game; E 269
War. S. Mason; P 522
War resisters league; calendar for 1967; E 661
Warren commission report on assassination of President Kennedy
 Missing photographs and X rays turned over to National archives by Kennedy family; E .... 500; see also 43
 What it omits: the vital documents. J. Cohen; S .... 43; see also C, 138
Washington, D.C.; resident theatres. J. Novick; D 27
Washington state. See Auburn, Wash.
Water; coming crisis described by C. C. Furnas; E 205
Water pollution. See Pollution
Watkins, Peter: TV nuclear-war film limits horror; E 269
Watson, Patrick, and L. LaPierre; co-hosts of CBC TV program This hour has seven days 62
Weill-Tuckerman, Anne
 Storm signals on the East River; U.N.'s impotence in Vietnam conflict and Thant's threatened resignation; E 298
 U Thant on war and peace; S 38
 U.N. running hard to stand still in keeping Middle Eastern peace and excluding China; E 626
Weisgall, Hugo. Opera Purgatory reviewed by B. Boretz; M 126
Weiss, Peter. Play The investigation reviewed by H. Clurman; D 395
Weiss, Theodore; New York congressional contender's use of closed-circuit TV. O. G. Chase; C .... 106; see also 577
Weiss, Theodore
 Sweet talk; P 221
Weissman, David L.
 Objections to J. Newfield's praise of R. F. Kennedy; C .... 562; see also 505
Welch, Robert. See Birch society, John
Welfare. See Poverty
Welfare imperialism. See Imperialism
Welshaus, Pfc. Darrel L.
 Praise for J. McDermott's Welfare imperialism in Vietnam; C .... 484; see also 76
Weltner, Representative Charles L.; bill proposing criminal conspiracies control act as clear and present danger to civil liberties. V. Countryman; S 16
 Resigned rather than support Georgia Democratic gubernatorial nominee L. Maddox 372, 642
Werth, Alexander
 Impact of truth in June 13 article, French eyes on Vietnam: America's colony in hell. L. Forer; C 51
 Russian summer: the worried vacationists in view of Vietnam situation; S 176
 Soviet Premier Kosygin in Paris: differences within amity with France; S 693
Wertham, Dr. Frederic; on violence inculcated by TV 340
Wesker, Arnold; play The kitchen reviewed by H. Clurman; D 334

Index

PAGE

- West Virginia; Federal construction and education projects deferred because of war; E .. 404
- Westergaard, Peter. Opera Mr. and Mrs. Discobbolus reviewed by B. Boretz; M 126
- Weston, Hugh
  - Letter from Australia: whites, aborigines, immigration, U.S. influence and British tradition, Vietnam participation; S .... 512; see also C, 594
- Wheeler, David; founder of Theatre company of Boston ... 130
- Wheeler, General Earle C.; demonstration against at Brown U. ... 594
- White Pass ski patrol. J. Logan; P ... 358
- Whitney museum of American art, New York; architecture reviewed by E. Galantay; S ... 292
- Widick, B. J.
  - Pressures on labor: Vietnam, race and the unions; S ... 545
- Wilbur, Richard
  - Under Cygnus; P ... 675
- Wilder, Thornton; Cherry lane productions of three one-act plays reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 334, 398
- Williams, Raymond
  - Letters from Britain:
  - Significance of economic-political crisis; illusions lost; S ... 185
  - Significance of seaman's strike .... 18; see also correction, 90
- Williams, Tennessee. Play The rose tattoo (City center revival) reviewed by H. Clurman; D ... 493
- Wilson, Prime minister Harold. See Great Britain
- Wilson, James Q.; on corruption in state governments ... 475, 477-478
- Wingfield, William
  - The campus scare campaign; anti-Communist books distributed gratis by Constructive action; S .... 206; see also C, 370
- Winnipeg; Manitoba centre theatre. J. Novick; D ... 196
- Wiretapping; by FBI under Justice department scrutiny; E ... 37
  - J. E. Hoover-R. F. Kennedy feud over "dirty business," as in Bobby Baker case; E ... 690
- Wolfe, Thomas
  - 1938 letter to The Nation on Spanish civil war ... 94
- Wolff, Dr. Max; study of Head Start program ... 501
- Wolseley, Roland
  - June 27 editorial would advocate violence to win Negroes' rights; C .... 66, with editors' reply
- World War I; Supreme court failed to protect dissenters ... 316-317
- World War II; catalyst for Latin America 183
- Wrong box, the. Reviewed by R. Hatch; MP ... 134
- Wulf, Melvin L.
  - Selective reprisal: Johnson administration's sniping at dissenters on Vietnam; S .... 149; see also C, 234

Y

- Yarmolinsky, Adam; former Defense official on uses of U.S. military power. R. Stern; S ... 639
- Yew, Prime minister Lee Kuan. See Singapore
- Yorty, Sam; Los Angeles mayor's opposition to open housing ... 439
- Young, Rev. Andrew; M. L. King aide on black power ... 115
- Young Americans for freedom; book-distributing activities for Constructive action 206 ff.; see also C, 370
- Youngdale, James M.
  - Democrats' war-prosperity gambit in T. Roosevelt tradition; C .... 338: see also E, 236
- Ypsilanti, Michigan; Greek theatre reviewed by J. Novick; D ... 261

Z

- Zagri, Sidney; Teamsters' lawyer and DRIVE executive director ... 664
- Zellner, Robert; in charge of R. Cook's campaign ... 470 ff.
- Zweig, Paul
  - Pain; P ... 330
  - Upon seeing a frieze of Greek marbles; P .. 652

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B	Book review
R	Reviewer
C	Correspondence

PAGE

A

- Abbe, George
  - The non-conformist: the autobiography of a conscience; B ... 426
- Abortion. L. Lader; B ... 492
- Abrahams, William, and P. Stansky
  - Journey to the frontier (in Spain): Julian Bell and John Cornford; B ... 102
- Achievement of William Faulkner, the. M. Millgate; B ... 220
- Affluence after anger; development of British "cultural generation" of 1950's. Article by R. Williams ... 676
- Africa. South of the moon: on Stanley's trail through the dark continent. B. Littell; B...... 712
- Age of Keynes, the. R. Lekachman; B ... 329
- Agnon, Shmuel Yosef, as Nobel Laureate of Hebrew literature. Article by C. Leviant 645
- Aguilar, Jeannette
  - The classic cooking of Spain; B ... 679
- Air pollution. Poisons in the air. F. Warshofsky and E. Edelson; B ... 359
- Akhmatova, Anna. Article by A. Werth on late Russian poet ... 157
  - Quoted on Russian poetry ... 550
- Amis, Kingsley
  - The anti-death league; B ... 620
- Anderson, Margaret
  - The children of the South (Negroes in desegregated high school); B ... 523
- Angel in the forest, M. Young book reviewed June 13, far off course. H. A. Ziegler; C 19
- Anti-death league, the. K. Amis; B ... 620
- Antiworlds: poetry by Andrei Voznesensky; B .... 549. See also correction, 690
- Aptheker, Herbert
  - Mission to Hanoi; B ... 188
- Art books noted ... 680
- Art of cuisine, the. H. de Toulouse-Lautrec and M. Joyant; B ... 678
- Arthur, George
  - IWW still exists; C .... 187. See also J. Yglesias article, 54
- As a city upon a hill: the town in American history. P. Smith; B ... 713
- Ashbery, John
  - Rivers and mountains; B ... 649
- Austrian empire. The waterfalls of Slunj. H. von Doderer; B ... 519

B

- Bailey, Hugh C.
  - Hinton Rowan Helper: abolitionist and racist; B ... 191
- Barren lives (Vidas secas). G. Ramos; B 59
- Barth, John
  - Giles goat-boy; B ... 193
- Barzun, Jacques (ed.). See Follett, W.
- Bates, Ralph
  - The olive field (reissue); B ... 98
- Becker, James F.
  - Author J. H. G. Pierson's objections to June 20 review of Insuring full employment; C ... 202
- Becker, James F.; R ... 329
- Beckett, J. C.
  - The making of modern Ireland, 1603-1922; B ... 485
- Behan, Brendan
  - Confessions of an Irish rebel; B ... 486
- Beiliss, Mendel. Blood accusation: the strange history of the Beiliss case. M. Samuel; B ... 394
- Bell, Julian. Journey to the frontier (in Spain): Julian Bell and John Cornford. By W. Abrahams and P. Stansky; B ... 102
- Bellow, Saul; on intellectuals and literature .... 52, 58. See also Bellow letter, C, 156, and Boldizsár reply, C, 298
- Benítez, Fernando
  - The century after Cortes (in Mexico); B 287
- Berube, Maurice R.; R ... 520
- Better half, the: the emancipation of the American woman. A. Sinclair; B ... 490
- Big gift books noted ... 680
- Big knockover, the: selected stories and short novels. D. Hammett; B .... 454. See also correction, 498
- Blackstock, Charity
  - The children (survivors of German concentration camps); B ... 523

PAGE

- Blood accusation: the strange history of the Beiliss case. M. Samuel; B ... 394
- Bly, Robert. Work of Sixties press described in article The American outsider, by P. Zweig ... 517
- Boldizsár, Iván
  - The view from the East; article on Communist intellectuals .... 55. See also S. Bellow, C, 156; and Boldizsár reply, C, 298
- Bosch, Juan
  - David: the biography of a king; B ... 615
- Brazil; two novels from reviewed ... 59
- Brecht, Bertolt
  - Manual of piety (Die Hauspostille); B 458
- Brodsky, Iosif
  - Selected poetry (in Russian); B ... 549
- Brome, Vincent
  - The international brigades; B ... 91
- Brown, Edward J.
  - Article Sholokhov and the Nobel prize 160
- Burgess, Anthony
  - Tremor of intent; B ... 620
- Burke, Kenneth
  - Towards a better life: being a series of epistles, or declamations (reissue); B 648
- Burroughs, William
  - The soft machine; B ... 25

C

- Cameron, James
  - Here is your enemy (North Vietnam); B .. 188
- Carthaginian peace, the, or the economic consequences of Mr. (J. M.) Keynes. By E. Mantoux; B ... 329
- Case of Joe Hill, the. P. Foner; B ... 291
- Century after Cortes, the (in Mexico). F. Benítez; B ... 287
- Chametzky, Jules
  - In my father's court. I. B. Singer; B 392
- Chase, Edward T.; R ... 712
- Cheuse, Alan; R ... 59
- Children, the (survivors of German concentration camps). C. Blackstock; B ... 523
- Children of the South, the (Negroes in desegregated high school). M. Anderson; B .. 523
- China. Thousand recipe Chinese cookbook, the. G. B. Miller; B ... 679
- Christman, Henry M.; R ... 190
- Cipango's hinder door. E. Dahlberg; B ... 225
- Cities, U.S. As a city upon a hill: the town in American history. P. Smith; B ... 713
- Classic cooking of Spain, the. J. Aguilar; B ... 679
- Clurman, Harold; R ... 421
- Cohen, Mitchell, and D. Hale (eds.) The new student left: an anthology; B ... 20
- Commentary reader, the: two decades of articles and stories. N. Podhoretz (ed),; B ... 23
- Communist controversy in Washington, the: from the New Deal to McCarthy. By E. Latham; B .... 422. See also Latham letter, with reviewer F. J. Donner's reply; C ... 594, 612
- Communistic societies of the United States, the (reprint). C. Nordhoff; B ... 254
- Confessions of an Irish rebel. B. Behan; B .. 486
- Connell, Evan S., Jr.
  - The diary of a rapist; B ... 26
- Cook right—live longer. L. Kordel; B ... 679
- Coogan, Timothy Patrick
  - Ireland since the rising; B ... 485
- Cookbooks; five reviewed ... 678
- Cornford, John. See Bell, J.
- Costa, Richard Hauler
  - Article (H. G.) Wells and the cosmic despair ... 222
- Cowan, Paul; R ... 291
- Cowley, Malcolm
  - The Faulkner-Cowley file: letters and memories, 1944-1962; B ... 220
- Cronin, Sean; R ... 486
- Cuba. The yoke and the star. T. de Gámez; B ... 616

D

- Dahlberg, Edward
  - Cipango's hinder door; B ... 225
  - Reasons of the heart; B ... 225
- Dark, the. J. McGahern; B ... 488
- Dark places of the heart. C. Stead; B ... 420
- David: the biography of a king. J. Bosch; B ... 615
- Deming, Barbara
  - Prison notes; B ... 190
- Diary of a rapist, the. E. S. Connell, Jr.; B ... 26
- Documents of upheaval (from Garrison's Liberator). T. Nelson (ed); B ... 190
- Doderer, Heimito von
  - The waterfalls of Slunj; B ... 519

PAGE

Donner, Frank J.; R .... 289, 422. See also M. R. Konvitz, C, 484, and E, Latham, C, 594, with Donner replies; also 612
Dostoevsky and romantic realism: a study of Dostoevsky in relation to Balzac, Dickens, and Gogol. By D. Fanger; B 164
Dublin 1916. Edited by R. McHugh; B 486

E

Edelson, Edward. See Warshofsky, F.
Education. Four books on Negroes and concentration-camp refugees reviewed. ...... 520 ff.
Eliot, T. S.
  To criticize the critic and other writings; B 324
Epstein, Edward J.
  Inquest: the Warren commission and the establishment of truth; cited in J. Cohen article .... 44 ff.
Esfandiary, F. M.
  Identity card; B 616
Expanding liberties: freedom's gains in postwar America. M. R. Konvitz; B .... 289. See also Konvitz letter and reviewer F. J. Donner's reply; C 484

F

Fall, Bernard B.; R 188
Fanger, Donald; R 389
  Dostoevsky and romantic realism: a study of Dostoevsky in relation to Balzac, Dickens, and Gogol; B 164
Faulkner, the achievement of William. By M. Millgate; B 220
Faulkner-Cowley file, the: letters and memories, 1944-1962. M. Cowley; B 220
Fertig. By S. Yurick; B 128
Field, Andrew (ed.)
  Pages from Tarusa; B 549
Fixer, the. B. Malamud; B 389
Follett, Wilson, et al.
  Modern American usage. Edited by J. Barzun; B 709
Foner, Philip
  The case of Joe Hill; B 291
Foner, Philip (ed.)
  The letters of Joe Hill; B 291
France. Modern French culinary art. H.-P. Pellaprat; B 679
Freeways. L. Halprin; B 357
From race riot to sit-in: 1919 and the 1960's. A. I. Waskow; B 189

G

Gámez, Tana de
  The yoke and the star; B 616
Gardner, Frederick H.; R .... 454. See also correction 498
Gass, William H.
  Article A true lie-minded man, on the novelist 453
Genovese, Eugene D.; R 191
Gerassi, John; R 252
Germany. Muted revolution, the: East Germany's challenge to Russia and the West. W. Hangen; B 457
  Two Germanies: mirror of an age. P. Lust; B 457
Gersh, Gabriel; R 360
Giles goat-boy. By J. Barth; B 193
Gillman, Joseph M.
  Misstatement in June 20 O'Connor review of Baran and Sweezy; C .... 202, with O'Connor reply
Goldstein, Laurence
  Article Survivor's heritage, on novels of E. Wiesel 390
Góngora, Luis de
  The solitudes of Don Luis de Góngora: a text with verse translation. E. M. Wilson; B 288
Great Britain. Development of "cultural generation" of 1950's. Article by R. Williams .. 676
Grierson, Francis
  Valley of shadows, the. The coming of the Civil War in Lincoln's Midwest: a contemporary account; B 226
Guimares Rosa, José
  Saganara; B 59

H

Hale, Dennis (ed.) See Cohen, M.
Halperin, Irving; R 393
Halprin, Lawrence
  Freeways; B 357
Hamburger, Michael; R 458, 519
Hammett, Dashiell
  The big knockover: selected stories and short novels; B .... 454. See also correction 498
Hangen, Welles
  The muted revolution: East Germany's challenge to Russia and the West; B 457
Harrington, Alan
  The secret swinger; B 127

PAGE

Harris, Mark
  Twentyone twice: a journal; B 425
Hatch, Peter; R 102
Hatch, Robert; R 620
Heirs of Cain, the. A. Rothberg; B 620
Hentoff, Nat
  Our children are dying (Negro slum schools); B 520
Herbst, Josephine; R 91
Here is your enemy (North Vietnam). J. Cameron; B 188
Hill, Joe, the case of. P. Foner; B 291
Hill, Joe, the letters of. Edited by P. Foner; B 291
Hinton, Rowan Helper: abolitionist and racist. H. C. Bailey; B 191
Hoffman, Frederick J.; R 324
Horowitz, Irving Louis
  Three worlds of development: the theory and practice of international stratification; B 252
Howe, Irving (ed.)
  The radical papers: essays in democratic socialism; B 23

I

Identity card. F. M. Esfandiary; B 616
In my father's court. I. B. Singer; B 392
Industrial workers of the world; still exists despite J. Yglesias statement. G. Arthur; C .... 187; see also 54
Inquest: the Warren commission and the establishment of truth. E. J. Epstein; cited in J. Cohen article .... 44 ff.
International brigades, the (in Spain). V. Brome; B 91
Iran. Identity card. F. M. Esfandiary; B 616
Ireland. Dublin 1916. Edited by R. McHugh; B 486
Ireland, the making of modern, 1603-1922. J. C. Beckett; B 485
Ireland since the rising. T. P. Coogan; B 485
Irish rebel, confessions of an. B. Behan; B 486
Irish uprising, the 1916-1922. A C.B.S. legacy collection produced by G. Lieberson. Book and 2 records 486

J

Jackson, Gabriel; R 98
Jackson, Kennell, Jr.; R 521
Jacobs, Paul, and S. Landau
  The new radicals: a report with documents; B 20
Jews. The children (survivors of German concentration camps). G. Blackstock; B 523
Four writers on reviewed. .... 389 ff.
Journey to the frontier (in Spain): Julian Bell and John Cornford. By W. Abrahams and P. Stansky; B 102
Joyant, Maurice. See Toulouse-Lautrec, H. de

K

Kariel, Henry S.; R 22
Karlinsky, Simon; R .... 164. See also correction, 690
Karlinsky, Simon
  Article Yevtushenko and the underground poets (of the Soviet Union) 549
Kateb, George; R 254
Keynes (John Maynard), the age of. R. Lekachman; B 329
Keynes, John Maynard. The Carthaginian peace or the economic consequences of Mr. Keynes. By E. Mantoux; B 329
Koch, Stephen; R 25, 649
Konvitz, Milton R.
  Expanding liberties: freedom's gains in postwar America; B .... 289. See also Konvitz letter, with reviewer F. J. Donner's reply; C 484
Kordel, Lelord
  Cook right—live longer; B 679
Kriegel, Leonard; R 616

L

Lader, Lawrence
  Abortion; B 492
Laing, Alexander; R 332
Lambert, Gavin
  Norman's letter; B 331
Landau, Saul. See Jacobs, P.
Landscape in concrete. J. Lind; B 393
Larson, Charles R.; R 425
Lasch, Christopher
  What shall a moral man do? Article based on critique of The psychology of power, by R. V. Sampson 581
Last gentleman, the. W. Percy; B 129
Latham, Earl
  The Communist controversy in Washington: from the New Deal to McCarthy; B .... 422. See also Latham letter, with reviewer F. J. Donner's reply; C 594, 612

PAGE

Lathrop, Peter; R 23
Left, the new; three books on; B .... 20. See also O. Nathan; C 266
Lekachman, Robert
  The age of Keynes; B 329
Letters of Joe Hill, the. Edited by P. Foner; B 291
Leviant, Curt; R 394
Article Nobel laureate of Hebrew literature, on S. Y. Agnon and his books 645
Lewis, Gordon K.; R 287
Liberator, The; Documents of upheaval from. T. Nelson (ed.); B 190
Lieberson, Goddard
  The Irish uprising 1916-22. C.B.S. legacy collection produced by G. Lieberson. 1 book and 2 records 486
Lind, Jakov
  Landscape in concrete; B 393
Littell, Blaine
  South of the moon: on Stanley's trail through the dark continent; B 712
Llosa, Mario Vargas. See M. Vargas Llosa
Luce, Phillip Abbott
  The new left; B 20
Lust, Peter
  Two Germanies: mirror of an age; B 457
Lynd, Staughton (ed.)
  Nonviolence in America: a documentary history; B 190

M

McCarthyism. The Communist controversy in Washington: from the New Deal to McCarthy. By E. Latham; B 422
Non-conformist, the: the autobiography of a conscience. G. Abbe; B 426
McConnell, Grant
  Private power and American democracy; B 22
McGahern, John
  The dark; B 488
McHugh, Roger (ed.)
  Dublin 1916; B 486
McShane, Frank; R 225
Mafia, the, and politics. M. Pantaleone; B 360
Making of modern Ireland, the, 1603-1922. J. C. Beckett; B 485
Malamud, Bernard
  The fixer; B 389
Mandelbaum, Seymour J.; R 713
Mantoux, Etienne
  The Carthaginian peace, or the economic consequences of Mr. (J. M.) Keynes; B 329
Manual of piety (Die Hauspostille). B. Brecht; B 458
Maurer, D. W.; R 456
Mayer, Peter (ed.)
  The pacifist conscience; B 190
Mexico. Century after Cortes, the. F. Benítez; B 287
Miller, Arthur; on PEN 52, 56, 58
Miller, Gloria Bley
  The thousand recipe Chinese cookbook; B .. 679
Miller, Heather Ross
  Tenants of this house; B 227
Millgate, Michael
  The achievement of William Faulkner; B 220
Mission to Hanoi. H. Aptheker; B 188
Modern American usage. W. Follett. Edited and completed by J. Barzun et al.; B 709
Modern French culinary art. H.-P. Pellaprat; B 679
Molnar, Thomas
  South West Africa: the last pioneer country; B 712
Morality. Article What shall a moral man do?, based on book by R. V. Sampson, The psychology of power. C. Lasch 581
Morshen, Nikolai
  Poems in The new Russian review; B 549
Music school, the. J. Updike; B 328
Muted revolution, the: East Germany's challenge to Russia and the West. W. Hangen; B 457
Myers, Oliver T.; R 288

N

Nathan, Otto
  Comment on J. O'Connor review of new Left books; C .... 266; see also 20
Nation, The; books by contributors 684
Negroes. The children of the South (in desegregated high school). M. Anderson; B .. 523
  From race riot to sit-in: 1919 and the 1960's. A. I. Waskow; B 189
  Our children are dying (in slum schools). N. Hentoff; B 520
Nelson, Truman (ed.)
  Documents of upheaval (from Garrison's Liberator); B 190

Index

PAGE

Nelson, Truman
  The torture of mothers (of "Harlem six"), cited by J. Baldwin 40
Neruda, Pablo: the poet in New York at PEN congress. Article by J. Yglesias 52
  See also G. Arthur; C 187
New England conscience, the. A. Warren; B 647
New England saints. A. Warren; B 647
New left, the. P. A. Luce; B 20
New radicals, the: a report with documents. P. Jacobs and S. Landau; B 20
New Russian poets, the, 1953 to 1966. An anthology. Translated and edited by G. Reavey; B 549
New student left, the: an anthology. M. Cohen and D. Hale (eds.); B 20
Nobel prize and M. Sholokhov. Article by E. J. Brown 160
Non-conformist, the: the autobiography of a conscience. G. Abbe; B 426
Nonviolence in America: a documentary history. S. Lynd (ed.); B 190
Nordhoff, Charles
  The communistic societies of the United States (reprint); B 254
Norman's letter. G. Lambert; B 331

O

Oates, Joyce Carol; R 129
O'Connell, Shaun; R 193
O'Connor, James
  Corrections to June 20 review of Baran and Sweezy, Monopoly capital. J. M. Gillman; C .... 202, with O'Connor reply
O'Connor, James; R .... 20. See also O. Nathan; C 266
Olive field, the (Spanish civil war) (reissue); R. Bates; B 98
Our children are dying (in Negro slum schools). N. Hentoff; B 520

P

Pacifism and nonviolence; four books on noted 190
Pacifist conscience, the. P. Mayer (ed).; B 190
Pages from Tarusa. Edited by A. Field; B 549
Panteleone, Michele
  The Mafia and politics; B 360
Paul, Sherman; R 356, 647
Peace corps. Twentyone twice: a journal. M. Harris; B 425
Pei, Mario; R 675, 709
Pellaprat, Henri-Paul
  Modern French culinary art; B 679
PEN; P. Neruda at international congress in New York. Article by J. Yglesias 52
Percy, Walker
  The last gentleman; B 129
Peru. The time of the hero. M. Vargas Llosa; B 616
Pierson, John H. G.
  Objections to J. F. Becker review, June 20, of book Insuring full employment; C 202
Podhoretz, Norman (ed.)
  The Commentary reader: two decades of articles and stories; B 23
Poetry. The American outsider; article on "lowbrow" poets and R. Bly's Sixties press. P. Zweig 517
Poisons in the air. F. Warshofsky and E. Edelson; B 359
Pol, Heinz; R 457
Polner, Murray; R 523
Pop novels. Three examples reviewed by R. Hatch 620
Power, the psychology of. R. V. Sampson; B 581
Prison notes. B. Deming; B 190
Private power and American democracy. G. McConnell; B 22

R

Radical papers, the: essays in democratic socialism. I. Howe (ed.); B 23
Ramos, Garciliano
  Barren lives (Vidas secas); B 59
Random house dictionary of the English language, the (unabridged edition); B 675
Raskin, Barbara; R 227
Réage, Pauline
  Story of O; B 332
Reasons of the heart. E. Dahlberg; B 225
Reavey, George (ed.)
  The new Russian poets 1953 to 1966. An anthology; B 549

PAGE

Rechy, John; R 331
Reeves, Nancy; R 490
Rivers and mountains. J. Ashbery; B 649
Roads. Freeways; L. Halprin; B 357
Rosenthal, M. L. (ed.)
  The William Carlos Williams reader; B 356
Rothberg, Abraham
  The heirs of Cain; B 620
Rueckert, William H.; R 648
Runyonese: the mind and craft of Damon Runyon. By J. Wagner; B 456

S

Sagarana. J. By Guimaraes Rosa; B 59
Sampson, R. V.
  The psychology of power; B 581
Samuel, Maurice
  Blood accusation: the strange history of the Beiliss case; B 394
Samuels, Charles T.; R 220, 328
Sanford, Charles L.; R 426
Schur, Edwin M.; R 492
Secret swinger, the. A. Harrington; B 127
Selected poems of Andrei Voznesensky; B 549
Selections from The Bratsk power station and other poems. Y. Yevtushenko; B 549
Shapiro, Elliott. Protagonist of Our children are dying (Negro slum schools). N. Hentoff; B 520
Sholokhov, Mikhail, and the Nobel prize. Article by E. J. Brown 160
Silver, Nathan; R 357
Simonson, Harold P.; R 226
Sinclair, Andrew
  The better half: the emancipation of the American woman; B 490
Singer, Isaac Bashevis
  In my father's court; B 392
Sixties press. R. Bly's poetic enterprise reviewed in article The American outsider, by P. Zweig 517
Smith, Bob
  They closed their schools: Prince Edward county, Virginia, 1951-1964; B 521
Smith, Page
  As a city upon a hill: the town in American history; B 713
Soft machine, the. W. Burroughs; B 25
Solitudes, the, of Don Luis de Góngora: a text with verse translation. E. M. Wilson; B 288
South of the moon: on Stanley's trail through the dark continent. B. Littell; B 712
South West Africa: the last pioneer country. T. Molnar; B 712
Spain. Civil war booklist 100
  International brigades, the. V. Brome; B 91
  Journey to the frontier (in civil war): Julian Bell and John Cornford. By W. Abrahams and P. Stansky; B 102
Spain, the classic cooking of. J. Aguilar; B 679
Stansky, Peter. See Abrahams, W.
Stead, Christina
  Dark places of the heart; B 420
Story of O. By P. Réage; B 332
Sullivan, Kevin; R 485

T

Tenants of this house. H. R. Miller; B 227
They closed their schools: Prince Edward county, Virginia, 1951-1964. B. Smith; B .. 521
Thomson, Virgil
  Virgil Thomson; B 421
Thousand recipe Chinese cookbook, the. G. B. Miller; B 679
Three worlds of development: the theory and practice of international stratification. I. L. Horowitz; B 252
Time of the hero, the. M. Vargas Llosa; B 616
To criticize the critic and other writings. T. S. Eliot; B 324
Topkins, Katharine; R 127
Torture of mothers, the (of "Harlem Six"). T. Nelson; cited by J. Baldwin 40
Toulouse-Lautrec, Henri de, and M. Joyant. The art of cuisine; B 678
Towards a better life: being a series of epistles, or declamations (reissue). K. Burke; B 648
Tremor of intent. A. Burgess; B 620
Tucker, Martin; R 128
Twentyone twice: a journal. M. Harris; B 425
Two Germanies: mirror of an age. P. Lust; B 457

U

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yevtushenko and the underground poets. Article by S. Karlinsky 549
Updike, John
  The music school; B 328

PAGE

V

Valley of shadows, the. The coming of the Civil War in Lincoln's Midwest: a contemporary account. F. Grierson; B 226
Vargas Llosa, Mario
  The time of the hero; B 616
Vietnam, North; two books on reviewed 188
Virgil Thomson. By V. Thomson; B 421
Virginia. They closed their schools: Prince Edward county, Virginia, 1951-64. B. Smith; B 521
Voznesensky, Andrei
  Antiworlds: poetry by Andrei Voznesensky; B .... 549. See also correction, 690
  Selected poems of Andrei Voznesensky; B .. 549
  Voznesensky: selected poems; B 549

W

Wagenheim, Karl; R 615
Wagner, Jean
  Runyonese: the mind and craft of Damon Runyon; B 456
Warren, Austin
  The New England conscience; B 647
  New England saints; B 647
Warren commission. Inquest: the Warren commission and the establishment of truth. E. J. Epstein; cited in J. Cohen article .... 44 ff.
Warshofsky, Fred, and E. Edelson
  Poisons in the air; B 359
Waskow, Arthur I.
  From race riot to sit-in: 1919 and the 1960's; B 189
Waterfalls of Slunj. By H. von Doderer; B 519
Wells, H. G. Wells and the cosmic despair. Article by R. H. Costa 222
Werth, Alexander
  Akhmatova: tragic queen Anna. Article on late Russian poet 157
West, Anthony C.; R 488
Wiesel, Elie
  The gates of the forest and other novels discussed in article Survivor's heritage, by L. Goldstein 390
William Carlos Williams reader, the. Edited by M. L. Rosenthal; B 356
Williams, Raymond
  Article Affluence after anger, on development of British "cultural generation" of 1950's 676
Wilson, Edward Meryon (translator)
  The solitudes of Don Luis de Góngora: a text with verse translation; B 288
Women's suffrage. The better half: the emancipation of the American woman. A. Sinclair; B 490
Writers and writing
  PEN congress speech excerpts by A. Miller and S. Bellow 56, 58
  PEN congress, New York. Article by J. Yglesias 52
  True lie-minded man, a; article on the novelist. W. Gass 453
  View from the East, the; Communist intellectuals. Article by I. Boldiszár 55
Wurtele, M. G.; R 359

Y

Yevtushenko, Yevgeny
  Selections from The Bratsk hydroelectric station and other poems; B 549
  Yevtushenko poems; B 549
Yevtushenko and the underground poets (of the Soviet Union). Article by S. Karlinsky .. 549
Yglesias, Helen; R 678, 680
Yglesias, José; R 420
  Pablo Neruda: the poet in New York; article on PEN congress .... 52. See also G. Arthur; C 187
Yoke and the star, the. T. de Gámez; B 616
Young, Marguerite; book Angel in the forest, reviewed June 13, far off course. H. A. Ziegler; C 19
Yurick, Sol
  Fertig; B 128

Z

Ziegler, Henry A.
  M. Young book Angel in the forest, reviewed June 13, far off course; C 19
Zinn, Howard; R 189
Zoll, Stephen; R 26
Zweig, Paul
  Article The American outsider, on "lowbrow" poets and R. Bly's Sixties press .. 517

THE WELTNER BILL VERN COUNTRYMAN

THE NATION

JULY 4, 1966 35 cents

229272

The Night We Bombed Peking

WILLIAM EASTLAKE

THE TRANSIT SNARL

Is It Back To The Rails?

CARL DREHER

New Left Books

BEYOND THE BURNING MORAL THING JAMES O'CONNOR

New Non-Novels

BURROUGHS' SOFT MACHINE

STEPHEN KOCH

CONNELL'S DIARY OF A RAPIST

STEPHEN ZOLL

HINTERLAND THEATRE IN THE EAST JULIUS NOVICK

10-30-67 PLL1865
BRO EDMUND JOSEPH F S C
COMMUNITY LIBRARY
20TH ST & OLNEY AVE
PHILADELPHIA PA 19141

LETTERS

Brown failed

New York City

Dear Sirs: Your editorial on the California Republican gubernatorial and Democratic primaries ["California, There She Blows!," The Nation, June 20] is a clear, intelligent analysis. However, I notice that you again mention Governor Brown—as you have sometimes had occasion to in the past—in a somewhat favorable context. To many of us, Brown is not another Earl Warren or Hiram Johnson (men who, incidentally, shine in comparison with their fellows, but whose intrinsic merits as humanitarians seem lacking) but merely the man who could have (1) followed through correctly after his correct appraisal of the roots of the Watts riots, but who instead unleashed the brutal suppression of the rioters; (2) struck a blow for free speech by publicly upholding the rights of the Berkeley FSMers; (3) saved the life of Caryl Chessman. On all these points Brown failed—failed as a human being.

Jerry Engelbach

baby Marines

New Orleans, La.

Dear Sirs: On the morning of May 17, the students of Jesuit High School in New Orleans were treated to an event which will become common in high schools all over the nation in the next few months. The noted event was the activation ceremonies for the first U.S. Marine Junior ROTC program in the country. This program is for youths in the age group 14-18 and is the first of 12,000.

The latest move to militarize the youth of the country did not go unchallenged, however; several pickets were on hand and many students of Jesuit High objected. The pickets carried signs reading: PEACE CORPS NOT MARINE CORPS, HOW MANY MORE MUST DIE FOR JOHNSON'S MISTAKES? WHY TRAIN OUR CHILDREN TO BE KILLERS? and WHAT HAPPENED TO THE PRINCE OF PEACE? . . .

During the demonstration, a picket was struck by an irate father of one of the boys, the same man then spat on two female pickets and tore up a sign. . . . The students and parents were addressed by Gen. Wallace M. Greene, U.S. Marine commandant; the Rev. J. Donald Pearce, school president, and Rep. F. Edward Hebert, an alumnus of Jesuit High and the proud father of the ROTC revitalization bill.

General Greene congratulated the students for being chosen as the first unit in the United States to receive the "honor," and said: "We in the Regular Marine Corps are proud of this new addition to the Marine Corps family." The Rev. Donald Pearce stated that the United States is presently fighting in Vietnam "to preserve the ideals established here 200 years ago." He went on to say: "If our youth is rightly instructed our power will be greater than any weapon man can devise. . . ."

Jack J. Frazier

more about Sylvester

Washington, D.C.

Dear Sirs: Your editorial of June 6 ["Did You Hear That?"] makes the point that Arthur Sylvester, the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Public Affairs, once threatened newsmen in Saigon with "I know how to deal with you through your editors and publishers in the States." I can testify from personal experience that Mr. Sylvester does not confine his threats to newsmen.

In a radio broadcast on June 24 (on Washington

(Continued on page 19)

EDITORIALS

The Kennedy Safari

President Kennedy rated his brother Robert as a major political intellect and insisted on having him in his Cabinet. On his African safari, Senator Kennedy proved that President Kennedy's evaluation was not overdrawn. Everything the Senator said was well said, and, in a precarious situation, he did not make a single misstep. Even his confusion and embarrassment, on one occasion, turned out to his credit. The trip was a good thing for the United States, for the Africans, and for Kennedy himself. What Richard Nixon said at a Republican fund-raising dinner on June 11 is now even more emphatically true: "Bobby Kennedy will be the second most powerful man in the Democratic Party in 1968. Whether he challenges the President or not will depend on the polls." It will also depend on Kennedy's courage and his ability to sustain the political élan he showed on his African journey.

For the first time in memory, an important American said the right things in the Union of South Africa. By denying entry to the American press, the Verwoerd government assured special attention to Kennedy's visit. Nor was the news blackout complete. The New York Daily News had a correspondent—George Laing—in Johannesburg, and he syndicated the story after traveling with Kennedy.

The white supremacists had expected Kennedy to get a mild welcome from English-speaking university students. Instead, 4,000 students, who had waited for hours at the airport, hoisted Kennedy onto their shoulders and marched him triumphantly into the terminal building. The mobbing was repeated in Capetown, in Durban, and even at Stellenbosch University, a hotbed of Afrikaaner nationalism.

The trip must have been educational for Kennedy as well as for the Afrikaaners. When he tried to shake hands with an African member of the ground staff at the Kimberley airport, the man fled. To shake hands with a white man would have been perilous for the African. But thousands came to hear him speak, and surged forward in an uncontrollable mass, shouting, "Master, Master"—the only word of praise and gratitude they knew. In Tanganyika Kennedy met a more sophisticated crowd of black Africans. They listened to him politely but in grim silence, and Kennedy knew the reason: Vietnam. His hands trembled and he spoke awkwardly. But he recovered and, abandoning his written text, spoke directly to the young, to those, as he put it, "with the fewest ties to the past, the fewest ties to the present, and the greatest stake in the future."

At no point was Kennedy the self-righteous American abroad. He conceded our faults and said only that we were aware of them (some of us at least) and were trying to do better. There he was speaking not only to the Africans but to liberals, intellectuals, progressive labor and, in general, that part of America which is left of Center. If he is to achieve higher office than the Senate, that grouping must be the nucleus of his support. If events favor, it can spread from these elements to the less differentiated electorate.

His risks are as great as his opportunities. From a professional political viewpoint, his start has been made too early. It is more than two years to the 1968 election, six to 1972. The big issue on which the coming elections may turn is Vietnam. Kennedy has sent up one trial balloon on the issue of opposition to the Johnson policy of escalation in Vietnam, then pulled it back. Whatever the outcome, the United States is in for endless trouble in that part of the world. Even if the Vietcong are conquered, at enormous cost, Vietnam will turn out to be a Pyrrhic victory for American military power. Kennedy must show that he foresaw disaster and opposed it while it was still politically hazardous to speak out. Winston Churchill came to power in Britain by opposing the government in power. A lone voice, when it speaks truth, is the loudest. And Kennedy's voice is already strong enough so that he cannot be ignored. His African trip made him an international figure. Now, with a continuation of nerve and verve, he is in a position to capitalize on it in U.S. politics.

The Cry of the Cities

This year's meeting of the U.S. Conference of Mayors in Dallas was notable on two counts. The first is that the mayors of New York, Boston, Detroit and other cities made it clear, in a national TV broadcast, that some of the money being spent in Vietnam had better be turned to solving the problems of the cities, before conditions become completely chaotic. The mayors mentioned $33 million a day, but this figure is outdated. Only a few members of the inner circle of the Johnson Administration know what the war is actually costing, but it is nearer $2 billion a month than $1 billion, and probably before the end of the year it will exceed the larger figure.

That hurts. As Marquis W. Childs points out in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, a mayor's life is not a happy one. Half the time he is beating a path to Washington holding his hand out for money, merely to keep afloat. The rest of the time he may be fighting a state legislature which regards the city as a den of iniquity, in contrast to the pristine purity of the constituents on the farm—those who are willing to remain there. A cooperative governor is an exception rather than the rule. These afflictions of the typical big-city mayor are almost taken for granted, but when Washington is pouring billions into an overseas war, on top of the billions routinely allocated to "defense," many mayors must be asking themselves if there are not easier ways of dying.

The compensating factor in this, for the country if not for the mayors, is that the cities they represent are one of the most significant potential sources of political pressure to curb the excesses of Vietnam. Organized labor is for the most part acquiescent, business even more so, because in the short run both benefit by the war. But the cities' financial plight is such that the local officials who are trying to cope with it may be able to transmit some of their desperation to Washington. Mayor Jerome P. Cavanagh of Detroit and Mayor John F. Collins of Boston called for a "total reassessment and re-analysis" of national and international commitments. Mayor Lindsay of New York concurred. These men are national figures, close to the grass roots. Cavanagh is running against G. Mennen (Soapy) Williams for the Democratic Senatorial nomination in Michigan. As he tours the state, most of his audiences

IN THIS ISSUE

July 4, 1966

EDITORIALS

2

ARTICLES

6 Quebec: Separatism in a New Guise
Dillon O'Leary

8 The Night We Bombed Peking
William Eastlake

11 The Transit Snarl:
Is It Back To The Rails?
Carl Dreher

16 The Weltner Bill:
Clear and Present Danger
Vern Countryman

18 Letter from Britain
Raymond Williams

BOOKS & THE ARTS

20 New Left: Beyond the Burning Moral Thing
James O'Connor

22 Behind Pluralism's Façade
Henry S. Kariel

23 Criticism Sans Action
Peter Lathrop

24 To The Heart (poem)
Victor Contoski

25 Images of Loathing
Stephen Koch

26 Violent Days
Stephen Zoll

27 Hinterland Theatre IV:
Washington to Philadelphia
Julius Novick

31 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Assistant Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher
ANNE C. ABRAMOVITZ Assistant

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. Tel.: 242-8400.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address [illegible] well as the new.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION Volume 203
No. 1

applaud his stand on the Vietnamese war, which is to stop the escalation and try to negotiate a settlement. And Detroit needs the funds a settlement would release.

Equally significant at the conference was the blunt talk of Mayor Henry W. Maier of Milwaukee on city-suburb relations. One of Maier's proposals is that the federal government should put pressure on the suburbs to bear part of the burden of housing and education in the cities, where people of low income (or none at all) are concentrated. The central city, Maier points out, is left to become "the receptacle for all the functions the suburb dweller does not care to support." He contends that "the islands of the privileged could not exist unless they were paid for by islands of the poor." The well to do flee to the suburbs and, from these enclaves, sally forth daily to make money in the cities, then return at night to the comfort and relative security of their outlying homes. When, as Mayor Lindsay proposed, they are asked to pay a city income tax which would impose a negligible burden, their screams resound over the whole metropolitan area.

At the same time "metropolitan hypocrisy" keeps suburban schools tightly segregated. It is poor form to mention this fact, but Maier spoke about it at length. The mayors, at his suggestion, asked the federal government to cut off financial aid to suburbs which are not willing to think and act in terms of metropolitan areas. Such action would be a step in the right direction in any effort to check the degradation of the cities, and the only immediate source for the huge sums this would require must come from possible cutbacks in military spending in Vietnam.

The Economics of Pollution

The economics of water pollution has not received anything like the attention the subject deserves. It is currently estimated that the nation suffers almost $13 billion annually in damage from water pollution. Technically it is possible to upgrade the quality of water to any extent necessary; the problem is largely a matter of economics. As the Illinois Business Review (University of Illinois) points out, the costs rise sharply once pollution is severe. "Once any practice is permitted," the Review notes, "it becomes entrenched in a vested interest that cannot be dislodged without a fight." The longer pollution is tolerated, the higher the costs will be and, if tolerated long enough, the costs can become prohibitive.

Yet pollution is not lessening as one might assume from the attention it is getting in print; on the contrary, because of rising population and industrial output, we are facing a deteriorating situation. The immediate problem is to prevent additions to the uncompensated social costs of wastes passed on to others. Each expanding community, each new factory should be required to return to the stream water equal in quality to that taken into the plant or into city conduits. These requirements should be enforced all across the country, to prevent self-seekers from competing for new plants and population at somebody else's expense.

Even if this first task is met, the cost of cleaning up the existing mess and supplying ever increasing needs will be enormous; but if it is not met, the ultimate costs will be much higher: The Review's conclusion is unassailable: "We are facing the day when water production will have to be managed, region by region, by efficient enterprises, which will make careful use of resources, carry on research to solve emerging problems, and enact a scale of charges designed to allocate available supplies economically. We cannot delay the building of the regional enterprises that will have these responsibilities. Any loss of momentum will magnify and solidify the obstacles. To salvage the future we have to begin building it now."

Honor Thy Father & Thy Mother

In practice, the Biblical injunction has been construed as an obligation of adult children to support their parents. When the children are affluent and the parents are in need, this is fair enough, but when the moral principle is enacted into law, inequities develop in many cases. Title 19 of the federal government's medicare program has resulted in a highly desirable modification in the welfare regulations in New York State and New York City, and no doubt other states and cities will effect similar changes. In New York City thousands of needy old people have been informed that their children are no longer required to support them and, contrary to what one would expect, the parents as well as the children express relief. The elderly residents of an institution in Brooklyn are quoted in The New York Times as saying that they were glad their children would now be free "to take a vacation, get a new car, or give the grandchildren some extras." The burden of guilt has been lifted from parents (and grandparents) who were plagued in their last years by awareness that they were a burden.

Undoubtedly there will be a howl from the Right, with the usual assertions that here is another measure to obliterate individual and family responsibility by shifting the burden to the well-to-do taxpayer. The facts do not jibe with this well-worn theory. What the federal law did was to eliminate the requirement that children be responsible for their parents' medical bills; in taking advantage of the federal program, New York State sensibly extended this exemption to all kinds of support. Spouses remain responsible for each other, and parents for children under 21. The only change has been in favor of children over 21 toward their parents. Those who are willing and able to support their parents, or help support them, will no doubt continue to do so. However, they cannot be forced, and in fact the attempt to force them was never much of a success. It resulted in cruel hardships and did more to divide families than probably any other law on the books.

A typical case is that of a $10,000-a-year man with a wife and two children. Under the former arrangements, the cut-off income was $5,600 a year, and this man was required to pay half the difference, or $2,200 a year, toward his parents' support. What with the income tax, interest on the mortgage, etc.—and the obligation, now well-nigh taken for granted, to send the children to college—this $10,000-a-year man and his wife need only a little bad luck to be headed for the relief rolls themselves.

What the voices on the Right are not likely to mention is that lawyers have contended for some years that "relative responsibility" (applied outside the spouse-for-spouse and parent-for-minor-child categories) may well be unconstitutional under the equal-protection clause, in that it imposes double taxation on the person who happens to be unlucky enough to have relatives who need public assistance. Also, little attention will be paid to the assertion of New York City Welfare Commissioner Mitchell I. Ginsberg that the additional cost to the city when it picks up the bills previously paid by children will be offset by savings in investigation and court costs. Heretofore, every applicant for welfare has been investigated to ascertain whether any relatives can be held responsible for his support, and several hundred cases a year have been taken to court. Even if it should turn out that Mr. Ginsberg has exaggerated the savings, the inherent indecency of these proceedings would be cause enough for their discontinuance. The change should be hailed not so much on the basis of cost as on grounds of humanitarianism and civic amenity.

SUMMER SCHEDULE

During July and August, The Nation will appear on alternate weeks: forthcoming issues will be dated July 11, July 25, August 8 and August 22.

Thanking Senator Robertson

On March 10 of last year, the U.S. District Court in New York City ruled that the Manufacturers Trust Company and the Hanover Bank were, by their merger into the nation's fourth largest bank, in violation of the Sherman antitrust laws. Three weeks later, Sen. A. Willis Robertson, Chairman of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, introduced legislation to exempt Manufacturers-Hanover from this court action.

Not surprisingly, the officers of Manufacturers-Hanover felt kindly toward Senator Robertson, a venerable Virginia gentleman, for this assistance, and the bank sent out 40,000 letters asking its stockholders to express their "thanks" to Robertson this year—which happens to be election year for him and he is hard pressed.

When this was revealed in Washington newspapers recently, Robertson responded that he had never "solicited a penny" from the banks. This is probably true. There would be no need to remind the bankers of the country of what they were already very well aware (as several of them have said openly and as several columns in the American Banker have stressed): that if Robertson is defeated and if U.S. Sen. John Sparkman is knocked off this fall by an Alabama Republican—which is not impossible—then the committee chairmanship could fall into the hands of Sen. Paul Douglas of Illinois, assuming his re-election, who dearly loves to make big banks and big corporations toe the mark.

*Some*one is soliciting *some*thing. A director of one bank in Virginia resigned recently, saying that the "arm twisting" to force contributions for Robertson, some of it done with the threat of blocking advancement of bank workers if they did not chip in, was too much for him to stomach.

Robertson's own efforts to appear above aligning himself with the bankers' lobby were somewhat deflated when Robert Walters of the Washington Star recently discovered that the Virginia Senator had hired, for the duration of the campaign, one Charles Emmet Lucey as a "researcher." Last session of Congress Lucey was better known around Washington as one of the top lobbyists pushing the bank-merger bill that gave Manufacturers-Hanover and several other banks such a timely assist. And what is Lucey doing in Robertson's office? "I'm giving assistance," he said, "to help him formulate various things."

The Salisbury Talks

The talks now in progress in Salisbury between officials of the British Government and those of the rebel regime of Rhodesia will not solve the country's main problems—even if agreement is reached. The manner in which they were initiated, as well as the composition of the delegations, precludes a consideration of the main issues that gravely concern the leaders of the 4 million voteless Africans.

The man who should take credit for the current talks is Dr. Hendrik Verwoerd, Prime Minister of South Africa. When the United Nations Security Council gave authority to Britain last April to stop and even board ships taking oil to Rhodesia, it indirectly warned South Africa not to continue breaking the international boycott. Dr. Verwoerd knew that the Security Council would widen the use of the powers contained in Chapter 7 of the Charter to include his own country, if the limited use already agreed on proved ineffective. He was therefore eager to take the Rhodesian crisis out of the hands of the Security Council before the May meeting. By threatening Britain with a direct confrontation with South Africa in the financial field where the former is weakest, and by bullying Ian Smith's Rhodesia, which could not survive without his massive aid, he managed to get the two to talk.

It may not matter how or who starts negotiations, but South Africa's intervention in Rhodesian affairs always strengthens the conservative, racialistic elements in the white-settler population of Rhodesia. The solution Dr. Verwoerd seeks is totally different from that of Ian Smith, let alone Britain or the Africans. The British Foreign Office's statement last week that conservative right-wing Ministers in Ian Smith's regime are on the ascendancy in policy matters came as no surprise and can be traced directly to Dr. Verwoerd's intervention in April and May.

It is incredible that Britain's Labour government should agree to go this far in discussions with Ian Smith's representatives without leaders of the 4 million Africans being present. Wilson's six principles, which have formed the basis of the current talks, have been rejected by Africans as both inadequate and outdated by U.D.I. (the Unilateral Declaration of Independence last November). Any modifications insisted upon by Rhodesian representatives will be even more unacceptable. It is therefore tragic that two delegations composed entirely of Europeans should sit down in Africa in 1966 to discuss and decide upon the future of 4 million indigenous Africans. No decision arrived at in the absence of Rev. Ndabaningi Sithole and Mr. Joshua Nkomo —the elected leaders of the African people, now in detention with many of their followers—can be considered binding on the African people. In fact they may well feel duty bound to abrogate any such imposed settlement. Britain learned (or should have learned) this lesson bitterly in the experiment of the Central African Federation. After ten years of hard work and heavy investment it was finally dismantled. The same fate awaits any agreement that may be reached in the present talks.

The issues at stake are that at the time Britain gives independence to Rhodesia there should be a government responsive to the wishes of all people (majority rule), and therefore power must shift from the 220,000 settlers to the 4 million Africans; and that race must not be a hindrance to economic and social advancement. If Britain were as fully committed to these principles as it says it is, it would not be talking to a regime that is moving in the opposite (South African) direction; instead, it would be tightening the sanctions (for instance, giving more assistance to Zambia to blockade Rhodesian railways by finding alternative routes) and fully supporting Security Council action.

African demonstrations against the Salisbury talks have been ruthlessly put down by police and army units and censored from all local newspapers. On June 15 there was widespread rioting in all African townships in Salisbury. A bus, a factory, a hotel and several drug stores belonging to Europeans were set on fire by angry demonstrators, who were being chased by trained police dogs. Isolated incidents were reported in London newspapers of the week ending June 19, but readers of Salisbury newspapers never know about any such incidents. Both supporters and opponents of Ian Smith's regime live in the dark about their own country—and in constant fear. N. M. SHAMUYARIRA

Mr. Shamuyarira, born in Rhodesia in 1928, was for four years editor of the now banned Daily News, the only paper in the country edited for African readers. He is at present studying for a Ph.D. in politics at Princeton University. In 1965 Mr. Shamuyarira published Crisis in Rhodesia (Andre Deutsch).

Quebec: Separatism in a New Guise

DILLON O'LEARY

Mr. O'Leary is a Canadian free-lance journalist and political correspondent.

Ottawa

English Canada breathed easier immediately after the June 5 Quebec provincial election. The first clearly Separatist bid at the polls had been soundly rebuffed by Quebec's voters.

The rest of Canada, which knows little about Quebec except that it seems a troublesome puzzle, also heard that Daniel Johnson's Union Nationale had scored a narrow upset victory over the Liberal government of Premier Jean Lesage. Lesage had for three years been raising English-Canadians' hackles with demands for "Quebec's rights," so his defeat by Johnson seemed an exchange of a devil they knew for a devil they didn't. That seemed less important than knowing that Separatism was a hollow threat.

But is it? A long second look at Premier Johnson proved less reassuring. He is an urbane lawyer of age 51, and an experienced politician who was sponsored and taught his art by the late Premier Maurice Duplessis, who for eighteen years ran Quebec as a feudal fief. Despite his name, Daniel Johnson is every inch a French-Canadian. In recent years he has become an advocate of Associate Statehood for Quebec: a more sophisticated brand of the Separatism espoused by young romantics and some professors in Quebec's universities. He is the first Quebec premier to endorse such a doctrine. The next year may tell whether his quasi-Separatism was mere demagogy, or a storm signal which was largely overlooked or ignored.

As good a definition as any of Associate Statehood was offered by Johnson last summer to an English-speaking study group. He would have English and French "nations" co-existing within the Canadian state. Ottawa would be the capital of only the "English nation," and Quebec City of the "French nation." He allowed that they might have a common postal service, currency and, perhaps, defense force; otherwise they would be autonomous. He has also asserted Quebec's right to become a republic. The difference between this theory and outright Separatism is largely a matter of semantics.

This is a dissonant theme amid Canadian preparations to celebrate next year the hundredth anniversary of Confederation. In 1867, Confederation welded the four British colonies of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick into a federal union. The centennial will celebrate its development into modern Canada of ten provinces, stretching 4,000 miles from Atlantic to Pacific; an independent nation attached voluntarily to the British Commonwealth.

Within Confederation, however, Quebec held aloof from the rest of Canada. Until recently, its hinterland beyond Montreal remained a pastoral enclave outside the industrial development of North America: Roman Catholic and clerical, rustic, inward-looking and intent mainly on preserving its religion and language. The fact that two prime ministers were from Quebec—Laurier and St. Laurent—did little to lure the city into the mainstream of Canadian life.

Nor did English Canada often extend a sympathetic hand. Canada's English-speaking Establishment regarded Quebec as "backward and priest-ridden," and a source of largely unorganized and cheap labor for industry owned by American and English-Canadian capital. Montreal's English-speaking businessmen paid support to the reactionary and union-hating regime of Duplessis, who ran the province through corruption and coercion, and let the rest of the country go its own way.

All that changed completely in 1960 when Premier Lesage took office, and Quebec's so-called "quiet revolution" began. French Canada came alive to the 20th century, and its pent-up cultural and political ambitions exploded.

The upsurge swept Lesage to a second and decisive victory in 1962, with his slogan, "Maîtres Chez Nous" (Masters in Our Own House), symbolizing Quebec's aspirations to control its economic as well as its political destiny. His government nationalized the electric utility companies, owned by English-Canadian capital, into Quebec Hydro. The backward school system was reformed and expanded rapidly. An emerging and well-educated middle class demanded its share of posts in the upper echelons of the province's business and industry; it also demanded that French replace English as Quebec's language of commerce, and that French have equal status with English in the federal civil service in Ottawa. The latter demand was coupled with insistence that French-Canadians be given a greater share of the senior civil servant positions.

From that ferment was born a nationalistic Separatism, demanding an independent Quebec republic. Its adherents were mainly students, bohemians, some young workers and intellectuals; and a sprinkling of Marxists and young French Canada's version of the New Left. (Only ten years ago a French-Canadian Marxist was both a curiosity and an outcast.) Separatism in turn spawned a faction of terrorists, noted in 1963 and 1964 for their bombings, and raids on armories and gun shops. Almost the first bomb blew up General Wolfe's monument on the Plains of Abraham outside Quebec City, where Wolfe won French Canada for Britain in 1756. Terrorism killed three persons and maimed another. Two terrorists have been condemned to death and are awaiting execution.

But when the Separatists resorted to ballots instead of bullets in the recent elections, Quebec's 3,200,000 voters largely ignored them. Their major bid was by the leftist RIN (Rassemblement pour l'Indépendence Nationale) led by Pierre Bourgault, a 33-year-old ex-journalist who was in the fore of demonstrations against Queen Elizabeth during her visit to Quebec City in 1964. The RIN got only 5.5 per cent of the vote, though it was nearly 8 per cent in Montreal. An ultra-Right Separatist group got 3.2 per cent.

That vote hardly writes off Separatism. For the spirit of Separatism pervades the Liberal and Union Nationale parties: its concepts often flower in theories of a semi-autonomous French Canada, or Associate Statehood, almost a throwback to the Austria-Hungary of the Hapsburgs. Premier Lesage was not of that belief, but a few of his prominent ministers were. They included the Socialist-minded René Levesque, who inspired the electric utilities take-over; Paul Gerin-Lajoie, who insisted on Quebec's right to sign certain foreign treaties on its own, such as a cultural agreement with France—and did; and Pierre Laporte, Lesage's then heir apparent.

Their attitude exacerbated the guerrilla warfare which the Lesage government conducted with Ottawa, demanding and often getting ever greater autonomy in administering welfare, educational, housing and manpower policies; and demanding also for Quebec, and getting, a larger share of income taxes under the formula by which they are shared between federal and provincial governments. Rakosi's salami-slicing techniques were used to whittle away federal power in Quebec.

Nevertheless, during the election these ministers were in the background. Lesage made himself the central Liberal spokesman, and he attacked Separatism as "foolish and childish."

Johnson played both sides of the fence. He appealed for the English-speaking minority's votes—about 15 per cent, concentrated in Montreal—and said he had rejected an alliance with Separatist groups. He declared he was against splitting Quebec from Canada (which was not necessarily a repudiation of Associate Statehood). But he also appealed directly for Separatist votes, and said Separatism could not be ruled out as Quebec's final solution.

He did not get the English-speaking vote, and the result was embarrassing. Union Nationale won fifty-five seats in the legislature, against fifty-one for the Liberals, plus two independents elected; but because Johnson's main strength was in the numerically smaller rural ridings, he got only 41 per cent of the popular vote, against 47 per cent for the Liberals. The non-French vote had withheld from him the clear mandate he wanted. In exasperation on election night, he protested that "les Anglophones et les Juifs" (the English and Jews) had voted against him. The racist undertones sent a chill through the province.

To allay fears from that outburst, Johnson has promised his government will pass a bill of rights for all minorities in Quebec. He has also unfolded other fascinating plans: to send Quebec delegates to some bodies of the United Nations, such as UNESCO, and to set up a Quebec department of immigration. Foreign affairs and immigration are, under the Canadian constitution, solely federal jurisdictions. But Johnson proposes to revise the constitution through negotiation between English and French Canada. The federal and provincial governments together have been trying without agreement to revise Canada's constitution these last seventeen years; Johnson will not find it any easier.

For the present, however, it is not these plans which perplex Ottawa. The federal government wonders how far Johnson will press his main election plank: his demand that Quebec take over all personal income, corporation and succession taxes collected by Ottawa in Quebec. In cold cash this year, that would give his government $865 million additional revenue, over and above the $585 million Quebec garners in these taxes. It is an impossible demand. Ottawa could not grant it without other provinces asking a like share. That would leave a bare treasury, and the mere remnants of a national government. How seriously will Johnson push his ideas? He has been ambiguous about this.

He must score spectacularly in at least some of them. For with his small majority in the legislature, he must almost certainly call another election within a year in an attempt to win a decisive majority, if he is not overthrown by a legislature vote before that. In seeking increments to Union Nationale support, the temptation to woo the total 8.7 per cent of the outright Separatist vote will be alluring; especially in Montreal, where the Union Nationale vote was weakest and the Separatist vote strongest. He can do that by loudly asserting Quebec sovereignty in dealing with Ottawa and English Canada generally.

The likelihood is that such action would intensify an English-speaking backlash in the rest of Canada. The anti-Quebec resentment is already there, as Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson discovered last fall in the federal election. He has staked his career on reconciling English and French Canada. That policy won him most of Quebec, but he failed to sell it to English Canada. He returned with a minority government in the five-party House of Commons.

The confederation has not yet been torn asunder. But the current noises from Quebec sound suspiciously as if it is bulging at a few of its seams.

THE NIGHT WE BOMBED PEKING

WILLIAM EASTLAKE

Mr. Eastlake, author among other books of The Bronc People (Harcourt Brace) and Castle Keep (Simon & Schuster), recently spent three months in Southeast Asia. While there he had some "night thoughts" about his experience, and since he is by trade a novelist and short-story writer, they took this form.

"Silent as a whisper, death, Billy," the CIA man said, and then he said, "The colonel says we have to bomb Peking now before it is too late."

The captain agreed and the major didn't say anything. The Communist waiter left to make notes and the CIA man said, "Well, I don't suppose it's any secret that you're a nut, Colonel."

We were in the bar of the Surawongse Hotel in Chieng Mai, Thailand, where the country curves north toward China and where the bombing run to Hanoi is short. The American Air Force officers had come into this rest area four days before. I had come up on the Bangkok-to-Chieng Mai train behind a golden, dragon-emblazoned, wood-burning locomotive, with the CIA man in the same compartment. We talked. The CIA man was fresh from triumphs in Cuba, Santo Domingo and Singapore, but he didn't want to talk about that. He wanted to talk about Franz Kafka.

The smoke drifted around us.

"I don't think I was cut out for this job," he said.

I had never even seen a CIA man before so I kept quiet and let him talk.

"Cat got your tongue?" the CIA man asked. "Wait till you hear those Air Force kooks in Chieng Mai," he said slowly in remembrance of blunders past. "They'll jar your teeth out. They want to be turned loose on China. Funny thing," the CIA man said, "your reaction is not atypical. Most Americans get scared when they meet a CIA man. But you can't write about me. No one would believe it if you did. Cat got your tongue, Billy?"

More smoke.

"Teak," the CIA man said. "Smells like camphor. Did you enjoy Cambodia?"

"How did you—?"

"That's my business. Don't get scared. We're both Americans. People are always surprised that a CIA man is a human being. Particularly intellectuals. Intellectuals have got us pigeonholed in their clichés as villains, blundering villains. I hate to disillusion you, Billy."

"You want to play nasty?"

"I want to provoke you into saying something. I sense resentment and I think it would be helpful if you got it out."

"Boo!" I said.

"That's better," the CIA man said. "Pretty soon you'll be treating me like a human being."

That night in the Surawongse Hotel bar, after the American Air Force officers left with the international whores, the CIA man went suddenly quiet. The Bentley's overhead cams were still noisy the way they had been every night the international whores picked up our heroes.

"Where do they go?"

"I don't know where the Air Force goes at night," the CIA man said abruptly. Then he ordered the Communist spy waiter to fetch him a sangría. "I don't know what they do on their time off, Billy. They are entitled to some privacy." The CIA man thought about this a long time in silence while waiting for the sangría. "No, they're not. Not as long as they got the bomb they're not entitled to any privacy at all. You know that place across from the prison that looks like a palace, Billy? Well, that's what it is, a palace, and that's where they go. I've got all the bedrooms wired for sound. You want to hear an old tape?"

"No."

"All they want to do is bomb China. Is that asking too much? You won't let them do it, will you, Billy?"

"That's right."

"Their lives can be frustrating, Billy. Very frustrating."

The sangría arrived.

"I don't know why I tell you all this. I tell you all this because no one would print it."

"Maybe you have a compulsion to confess?"

"No, Billy. I read Dostoevski too."

"Michigan State?"

"Princeton," the CIA man said. "I show my hand, Billy, because that's the best cover. No one will believe the truth. Not even my wife."

"Sad."

"Au contraire, Billy. It's my cover—my modus vivendi."

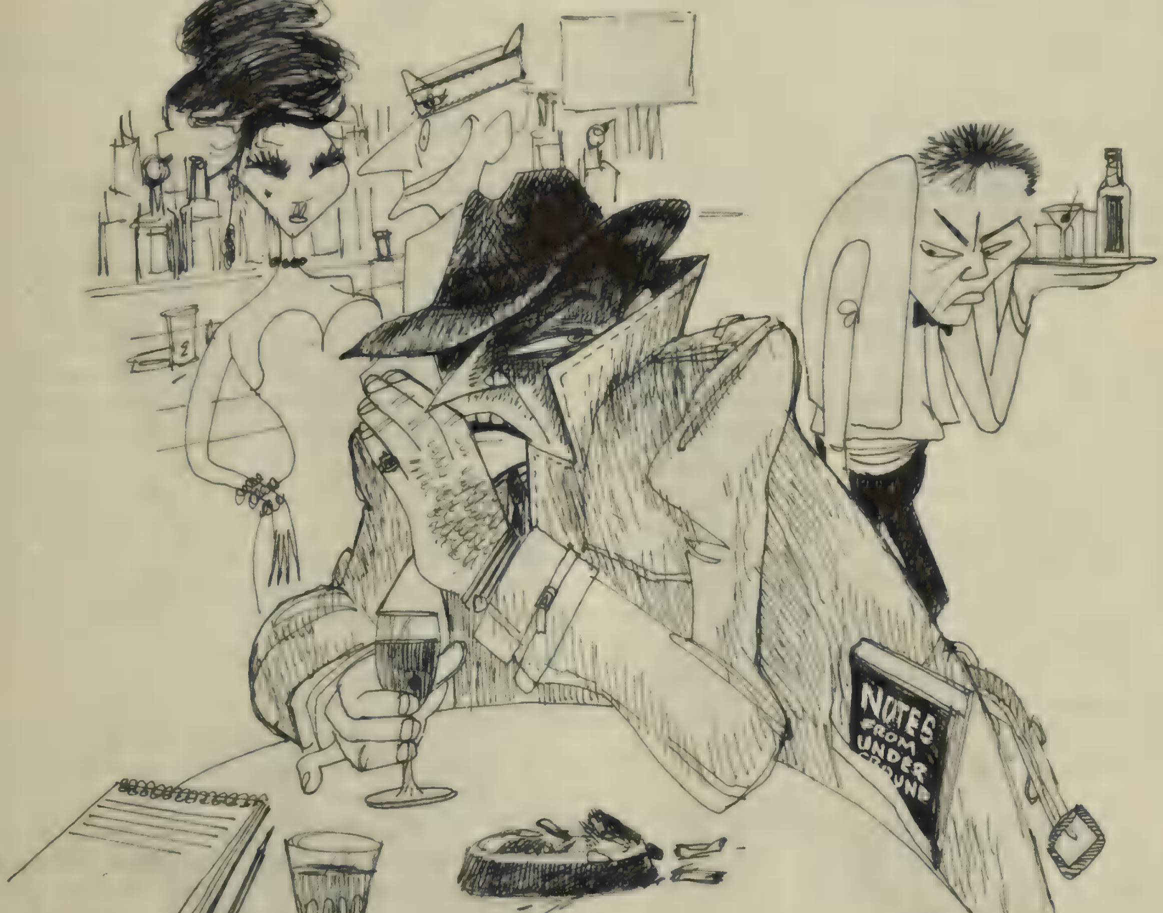
"I guess you went to Princeton all right."

The CIA man mumbled something in Latin that I couldn't catch, couldn't catch if I had caught. Then he said: "You know, Billy, the CIA could take over this whole shooting match any time at all."

"Oh?"



"Doesn't that scare you, Billy?"

"More than you'll ever know."

"Did I tell you about our Santo Domingo caper?"

"Twice."

"Try to get it printed."

"I see what you mean."

"It's not that we control the press, Billy. It's that they don't control us."

The CIA man sent the waiter off on another sangría mission and then said: "I taught him to make a Cuban sangría. And I got him a job here so I could keep an eye on him. His room is on tape. This way, Billy, if an American—if you—were to be assassinated we would know about it."

"Thanks."

"I said we'd know about it. I didn't say we'd do anything about it. Sometimes in the long run we find it best to let nature take its course. If it meant our cover or your life, who knows?"

"Quién sabe?"

"Billy, I'm going to buy you a Buddha and then I want you to do me a favor."

"What favor?"

"Let the Air Force drop the bomb on Peking."

"Say that again."

"A fantasy bomb, Billy, not the real thing. But it will do the trick. You see, the American people sent the Air Force over here to win a war cheap. Quick and cheap, but they tell them Thou Shalt Not Do This, Thou Shalt Not Do That. They got areas all mapped out where they can go and can't go. They can't go to Peking."

"What a shame."

"It means they can't win the war, Billy. It means they're all choked up. It means our colonel, the captain and the major are in trouble. You think they enjoy running off every night of their Rest and Recreation, spending all of their R and R, with the international whores? No, Billy, they're in trouble."

"That is a pity."

"Come on, Billy, I'll buy you a Buddha."

And he did, too, but first we got in a trishaw to get where the Buddhas were. I insisted he use my trishaw boy, Yip Phy. I've still got Yip's card along with the card of a saffron-robed Buddhist monk, another companion on the wood-burning train—cards, the confetti of the jungle.

"The Thais got the card-carrying bit from their Japanese allies during the Second World War, but they don't like to be reminded of this. They have another legend that they're a free people. They love myths," the CIA man said. Then he made a big pause watching the hard-working rear of Yip Phy. "Billy, what are we going to do for our heroes, the captain, the major and the colonel?"

"Nothing."

"Just one bomb on Peking?"

"Nothing."

"Come on, I'll buy you a Buddha."

The bronze Buddha, 10 centimeters high, was beautiful. I had no intention of accepting it, but man is weak. I'm watching it on my desk as I write.

When we got back in our trishaw the CIA man said: "Billy, did I ever tell you about the directive that went out advising everyone attached to the American Embassy to improve our bi-cultural relations. It said that the darker hill Thai people should no longer be excluded from functions. Do you know what I said when I heard this news, Billy?"

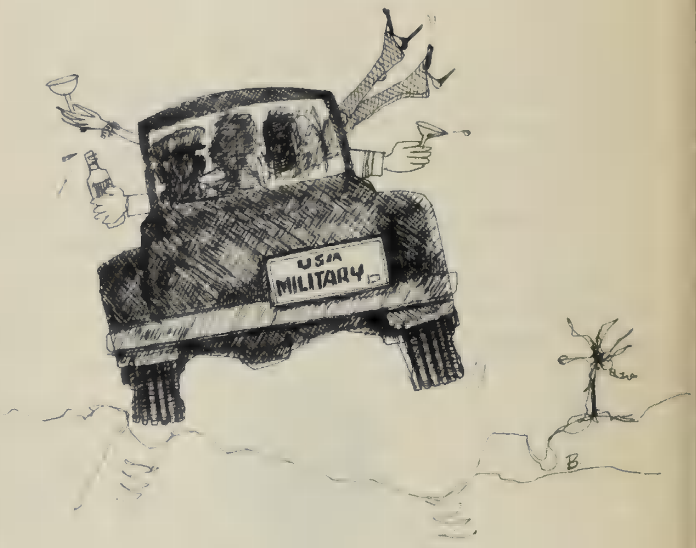
"What did you say?"

"Black Thai mandatory."

"Thank God for the CIA," I said.

That afternoon, as was their custom, our Air Force heroes on R and R got stoned, starting at noon. When I arrived at four o'clock at the Surawongse bar they were all staring into the yonder.

"I am just telling them, Billy, about their mission to Peking."



"Honored," the colonel mumbled. "Terribly honored."

"Take off at 1800 hours," the CIA man said, flicking his watch.

"Honored," the colonel said. "But we have all been drinking heavily."

"That could help," the CIA man said.

"Yes," the colonel said. "Honored to have been selected for this first mission, but—but—we have an engagement at 1800 hours with the international—with the young ladies."

"Take them along to Peking. I mean, forget them. Think of your country."

The colonel thought of his country. "Old Miss," the colonel said, and he brushed away a tear.

"It's 1500 hours now," the CIA man said. "Time to go to the ready room for briefing."

"We're honored."

"We sure are," the captain said.

"Shut up," the colonel said. "Sit down, boy," the colonel said to the CIA man. "Who's your friend?" he said staring at me through a blear of Scotch.

"Not the novelist William Eastlake whom we all know, love and admire and respect in this bar on your R and R," the CIA man said. "That's his cover. William Eastlake, the novelist who or whom you have all come to love, honor, admire and respect is not a very good cover, is it? Well; he is in fact Henry Wilberforce, our operator from Harvard who planned this mission."

"All by yourself?" the colonel said.

"We are sure honored," the captain said.

"Shut up," the colonel said. The colonel took another sip of his Scotch. "At 1800 hours we have an appointment with the ladies."

"Listen, Colonel," the CIA man said, standing up and pointing. "If you go out that door to the old Bentley with double overhead cams, I mean if you go out with the international whores, that door leads straight to hell. On the other hand, if you go out that door over Peking, somewhere, somehow there will be a hallowed spot in every American heart in solemn memory."

The colonel took another swig of the Scotch.

"Or is that what you want to do, Colonel?" the CIA man said. "Make Thailand into an American brothel?"

"Washington is an American brothel," the colonel said.

"That's right," the major said.

"Sure is," the captain said.

"You see? That shows our State Department was right all the time," the colonel said. "Have a drink."

"All right, you've had your little joke, Colonel," the CIA man said solemnly. "Now let's get back to bombing Peking."

"Some other time," the colonel said, struggling to his feet. He looked at his wrong wrist. "Got appointment with the ladies at 1800 hours."

"The whores," the captain said rising.

"That's right," the major said.

"Shut up," the colonel said. "They're fine young ladies who are using the money to reconstruct the palace. Where would this country be without them? They are studying for the priesthood, got the yellow dresses, everything." The colonel stared around. "Where's Peking? I mean, where's the Bentley?"

"That's right," the major said.

"Sure is," the captain said.

They all departed. They all stumbled out the door to the noisy, double overhead cammed old Bentley. The door they did not take led some time, somewhere to a Mach Four, brand new, silent as a whisper, death.

The CIA man watched them make the Bentley, then turned to me and said, "How do you like those apples, Wilberforce?"

THE TRANSIT SNARL

IS IT BACK TO THE RAILS?

CARL DREHER

It is a common belief that the railroads lost most of their passenger business through complacency and technological stagnation. In certain instances, that may be close enough to the truth; but, as always in widespread adversity, the responses of groups and individuals differed widely. Some of the railroads went down fighting; some others held on to a substantial part of the traffic—and these, with government help, are now on the verge of a comeback.

Even where somnolence was clearly a factor in the decline, the sleep was by no means total. When diesel power promised to reduce costs, the railroads made the steam locomotive a museum piece with a celerity that belied the myth of senility. In recent years striking advances have been made in efficient freight movement, and the results are reflected in the 1965 earnings of the stronger roads, some of which delighted their stockholders with profits unparalleled in their history: Norfolk & Western, with $90 million; Northern Pacific, $28 million (the latter had earned more in two previous years, but the later of these was 1918). The New York Central, with $41.5 million, up from $27 million in 1964, did not do badly either. Where management failed it was only in the passenger field, against seemingly insuperable competition from the airplane and the automobile. Ten years ago, research and development were not the magic words they have become, nor was it apparent that we were highway-building ourselves into trouble.

Now that it is apparent, there is still no indication that the railroads can regain their one-time primacy in long-haul passenger transport. The Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964, insofar as it is aimed at the 460-mile "Northeast Corridor" (Boston-New York-Washington) may prove to be quite off the mark. Fast trains on this run might obviate the time-consuming trip from midtown to the airport and offer such attractive features as barbershops and club cars, but most of these amenities were taken for granted on pre-World War II de luxe trains like the Southern Pacific's Lark.

Once, seven nights a week, the Lark carried 300 passengers from San Francisco to Los Angeles in civilized leisure and comfort, and an equal number in the reverse direction. The distance is about the same as between Boston and Washington and the Lark, though not what it once was, is still a pretty fair train—but the railroad has asked the California Public Utilities Commission for permission to discontinue it. The air line makes the trip in an hour and offers hundreds of flights a week. Ninety-five passengers ride the Lark each way each night; the air line carries 7,700 a day. As the SP traffic manager says, the Lark has one fatal defect—it can't fly. Any conceivable increase in speed would leave the Lark, and probably its East Coast counterpart, still far behind.

The crucial problem, and the one that calls for new directions in railroading, is in suburban areas within a radius of, say, 60 miles from the great metropolitan centers, where the automobile is becoming a greater source of pollution than of movement, and where the airplane does not compete. But even here we should not expect too much too soon. "The fuse is lit," one Sunday feature writer proclaims, "for an explosion in urban mass transportation that may rival the freeways of the past decade." Maybe so, but "explosion" is a word sorely overused these days. What we are likely to see is something more on the order of accelerated evolution in a number of locations, with the controlling interests elsewhere waiting and watching. Their decisions will hinge less on social efficiency and the commonweal than on the amount of financial assistance federal, state and municipal governments are prepared to offer.

We should be skeptical of both grandiose organizational reforms and great technological leaps, such as 300- or 400-mph ground transport by the various exotic means on which magazine art departments delight to exercise their imaginations. It is said that transportation in all its forms accounts for about 20 per cent of gross national product—as much as $140 billion yearly. Considering its fragmented, cross-purposed character and the waste we all experience at the junction points of the various modes, the estimate does not seem out of line. When Secretary of Commerce John T. Connor talks hopefully of "all forms of transport . . . harmonized and orchestrated in the manner best serving the national interest," he is giving a good description of what U.S. transport is not. Costs could indeed be reduced and the public convenience served by large-scale planning and coordination, but the prospect for any such inclusive overhaul is dim.

This article is the second in a series on new technological developments in inter-city and suburban rail transportation. The first, "Advance Into Yesterday" by Michael Harris, was published on June 6.

To appreciate how far we are from anything resembling an integrated transportation policy, one need only look at the jagged interface between ground and air transport. Charles C. Tillinghast, Jr., president of Trans World Airlines, puts it aptly: "America had better solve some of her mass transit problems before she worries too much about the supersonic jet. If the problem of getting to and from airports is not solved, almost half the time of a transcontinental trip will be spent on the ground." At the present rate, the problem will not be solved before the eighties, if then. A metropolitan airport is a crippled facility without a rapid transit line to the city's core area, but no such combination exists anywhere in the United States, and only one city—Cleveland—is planning such a connection. Since only 10 or 15 per cent of the American people have ever flown in any aircraft, civil or military, and a much smaller percentage flies the air lines at all regularly, it can be argued that rapid transit to and from airports is unwarranted. But, with all the advertising the air lines do, isn't that another indication that an inclusive transportation policy is envisioned only in the after-dinner speeches of high government functionaries?

The proposed federal Department of Transportation—assuming it can manage to get through Congress—will be able to change the general picture very little in the foreseeable future. Special interests will simply do their infighting within the new department. The management and coordination of federal programs in the various fields of transportation will improve only slowly and may even suffer setbacks as the present eleven agencies charged with supervising air lines, railroads, federal highways, etc., struggle to retain their autonomy while submitting to organization-chart merger. That the present generation of commuters, whether on rubber or steel, will benefit in any tangible way is unlikely.

This does not mean that integration cannot be effected regionally on a significant scale. Public-spirited individuals and organizations should continue to bend their efforts in that direction. Among local and regional programs there can be beneficial interplay and the federal government can exert constructive influence with impartial expertise and judicious allocation of funds. A hopeful sign may be found in the provisions of the Federal Highway Act of 1962, which was supposed to withhold federal highway grants from cities that failed to come up with plans tying in road projects with other modes of transportation. The question is whether plans on paper—tokenism in transport—will be allowed to substitute for the real thing.

On the technical side railroads are making important progress, especially by adapting airplane technology, with its objectives of compactness, lightness and reliability, to ground transport. Note that I do not include air line speeds, since even the higher propeller speeds are not feasible on the ground, and jet speeds are out of the question. However, rail schedule times can be materially improved with vehicles moving at, say, 80 mph. Even if it should turn out that there is no market for a modernized rail passenger system running the length of the Northeast Corridor, the experiments will benefit suburban traffic along that route and elsewhere. The Pennsylvania has started upgrading its roadway, tracks and catenary (the 11,000-volt overhead feed for electric trains) and expects to be ready for 100-mph top speeds within eighteen months, and perhaps for 150 mph by 1970. By the end of the year, the Department of Commerce will receive under lease a United Aircraft train equipped with Canadian Pratt & Whitney engines which are a ground-adapted version of an airplane engine. This train will be capable of speeds up to 160 mph, but will be tested on the New Haven Railroad between Providence and Boston at much lower speeds. The Long Island will test a Budd train equipped with Garrett gas turbines, likewise modified from turboprop aircraft service. The design speed of this train is 100 mph, but operation at only 75 mph is contemplated.

Rail systems are benefiting by internal development as well as by borrowing from air technology. The Housing and Home Finance Agency has put more than $7 million into the test track of the San Francisco Bay Area Rapid Transit District. BARTD itself paid part of the total cost, and the suppliers (General Electric, Westinghouse Air Brake, Philco, General Railway Signal, General Steel Industries, Pullman-Standard and others) are said to have invested between $2 and $3 for every dollar contributed by HHFA and BARTD. There is now talk among the railroads that the test track should be kept going in some central location, such as Chicago, with continuing support from the federal government, the railroad industry and manufacturers. Coordination in this form would hardly have occurred at this time had it not been for the BARTD project and the need for research as a basis for design.

The most important factor in future commuter rail travel is its relation to the private automobile. The point of departure for any meaningful analysis is that the automobile has relegated the train to a subordinate place, or entirely taken over the business, for several good reasons, as well as some bad ones. Everyone who drives knows the built-in advantages of the automobile. It may not arrive when you want to arrive, but it leaves when you want to leave. It takes you door to door with no transfers. There may be no place to put it after you get there, but much is to be said for it en route.

On many journeys, the automobile is the only practical conveyance, although, when used individually, it is more expensive than most motorists realize. Suppose you live in Westchester, north of New York City, and work on Long Island beyond subway service, as a surprising number of people do. If you could use a helicopter, your course would be southeast. You can drive in that general direction on the Westchester expressways and over either of two bridges crossing Long Island Sound, then on Long Island expressways and local roads to your destination. The tolls amount to 50c each way—$20 a month. The car costs 10c a mile—for a 25-mile one-way trip, $5 a day or more than $100 a month—total more than $1,400 a year. Many motorists fail to take amortization and maintenance into account, but even if they were aware of the actual cost they would drive, because the alternative is next to impossible.

The alternative involves an automobile trip to a New York Central line which will bring the traveler to New York, then a subway ride with one change, then a trip on the Long Island Railroad, with a possible change en route. At each of the railroad-subway interfaces there is considerable walking and stairclimbing. The traveler must have commutation tickets for both railroads, and since few people use this roundabout route there is no reason for coordination of schedules. When the traveler finally gets off the train he may still have the problem of transportation to his factory or office. The directions are wrong, too—south by southwest, then east. In sum, both in time and money the automobile is the only way to do it. There are situations like this all over the country, with impractical public transportation or none at all. People cry for freeways and more of them. They will never relinquish their cars; they can't.

Everybody is tired of the crack about the Long Island Expressway—"the world's longest parking lot"—but during peak hours it sometimes seems only a mild exaggeration. Yet this is a new freeway and no expense was spared. Contributing to its daily tie-ups are those commuters who could travel by rail between Long Island and Manhattan, but who cling to their automobiles. If the railroad were made attractive enough, on a national scale, to change the habits of huge groups like that, the pressure on the freeways would be relieved. What is involved in this hoped-for switch is far from simple; it calls for more than improved, yet inexpensive, rail service alone. Though a few general principles obtain, their application varies from place to place and will encounter serious obstacles everywhere.

One unavoidable obstacle is the enormous vested interest in automobile manufacture and servicing, and in highway construction on a scale that threatens to obliterate with concrete vast sections of the American landscape. In 1966 the federal government is spending $5 billion for highways, and construction of the Interstate Highway System still has six years to run. The cost of the system, originally budgeted at $41 billion, will actually come to $50 billion or more. The positive feedback of highway construction is something to reckon with: it is supported not only by the majority of motorists but by the automobile manufacturers, their innumerable subcontractors and 64,000 dealers; the gasoline companies; the tire companies; the cement, asphalt and gravel industries; the motor clubs; highway department officials on all levels and the politicians allied with them; construction contractors and unions; and numerous allied interests. When Henry Ford, 2nd, warned recently of the economic hazard in undue pressure to improve car safety, he was not indulging in idle threats. The annual model change, which is presumably what Mr. Ford saw in jeopardy, is actually one of the pillars of the American economy, and highway construction is one of the indirect subsidies on which the automobile industry depends for its profits.

However, the situation is not hopeless. Freeway construction is running into rising opposition from prospective displaced persons, conservationists, engineers not hypnotized by highway technology and the public spirited of every occupation and persuasion. The freeways are not doing the job and comparisons of peak-carrying capacity of railroads and freeways invariably favor the railroad. Ruth and Edward Brecher, writing in Consumer Reports (February, 1965) gave the BARTD system a peak-hour capacity of 30,000 seated passengers in each direction. A comparable eight-lane freeway with two reversible lanes would begin to slow down at 7,000-8,000 cars per hour (10,000-12,000 occupants). A figure widely used for single-lane freeway peak capacity is 2,250 persons per hour, which would move 13,500 over six lanes, better than the Brecher estimate but still far below the railroad figure, which the same source estimates for a single track at 35,000, presumably including about 15 per cent standees.

Especially during the rush hours, cars are ridiculously underloaded, and that accounts in part for the low capacity of the highway. When Nikita Khrushchev surveyed early morning home-to-work traffic on San Francisco's Golden Gate Bridge, he exclaimed in amazement: "There is only one man in most of those cars!" Some Americans also find it hard to justify the use of a 4,000-pound, 350-horsepower vehicle to carry a payload averaging 240 pounds. But until mass transit arrives, this travesty will continue.

The freeway is designed primarily to get people to and from work. Its cost could not be justified otherwise, either for construction or for the withdrawal from other uses of the land it devours. On the average, a freeway may carry 80 per cent of its total traffic during the commuting hours. At other times it provides fast, relatively safe transportation and justifies its name, but it is precisely during the hours when it is performing its primary function that it becomes inefficient. In this sense the unassisted freeway is a failure, at best a stopgap, and a metropolis like Los Angeles, with 400 miles of operating freeways and plans for another 800 miles to complete the network, would be well advised to give priority to its projected rapid transit system, which has now been in the talking stage for ten years or more. When they have rapid transit, they can start building freeways again with at least a semblance of sense.

It is a pity that the headlong rush to superhighways occurred and that the limitations of this mode did not become apparent earlier, but with so many interests making so much money out of it, the aberration had to run its course. Many suburban freeways which were built for automobiles only should have been built with automobile lanes and a rapid transit guideway in each direction, like the Eisenhower Expressway in Chicago and parts of the BARTD project. Plans for future freeways should be scrutinized with two questions in mind: (1) Should the highway be built at all? (2) If the answer is yes, should not the design allow for mass rapid transit as well as automobiles? It is not precluded, even, that interurban freeways might be advantageously combined, in special cases, with a modern version of the interurban trolley.

A more widely applicable solution, and by far the most economical, is to upgrade existing suburban trackage and equipment. The view of some industry executives is that many suburban lines can be rehabilitated with new or rebuilt, comfortable, attractive cars designed for fast loading and unloading, and frequent service, with only moderate increases in speed. All through the period of decline in passenger traffic the Harlem Division of the New York Central has continued to operate a few express trains which maintain top speeds of 70 mph for major parts of their runs—not far short, on this old railroad, of the 75 or 80 mph projected for the ultramodern BARTD system. The ride is quite smooth, indicating that the track system could be upgraded further without radical changes. Despite an enforced limit of 45 mph in the 2-mile tunnel into Grand Central and a five-minute change of locomotives from diesel to electric, or reverse, 24 miles from the city, these expresses make schedule speeds, including stops, of 40 mph. However, the average schedule speed of most trains on the line is only about 30 mph, which is too slow to compete with automobiles on the parkway paralleling the tracks. If we visualize a service at schedule speeds of 40-50 mph on trackage of this quality, with all the amenities of first-class railroad service, at a fare substantially lower than the cost (including depreciation) of the automobile, there is every prospect of dividing the traffic between the parkway and the railroad, to the advantage of both—including faster rides on the parkway, fewer accidents, and somewhat lowered automobile insurance costs.

Improved rail service, though vital, is only part of the answer. The coordinated transit approach aims to take advantage of the flexibility of the automobile and bus to feed high-volume, high-speed rail lines. In many suburbs feeder-bus transportation could bring passengers to the railroad station during the commuting hours and obviate both parking and walking from the car to the station which, as parking space is provided at greater distances, becomes a significant factor in making the train. Transportation of school children is considered so important that even in thinly settled neighborhoods almost every child, from the kindergarten through high school, is assured a door-to-door ride every school day at public expense. In contrast, although the children could neither be educated nor fed and sheltered were it not for the commuters, the latter are entirely on their own. In many localities no public transportation whatever is available, even on main routes. During World War II bus routes were improvised because it was considered important to save gasoline and rubber, but as soon as the war ended collective transportation, with all its inherent advantages, gave way once more to the 1.5-passenger automobile.

But who is to foot the bill? Alan S. Boyd, Undersecretary of Commerce for Transportation, is said to have predicted that a cabinet-level department of transportation would favor ending subsidies "whenever possible," requiring users to bear the full cost, and relying more on competition to protect consumers' interests. If Mr. Boyd is correctly quoted and if he means that open subsidies for rail transportation should be disallowed, but that the hidden subsidies for freeway transportation should continue, it amounts to saying that the proposed department of transportation will favor the policies that got us into this mess.

To the question of who is to pay for an efficient ground transportation system, one may oppose the question of who is paying now for the inefficient highway-oriented program. The automobile clubs and highway lobbies have convinced many taxpayers that the Interstate Highway System is financed by gasoline taxes and similar highway imposts and so the cost is entirely defrayed by the users. This is less than a half truth. Fuel and other taxes paid by users of a typical expressway at the peak hours defray only about one-third of the capital cost. According to Dr. Lyle C. Fitch of the Institute of Public Administration, if the tax on gasoline burned on a freeway costing $2 million per lane-mile, were to be assessed on the peak-hour users to cover the entire cost of the road, that tax would have to be raised by 75c a gallon. Prof. William Vickrey of Columbia University puts the figure even higher—he estimates that rush-hour motorists on typical urban expressways and streets enjoy a subsidy of 10c per mile per automobile.

The subsidy for the motoring commuters comes from all the motorists who use all the roads, including city streets, most of it amortized long ago and now requiring only routine maintenance. This great population of motorists is pictured as a sodality willing to share in the cost and operation of the $50 billion interstate highway system and other expensive highways. That they so regard themselves, or would if they knew the fiscal situation, is extremely doubtful. This is apposite from the standpoint not so much of eliminating the subsidy as of supplementing it. ". . . whether warranted or not," the Brechers write, "subsidy to peak-hour commuting by car is far too deeply imbedded in the economics of our large cities to be wrenched out at this late date. And if freeway and parking subsidies continue, the corollary inevitably follows that high-quality rapid transit will also require a subsidy."

A rough idea of the magnitude of the latter subsidy may be obtained from the two partly electrified New York Central suburban lines running into Grand Central. Electrifying all the way to Brewster on the Harlem Division and Peekskill on the Hudson Division, rebuilding the station platforms to eliminate the need for steps on the cars, providing first-class rolling stock and allowing for minor improvements, would cost in the neighborhood of $60 million. This is less than the money cost per day of the Vietnamese war at the present level of $2 billion per month, a figure which emerged from the recent testimony of Administrator David E. Bell of the Agency for International Development in hearings before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

These two lines might be modernized with an investment substantially lower than the cost of waging the Vietnamese war for a single day. Electrification involves very high capital costs. If gas turbines were used, with transition to electric propulsion in the Grand Central tunnel, a lower investment would suffice. This situation can be more or less duplicated on other rail lines serving New York City and its environs; according to a study by the Regional Plan Association, full modernization of these lines would entail an investment of $1 billion, spread over ten years.

The rail managers, whether in New York or elsewhere, are not going to defray the deficits on commuter services; the present situation results, in part, from their reluctance to do so. They are even less willing to pay for the updating of these services. They are going along now, and with their suppliers, showing signs of a progressive spirit, primarily because subsidies and possible future revenues have elevated the mood of the industry. They can and do argue that if rail commuter service is necessary to avert chaos in ground transportation, the deficits are no obligation of theirs. It may be deplorable that they are not willing to show gratitude for past favors, dating back to the Civil War, and to defray these current costs out of profits from other operations, but under the free enterprise system they are not obliged to be so generous.

If ground transportation is to be radically modernized, the federal government will have to take over the major part of the capital cost of many projects. Thus we face a recurring dilemma. Our mores require an apparently permanent counterrevolution against communism. This costs money, lots of money. It spells defeat in the war on poverty. It also spells defeat in the effort to rationalize and renew metropolitan transportation. Capital costs must come for the most part from the funds now poured into foreign wars. It is a familiar conflict and one which will be resolved in the familiar way—by a course somewhere between catastrophic breakdown and the efficiency which an untrammeled technology offers. One can only hope it will be nearer the latter.

THE WELTNER BILL

CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER

VERN COUNTRYMAN

Mr. Countryman, professor of law at the Harvard Law School, is the author of Discrimination and the Law (University of Chicago Press), Douglas of the Supreme Court (Doubleday) and Un-American Activities in the State of Washington (Cornell University Press).

Given its record of futility and unconstitutionality, the best treatment for the McCarran Internal Security Act would be to repeal it. Instead, Rep. Charles Weltner of Georgia, the "liberal" member of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, has recently introduced a bill (H.R. 12302) to revise, expand and perpetuate it as a new "Criminal Conspiracies Control Act."

The McCarran Act was passed by the Congress in 1950, over President Truman's veto. After giving an elaborate recital of Congressional "findings" of internal subversion directed by a "world Communist movement," which was itself directed by "the Communist dictatorship of a foreign country," the act created a Subversive Activities Control Board to deal with the problem. The board was authorized to conduct hearings and to make determinations that organizations were either "Communist action" or "Communist front" ("Communist infiltrated" organizations were added by a 1954 amendment). Once the board had made such a determination, the organization was required to register with the Attorney General and to file with him each year information concerning its officers, membership, financial affairs and printing facilities. All members of "Communist-action" organizations were also required to register. In addition, federal tax exemptions were withdrawn from the proscribed organizations, and they were required to label all of their mailings and radio or television broadcasts to reveal that they were disseminated by "a Communist organization." Members of the proscribed organizations were barred from employment by the United States Government and from office in or employment by a labor union, and members of "Communist-action" organizations were also barred from employment in defense plants. Members of all proscribed organizations were to be denied passports.

President Truman in his veto message stated that he acted on the advice of the Departments of Justice, Defense and State and the Central Intelligence Agency, and that the McCarran Act "would seriously damage the security and intelligence operations for which they are responsible." He characterized the act as one which "would put the government of the United States in the thought-control business" by giving government officials "vast powers to harass all of our citizens in the exercise of their rights of free speech," and predicted that its "unworkable registration provisions" would require the government "to spend a great deal of time, effort and money—all to no good purpose."

Events have borne out the President's characterization and his predictions. The Subversive Activities Control Board's first proceeding, initiated against the Communist Party of the United States in 1950, after one determination had been set aside by the Supreme Court because based in part on the evidence of perjurers, culminated in 1961 in a final order that the party register as a "Communist-action" organization. But the provision of the McCarran Act requiring members of the party to register themselves was held by the Supreme Court to violate the privilege against self-incrimination. That privilege has thus far also blocked criminal prosecution of the party for failure to register, and neither the Communist Party nor any of the twenty other organizations found to be "Communist fronts" has yet registered under the McCarran Act despite more than fifteen years of government effort. The Supreme Court has also invalidated the provision which would deny passports to members of the party, and has reversed two other orders of the board requiring organizations to register as "Communist fronts" because the orders were based on stale evidence. It has, in addition, invalidated as a bill of attainder a provision of the Taft-Hartley Act, similar to the McCarran Act's provision, making it a crime for a member of the Communist Party to serve as an officer of a labor union.

The Weltner bill of 1966 also recites Congressional "findings"—some ungrammatical ("Being a nation of laws, the Constitution protects the guilty as well as the innocent"), some vacuous ("Criminal syndicates are vast networks which exact billions of dollars from their victims"), and some amending the McCarran Act's findings to recite that control of the "world Communist movement" is now "divided among two or more foreign powers both [sic] of which" have established subversive groups within the United States.

Under the Weltner bill the Subversive Activities Control Board would be reconstituted as a Criminal Conspiracies Control Board, with authority to conduct hearings and make determinations that organizations are "criminal conspiracies" and that individuals are "members" of such organizations. "Criminal conspiracies" are of three varieties: (1) Any organization having as one of its purposes "the establishment [sic], control, conduct, seizure or overthrow of the government of the United States or any state by force or violence"; (2) any organization which "advocates or employs acts of violence or intimidation" to deprive United States citizens of rights under the federal Constitution or laws; or (3) "any organization having as its purpose the planned, continued and consistent execution of acts which violate" the federal Criminal Code. (Congressman Weltner has cited, as an example of each type, respectively, the Communist Party, the Ku Klux Klan and the Cosa Nostra.)

To avoid troublesome constitutional obstacles to self-registration and annual filing of information by proscribed groups, the Weltner bill requires the Attorney General to register in a "Register of Criminal Conspiracies" (open to public inspection) all groups ordered by the old Subversive Activities Control Board to register themselves, all groups found by the new Criminal Conspiracies Control Board to be criminal conspiracies, and all individuals found to be members of such conspiracies. Individual members are also required to supply the Attorney General annually with their current addresses for inclusion in the "Register of Criminal Conspiracies." The newly proscribed organizations are required to label their mailings and their radio and television broadcasts to disclose that they are disseminated by "a criminal conspiracy," and are to forfeit tax exemptions and all other "rights, privileges, and immunities attendant upon legal bodies." Finally, the federal courts are authorized to issue sweeping injunctions directing organizations determined by the board to be criminal conspiracies to cease their conspiratorial activities, and these injunctions may be made binding on individuals whether or not they are parties to the proceeding.

Congressman Weltner's cynical joinder of organized crime, commercial or racist, with political unorthodoxy as the targets of his new bill, may gain him support among the unthinking. But it does not change the fact that the McCarran-Weltner approach is contrary to basic principles of our constitutional system. Indeed, the Weltner bill is in some respects more objectionable than the McCarran Act.

Like the McCarran Act, it would drastically abridge those freedoms of speech, belief and association which the First Amendment forbids Congress to abridge. Men and organizations are to be proscribed because they are found to "advocate," or have as "purposes" or "objectives" certain activity to be carried out in the future. Departing from our constitutional practice of punishing acts, we are to continue and expand the McCarran practice of attempting to search out potential actors by official inquiry into and strictures upon speech, belief and association, in complete disregard of the First Amendment.

The Weltner bill and the McCarran Act also dispense with the view that individual guilt is personal, and resort instead to the pernicious doctrine of guilt by association. Once the group is proscribed by the board, the board is also to proscribe its members. And in determining whether an individual is a member of the group the board "shall consider the extent to which [he] has had a close and continuing relationship with such [group], knowing the purpose thereof." Evidence of such relationship would be "in any manner communicating or publicizing" its "policies, plans, or directives," or supporting it "by financial or other contribution" or by "advising, counselling, imparting suggestions." Lest some or all of these matters be viewed as consistent with innocent affiliation, publication in the Federal Register of the board's prior determination that the group is a criminal conspiracy is made to "constitute notice to all concerned." By such standards the bill would dispense with the due process requirement of a rational basis of proof by authorizing the board to conclude that one who made suggestions to or in any manner contributed to the group, or in any way publicized any of its policies (a) knew of its proscribed purposes, (b) had a close and continuing relationship with it, and (c) was a member of it.

Because we are not really equipped to read the minds of men or the collective minds of groups, it becomes necessary for the McCarran-Weltner approach to dispense with rationality and to substitute statutory presumptions for evidence. In determining whether a group is a criminal conspiracy of the Communist variety, the board "shall take into consideration" the extent to which its policies "are consistent with" the policies of any foreign government which is a "dictatorship," and the extent to which "for the purpose of concealing its activities and goals, and connections with foreign governments," it conceals its membership or "in other ways operates in a secret manner." For criminal conspiracies of the Ku Klux Klan or Cosa Nostra variety, the same practices of secrecy "for the purpose of concealing" goals and activities is also to be considered evidence of the proscribed goals and activities.

Since our traditional constitutional guarantees designed to insure a fair trial are devised for procedures which punish actors rather than potential actors, those guarantees must give way to the McCarran Act and the Weltner bill. It is made a crime for one who has been determined to be a "member" of a criminal conspiracy to fail to file his address with the Attorney General. But in the ensuing criminal prosecution most of the basic elements of the offense will not be submitted to the jury, nor be subject to proof beyond reasonable doubt, nor open to cross-examination, nor indeed to inquiry. The board will already have determined, in a proceeding of which the alleged "member" may have had no notice, and on the basis of a preponderance of the evidence as aided by statutory presumptions described above, that the group is a criminal conspiracy. The accused "member" may never have learned of the board's determination, but that is irrelevant. Publication of the determination in the Federal Register is to fill the gap. Even the question of the accused "member's" membership will not be open in the criminal trial. That issue also will have been determined by the board under the special definitions and evidentiary rules prescribed by the Weltner bill. The only issue in the criminal trial is to be whether the accused filed his address—though he was not in any rational sense a member of the proscribed group, did not know of its proscribed purposes, did not know that those purposes had been proscribed until "membership" proceedings before the board were brought against him, never had a chance to contest the findings as to the group, and will not have a chance in the criminal trial to contest the board's findings of his "membership" in the group.

The Supreme Court has characterized as "the first essential of due process of law" that "the terms of a penal statute creating a new offense must be sufficiently explicit to inform those who are subject under it what conduct will render them liable to those penalties"—an essential which the Court held was lacking in "a statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application." Clearly, the basic constitutional requirement is disregarded by the Weltner bill, as by the McCarran Act before it. What man of common or uncommon intelligence can inform himself as to the meaning of "criminal conspiracy" or of "membership" therein under the tortured definitions and evidentiary rules of the Weltner bill?

Weltner goes beyond McCarran in the authorization of dragnet injunctions against conspiracies or participation therein by any persons, whether or not they are parties to the injunction procedure. The obvious purpose here is to circumvent the constitutional guarantees for criminal trials completely. All subject to injunction are also subject to summary procedures for contempt of court in disregarding the injunction—without the benefit of indictment by grand jury, trial by jury, presumption of innocence, and the requirement that proof of guilt be beyond reasonable doubt.

Weltner also goes beyond McCarran in another respect. Lest the Fifth Amendment's privilege against self-incrimination prove troublesome in hearings before the board or in injunction proceedings before the courts, witnesses may be granted complete immunity from prosecution for any matter about which they are compelled to testify or any matter later discovered as a result of such testimony. With such an amnesty from criminal prosecution for actual crimes as bait, the board and the courts may indeed be able to induce those of Communist, Ku Klux Klan or Cosa Nostra persuasion who have committed such crimes to testify to the speech, beliefs and associations of others.

LETTER FROM BRITAIN

RAYMOND WILLIAMS

We are pleased to announce that beginning with this issue Mr. Williams will be contributing a regular "Letter from Britain." He is a Fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge, and one of Britain's most distinguished young social critics. His better-known books include Culture and Society, The Long Revolution, and two novels, Border Country and Second Generation.—The Editors

During these warm months of May and June, we have been living though a national crisis. There is a nationwide strike of merchant seamen. But the crisis is not in the fact that its merchant fleets are dry-docked. Foreign ships still come into port, and the only shortages are on some of the off-shore islands. The crisis is rather in the fact that the strike has had the effect of shattering a long-standing myth: that England can advance in its own social progress, regardless of any external pressures. In its actions, the Labour Party has indeed shown that it will bow to external pressures: pressures on the pound. And former supporters of the Labour Party cannot help wondering whether it is time to reassess their allegiances.

The government, in effect, has been faced with a choice between favoring the interests of its sailors, or the sterling pound. If the sailors get their raise, they are likely to spend more money out of the country, and the goal of protecting the pound will not have been advanced. On the other hand, if the sailors do not get their raise, then the pound is being protected, but the sailors—traditional heroes of the British people—are being allowed to continue working at a pitifully low wage scale as compared with other laboring professions. The New Left is watching the Labour government choose to support the pound over bettering the conditions of the sailors; it is watching what is supposed to be the party of the people choose commercial over humanitarian goals.

Wilson has dramatized this whole issue as a struggle between the state and the seamen. The seamen insisted all along, and in my view rightly, that this was solely an industrial dispute with the shipowners. But Wilson had made it seem to the public that the seamen, demanding their own rights, are working against the public interest. The known militancy of the seamen makes this image believable to the public.

Here in Cambridge we had a meeting of the Center for Socialist Education to hear one of the seamen's leaders present his case. What struck me most in listening to him was the sheer injustice in Wilson's having dramatized the strike as a struggle between the state and the seamen. The seamen obviously need the raise for which they are striking. The strike, in fact, is long overdue. During the good years for British shipping the seamen had a notoriously inert and bureaucratic union. Most of the present leadership had to fight for years to break through the old leadership, and it really only succeeded in doing so by the early sixties. By that time—after all those years of poor union leadership—wages and conditions had dropped well below national standards. The present struggle for a forty-hour week is essentially an attempt to get for the seamen what the great majority of British workers already have.

The government's rationale for opposing the seamen's strike is that the seamen are ignoring the government's incomes policy (the name is supposed to distinguish it from a wage freeze). But the incomes policy provides that in itics." Phillips argues that radical politics of the thirties and the sixties are both futile and equally anti-intellectual. The only advance—if that is not too strong a term — consists in recognition of the incompatibility of intellectual and political activity. Having divorced radical literature and criticism from politics, the sophisticated intellectual, Phillips concludes, attains a tenuous freedom. Instead of grasping reality through the distorting lens of political organizations as in the thirties, he can now "face history directly."

One wonders, nevertheless, whether this solitary confrontation is merely a modern variety of aestheticism, a realism of the uninitiated intellectual.

Does permanent rejection of radical politics constitute the intellectual's final wisdom, the exacting but necessary price of clear vision? Or does such disengagement insure historical nearsightedness? In the preface to The Russian Revolution, Trotsky observes that "society does not change its institutions as need arises, the way a mechanic changes his instruments. On the contrary, society takes the institutions which hang upon it as given once for all. For decades the oppositional criticism is nothing more than a safety valve for mass dissatisfaction, a condition of the stability of the social structure." For Trotsky, however, the status quo is only a temporary equilibrium of irrational power — to be comprehended and dissolved through a synthesis of revolutionary theory and practice. It would be a supreme irony—for connoisseurs of historical irony and paradox — if the ex-radicals ultimately fail to attain the vision of Trotsky, the teacher of their youth, who experienced, as much as any modern man, a personal discontinuity of criticism and action, yet always affirmed their historical continuity.

THE OCCASIONAL MAN

James Barr's sequel to

QUATREFOIL

One of the best selling novels on the male homosexual theme, is now available for just $1. (QUATREFOIL also available at $1.) Send your order for either or both to

TROJAN BOOK SERVICE
Box 2121 B, Phila., Pa. 19103

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. N

$2.95 each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF THE NATION

- Each file holds a full year's copies.
- Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.
- Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send check or money order.

MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

Images of Loathing

THE SOFT MACHINE. By William Burroughs. Grove Press. 182 pp. $5.

STEPHEN KOCH

Mr. Koch teaches at the State University of New York at Stony Brook.

An enormous amount of discussion has been wasted on William Burroughs since Naked Lunch was published six years ago. There was the underworld. There were drugs. There was homosexuality. One heard him linked endlessly with Jean Genet, a writer with whom he has almost nothing in common. Burroughs has not been considered as an artist, but as a phenomenon in a moral crisis.

And it is true that Burroughs himself regards his work as critical, radical. But the torn energy and violence of his four books have little to do with the crisis—what is it? does it exist?—that troubles his commentators. That, one presumes, is a crisis in manners, demeanor. The "moralist" in Burroughs addresses himself to something else: the freedom or bondage of consciousness, insofar as consciousness is a function of language. "What scared you all into time?" he asks in Nova Express. "I will tell you: 'the word.' Alien Word 'the.' 'The' word of Alien Enemy imprisons 'thee' in Time. . . . Prisoner, come out. The great skies are open. I Hassan i Sabbah rub out the word forever." In the accents of a grade B movie sage from the Mysterious East, Burroughs prophesies on the attitude toward language, particularity and selfhood that underlies his art. Let's not worry for the moment about the truth of the prophecy—suffice it to say that it's questionable, and that it's not necessary to the validation of Burroughs' books as works of art. Language, like the heart, has its reasons.

Burroughs' ideology—the theme explicitly developed by Nova Express, his least impressive book so far—is based on an image of consciousness in bondage to the organism; better, of consciousness as an organism, gripped by the tropisms of need. Consciousness is addicted—it is here the drug metaphor enters—to what sustains it and gives it definition: in particular, it is addicted to the word, the structures of language that define meaning and thus reality itself. The linguistic formulas that fill our lives, he assumes, have hardened into independent, imprisoning realities.

The human organism is "the soft machine" craving to be programed by the world's "ticket." Burroughs' art is an effort to explode that ticket. Such an experiment is possible only during the late stages of a language's history. There is a large amount of parody in these books, based (as in the great early modern examples, like Joyce and Mann) on a certain self-conscious, liberating attitude toward the decadence of a language. But Joyce and Mann were concerned with the degeneration of literary language: Burroughs uses, primarily, pre-literary forms. More important, his attitude toward the problem of meaning is far more radical than theirs. Mann and Joyce are ironists: their achievement was to infuse irony with the temper of romantic ecstasy. But ecstasy is something one works toward (through the disciplines of asceticism, concentration, seduction); it is always the result of something structured. In literature, meaning and structure are virtually coextensive. (To choose a deceptively simple example, consider how much depends on the subject-verb-object sentence structure.) But "meaning" is precisely what Burroughs wants to break apart.

Break meaning apart in the name of what? Meaninglessness? There's no need to enter that tortured ground. Burroughs won't give the world any more or less meaning than it already has. His books are without meaning just as they have no stories and are not imitations of life. They are unparaphrasable experiences. Experiences of language, to be sure, but nonetheless unparaphrasable, because this is language without content. For language is charged with affect as well as ideas; it can be opaque, as well as transparent.

Burroughs regards words not as vehicles of concepts but as instruments of provocation—as sensory agents. He gives their affect priority over their role as signs quite simply: by de-structuring, by destruction. Words, sentences, paragraphs, moving in these rapid, lurid, discontinuous "biologic films" are not concepts but things, put together in mosaics of verbal icons violently scattered across the sensibility with invisible artfulness. The books begin when opened, end when closed; there is no need to read them straight through. The reader's mind plays over their broken, sensuous surfaces at liberty, discovering correspondences, making associations, experiencing images of the impossible, accepting, rejecting—creating the work himself.

The Soft Machine, like the other three books (one, The Ticket that Exploded, has not yet been published in America) is a collection of related, syncretically developed "routines"—sections from 2 to 50 pages—that exploit various images and voices in the surrealistic confidence that language retains its vibrancy even—perhaps especially—in a state of radical dissociation. There are romps in Panama, hangings, science-fiction wars. None of these are proposed as something to believe; there is no story to accept or reject. In the "routines," the ordinary devices of fiction—situations, characters, places—exist as pretexts for unsustained verbal texture, excitement, tempo, coloration. "I was working the hole with the Sailor and we did not do bad," the book begins. The sentences follow one another like the words that circle the tower at night at Times Square, an endless, but endlessly fragmented line. But though these routines are formally unsustained, they are given a certain coherence by means of repetition. Phrases, motifs, images recur like obsessions. And indeed, the energy of obsession makes this book live.

Burroughs has been announced (by Jack Kerouac, among others) as a satirist. This is not quite the case: he is a parodist, a satirist of the way words are used. Strictly speaking, a satirist must have an object, an intention. This Burroughs' art precludes. Nonetheless, his work is obsessed with a quality of feeling frequently found in the real thing. I am speaking of loathing. It is not directed against anything, for almost nothing in Burroughs can be construed as an ethical statement. But some of his images have a certain lurid but real and remarkable energy generated by the force of disgust. So far as I know, his is the first work in English prose to exploit the rich intensity of loathing in a direct, unstructured, unrationalized appeal to the senses. When I call it lurid, I don't want to suggest that it is cheap. "Sensationalism" like it (e.g., the paintings of Francis Bacon) has been accorded respect in the visual arts for a long time.

For Burroughs, energized disgust is a strategy for making prose concrete. As such, it is an important, even essential, enterprise. The notion that concreteness can be achieved in prose with mere lists of names is naive: in an abstract medium like literature, concreteness is really a form of emotional concentration. Actual objects are able to provide it only so long as the names of things still provoke a sharp sensory response not yet enervated by banality. Unfortunately, in a period like ours, when prose style is in a state of extreme decadence, it is very difficult to make names play such a role.

In his images of loathing, Burroughs has been able to find the primary sensory appeal names are no longer able to call forth. Of course, the effort succeeds only if the images are given definition in some carved, complex way that allows them to keep their primitive energy despite the elaborations of art. But that's what Burroughs has done in The Soft Machine, often enough to make the book one of the most interesting pieces of radical fiction we have.

Violent Days

THE DIARY OF A RAPIST. By Evan S. Connell, Jr. Simon & Schuster. 252 pp. $4.95.

STEPHEN ZOLL

Articles by Mr. Zoll have appeared in Dissent, The Village Voice and The Nation.

The Diary of a Rapist is a pitiful journal recording a compulsive preoccupation with violence, scorn and hopelessness. It is faithfully kept for one week short of a year by a cowardly adult version of the child who rather expects it will turn out that he has been kidnaped from a prince's cradle. The journal starts on the first of January as though, by this precision, to mock the irresolute and arbitrary intervals of the diarist's otherwise unmeasured life. Six of the seven blank days are the resoundingly empty entries whose missing author has vanished into madness or worse: December 26-31. The silence at the end comes as no surprise as the diary reads throughout the year as if it were the last messages of a stranded Antarctic voyager waiting for the end.

As a novel, the portrait it gives of the rapist is little more than a conventional psychological case history in the terms of which the reader agrees to have more concern for the subject than his victim. But Connell has achieved far more than this convention. The rapist, Earl Summerfield, a name like buttermilk, is passive, depersonalized, paranoid, infantile, latently homosexual, anal, etc. The symptomatology is corroborated by convincing entries. Connell has produced a powerful fictionalized documentary the effect of which is extremely troubling; he has moved case history into autobiography and we experience the impersonal subject of the first as the feeling author of the second.

Imagine a novel with these limitations: a first-person narration by the one and only character; a point of view limited to that character's unjustified anger and destructive madness; nothing is probed or revealed of this character—it is all confessed—as the narrator is acutely self-aware that his personality is limited to obsequiousness, cowardice and false bravado; there are no literary devices—neither plot, irony, reversal, discovery, epiphany, etc.—only language that is inventive, flowing, disciplined and nevertheless convincing as the words of so limited a character. This is the cavil: Summerfield has no stature.

Even so, Summerfield is not used for violently confronting the reader with intimations of his own foibles magnified. A consistent literary formula for shocking portrayals of deviates, murderers, addicts and the institutionalized insane has been the hopeful nomination of a metaphor that we are all murderers, or that between someone else's drugs and our own dependencies there is more than a casual connection, and, the dismal ultimate, that between an institution (such as Charenton) and the world, between the inmates and ourselves, there is no dependable distinction. This formula, however artistic, prosecutes, like a district attorney, for conviction. Connell's book is an exercise in pity and terror; the diary's power to make it impossible for the reader to keep from identifying with Earl Summerfield lies within its limitations: we are not manipulated or accused. We are made aware in Summerfield's greed of the weakness in our own faith that we can ever be satisfied.

The 4th of July is the first of the seven blank entries in the diary. On this day of American celebration, the diarist committed his crime. He had first seen the girl in February; her American virtues of fresh good looks, church service, physical innocence, monied background, added up to perfect harlotry. The accusation is the justification to hate. Summerfield hates because of an unsatisfied greed for love and fame.

He grandly fantasies that he will be given a promotion, that he is a superior person capable, really, of achieving a career as a theoretical physicist or a concert violinist. He thinks he would like to be a woman and be loved and not require fame. His fantasies and ego ideals return to haunt him with blame and guilt that he was not powerful enough to make them come true. As punishment he tortures himself by dwelling on the knowledge that he is physically repellent, that he is getting fat and growing bald, that his youth is past, that his marriage is hopeless, that he is totally unskilled and will forever be underpaid—that what will follow will be only more of what went before. From dreams of stately world travel and encounters on equal terms with the international elite, he concludes a reverie, wondering, "What would happen if I tattooed my face?" In the pit of depression he saves himself by thinking that the girl, as he raped her, admired him.

The sin of vanity is Summerfield's only protection against the consequences of his greed. He feels he deserves, while simultaneously knowing that he is not worthy. The vocabulary of separate disciplines of behavioral criticism calls this lack of affect either ambivalence, fecklessness, or feedback impeding output; Connell's method is to make the reader see the squirming Summerfield as an uncomfortably recognizable human being. The recognition is not that we are like him, or he like us; it is that both Summerfield and ourselves—he permanently, we temporarily from time to time—belong to a woebegone minority of the unglorious that can never be justified or organized; a minority whose members share a failure of faith to believe in defenses against vulnerability; either absorption in a life's work, or a great love, or riches, or handsome appearance, or fame, a dependable pat on the back when one can't accept one's own.

There is a weak irony built into Summerfield's miserable position as a filler of forms in the Bureau of Unemployment Compensation. He administers to those whose lives are not entirely their own affair and have become a public burden. In Summerfield, clay that had once been touched, the vast distance between his reality and his ideas, a mocking comparison to the mere economic adversity of his clients, provoke him to violence as a hope of making the burden of that distance no longer his own affair.

Connell, I believe, would have the reader understand that this case history of aberration is not, narrowly, a psychological problem, but, perhaps, a religious one. On Christmas Day, Summerfield's last entry is, "In the sight of the Lord I must be one of the many." Leaving off his private diary, he has given up even vanity and disappeared into the scandal of public confession. Connell seems to be saying that recognition achieved finally by becoming one of the many is a theological madness, and that human hunger unsatisfied leads to greed so monumental that there can be no hope of satisfaction. Without hope there is neither faith, nor grace, nor salvation. Summerfield's obscene behavior is the best answer he can give his hunger; it is to save him from the abyss. Connell moves the reader because Summerfield suffers his mad logic and also disappears into the abyss from which his madness was to have saved him.

Hinterland Theatre IV
Washington to Philadelphia

JULIUS NOVICK

A theatre is traditionally an urban phenomenon, flourishing where people are most concentrated, and so it is not surprising that in this country, resident theatres are clustered most thickly in the Washington-to-Boston megalopolis. Washington itself has two of them; one of these, the Arena Stage, is materially and artistically one of the most successful theatres in America.

Mrs. Zelda Fichandler, the Arena's founder, "producing director" and guiding spirit, is (along with Nina Vance of Houston), one of the matriarchs of the resident-theatre movement. With her thick, dark hair, net stockings and brown boots, she doesn't look like a matriarch, but then she has been at it for only sixteen years. In the resident theatre even the matriarchs are young; the Arena, begun in 1950, is the oldest of the dozen or so such theatres on the Eastern seaboard.

It opened in an old movie house with 247 seats, and was received, says Mrs. Fichandler, "with instant apathy." But she knew that in Washington, as in every major city, there was an audience that was not being served by the road companies. And, after years of "staying at it, surviving, on Monday trying to get to Tuesday," it turned out that she was right. From the movie house the Arena moved to an abandoned brewery thenceforth known as the Old Vat, and from there to its present home, a custom-built, 773-seat, million-dollar theatre (paid for mostly by the Ford Foundation). The new house has been filled this season to more than 90 per cent of capacity; it played to some 179,000 people. (Soon there will be an additional auditorium of 300 seats for experimental work.) This season Mrs. Fichandler presented Saint Joan, The Skin of Our Teeth, Project Immortality (a new play by Loring Mandel about a dying scientist), The Three Sisters, Serjeant Musgrave's Dance, a bill of one-acts (Ionesco, Pinter and a new play) and Oh What a Lovely War. It is not, nowadays, an unusual program, though it is rich and variegated; Zelda Fichandler has never been as audacious in this regard as the hotheads at the Actor's Workshop in San Francisco. But she points out that though many theatres are doing these plays today, the Arena was doing them when hardly any other professional theatre dared.

My first encounter with the Arena was depressing: a flat and superficial Three Sisters, directed by Zelda herself. Chekhov is the most evanescent of playwrights; everything depends on how sensitively the

I WANT TO KNOW
(How Citizen Exchange Corps Helps Americans Find Out)
IF RUSSIANS HAVE HORNS

Send me Free reprints of N. Y. Times articles and editorials telling about CEC, a non-profit, tax-exempt foundation. Tell me how it brings together Americans and Russians of all ages and occupations to meet their counterparts in both the United States and the Soviet Union . . . and how I can participate in this program, which will lead eventually to exchanges of Americans and Soviets to live and work in each other's country for 6 months to 2 years as a major step toward mutual understanding and survival.

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP ....

Mail to:
CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS., Dept. N
550 Fifth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10036

director and the actor can seize his hints. "Men dine, just dine," he wrote, "and in that moment their fate is decided and their lives are destroyed." In this production the dining was there right enough (I could quite literally smell the soup in the first act), but the decisions and destructions were less clear. Naturalistic detail is important in Chekhov, but only as a means of revealing character; here there was plenty of "behavior," but psychology was not much in evidence. Most of the individual performances were quite creditable, as far as they went, but they did not go far enough to interact and kindle one another. Alas, there are only two kinds of Chekhov productions: exquisite and tedious.

Serjeant Musgrave's Dance, John Arden's murky, beautiful play, is a very difficult work to bring off in the theatre, but the Arena did nobly by it. The Washington production opened just a few days after the off-Broadway production of the same play in New York, and was by a good margin the better of the two. The Arena's arena, a big rectangular stage surrounded by the audience on all four sides, had made The Three Sisters seem unfocused (it is not a good stage for living-room drama), but it suited Musgrave, which is not only the story of four Victorian soldiers on a mysterious recruiting mission in the north of England but also a parable, didactic in intent and unrealistic in form, about the futility of violence.

Edwin Sherin, the Arena's associate producing director, staged it frankly, but not self-indulgently, as a piece of theatre. He began and ended it by bringing on the whole cast in a circle dance; he had the simple scenery changed by the actors; important speeches were spoken directly to the audience; actors came up the aisles amidst the spectators. All these devices have been used many times before, but seldom with such control and to such purpose. Usually, in the theatre, we are overhearing and peeping at an action confined to the stage; we can take it or leave it. In this production, what happened onstage was explicitly for us, to us, at us in the audience. We were never quite allowed to forget that we were watching something contrived for our benefit. Perhaps this is Brecht's famous "alienation effect," yet it did not alienate. The central characters never dwindled into mere metaphors or mouthpieces; things were happening to these people, and happening with conviction and intensity; emotional involvement with them was by no means excluded by the production—though it was made difficult by the diffuseness of the play.

At the Arena as elsewhere, directors sometimes come through, and sometimes do not; the actors do, almost always. They are sometimes miscast; they sometimes show the effects of too little help from the directors; but their work is almost always at least highly professional, and often something more than that. Jane Alexander in Musgrave, for instance, played a coarse, dirty, half-mad slut without stridency, but with passion, with desperation and with a tragic dignity. As Masha, in The Three Sisters, Janet Sarno created in the first act, clearly and incisively, an intelligent, sophisticated young woman who rather despised her sisters with their vaporings and carryings-on. In the third act, when she broke down and confessed to them that she was in love with Vershinin, she seemed a different woman altogether; but her two inconsistent Mashas were both very well executed. Robert Prosky was excellent as Masha's husband, the stupid but kind-hearted pedant Kulygin, and he was equally good as a glib, flashy second-rate swindler in a new one-act play. George Reinholt played two widely contrasting young men—the shy, earnest Baron Tusenbach in Three Sisters and the joke-telling, song-singing, card-tricking Private Sparky in Musgrave—most appealingly; too appealingly, perhaps, since both characters are supposed to be homely and awkward. In The Collection (one of Harold Pinter's one-act exercises in elegant ambiguity), Reinholt played a homosexual dress designer without quite enough attention to the character's origin in an English slum, but under Dana Elcar's taut and lucid direction he and Robert Foxworth (as another ambiguous young man) had the air crackling with innuendo.

What the company seems most notably to lack is a heroic actor, a deficiency that was apparent in Serjeant Musgrave's Dance. Ted D'Arms, who had been very good as Andrey in The Three Sisters, played Musgrave as simply a sergeant, with a brisk manner and a good throaty bellow. The deeper authority and strength, the grandeur and mystery, the fanaticism, the madness, were missing. But then, who could provide them? Olivier? Scofield? O'Toole? Burton? Brando? Even without such an actor, the Arena has the best resident company in the United States, except perhaps for that of the Guthrie Theatre in Minneapolis. And the Guthrie has the tremendous prestige of Sir Tyrone Guthrie's name to attract other big names; the Arena has no big names, and has acquired its own prestige.

Washington's second resident theatre, the 145-seat Washington Theatre Club, is one of the smallest Equity theatres in the country. Since the club can break even on an attendance of only 800 people a week (the Arena usually plays to that many in a night), it is able, according to its artistic director, Davey Marlin-Jones, to take chances "that a General Motors operation can't take." Yet its programing is fairly conventional, for a resident theatre; this season it has given Anouilh's Romeo and Jeannette (a neglected play which deserves to be seen), but also lightweight works such as Murray Schisgal's The Typists and The Tiger, and a musical version of The Importance of Being Earnest.

Like so many resident theatres, Center Stage of Baltimore is now in the intermediate stage between small beginnings in the recent past and large hopes for the near future. It began in January, 1963, in a cramped and ill-equipped former gymnasium. For its fourth season, now concluding, it had 5,984 subscribers and a new home (a former Oriole Cafeteria, converted into a comfortable and well-equipped 350-seat theatre). William H. Bushnell, Jr., the executive director of Center Stage, believes that "the basis of any theatre in a community has got to go beyond its major productions." And so he has instituted a full program of auxiliary activities: a high school tour financed by the state government that this year visited twenty-one out of Maryland's twenty-three counties; special matinées of As You Like It at the theatre for high school groups; plays and drama classes for children. The plan for the future is the usual one: a new home in a new urban renewal project downtown, with a main auditorium seating 800 or 1,000, and a 300-seat experimental theatre.

Meanwhile, a competent but somewhat unexciting group of actors, under the artistic directorship of Douglas Seale (an Englishman who has directed at all three Stratfords: a biggish name for a resident theatre) works its way through a well-balanced schedule. The Center Stage production of The Birthday Party, Harold Pinter's "comedy of menace," was the best of the three I saw on my travels. It was directed for maximum nerve-racking effect by Brooks Jones, the producer-director of the Cincinnati Playhouse in the Park (where Seale in turn has served as guest director).

The Days Between by Robert Anderson (the author of Tea and Sympathy) was offered to Center Stage through the American Playwrights Theatre, which Anderson describes as "a group of college and community theatres which has come together to get a chance to produce the plays of 'established' playwrights before not after Broadway." By September, fifty theatres will have mounted The Days Between, but Center Stage is the only professional theatre I know that has been willing to touch it. Its theme is the perennial, almost the obsessional, theme of American drama since O'Neill: the self-deluder forced in the end to face himself for what he really is. Anderson's hero is a writer, the author of one good novel in his youth, who has been struggling ever since to write his second book. Five minutes after the play begins we know he never will.

This fatal disability aside, the play is competently—somewhat too competently—constructed in the old-fashioned way: everything is smooth and neatly dovetailed; you can see where every line is going. Furthermore, the dialogue is highfalutin and hollow ("I became sick with this indescribable longing." "How can you say that?" "Because it's the truth."), and the characters are gracious, grammatical puppets. There is a certain amount of entertainment to be derived from watching them glide neatly through their carefully arranged paces (or perhaps I thought so because no play about "writer's block" can ever be without interest to a writer). But The Days Between is dead. Douglas Seale's production (on an impressive multi-level set by Mark Rodgers) was decent enough, but unavailing; the leading actors looked about ten years too young for their roles, but it did not matter.

The Chinese Wall, by the Swiss writer Max Frisch, which succeeded The Days Between at Center Stage, is a very different kind of bad play: shapeless, whereas The Days Between is all too carefully shaped. Buried in The Chinese Wall is an unsubtle but effective one-act parable about an ancient emperor of China, "Tsin She Hwang Ti, called the Son of Heaven, he who is always in the right," who presides at the trial of a mute child on the charge of being a revolutionary called The Voice of the People, and who is provoked by the mute's impassivity into screaming out the truth about his own tyrannical crimes. (This Emperor was strongly played in Baltimore by John Schuck.) But Frisch has added a character called the Contemporary, a 20th-century intellectual (or so the playwright says) who gets involved in the action and spouts yards and yards of platitude. The point seems to be something about the impotence of well-meaning intellectuals in the face of tyranny, but it is not made very economically. And then Frisch has filled out his cast with Romeo and Juliet, Napoleon, Columbus, Pontius Pilate, Don Juan, Brutus, Philip of Spain and Cleopatra, who carry on and on for no good reason that was evident to me; perhaps it all has something to do with the Teutonic sense of humor.

In this meandering free-for-all, Seale saw the opportunity for a directorial tour de force. Influenced, perhaps, by Peter Brook and Marat/Sade, he set the play not in a madhouse but in a circus. The Contemporary became the ringmaster, Romeo and Juliet the acrobats, Napoleon a clown, Cleopatra a gum-chewing stripper, and so on. In the Emperor's speech about "the Great Order, which we call the True Order and the Only Order and the Final Order!" (according to the published translation), the word "Order" was changed to "Society." The Mandarins were dressed in K.K.K. sheets; Brutus wore a big "Make Love Not War" button pinned to his leotards. In the first act, it seemed to me, Seale's inventiveness was not quite sufficient to offset the innate dullness of the script; but the second (which contains, along with more dull stuff, most of the action in the play) was a splendid piece of theatre.

At any rate, the production showed a laudable determination on the part of Center Stage to stir things up in Baltimore. Interestingly enough, The Days Between, which is pseudo-realistic and easy to follow, was not popular there; people seemed to prefer an absurdist comedy-melodrama like The Birthday Party, or a didactic extravaganza like The Chinese Wall. (None of these three plays, incidentally, has yet been done professionally in New York.)

In Philadelphia, a young organization called the Theatre of the Living Arts seems even more intent on keeping things stirred up. The Living Arts opened a year ago last January in a 407-seat converted movie house in a Negro slum section. Its story is a familiar one: this season, its second, it had 8,500 subscribers; it played to 80 to 85 per cent of capacity; it expects to build a new theatre of 800 or 900 seats. In its brief existence, however, it has already received an extraordinary amount of attention. A couple of fairly well-known New York playwrights have expressed interest in writing for it. The New York press has taken notice. Robert Brustein, the new dean of the Yale Drama School, has invited the company to give its production of Samuel Beckett's Endgame at Yale. It has also been invited, along with the Stratford (Ontario) Shakespeare Festival, the Guthrie Theatre of Minneapolis, and the Arena Stage of Washington, to appear at a resident theatre festival that will be held in a Broadway theatre in 1967. Some of this attention is attributable to the fact that the theatre is only about an hour and a half from New York; but a good deal of it, I think, comes from the air of excitement that—sometimes at least—prevails there.

André Gregory, the artistic director at the Living Arts, is a member of the Actor's Studio, and acknowledges its influence on his work. But perhaps because he has worked in Europe with Bertolt Brecht's Berliner Ensemble he appears to be free of the various kinds of corruption (whatever they are; authorities differ) for which the Studio is, justly or unjustly, notorious. "Just doing plays well is nice," he says. "It's a value, but it's not a prime value." He wants his theatre to be the place where the community comes to question itself. One of the purposes of the Living Arts should be, he believes, to "shock and seduce—but more shock—into thinking. Things have been much too rigid in this town. . . . People have got to feel about problems that concern them."

This is more or less what most resident-theatre leaders want, but it is a tall order. One wonders how often an evening at the theatre changes anybody's mind, or causes him suddenly to begin thinking about something that had never occurred to him before. I tend to believe that the important effect of the theatre is subliminal and cumulative, that it builds up in a man's mind like a coral island. But I guess also that it builds up faster at the Living Arts than at most resident theatres (and, of course, a lot faster at any halfway decent resident theatre than in the inquisitive

???
(About Group Insurance)

Explore the tax advantages of group insurance—major medical; hospitalization; surgical; pension. These coverages create long lasting employer-employee associations. The employer too, can increase his personal insurance at unbelievably low costs. Expose yourself to this valuable approach. Call or write Dan Jaffe, for an appointment.

Group Writers
INC.

INSURANCE SPECIALISTS
431 Fifth Avenue, N.Y. 10016
MU 4-5779

commercial theatre). Many directors say the same, but Mr. Gregory seems to be more in earnest about it than most, and his urgency is reflected in what happens on his stage.

This urgency was not overwhelmingly apparent in the Philadelphia production of The Last Analysis, Saul Bellow's self-consciously raffish attempt at intellectual farce. The play concerns itself with the opinions and obsessions of a washed-up Jewish television comedian named Bummidge, a "serious buffoon" who wants to broadcast the story of his life over closed-circuit television to an audience of psychoanalysts gathered at the Waldorf-Astoria. It was directed with high competence by George Sherman, the theatre's associate director; the broadcast itself, as staged by Mr. Sherman, was a hilarious nonsense fantasia on themes from Freud. As Bummidge, David Hurst was splendid: light and deft, very funny, unflagging but never forced, elfin but never overcute.

VACATIONS

TESSLER'S RESORT — Kerhonkson, N. Y. Gorgeous country for a relaxed vacation. Folk & Social dancing led by Milton Hellman. Special events: July 4, exhibit of works by prominent artist Jack Bilander; July 8, Yoga and self-analysis by Goldie Lipson, author of "Rejuvenation." Reserve for summer months. Write or phone: 914-626-2656 or 914-892-9849.

REAL ESTATE

HILLSDALE, N. J. (Bergen County). Country-like setting with woods in back and sheep across the street. Four bedrooms (10′ x 12′ to 12′ x 16′) on one level, 16′ x 32′ filtered swimming pool. 3 baths, game room with fireplace, 2-car garage, dishwasher and laundry chute. Four-year-old bi-level on a cul-de-sac. Easily accessible to schools, shopping and NYC. Asking $36,500; must move to Boston. Phone 201-664-8365.

$7,900 buys writer's two-acre hideaway home South Jersey pinewoods. 2½ hrs. N.Y., 40 min. Phila., 25 min. Atlantic City. Reasonable payments. Write P.O. Box 204 B. Mays Landing, N.J. Phone 914-737-6409.

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 7-4-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

CITY ....

STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

Mr. Bellow has loaded Bummidge with Weltschmertz and Angst; students of modern literature will have a field day comparing him to Herzog. But Herzog is not so noisily pretentious, and even Herzog is not so intolerably self-obsessed as Bummidge. Around him Mr. Bellow has written a repetitive, meandering script, full of lame jokes and peculiarly unidiomatic dialogue. A great deal is talked about the human condition, but very little is said about it. Mr. Bellow's foray into farce reminds me of the essay in which T. S. Eliot longed to be a music-hall clown, so that he could really reach the masses. I thought when I saw the play in New York, and I thought again in Philadelphia, that Mr. Bellow was slumming.

Poor Bitos, Jean Anouilh's acute and subtle study of the revolutionary temperament, is a play far more to my taste. André Gregory's production showed, for better and for worse, what his theatre can do. Anouilh's Bitos is a Communist public prosecutor in a small French town, graceless, uncultivated, fanatically dedicated and ruthless; in a flash-back he turns into Robespierre, his prototype. He hates the frivolous, decadent aristocrats of the town, yet yearns to be like them; when invited to one of their parties, he comes. But the party has been arranged specifically to torment him.

Mr. Gregory made it quite a party. In rehearsal, he provided a phonograph, and had his actors improvise to jazz and rock 'n' roll; the phonograph, the music, and a good bit of the improvised material ended up in the performance. The result, influenced perhaps by La Dolce Vita, was probably the most obscene, degenerate orgy ever seen in Philadelphia. I particularly remember an actress in a skintight, scaly-silver sheath wriggling passionately on the floor and doing God knows what to Bitos' feet. These abandoned revelers had little in common with Anouilh's elegant aristocrats, and the pathos of poor clumsy Bitos, the washerwoman's son who never knows which fork to use, passionately envying the cool, assured, exquisite Beautiful People around him, was lost amid all the hotly spectacular goings-on. But in its place we got a vivid picture of a lone puritan trying to preserve himself in the midst of a debauch.

Even more than John Hancock with A Midsummer Night's Dream in San Francisco, or Douglas Seale with The Chinese Wall in Baltimore, Mr. Gregory went all out for shock. He was brilliantly aided by Eugene Lee's constructivist wooden setting, with its floor sloping crazily in several directions at once, by Mr. Lee's hallucinatory lighting, and by the unhackneyed sensuality of Adam Sage's costumes. A crucial moment in the play was marked with a deafening scream of electronic music and a blinding flash from bright lights focused directly into the eyes of the audience. One of the revolutionary ladies in a flash-back scene performed with one breast exposed. (We were demurely informed in a program note that this lady used to appear that way in real life.) It was an audacious production, very contemporary, very immediate and very vivid.

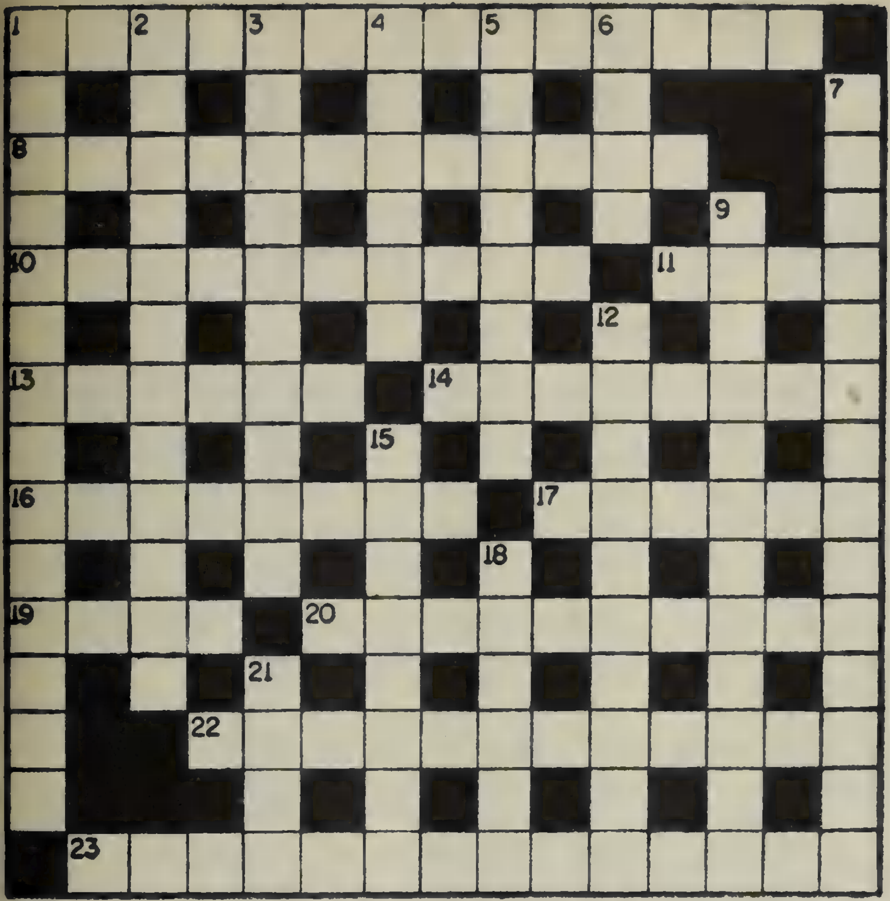
But it was a production in which the scenery, lighting, costumes, music and special effects were more interesting than the acting. George Bartenieff with his febrile raging was often intriguing as Bitos, but rather mannered, with a tendency to tense up and gabble indistinctly in moments of crisis. As his chief tormentor, Anthony Zerbe was competent enough, but in accordance with the director's scheme he coarsened the elegance of the character. And all the goings-on tended, to a certain extent, to distract attention from both of them. The Broadway production, like the London production before it, had no special effects, no dolce vita, no shocks; only two superb performances by Donald Pleasence and Charles D. Gray as Bitos and his opponent. It focused, as the Living Arts production did not, on two men fighting with everything they had, which is one of the things that drama is really about.

The Theatre of Cruelty can be highly exciting and bare breasts and blinding lights may have their place in the theatre. But nothing will ever take the place of good acting. Bitos in Philadelphia had an air not just of urgency but almost of desperation, as if Mr. Gregory feared that ordinary theatrical methods no longer work, that an audience must be shocked, galvanized, almost beaten and kicked, before it will pay attention. I do not think that this fear is warranted, and I doubt that Mr. Gregory really thinks so either.

But it is good to know that some people in the provinces are experimenting with skill, responsibility, and with qualified but very real success. It is not impossible that they will learn—and teach others—how to preserve the merits of their innovations without incurring the drawbacks, how to use shock tactics without unduly de-emphasizing the actor. Mr. Gregory appears to be following along behind Peter Brook (of Marat/Sade), who in turn is following Antonin Artaud; but it would not surprise me to see, in future seasons, Broadway directors and many others following along behind Mr. Gregory.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1160

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 What traction equipment might be for standing in back of the lead? (10, 4)
8 Their tops are supposed to fold over, but don't always. (12)
10 I read at least one version before the message can be destroyed. (10)
11 Not quite chi-chi, but still smart. (4)
13 The old sign of the guardsmen. (6)
14 Altering the constituent make-up? (8)
16 Little outdoor cooking, but that's not important. (5, 3)
17 An Italian used the octave before the sestet. (6)
19 Turner might have been connected with it, but Max Leger took it to heart. (4)
20 Probably no sign of welcome at such entrances. (10)
22 Walked about, but made paler when upset by it. (12)
23 Certainly not a consistent quality. (14)

DOWN:

1 Should there be 400 in the Polynesian group? (7, 7)
2 A friend of the Department of Defense, or is this merely how it might appear? (12)
3 Four less than 2, in a narrow way. (3-7)
4 It ain't proper! (6)
5 See 9 down
6 In which effectively one sees Oscar, perhaps. (4)
7 Cocoa, sold as the standard drugstore treat? (9, 5)
9 and 5 Famous band of opera-lovers? (3, 4, 2, 3, 8)
12 Miss Crane? (10)
15 Forget an alternative to an extent, if you look at it one way! (8)
18 A common friend from Boston? What a racket! (6)
21 Inconclusive injunction to amount to something, but you might find one is in the soup! (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1159

ACROSS: 1 Turkish bath; 9 Black cat; 10 Drupes; 11 Sunroom; 12 and 25 Bucket seats; 14 Behalf; 15 Pushcart; 17 and 6 Thunderstruck; 20 Rulers; 22 Sponges; 24 Assuage; 26 Sextet; 7 Acidosis; 28 Chorus lines. DOWN: 2 Uncertain; 3 Kick-off; 4 Sate; 5 Bedaubs; 7 Blouse; 8 Better; 13 Spasm; 16 Cellulose; 18 Hopper; 19 Ejector; 20 Rossini; 21 Regain; 23 Notch.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address requests to Puzzle Dept., The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014

EDUCATIONAL

WANTED for new private co-ed high school on large Vermont farm: musician-teacher. Full faculty status. If stimulating environment and associates mean more than high pay, write East Hill School, 21 Brown Street, Cambridge, Mass. 02138.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), [redacted] Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London. $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

WORLD DEMOCRACY. By Bin Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique, Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Ave., N.Y.C. Bin Dir Woor advocates Christ-Worship for all non-Christians. Better earth lives. Better after-death lives. A spiritual foundation for World Democracy. He promises, God willing, to appear many times after death to promote World Democracy, and asks the reader to do the same.

HOMOSEXUAL theme fiction, non-fiction listing available free. Only complete listing. Trojan Book Service, Box 2121B, Philadelphia, Pa. 19103.

ASSASSINATION still bothering you? Read "Did Secret Service Men Shoot Kennedy?" at your local bookstore.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 692 Greenwich Street, New York 14, PSC 709.

PERSONALS

"PLAY IT AGAIN, SAM"

GIANT PHOTO MURAL . . .

Typical "BOGIE" pose from one of his most famous movie roles. Lithographed on poster stock . . (43"x30"). Shipped in protective mailing tube.
$1.00 Postpaid.

HUDSON INDUSTRIES, Dept. N-6
116 Charles St., N. Y., N. Y. 10014

Your Home immortalized in lovely water-color! (From photo: by mail.) Inexpensive: satisfaction guaranteed. Details free. Idea Treasury, 98 Broadway, Hastings-on-Hudson, N. Y.

ASSOCIATES sought for new satirical, independent weekly needed to arouse apathetic John Doe against hypocrisy corroding American life. Mass appeal paramount. Suggestions welcome. Box 591, The Nation.

WRITER available for articles, speeches, PR, reports, novels, humor, editing. Call 212 388-5889.

VOLUNTEER to fight conscription. Write. International League Against Conscription, 4356½ Melrose Ave., Los Angeles, Cal. 90029.

1½" PEACE STICKERS. 20¢/100. Self-addressed envelope. R. Hogen, Box 259 Stuyvesant Sta., N.Y.C. 10009.

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

FREE! With every new subscription to THE NATION

THE FERVENT YEARS

by Harold Clurman, 302 pages; list price, $1.75

In this book, a classic in its field, The Nation's drama critic recalls the ideals, personalities, triumphs and errors behind the Group Theatre. That brilliant experiment in the American theatre brought together such then little-known talents as Lee Strasberg, Cheryl Crawford, Clifford Odets, Franchot Tone, Elia Kazan, John Garfield, Irwin Shaw; it produced such memorable and influential plays as Men in White, Johnny Johnson, Awake and Sing, My Heart's in the Highlands and Golden Boy. But beyond recapturing the excitement of those people and events, Mr. Clurman, himself a founder and director of the Group, has written one of the best social and intellectual histories of the 1930s—those tumultuous, tormented and fervent years that a new generation has just begun to discover with mounting pleasure and excitement.

> "Has the fascination of a novel. . . . Mr. Clurman's 'characters' . . . wander in and out of his pages as undraped as if, spiritually at least, they were at a nudist colony."
> —John Mason Brown

> "A tale of almost heroic struggle, of clashing vanities, of successes and mistakes, which will always have a place in the history of our stage."
> —Walter Pritchard Eaton, New York Herald Tribune

> "Light on the forces in the theatre and in the surrounding social and economic climate of the thirties that drew this wildly assorted collection of actors, directors, writers and eager aspirants into a vociferous effort to create a unity in which they could work and through which they might also live."
> —Theatre Arts

For your FREE copy of THE FERVENT YEARS, fill out subscription coupon below, and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of THE FERVENT YEARS.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME ______________________________

ADDRESS ______________________________

CITY ____________________ STATE ______________ ZIP No. ________

7-4-66

PABLO NERUDA TWO POEMS

THE NATION

JULY 11, 1966 35 cents

JUL 12 1966

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.

What the Warren Report Omits

THE VITAL DOCUMENTS

JACOB COHEN

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN

A Report From Occupied Territory

JAMES BALDWIN

PEN CONGRESS

Pablo Neruda in New York

JOSE YGLESIAS

The View from the East

IVAN BOLDIZSAR

LETTERS

Bundy in Santo Domingo

Stanford, Calif.
Dear Sirs: In his article, "The Unfinished Revolution," [The Nation, May 2], Sidney Lens stated that McGeorge Bundy "came to Santo Domingo" in May, 1965, and demanded that the Dominican Communists should be "incarcerated in concentration camps."

The term "concentration camps" is filled with such horror and loathing that no one should use it lightly or without absolute assurance. I have tried to find out what truth there may be in Mr. Lens's story. I have consulted some of the principals and one who was present at the discussions in Puerto Rico and in Santo Domingo, President Jaime Benítez of the University of Puerto Rico.

I am convinced that Mr. Lens has here committed an irresponsible and indefensible calumny. He does not state what his source of information is, but he passes on this tale with such circumstantial detail—most of which, I am convinced, is also fictitious—that the reader is led to believe that his source was at least one of the principals whose information was not open to question. United States intervention was bad enough without inventing unnecessary slanders and without making a villain of Mr. Bundy, who took on a most onerous task and carried it out as honorably as possible. Mr. Lens merely succeeds in exculpating the real villains.

Theodore Draper

Chicago, Ill.
Dear Sirs: Is it really so hard to visualize the United States asking another country to put Communists in concentration camps? I wonder where Mr. Draper has been these last twenty years.

My article had to do with negotiations between two men about a formula to save President Johnson's face in the Dominican Republic, and how, when McGeorge Bundy came to Santo Domingo to implement it, the whole matter got twisted into the usual hard line vis-à-vis the Communists. My source—unimpeachable in my opinion—is one of the principals, among others, and his story makes sense in the light of what Draper himself concedes to have been a false policy in the Dominican Republic.

What I suspect bothers Draper is something in himself, not me. He was a leading apologist for U.S. policy in Cuba, and in my humble opinion, he gravely twisted facts to make the U.S. State Department look good. On the Dominican issue he has been on the side of the angels and his articles are among the best materials on the subject. . . .

I get the impression that what Draper would like to do is show that there were some "good guys," like McGeorge Bundy, and some "bad guys," like Thomas Mann, making U.S. policy. I concede that Bundy probably did want to play the dove and work out an arrangement with Bosch and Guzman. But it is a historical fact that Bundy was eventually ordered to take the hard line I indicated, and that the thrust of U.S. policy was typically cold war and interventionist.

Sidney Lens

Sherrill wrong

Washington, D.C.
Dear Sirs: Robert Sherrill's article ["Foundation Pipe Lines: The Beneficent CIA," The Nation, May 9] is misleading and inaccurate. I have been a member of the board of directors of AFME since 1957 (and chairman since 1958), and I am thoroughly familiar with its activities.

(Continued on page 51)

EDITORIALS

Korea—with a Difference

At a June 18 news conference, President Johnson hinted at still another intensification of U.S. military action in Vietnam. "We must continue to raise the cost of aggression at its source," was his wording. This sounded like a threat to extend the area of bombing; and The Wall Street Journal of June 27 carried a report that Mr. Johnson had reached a decision to bomb North Vietnam's oil-storage depots at the port city of Haiphong which, because of the volume of foreign shipping passing through it, has heretofore been treated with some circumspection. A report to the same effect appeared in the June 26 Observer (London) under Anthony Howard's by-line. It must be said for Mr. Johnson that he is not given to idle threats: On June 29 U.S. Air Force and Navy jets bombed fuel depots on the outskirts of both Hanoi and Haiphong, approaching within 3 and 2 miles, respectively, of the city centers.

Howard reported further that the Johnson Administration had decided to settle for nothing less than a "Korean-type solution" for Vietnam. All ideas of a settlement based on the neutrality of South Vietnam have been ruled out, which is to say that the United States Government has fallen in line with the policy laid down by the triumphant Premier Ky who, with the latest types of tear-gas bombs and judicious use of clubs and firearms, has crushed opposition to his rule, at least for the time being. Ky and Johnson are apparently committed to a harder line than the Pentagon and Secretary McNamara. The latter, according to Howard, is not enthusiastic about the war of attrition and endurance implied in a Korea-type finale.

The American people are not being let in on the Administration's thinking. After all, elections of a sort are to be held in South Vietnam in September, and in the United States in November. In the Vietnam election neutralists are to be excluded, both as candidates and voters, and of course there will be no balloting in the areas held by the Vietcong, so the outcome is a foregone conclusion. In the United States, perhaps unfortunately from the Administration's standpoint, the outcome cannot be so confidently predicted. So that the U.S. electorate would not be unduly alarmed, Mr. Johnson took the unusual step of privately summoning a group of foreign correspondents to the White House and taking them into his confidence, with no domestic newsmen present. He avoided getting down to specifics, but made it clear that he was determined to fight in Vietnam to the bitter end. The correspondent of the Manchester Guardian asked him about the possibility of holding out some concessions to the Soviet Union in order to enlist its help in reaching a settlement in Vietnam. Nothing of the kind, the President replied; no "bribes and carrots," was the way he put it.

That the United States could never be expelled from Vietnam has been clear from the outset. When it looked as if the government of South Vietnam was coming apart at the seams, the Johnson Administration threw in sufficient manpower and materiel to take care of the situation, and it is still engaged in taking over the chief burden of the war.

After the elections the American people will be informed—as they were after Mr. Johnson's landslide victory on a peace platform in 1964. They will then learn that it is going to be Korea all over again—but with a difference. The Vietcong are in South Vietnam to stay, and though they may be forced by sheer weight of air power to lie low for a while, a Korean-type conclusion is inherently impossible. This is only the latest of the blind alleys into which Mr. Johnson has led us.

Synchronized Escalation

The closing in of U.S. bombers could have been predicted in the light of a "Citizens' White Paper" which shows that efforts toward a political settlement of the Vietnamese war have repeatedly been collapsed by timely intensification of the American military effort. The authors of the study, titled "The Politics of Escalation," are three professors of the University of California at Berkeley: Franz Schurmann, director of the Center for Chinese Studies, Peter Dale Scott of the Department of Speech, and Reginald Zelnick of the Department of History, assisted by a dozen consultants and editorial workers at Berkeley and other universities. A covering letter commending the report to the attention of President Johnson was signed by twenty-nine scholars, clergymen, lawyers, businessmen and labor leaders.

The study runs to book length and leans over backward in its effort to be fair to the Johnson Administration: "Available evidence does not prove that escalations were intended solely or primarily to counter efforts at compromise or negotiation. . . ." On these two counts it will no doubt be widely ignored, at least initially, by a press which likes its sources short, sensational and self-assured. Its immediate impact will be mainly on thoughtful Americans, who have been notably deficient in their influence on this Administration. This effort, however, differs from previous ones in that it is not so much a remonstrance as a marshaling of evidence which, in time, can hardly fail to raise questions. Is this repeated concurrence to be attributed to pure chance, or to such a sustained build-up of U.S. military strength in Southeast Asia that any particular move could hardly fail to coincide with the repeated efforts to end a war which most of the world regards as senseless and barbarous? Or is this pattern of synchronous occurrence the result of a deliberately calculated policy?

The authors cite and document at length nine incidents in what they call "the sombre, recurring pattern of political exploration cut short by military escalation. . . ." They ask the President whether this is fortuitous or intentional. The President does not reply. Instead, too late for inclusion as a tenth example, he is unleashing the bombers on Hanoi and Haiphong, at a time when efforts are being made by the Secretary-General of the UN and by French and Canadian envoys to negotiate a de-escalation of the war.

Yet despite Administration obfuscations and a generally uninformative press, the Johnson-Rusk policy of open-ended escalation is losing support. In the June 27 New York Times, Ronald Sullivan reports that Democratic leaders in New Jersey are "seriously considering" breaking with the President on Vietnam. They see advocacy of de-escalation

OCT 22
V 6
JAN 18

IN THIS ISSUE

July 11, 1966

EDITORIALS

34

ARTICLES

38 U Thant on War and Peace
Anne Weill-Tuckerman

39 To Whom It May Concern: A Report from Occupied Territory
James Baldwin

43 What the Warren Report Omits: The Vital Documents
Jacob Cohen

49 The Brass Pyramid
Robert G. Sherrill

BOOKS & THE ARTS

52 Pablo Neruda: The Poet in New York
Jose Yglesias

53 Ode To My Socks (poem)
Pablo Neruda
Translated by Robert Bly

54 Funeral in the East (poem):
Pablo Neruda
Translated by Robert Bly

55 The View from the East
Ivan Boldizsar

59 Brazilian Diamonds
Alan Cheuse

61 Television
Peter Gzowski

63 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Assistant Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher
ANNE C. ABRAMOVITZ Assistant

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. Tel.: 242-8400.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION Volume 203 No. 2

as their only chance of beating the Republican "hawks" in November. State Sen. Ned J. Parsekian, who has been chosen to oppose U.S. Sen. Clifford P. Case, feels he may have to turn down the nomination, partly because of his doubts about U.S. Vietnamese policy. The freshman Representative from Bergen County, Henry Helstoski, who rode into office on the Presidential coattails and has been a loyal supporter, now argues that we must stop bombing North Vietnam and ask the UN to work out a settlement. He has been echoing Charles E. Osgood's testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee—that it is impossible "to escalate the intensity of an attack on an opponent with one hand while simultaneously holding out an olive branch with the other."

Helstoski has been attracting attention with his news letters to constituents and the polls he conducts. A year ago those replying to his questionnaire on Vietnam favored Mr. Johnson's policy by 75 to 25, a ratio which has now fallen to a precarious 57 to 43. A poll by the Democratic State Committee in the spring gave a similar result. If Helstoski and other apprehensive Democrats should decide to run as moderate peace candidates, they can find fresh arguments for their position in "The Politics of Escalation." Nor would it be surprising if, with such efforts, the American people discover what Mr. Johnson would prefer not to let them know, until such time as his plans for a "Korean-type solution" mature.

Raid on Medicare

Not much editorial notice was taken of it, but the American people were given a brilliant lesson recently in how private industry can manipulate Congress—and make Congress like it. This exhibition was in the mangling of the Medicare Act by the American Hospital Association. As originally passed, the act allowed Robert M. Ball, Commissioner of Social Security, to repay the hospitals and nursing homes the "reasonable cost" of caring for the elderly. Repeatedly Ball acknowledged in Congressional hearings that he interpreted reasonable costs to mean reasonable costs only—no profits.

No doubt Ball thought he was telling the truth. In any event, the hospitals and nursing homes weren't about to settle for cost service. No sooner was medicare passed than they began to talk about boycotts. Washington bureaucrats panicked and began to give ground.

Meanwhile, the American Hospital Association was storming at the non-booty idea of the program. The California division of the association was especially enraged and threatened not to participate. At this point Ball, who apparently has the authority under the act to squeeze and stretch it any way he likes, went into private session with the American Hospital Association. Not even Congress knew what he was up to. Sen. Clinton Anderson requested from Ball a copy of the minutes of his conference with hospital officials—and was turned down!

Then Ball emerged to announce that he would allow the hospitals to operate their medicare programs on the old profiteering cost-plus basis: they would be paid a profit of 2 per cent of their cost. The more they pad their costs, the more they profit.

Furthermore, depreciation of facilities will be considered part of the cost. Here's a beautiful wringing of the taxpayer's neck: First he finances the construction of the hospital through the Hill-Burton program, and then he is forced to pay for the building's depreciation. He pays twice. (The 2 per cent of this is a third payment.)

Another curious deal Ball made with the hospital operators was an arrangement by which they can collect from the government thirty days in advance for services they "think" they will render to the old folks; this will deprive the Medicare Trust Fund of millions of dollars in interest, of course, but it will give the hospitals some early money to play with.

By the time the preposterous arrangements were made public, and Sen. Russell Long, Chairman of the Finance Committee, had called a private hearing to determine how seriously Ball and the American Hospital Association had damaged the intent of Congress, it was too late to do anything about it. The Senators did get to rid themselves of some of their spleen. Page 121 of the executive hearings shows a blank space, representing some very fiery language which Senator Anderson directed at Ball, and later removed.

But Congress and the American people have been beaten out of an estimated $150 million a year, which will be deducted from what would have been spent for actual care of the elderly, and given to the hospitals for profit.

As The Nation said on January 3, "There are signs that the results [of medicare] will not be so much the subsidizing of needy people as the subsidizing of an industry."

Senators Are Different

There are only fifty states in the Union and only a hundred Senators; they must therefore be accounted a special class of citizens. And among them Thomas J. Dodd seems to be in a special class all by himself. In the hearings before the Senate Ethics Committee, one cannot fail to be struck by the contrast between Dodd under investigation and the hundreds of witnesses, not Senators, who have been investigated by Dodd and his colleagues. It was the misfortune of the latter to be just plain citizens, at a time when cold-war scapegoats were in demand and Dodd was one of those most zealous in harrying and exposing them.

A new word, heralding a new concept, has emerged from the present hearings. The committee rejected copies of Dodd's correspondence, documents, etc., which had been turned over to Drew Pearson by members of Dodd's staff—to whom he does not seem to have endeared himself. The committee held that the copies were "stigmatized." In the federal courts documents seized without a search warrant fall into the category of "tainted" evidence, and "stigma-

SUMMER SCHEDULE

During July and August, The Nation will appear on alternate weeks: forthcoming issues will be dated July 25, August 8 and August 22.

tized" documents are apparently the Senatorial analogue.

Sometime back, police and representatives of a state legislative committee concerned with "un-American" activities broke into the New Orleans office of The Southern Conference Educational Fund, Inc., an organization seeking to secure to Negro citizens the rights guaranteed to them under the Constitution. The office was totally ransacked and everything movable taken away. Personal effects of Dr. James A. Dombrowski, the executive director of SCEF, were seized in his home and he was arrested. A Louisiana state court ruled that these proceedings were illegal, but in the meantime the books (one was Thoreau's Journal), records, membership lists, etc., had been moved to Baton Rouge, and from there taken across the state line into Mississippi under arrangements made by J. G. Sourwine, counsel to the Internal Security Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. The documents were reproduced and published by the subcommittee, of which Sen. Thomas J. Dodd was a prominent member. Apparently the subcommittee did not regard this material as "stigmatized," nor was the equanimity of other Senators in the least disturbed by any phase of this operation.

Coming back to the present proceedings, we find Dodd represented by a prominent law firm with seven lawyers in attendance, four at the counsel table and the overflow in the first row of the spectators' section. It must come as a surprise to see these lawyers vigorously cross-examining "hostile" witnesses. In the proceedings of the Internal Security Subcommittee witnesses without number, represented by counsel who were denied the right of cross-examination, have been crucified, with Dodd enthusiastically taking part in the inquisition.

Dodd now castigates his former employees who abstracted the documents from his files for copying, and who now find themselves without jobs and little prospect of ever being employed again in official Washington. But since when, in Dodd's world, has the informer been disreputable? The committee on which he serves is a refuge for informers, and they are praised to the skies for their actions and their testimony.

Granted that Senators are different—but are they that much different? Innumerable reputations have been destroyed through denial of the privileges now accorded Dodd. Is the reputation of a Senator that much more sacred than the reputation of any other citizen? Do we have one set of rules when Senators are investigated, and another set of rules for ordinary citizens? Or will the Senate now be shamed into revising the rules for the latter, to give them some semblance of equality?

'The Christian Virtues'

Newsweek once pointed out that J. Edgar Hoover is an "authentic folk hero." If any doubt remained on that score, it has been removed by the installation in the Capitol Hill Methodist Church in Washington of a stained glass window, 22 feet high and 33 feet wide—about the size of a modest ranch house—dedicated to the great G-man with the inscription, STATESMANSHIP THROUGH THE CHRISTIAN VIRTUES. When one contemplates the honors showered upon Mr. Hoover during his illustrious career and the lamentable fact that he resembles other men in one respect—mortality—one wonders what there will be left to say when he finally shuffles off this mortal coil.

Yet even while he is in our midst, terrorizing evildoers of every description, Hoover has his troubles within the government he serves so selflessly. On May 4, the Supreme Court refused to review the conviction for income tax violation of Fred B. Black, Jr., a Washington lobbyist. His attorney asked for a review on the ground that a wiretap issue was involved. On May 21, Solicitor General Thurgood Marshall submitted a memorandum to the Court in which he stated that wire taps or electronic eavesdropping devices had been used, without the knowledge of the Department of Justice and without its authorization. The Court responded by ordering that more information be supplied; specifically, who did order the bugging?

The effect of this sequence of events was to point the finger at J. Edgar Hoover, who has not yet responded. Marshall's action is said to have provoked a confrontation between Justice Department officials and Hoover in which the latter was described as "furious." This is not hard to believe. Even under the best of circumstances Hoover is a choleric sort, and his present situation is a trying one. As a folk hero he is probably immune from chastisement, but his temper is being put to a severe test.

However, more is at stake than prerogatives and passions. Marshall's action highlights a basic problem: that under Hoover's administration the FBI has assumed practically unlimited investigative powers. It can investigate almost anyone it wants to investigate, by almost any methods it sees fit to use.

In a series of articles in The Washington Post, Richard Harwood recounts some recent FBI investigations. A national magazine discovered in 1964 that the FBI had compiled a dossier on the ex-wife of one of its writers. The material in the file was then used by Hoover's associates to bar the writer from sitting in on an interview with Hoover. The managing editor of a prominent newspaper in the Midwest was advised by a U.S. district attorney in 1965 that a reporter for the paper has become persona non grata at the Federal Building because of "derogatory information" in the possession of the FBI. Americans traveling abroad—university professors in particular—have been put under surveillance by the FBI. The authors of books critical of the federal establishment can be reasonably certain of acquiring dossiers in the FBI files.

The folk hero has the wherewithal and the power. His annual budget is about as large as the State Department's and more than twice the size of that available to the Attorney General. Hoover commands the equivalent of an oversize army division—16,000. No one, right up to the President, can deal with him as an equal, much less a subordinate. Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach once joked in private: "Sure I could fire him on Monday. The only thing is that I'd be looking for a new job on Tuesday."

The more credit, then, to Thurgood Marshall. What he did took courage. If Katzenbach abetted him, so much the better. They cannot fire Hoover, but they have given him some explaining to do.

U THANT ON WAR AND PEACE

ANNE WEILL-TUCKERMAN

Mrs. Weill-Tuckerman has covered the United Nations since its inception as a correspondent for Agence France-Presse. She is also a regular political commentator for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

As he sets out on another European trip, there is no doubt that Secretary-General U Thant is deeply troubled about the future of the United Nations and its diminishing capacity to meet its commitment, under the Charter: to keep or restore the peace. This disenchantment and concern are key factors in his delay in announcing whether or not he will be available this fall, and his repeated statements that he would be happy if the Security Council found a successor to assume the post of Secretary-General after November 3 when his term expires. U Thant has tried to minimize the difficulties in finding a suitable candidate and has even, apparently in a semi-serious vein, offered his help in this search.

It is probable that U Thant has not yet made up his mind definitely about another term. On the personal level, he is not politically ambitious; perhaps because of his Buddhist philosophy, he has escaped the clinging to power which grows naturally in the breasts of most politicians and statesmen. Even if he now has a good idea of what he wants to do after November 3, he is not telling and is determined to seize this opportunity to convey in the strongest terms to those most concerned what he considers essential for the survival of the United Nations.

The top priority goes to the war in Vietnam, whose continuation demonstrates the impotence of the peace organization and threatens its very existence.

U Thant has called repeatedly for a three-point program as the only avenue to a negotiated settlement of the conflict: "First, the cessation of the bombing of North Vietnam; second, the scaling down of all military activities in South Vietnam, which alone could lead to the bringing about of a cease-fire; and third, the willingness by all sides to enter into discussions with those who are actually fighting," or, in more concrete terms, the willingness of Saigon and Washington to enter into discussions with the Vietcong.

The first and third steps of this program are undoubtedly the responsibility of the United States. The bombing of oil targets in the highly populated areas of Haiphong and Hanoi has given a resounding negative answer to U Thant's point one, and the Secretary-General has expressed his disapproval in a laconic but unequivocal communiqué. Already the punitive warnings to North Vietnam by President Johnson in his press conference of June 18 gave the impression that he did not take U Thant more seriously than Stalin did the late Pope Pius XII, when, according to the anecdote of Yalta which has become a historical cliché, he brushed aside the role of the Vatican in Italian politics with the comment: "How many divisions has the Pope?"

As for the possibility that General Ky will sit down with the Vietcong—an essential element in point three of U Thant's scheme—American policy makers who might conceivably accept such an eventuality for themselves are not likely to insist on it in Saigon in view of the extreme precariousness of the present regime. By refusing to sponsor a Saigon request for United Nations observers in the forthcoming elections (scheduled for this September), U Thant has amply shown that he did not care to confer a UN seal of approval on these elections or their results.

A related cause of U Thant's concern over the future of the UN is the absence of the People's Republic of China; this could become a fatal flaw in the fabric of the world organization as the present paralysis over Vietnam demonstrates. He realizes that, at this stage, the main obstacles no longer derive solely from the United States but from Peking itself, partly out of rancor against an organization which has for so long denied it its legitimate place. He is extremely careful not to interpret or comment publicly on the attitude of the Chinese leaders toward the UN or himself and it has been noted with some interest at UN headquarters that no direct attack against U Thant has been made from Peking—or Hanoi—since he enunciated his three-point program for a Vietnam settlement in Paris last April.

Next to the need for a negotiated settlement in Vietnam and China's admission to the UN, the future of the UN itself depends largely on its capacity to wield the machinery for peace keeping. Here too, U Thant feels an acute disappointment which he has expressed forcefully in recent weeks. Although he kept as much as possible out of the quarrel over Article 19, which dealt with the financing of the controversial Congo operation (a legacy from the Hammarskjold administration), he does not keep silent on the lack of progress in the establishment of machinery for future peace-keeping operations, including financial provisions. Above all, he is thoroughly dissatisfied with the refusal of big powers like the USSR and France (which have voted in favor of the present operation in Cyprus) to assume financial responsibility for the UN force there. The Secretary-General has denounced as grossly inadequate and unacceptable for the future the method of voluntary financing now used for the Cyprus account. He has warned that "if the UN is to develop as a really potent force for peace, it must have the tools to perform its work; and without the proper tools, there is going to be a stagnation . . . [which] is definitely not in the interests of the organization or of world peace."

This, together with the need of a Soviet contribution to ease the UN financial difficulties, U Thant will discuss with Soviet leaders during his visit to Moscow late in July. He will also have frank discussions about the changes that the Russians want to effect in the administration of the Secretariat, which he feels are not in the interests of the organization. It is worth while to note in this regard that the Soviet Union is the only big power which has not announced its support of U Thant for re-election, the official position being that no comment will be forthcoming from Moscow until the Secretary-General has stated his intentions unequivocally regarding his candidacy. Two can play at that game.

Finally, U Thant is dissatisfied with what he considers insufficient efforts on the part of the large industrial powers to help the developing countries. The widely heralded "development decade of the United Nations" is far from being a success. International assistance, U Thant said in a recent message to the World Bank, is falling behind the absorptive capacity of the developing countries; yet it cannot be argued that they have done little to mobilize their domestic resources in the past years. The insufficiency of external aid remains, and the modest target set by the General Assembly in 1961—that the flow of development capital should represent 1 per cent of the aggregate national income of developed countries—is still far from being reached. Should this situation become worse, as it threatens to do, the growth of developing countries will be seriously retarded.

U Thant well realizes that he cannot bring about a change of policy on the part of the big powers toward the United Nations and world problems, but he is making full use of the best opportunity he has to state frankly to those involved his opinion of their responsibilities in the continuing crisis. He has made it clear that he does not have to go on leading an organization whose effectiveness they are preventing and—with the war in Vietnam—perhaps strangling to death.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN

A Report From Occupied Territory

JAMES BALDWIN

Mr. Baldwin's first published work was a review in this publication. Among his more recent books are: The Fire Next Time, Another Country and Going To Meet The Man (all Dial Press).

On April 17, 1964, in Harlem, New York City, a young salesman, father of two, left a customer's apartment and went into the streets. There was a great commotion in the streets, which, especially since it was a spring day, involved many people, including running, frightened, little boys. They were running from the police. Other people, in windows, left their windows, in terror of the police because the police had their guns out, and were aiming the guns at the roofs. Then the salesman noticed that two of the policemen were beating up a kid: "So I spoke up and asked them, 'why are you beating him like that?' Police jump up and start swinging on me. He put the gun on me and said, 'get over there.' I said, 'what for?' "

An unwise question. Three of the policemen beat up the salesman in the streets. Then they took the young salesman, whose hands had been handcuffed behind his back, along with four others, much younger than the salesman, who were handcuffed in the same way, to the police station. There: "About thirty-five I'd say came into the room, and started beating, punching us in the jaw, in the stomach, in the chest, beating us with a padded club—spit on us, call us niggers, dogs, animals—they call us dogs and animals when I don't see why we are the dogs and animals the way they are beating us. Like they beat me they beat the other kids and the elderly fellow. They throw him almost through one of the radiators. I thought he was dead over there."

"The elderly fellow" was Fecundo Acion, a 47-year-old Puerto Rican seaman, who had also made the mistake of wanting to know why the police were beating up children. An adult eyewitness reports, "Now here come an old man walking out a stoop and asked one cop, 'say, listen, sir, what's going on out here?' The cop turn around and smash him a couple of times in the head." And one of the youngsters said, "He get that just for a question. No reason at all, just for a question."

No one had, as yet, been charged with any crime. But the nightmare had not yet really begun. The salesman had been so badly beaten around one eye that it was found necessary to hospitalize him. Perhaps some sense of what it means to live in occupied territory can be suggested by the fact that the police took him to Harlem Hospital themselves—nearly nineteen hours after the beating. For fourteen days, the doctors at Harlem Hospital told him that they could do nothing for his eye, and he was removed to Bellevue Hospital, where for fourteen days, the doctors tried to save the eye. At the end of fourteen days it was clear that the bad eye could not be saved and was endangering the good eye. All that could be done, then, was to take the bad eye out.

As of my last information, the salesman is on the streets again, with his attaché case, trying to feed his family. He is more visible now because he wears an eye patch; and because he questioned the right of two policemen to beat up one child, he is known as a "cop hater." Therefore, "I have quite a few police look at me now pretty hard. My lawyer he axe (asked) me to keep somebody with me at all times 'cause the police may try to mess with me again."

You will note that there is not a suggestion of any kind of appeal to justice, and no suggestion of any recompense for the grave and gratuitous damage which this man has endured. His tone is simply the tone of one who has miraculously survived—he might have died; as it is, he is merely half blind. You will also note that the patch over his eye has had the effect of making him, more than ever, the target of the police. It is a dishonorable wound, not earned in a foreign jungle but in the domestic one—not that this would make any difference at all to the nevertheless insuperably patriotic policeman—and it proves that he is a "bad nigger." ("Bad niggers," in America, as elsewhere, have always been watched and have usually been killed.) The police, who have certainly done their best to kill him, have also provided themselves with a pretext derisoire by filing three criminal charges against him. He is charged with beating up a schoolteacher, upsetting a fruit stand, and assaulting the (armed) police. Furthermore, he did all of these things in the space of a single city block, and simultaneously.

The salesman's name is Frank Stafford. At the time all this happened, he was 31 years old. And all of this happened, all of this and a great deal more, just before the "long, hot summer" of 1964 which, to the astonishment of nearly all New Yorkers and nearly all Americans, to the extremely verbal anguish of The New York Times, and to the bewilderment of the rest of the world, eventually erupted into a race riot. It was the killing of a 15-year-old Negro boy by a white policeman which overflowed the unimaginably bitter cup.

As a result of the events of April 17, and of the police performance that day, and because Harlem is policed like occupied territory, six young Negro men, the oldest of whom is 20, are now in prison, facing life sentences for murder. Their names are Wallace Baker, Daniel Hamm, Walter Thomas, Willie Craig, Ronald Felder and Robert Rice. Perhaps their names don't matter. They might be my brothers: they might also be yours. My report is based, in part, on Truman Nelson's The Torture of Mothers (The Garrison Press, 15 Olive Street, Newburyport, Mass., with an introduction by Maxwell Geismar). The Torture of Mothers is a detailed account of the case which is now known as the case of The Harlem Six. Mr. Nelson is not, as I have earlier misled certain people into believing, a white Southern novelist, but a white Northern one. It is a rather melancholy comment, I think, on the Northern intellectual community, and it reveals, rather to my despair, how little I have come to expect of it that I should have been led so irresistibly into this error. In a way, though, I certainly have no wish to blame Mr. Nelson for my errors; he is, nevertheless, somewhat himself to blame. His tone makes it clear that he means what he says and he knows what he means. The tone is rare. I have come to expect it only of Southerners—or mainly from Southerners—since Southerners must pay so high a price for their private and their public liberation. But Mr. Nelson actually comes from New England, and is what another age would have called an abolitionist. No Northern liberal would have been capable of it because the Northern liberal considers himself as already saved, whereas the white Southerner has to pay the price for his soul's salvation out of his own anguish and in his own flesh and in the only time he has. Mr. Nelson wrote the book in an attempt to create publicity and public indignation; whatever money the book makes goes into the effort to free The Harlem Six. I think the book is an extraordinary moral achievement, in the great American tradition of Tom Paine and Frederick Douglass, but I will not be so dishonest as to pretend that I am writing a book review. No, I am writing a report, which is also a plea for the recognition of our common humanity. Without this recognition, our common humanity will be proved in unutterable ways. My report is also based on what I myself know, for I was born in Harlem and raised there. Neither I, nor my family, can be said ever really to have left; we are —perhaps—no longer as totally at the mercy of the cops and the landlords as once we were: in any case, our roots, our friends, our deepest associations are there, and "there" is only about fifteen blocks away.

This means that I also know, in my own flesh, and know, which is worse, in the scars borne by many of those dearest to me, the thunder and fire of the billy club, the paralyzing shock of spittle in the face; and I know what it is to find oneself blinded, on one's hands and knees, at the bottom of the flight of steps down which one has just been hurled. I know something else: these young men have been in jail for two years now. Even if the attempts being put forth to free them should succeed, what has happened to them in these two years? People are destroyed very easily. Where is the civilization and where, indeed, is the morality which can afford to destroy so many?

There was a game played for some time between certain highly placed people in Washington and myself before the administration changed and the Great Society reached the planning stage. The game went something like this: around April or May, that is as the weather began to be warmer, my phone would ring. I would pick it up and find that Washington was on the line.

Washington: What are you doing for lunch—oh, say, tomorrow, Jim?

Jim: Oh—why—I guess I'm free.

Washington: Why don't you take the shuttle down? We'll send a car to the airport. One o'clock all right?

Jim: Sure. I'll be there.

Washington: Good. Be glad to see you.

So there I would be the next day, like a good little soldier, seated (along with other good little soldiers) around a luncheon table in Washington. The first move was not mine to make, but I knew very well why I had been asked to be there.

Finally, someone would say—we would probably have arrived at the salad—"say, Jim. What's going to happen this summer?"

This question, translated, meant: Do you think that any of those unemployed, unemployable Negroes who are going to be on the streets all summer will cause us any trouble? What do you think we should do about it? But, later on, I concluded that I had got the second part of the question wrong; they really meant, what was I going to do about it?

Then I would find myself trying patiently to explain that the Negro in America can scarcely yet be considered—for example—as a part of the labor unions—and he is certainly not so considered by the majority of these unions—and that, therefore, he lacks that protection and that incentive. The jobs that Negroes have always held, the lowest jobs, the most menial jobs, are now being destroyed by automation. No remote provision has yet been made to absorb this labor surplus. Furthermore, the Negro's education, North and South, remains, almost totally, a segregated education, which is but another way of saying that he is taught the habits of inferiority every hour of every day that he lives. He will find it very difficult to overcome these habits. Furthermore, every attempt he makes to overcome them will be painfully complicated by the fact that the ways of being, the ways of life of the despised and rejected, nevertheless contain an incontestable vitality and authority. This is far more than can be said of the middle class which, in any case, and whether it be black or white, does not dare to cease despising him. He may prefer to remain where he is, given such unattractive choices, which means that he either remains in limbo, or finds a way to use the system in order to beat the system. Thus, even when opportunities—my use of this word is here limited to the industrialized, competitive, contemporary North American sense—hitherto closed to Negroes begin, very grudgingly, to open up, few can be found to qualify for them for the reasons sketched above, and also because it demands a very rare person, of any color, to risk madness and heartbreak in an attempt to achieve the impossible. (I know Negroes who have gone literally mad because they wished to become commercial air-line pilots.) Nor is this the worst.

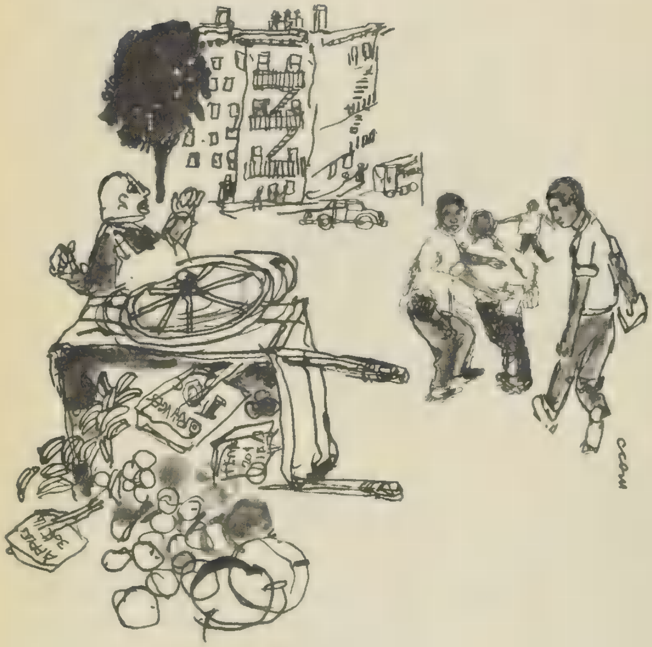
The children, having seen the spectacular defeat of their fathers—having seen what happens to any bad nigger and, still more, what happens to the good ones—cannot listen to their fathers and certainly will not listen to the society which is responsible for their orphaned condition. What to do in the face of this deep and dangerous estrangement? It seemed to me—I would say, sipping coffee and trying to be calm—that the principle of what had to be done was extremely simple; but before anything could be done, the principle had to be grasped. The principle on which one had to operate was that the government which can force me to pay my taxes and force me to fight in its defense anywhere in the world does not have the authority to say that it cannot protect my right to vote or my right to earn a living or my right to live anywhere I choose. Furthermore, no nation, wishing to call itself free, can possibly survive so massive a defection. What to do? Well, there is a real estate lobby in Albany, for example, and this lobby, which was able to rebuild all of New York, downtown, and for money, in less than twenty years, is also responsible for Harlem and the condition of the people there, and the condition of the schools there, and the future of the children there. What to do? Why is it not possible to attack the power of this lobby? Are their profits more important than the health of our children? What to do? Are textbooks printed in order to teach children, or are the contents of these textbooks to be controlled by the Southern oligarchy and the commercial health of publishing houses? What to do? Why are Negroes and Puerto Ricans virtually the only people pushing trucks in the garment center, and what union has the right to trap and victimize Negroes and Puerto Ricans in this way? None of these things (I would say) could possibly be done without the consent, in fact, of the government, and we in Harlem know this even if some of you profess not to know how such a hideous state of affairs came about. If some of these things are not begun—I would say—then, of course, we will be sitting on a powder keg all summer. Of course, the powder keg may blow up; it will be a miracle if it doesn't.

They thanked me. They didn't believe me, as I conclude, since nothing was ever done. The summer was always violent. And in the spring, the phone began to ring again.

Now, what I have said about Harlem is true of Chicago, Detroit, Washington, Boston, Philadelphia, Los Angeles and San Francisco—is true of every Northern city with a large Negro population. And the police are simply the hired enemies of this population. They are present to keep the Negro in his place and to protect white business interests, and they have no other function. They are, moreover—even in a country which makes the very grave error of equating ignorance with simplicity—quite stunningly ignorant; and, since they know that they are hated, they are always afraid. One cannot possibly arrive at a more surefire formula for cruelty.

This is why those pious calls to "respect the law," always to be heard from prominent citizens each time the ghetto explodes, are so obscene. The law is meant to be my servant and not my master, still less my torturer and my murderer. To respect the law, in the context in which the American Negro finds himself, is simply to surrender his self-respect.

On April 17, some school children overturned a fruit stand in Harlem. This would have been a mere childish prank if the children had been white—had been, that is, the children of that portion of the citizenry for whom the police work and who have the power to control the police. But these children were black, and the police chased them and beat them and took out their guns; and Frank Stafford lost his eye in exactly the same way The Harlem Six lost their liberty—by trying to protect the younger children. Daniel Hamm, for example, tells us that ". . . we heard children scream. We turned around and walked back to see what happened. I saw this policeman with his gun out and with his billy in his hand. I like put myself in the way to keep him from shooting the kids. Because first of all he was shaking like a leaf and jumping all over the place. And I thought he might shoot one of them."



He was arrested, along with Wallace Baker, carried to the police station, beaten—"six and twelve at a time would beat us. They got so tired beating us they just came in and started spitting on us—they even bring phlegm up and spit on me." This went on all day. In the evening, Wallace Baker and Daniel Hamm were taken to Harlem Hospital for X rays and then carried back to the police station, where the beating continued all night. They were eventually released, with the fruit-stand charges pending, in spite of the testimony of the fruit-stand owner. This fruit-stand owner had already told the police that neither Wallace Baker nor Daniel Hamm had ever been at his store and that they certainly had had nothing to do with the fruit-stand incident. But this had no effect on the conduct of the police. The boys had already attracted the attention of the police, long before the fruit-stand riot, and in a perfectly innocent way. They are pigeon fanciers and they keep—kept—pigeons on the roof. But the police are afraid of everything in Harlem and they are especially afraid of the roofs, which they consider to be guerrilla outposts. This means that the citizens of Harlem who, as we have seen, can come to grief at any hour in the streets, and who are not safe at their windows, are forbidden the very air. They are safe only in their houses—or were, until the city passed the No Knock, Stop and Frisk laws, which permit a policeman to enter one's home without knocking and to stop anyone on the streets, at will, at any hour, and search him. Harlem believes, and I certainly agree, that these laws are directed against Negroes. They are certainly not directed against anybody else. One day, "two carloads of detectives came and went up on the roof. They pulled their guns on the kids and searched them and made them all come down and they were going to take them down to the precinct." But the boys put up a verbal fight and refused to go and attracted quite a crowd. "To get these boys to the precinct we would have to shoot them," a policeman said, and "the police seemed like they was embarrassed. Because I don't think they expected the kids to have as much sense as they had in speaking up for themselves." They refused to go to the precinct, "and they didn't," and their exhibition of the spirit of '76 marked them as dangerous. Occupied territory is occupied territory, even though it be found in that New World which the Europeans conquered; and it is axiomatic, in occupied territory, that any act of resistance, even though it be executed by a child, be answered at once, and with the full weight of the occupying forces. Furthermore, since the police, not at all surprisingly, are abysmally incompetent—for neither, in fact, do they have any respect for the law, which is not surprising, either—Harlem and all of New York City is full of unsolved crimes. A crime, as we know, is solved when someone is arrested and convicted. It is not indispensable, but it is useful, to have a confession. If one is carried back and forth from the precinct to the hospital long enough, one is likely to confess to anything.

Therefore, ten days later, following the slaying of Mrs. Margit Sugar in Mr. and Mrs. Sugar's used-clothing store in Harlem, the police returned and took Daniel Hamm away again. This is how his mother tells it: "I think it was three (detectives) come up and they asked are you Danny Hamm? And he says yes and right away—gun right to the head and slapping him up, one gun here and one here—just all the way down the hall—beating him and knocking him around with the gun to his head." The other boys were arrested in the same way, and, again of course, they were beaten; but this arrest was a far greater torture than the first one had been because some of the mothers did not know where the boys were, and the police, who were holding them, refused for many hours to say that they were holding them. The mothers did not know of what it was their children were accused until they learned, via television, that the charge was murder. At that time in the state of New York, this charge meant death in the electric chair.

Let us assume that all six boys are guilty as (eventually) charged. Can anyone pretend that the manner of their arrest, or their treatment, bears any resemblance to equal justice under the law? The Police Department has loftily refused to "dignify the charges." But can anyone pretend that they would dare to take this tone if the case involved, say, the sons of Wall Street brokers? I have witnessed and endured the brutality of the police many more times than once—but, of course, I cannot prove it. I cannot prove it because the Police Department investigates itself, quite as though it were answerable only to itself. But it cannot be allowed to be answerable only to itself; it must be made to answer to the community which pays it, and which it is legally sworn to protect; and if American Negroes are not a part of the American community, then all of the American professions are a fraud.

This arrogant autonomy, which is guaranteed the police, not only in New York, by the most powerful forces in American life—otherwise, they would not dare to claim it, would, indeed, be unable to claim it—creates a situation which is as close to anarchy as it already, visibly, is close to martial law.

Here is Wallace Baker's mother speaking, describing the night that a police officer came to her house to collect the evidence which he hoped would prove that her son was guilty of murder. The late Mrs. Sugar had run a used-clothing store and the policeman was looking for old coats. "Nasty as he was that night in my house. He didn't ring the bell. So I said, have you got a search warrant? He say, no, I don't have no search warrant and I'm going to search anyway. Well, he did. So I said, will you please step out of this room till I get dressed? He wouldn't leave." This collector of evidence against the boys was later arrested on charges of possessing and passing counterfeit money (he pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor, "conspiring" to pass counterfeit money). The officer's home in Hartsdale, N. Y., is valued at $35,000, he owns two cars, one a Cadillac, and when he was arrested, had $1,300 in his pockets. But the families of The Harlem Six do not have enough money for counsel. The court appointed counsel, and refused to allow the boys counsel of their own choice, even though the boys made it clear that they had no confidence in their court-appointed counsel, and even though four leading civil rights lawyers had asked to be allowed to handle the case. The boys were convicted of first-degree murder, and are now ending their childhood and may end their lives in jail.

These things happen, in all our Harlems, every single day. If we ignore this fact, and our common responsibility to change this fact, we are sealing our doom. Here is the boy, Daniel Hamm, speaking—speaking of his country, which has sworn to bring peace and freedom to so many millions: "They don't want us here. They don't want us—period! All they want us to do is work on these penny-ante jobs for them—and that's it. And beat our heads in whenever they feel like it. They don't want us on the street 'cause the World's Fair is coming. And they figure that all black people are hoodlums anyway, or bums, with no character of our own. So they put us off the streets, so their friends from Europe, Paris or Vietnam—wherever they come from—can come and see this supposed-to-be great city."

There is a very bitter prescience in what this boy—this "bad nigger"—is saying, and he was not born knowing it. We taught it to him in seventeen years. He is draft age now, and if he were not in jail, would very probably be on his way to Southeast Asia. Many of his contemporaries are there, and the American Government and the American press are extremely proud of them. They are dying there like flies; they are dying in the streets of all our Harlems far more hideously than flies. A member of my family said to me when we learned of the bombing of the four little girls in the Birmingham Sunday school, "Well, they don't need us for work no more. Where are they building the gas ovens?" Many Negroes feel this; there is no way not to feel it. Alas, we know our countrymen, municipalities, judges, politicians, policemen and draft boards very well. There is more than one way to skin a cat, and more than one way to get bad niggers off the streets. No one in Harlem will ever believe that The Harlem Six are guilty—God knows their guilt has certainly not been proved. Harlem knows, though, that they have been abused and possibly destroyed, and Harlem knows why—we have lived with it since our eyes opened on the world. One is in the impossible position of being unable to believe a word one's countrymen say. "I can't believe what you say," the song goes, "because I see what you do"—and one is also under the necessity of escaping the jungle of one's situation into any other jungle whatever. It is the bitterest possible comment on our situation now that the suspicion is alive in so many breasts that America has at last found a way of dealing with the Negro problem. "They don't want us—period!" The meek shall inherit the earth, it is said. This presents a very bleak image to those who live in occupied territory. The meek Southeast Asians, those who remain, shall have their free elections, and the meek American Negroes—those who survive—shall enter the Great Society.

WHAT THE WARREN REPORT OMITS

THE VITAL DOCUMENTS

JACOB COHEN

Mr. Cohen taught history at Yale and is teaching this summer at Brandeis. He is presently completing a book on the Kennedy assassination which defends the Warren Commission's principal conclusion that Oswald was the lone killer. His articles have appeared in many magazines including The Nation, Commonweal and The New Leader.

Several writers have recently suggested that Lee Harvey Oswald was not a lone assassin shooting at President Kennedy that black Friday in Dallas and publishers' fall lists promise several new books developing variations of the same theory. While the writers we have heard thus far differ on such crucial details as the number of shots, the timing and source of the shots, and the precise location of the hits, there is one point upon which all present and, I would guess, future devotees of the theory could be made to agree: if there was more than one assassin, then the results of the autopsy which was performed on the President at Bethesda the night of the assassination must have been deliberately falsified.

One can reach no other conclusion. Two experienced pathologists and a wound ballistics expert examined President Kennedy thoroughly, internally and externally; and the physical damage described in their autopsy report, submitted, we are told,* on November 24, 1963, two days after the assassination, perfectly sustains the ultimate conclusions of the commission: that two bullets hit the President, both fired from a point "behind and somewhat above the level of the deceased"; that one bullet hit him in the back at the base of his neck, exiting from the lower third of the throat; and that the other bullet, the fatal missile, entered in the back of the skull and exited from the right temple, "carrying with it portions of cerebrum, skull and scalp."

---

*The autopsy document (Exhibit No. 387) is undated. We learn the date it was submitted in the testimony of the examining doctors (II pp. 349 et seq.).

Let us suppose, then, that the wound in Kennedy's throat was a wound of entry, which would place another assassin somewhere in front of him. This is one of the notions developed by Vincent Salandria in his articles in Liberation. Now, obviously, such a bullet would have to go somewhere. Either it would have lodged in Kennedy's body, in which case it would have been seen in the X rays and removed by surgery, or, it would have exited from the body at some discernible point. Internally, the bullet would have left a path and a pattern of bruises, rips, abrasions, blood clotting, displaced tissue, probably broken bones, and metallic tracings which could not have failed to indicate the bullet's source. But there is not a scintilla of evidence in the autopsy which would indicate a hit from the front. If there was such a hit, the autopsy must be false.

Or suppose that the President was hit flush in the right temple by an assassin situated to his right on the grassy knoll, as Salandria and Fred Cook suggest. This means that the massive fault in Kennedy's temple, which was observed in horror by many eyewitnesses to the shooting, was an entry wound; Salandria suggests the use of dumdum bullets to explain how an entry wound could have had such a shattering effect. However, the autopsy says that Kennedy's temple was shattered by a bullet which entered the base of his skull, leaving a neat, round hole, and then blasted out of his temple. Descriptions of the beveling and splintering of bone and the displacement of brain matter confirm this interpretation, as would the many pictures and X rays taken just before and during the autopsy examination. Again, it is inconceivable that a bullet—even a dumdum bullet—fired from the right, entering the right temple, could have caused damage even remotely resembling that caused by a bullet fired from above and behind which exited from the temple. If Cook and Salandria's speculations are correct, the autopsy is phony.

Or consider the theories of Edward Jay Epstein, who is described in Richard Rovere's adulatory introduction to Epstein's recent book, Inquest: The Warren Commission and the Establishment of Truth (Viking): "Mr. Epstein," says Rovere, "does not challenge or even question the fundamental integrity of the Commission or its staff. He discards as shabby 'demonology' the view that the Commissioners collusively suppressed evidence." However, when one extracts the theory behind Epstein's line of questioning it is clear that Epstein, no less than the others, suggests that the autopsy was falsified and, I might add, the evidence of this collusively suppressed.

The pivotal point in the commission's case for a single assassin—Epstein and Cook would agree—is its contention that President Kennedy and Governor Connally were hit by the same bullet. According to the commission the bullet which hit the President in the back of the neck and exited from the throat went on to hit Connally and caused all his wounds. If this did not happen—if Kennedy and Connally were hit by separate bullets—then it follows that there was a second assassin, as Epstein and Cook's very similar analyses of the films of the assassination indubitably prove. Both Epstein and Cook believe that the bullet which hit Kennedy in the back hit too low to have exited from his throat and then hit Connally. Cook agrees that the bullet exited from the throat, but feels its line of flight was too flat to have hit Connally at the required downward angle. Epstein doesn't even believe that the bullet exited from Kennedy's throat; he suggests that it penetrated the back an inch or so and then fell out.

Now either the bullet hit high enough on the back to have done what is claimed for it, or it did not; this is a matter of observable, measurable fact. Epstein suggests a wound several inches below the one described in the autopsy. If he is right, the autopsy must have been falsified; doctors, like successful assassins, don't miss by that margin. Similarly, is it a matter of observable fact whether that bullet exited from the throat or not? Dr. Milton Helpern, chief medical examiner of New York City, points out that "there is no such thing as a rifle bullet's passing through a neck without leaving a path." Mr. Epstein says there was no path (op. cit., pp. 58-9). Cook, too, says the pathologists at Bethesda were "unable to . . . trace the actual path of the bullet." But the autopsy report describes the path in some detail:

> The second wound presumably of entry is that described above in the upper right posterior thorax. Beneath the skin there is ecchymosis of subcutaneous tissue and musculature. The missile path through the fascia and musculature cannot be easily probed. The wound presumably of exit was that described by Dr. Malcolm Perry of Dallas in the low anterior cervical region. When observed by Dr. Perry the wound measured "a few millimeters in diameter," however it was extended as a tracheotomy incision and thus its character is distorted at the time of the autopsy. However, there is considerable ecchymosis of the strap muscle of the right side of the neck and of the fascia about the trachea adjacent to the line of the tracheotomy wound. The third point of reference in connecting these two wounds is in the apex (supra-clavicular portion) of the right pleural cavity. In this region there is contusion of the parietal pleura and of the extreme apical portion of the right upper lobe of the lung. In both instances the diameter of contusion and ecchymosis at the point of maximal involvement measures 5 cm. Both the visceral and parietal pleura are intact overlying these areas of trauma.

The emphasis is suggested by Dr. Helpern who interpreted this passage for me and assured me that this is a proper description of a path through the neck. Dr. Helpern also expressed considerable irritation that Mr. Epstein had quoted him in connection with Epstein's view that no path was found. When I asked Helpern what was meant by the statement "the missile path . . . cannot easily be probed" he snapped, "Nobody said it was always easy to find a path."

In other words, the President's body provided the most effective disproof of any contention that there were other hits, other assassins, and anyone making such an imputation, therefore, must be willing to defend the thesis that the autopsy doctors deliberately falsified their report, or that the autopsy report reproduced in the Warren Commission Report is a forgery, or both. Such a charge, of course, challenges the good name of many people, including those who lied, those who ordered them to lie, and the many who would know about the deception and are remaining silent.

Has it come to this, then—the doctors' word against the word of Cook, Epstein, Salandria, et al.? There is, of course, eyewitness testimony and other corroborative evidence on the nature of the wounds, but an objective mind would, it seems to me, find this evidence contradictory. Taking from these contradictions only the evidence which does not confirm the official version, critics easily can convince their readers that the Warren Report is radically flawed. And, sadly, the authors of the report have also been rather selective in their interpretation of the evidence. Whom are we to believe?

Fortunately there is an easy way out of this predicament, for there exists material evidence—the photographs and X rays taken at Bethesda—which could settle almost all the major differences of opinion concerning the wounds. The photographs would pinpoint the location of the back wound, and by showing whether it was high enough to sustain the commission's theory, would either silence Cook and Epstein or win a Pulitzer Prize for one of them. The photographs could also show alleged wounds unaccounted for in the autopsy, such as the exit wound of a bullet entering the throat, and they would reveal details of the complex wound in Kennedy's temple. And the X rays would determine, once and forever, if any unaccounted for bullets or bullet fragments lodged in Kennedy's body. Bullets are as clear in an X ray as a spoon and, together with the photographs, would depict the fracturing in Kennedy's skull clearly enough to test Salandria's theory that the massive skull wound was a wound of entry. Indeed, one sentence in the autopsy report makes the point perfectly:

> The complexity of these fractures and the fragments thus produced tax satisfactory verbal description and are better appreciated in photographs and roentgenograms which are prepared.

By showing nothing more than the autopsy has led us to expect, these documents would be valuable for they would silence a hundred theories already born or in utero.

All of which leads us to an examination of what may be the most exasperating mystery surrounding the Warren Report, that of the missing X rays and photographs. For amazing as it may seem, these documents—the only material evidence that could confirm or deny the observations of the autopsy doctors—are not included among the exhibits in the twenty-six-volume Warren Report, and as far as one can ascertain, were never even examined by the Warren Commission and its staff. Indeed, after several months of part-time detective work, I cannot even be sure of the whereabouts of these documents.

This much may be learned from the public record: In the half hour before the autopsy examination some "15-20 photographs both black and white and color" were taken, "depicting significant findings." Also, "10-12 X-rays" were made at this time, and "perhaps 15-20 more X-rays were made during the autopsy." I quote from the testimony (II, 348 et seq.) of Dr. J. J. Humes, the chief autopsy surgeon, who went on to say to the Warren Commission that these films were used "extensively" during the autopsy examination. Soon after the autopsy was concluded, all films were turned over to Agent Roy H. Kellerman of the Secret Service by Humes's superior, Captain J. H. Stover, Jr., and Kellerman then brought them to the White House where he turned them over to Special Agent Robert Bouck. What the Secret Service did with these documents is, as we shall see, part of the mystery.

On December 6, 1963, Captain (then Commander) Humes submitted a "Supplementary Autopsy Report" (Exhibit No. 391) to Captain Stover containing the results of microscopic examination of Kennedy's brain, heart and sections of the abdominal organs. In this report Humes writes:

> During the course of this examination seven (7) black and white and six (6) color 4x5 negatives are [sic] exposed but not developed (the cassettes containing these negatives have been delivered by hand to Rear Admiral George W. Burkley, MC, USN, White House Physician).

We are not told whether the thirteen photographs mentioned here were taken in the laboratory, or are the same ones which were taken and exposed in the morgue at Bethesda on the night of the assassination. If they were taken in the laboratory, there are twenty-eight to thirty-three photographs extant, and twenty-five to thirty-two X rays. If they were taken the night of the assassination, the missing photographs number from fifteen to twenty.

Dr. Humes appeared before the commission on March 16, 1964. He quickly explained that before testifying he "did not know whether or not the photographs which we made would be available to the Commission," and that, therefore, he had asked a Navy artist to prepare drawings of the President's wounds. These drawings (Commission Exhibits 385-389), the only visualization of the wounds in the entire twenty-six volumes, were made, Humes testified, solely on the basis of his, and his colleague, Dr. J. Thorton Boswell's, verbal description of the location and nature of the wounds. Humes and Boswell worked from notes; they did not have the pictures and X rays before them as they told the artist what to draw. Humes concedes the awkwardness of this procedure, repeating several times that these drawings are only a "schematic representation" and admitting once that "the photographs would be more accurate as to the precise location [of the wounds]," but then he insists, unconvincingly, that the pictures and X rays would be of no particular help to the commissioners. Since, as we have seen, inches count very preciously for the commission's thesis of a single assassin, it is difficult to understand why the commissioners did not examine the photos.

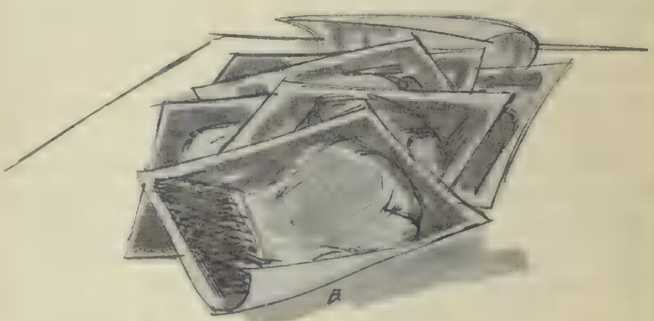
Secret Service Report to the Warren Commission*, December 18, 1963, Volume II, Exhibit 12. This material is in the National Archives in Washington, D.C.

What did Humes mean when he said that he didn't know whether these documents "would be available" to the commission? At one point in his testimony he informed the commissioners that some of the X rays taken during the autopsy, as distinguished from the X rays taken before the autopsy, would be "available" if requested, strongly suggesting that the other X rays would not be "available." Who, we wonder, was telling Humes just what documents would or would not be "available" to the commission? The best guess is someone from the Secret Service, since that agency presumably possessed these documents at this time. Nor is it clear whether the commission ever requested and received the X rays which were available, though in a lengthy interview on June 13, 1966, Arlen Specter of the commission staff told me that he had not seen any of these documents, and that when he asked Justice Warren for them Warren said that the commission had decided "not to press the matter." Since Mr. Specter, who is now District Attorney of Philadelphia, single-handedly developed the evidence on the autopsy and wrote the first draft of the most widely controverted pages in the Warren Report, his comment on this crucial point may be significant. Of course, his memory may be inaccurate. His reputation is certainly in some jeopardy as a result of accusations made lately, particularly by Epstein. However, this much seems clear from the public record: the Warren Commission did not see all of the X rays, or any of the important photographs.

Surprised by the revelations in Humes's testimony I began to check through the Warren Report to see if anyone else who should have seen these documents actually did see them. For example, on April 27, 1964, three wound ballistics experts from the Army's Edgewood Arsenal conducted experiments relating to the President's wounds. From animal skin, animal meat and gelatins they simulated several inert human necks and skulls, and then, under conditions roughly equivalent to those which prevailed at the time of the assassination, using Oswald's rifle, they fired round after round into the dummies in order to compare the damage done to the simulated necks and skulls with the damage that had actually been done to the President. They also simulated Governor Connally's rib cage for comparison with his wounds. Unquestionably, these scientists needed the photos and X rays of the President in order to make precise comparisons, just as they needed the Connally X rays. (No photographs were taken of Connally.) They received medical reports on Connally, the Connally X rays and the Kennedy autopsy, but not Kennedy's X rays and photos (I, p. 581).

Nor had the commission's principal ballistics expert, FBI scientist Robert Frazier, seen the X rays or even the autopsy before testifying on May 13, 1964. Asked whether the bullet holes in the front and back of Kennedy's shirt were made by the same bullet, Frazier refused to comment because, he said, he had not yet seen the autopsy results (V, p. 71). On June 4, 1964, Frazier testified again. He had been to Dallas on May 23 and had conducted an experiment for the commission which reconstructed the circumstances of the assassination. It was mainly from this that the commission concluded that a bullet exiting from Kennedy's throat, at the angle indicated by autopsy findings, would necessarily have hit Connally, considering the position of the two men at the time of the shooting. But this was not Frazier's conclusion. He withheld final judgment because he still had not seen the autopsy or other evidence on the wounds which would have indicated exactly what the downward angle of the bullet was (V, p. 168).

The fact that Frazier, the FBI's leading ballistics expert, had not seen the X rays and photos, or even the autopsy, by June, 1964, strongly suggests that the FBI did not have these documents as it prepared its own report on the assassination, presented to President Johnson on December 9, 1963, less than three weeks after the assassination. The point is crucial, because, as Salandria and Epstein have stressed, the FBI report contradicts the autopsy in the Warren Report in several details. According to the FBI, Kennedy was hit in the back, not the lower neck, and this bullet did not exit from his throat. The throat wound, says the FBI, was caused by a sliver of the bullet which hit Kennedy's skull. Now, if the FBI had the autopsy when it made this report, the conclusion must follow that the autopsy findings have somehow changed since the time the FBI examined them. Epstein states categorically that the "autopsy report was forwarded to the FBI" before it submitted its report on December 9, 1963. He adds that the "FBI had color photographs of the autopsy." But his only citation for these statements is an interview with Francis W. H. Adams of the commission staff. When I called Mr. Adams to check, he told me that he did not remember talking to Epstein, did not have Epstein's name in his calendar for July 8, 1965, the date Epstein claims the interview took place and, most important, that he had no knowledge whatsoever of whether or not the FBI had seen the autopsy and photographs. Unless Epstein can produce firmer documentation for his statement, we must add the authors of the FBI report to the list of people who should have seen the X rays and photos and did not.



Add the authors of the report of the Dallas police to that list also. Much abuse has been directed at the Dallas police for its handling of the case in the days just after the assassination, all of it deserved. It should be said, however, that the Dallas police continued its own separate investigation of the case for several weeks after the assassination, and the report it sent to the Warren Commission (XXIV, pp. 195-404) is well organized and admirably detailed. This report must have been considerably more useful to the commission than the brief and largely rhetorical FBI report of December 9. Within three days of the assassination the Dallas police had received from the FBI laboratory reports on all bullets and bullet fragments, Oswald's rifle and pistol, finger and palm prints; by December 20, they had an analysis of the Zapruder films of the assassination prepared by the FBI, which had received the films on December 5 (XXV, p. 576). And yet the Dallas police apparently never saw a copy of the autopsy report or of the photographs and X rays.

Where are these documents today? They are not in the National Archives, which supposedly has all the materials on the assassination. On March 31, 1966, I spent a day with John F. Simmons and Marion Johnson of the archives staff working through a long list of all the items in the assassination collection. Mr. Johnson said he had handled every item on the assassination in the building—classified, declassified and unclassified—and was sure that he had not seen the Kennedy X rays and photos, though he did remember photographs of Oswald's body. We also checked through all correspondence between the Secret Service and the commission and found no mention of these documents. The people at the archives, who were clearly irked that such important material is missing from the collection, suggested that I get in touch with the Secret Service.

So I wrote to Robert Wallace, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, who forwarded my letter to David C. Acheson. In a tart note Mr. Acheson informed me that the Service had turned all of its material over to the commission or the archives and that the "X-ray films were made available to the Commission and were in fact used in briefing the Commission staff on the autopsy procedures and results." He said nothing about the photos. I responded, politely, that the X rays were not in the archives despite the fact that the commission had turned over all its material to that library. I asked specifically how and when the Secret Service disposed of these documents, and I asked who exactly had "used the X rays in briefing the commission staff on the autopsy procedure and results," since it was clear from their testimony that the doctors who performed the autopsy had not seen the X rays since the night of the assassination. I also asked again about the photographs. This letter, dated April 26, 1966, is unanswered. When I wrote it I had not yet interviewed Specter, who told me the X rays had been unavailable.

And I wrote Dr. Humes, requesting clarification on several points and asking whether he knew where the photos and X rays were. He offered a terse no-comment. I wrote to Admiral Burkley, to whom Humes sent thirteen photographs, along with his supplementary autopsy, asking what he did with these photos and whether he knew where the photos and X rays were. He did not answer.

And I wrote a still unanswered letter to Sen. Robert Kennedy on May 5, 1966. Several of the lawyers on the commission staff whom I interviewed had told me they had heard that the photographs and possibly the X rays were not published at Robert Kennedy's request. The request is not in the record. Nor does the record indicate why the commission acceded to the request, if it was made, and why, if Kennedy merely opposed publication, the commission itself and the doctors and scientists who worked with the commission and the FBI were not permitted access to these documents. One can understand why the Kennedy family would not wish the photographs of the dead President widely reprinted, but why they would object to the publication, or even the examination, of X rays, which are as impersonal as IBM cards, is puzzling. I asked the Senator four questions:

(1) A member of the commission staff told me he had heard that you requested that the photographs not be included among the published exhibits. Did you also request that the X rays not be made public?

(2) When did you make this request, and are you willing that your request be made part of the public record?

(3) Was it also in consequence of your wishes that the commission and its staff apparently did not have these documents available for study?

(4) I understand perfectly your desire not to make a spectacle of President Kennedy by making the photographs generally available. But isn't there some way that responsible scholars can be permitted to examine them in order to silence what promises to be—if the assassination of Lincoln is any example—a century of harmful accusations?

Mr. Kennedy, of course, has been out of the country. It is hoped that with the publication of this article he will comment publicly on some of these matters.

Why the secrecy?

Sometimes it all seems like a weird joke. Here are twenty-six volumes on the assassination of the President, displaying a penchant for infinite detail which extends even to an exhibit showing a strand of Oswald's pubic hair. And yet, perhaps by some innocent oversight, the X rays and photos of the murdered President, the only material evidence on his wounds, the only hard and fast confirmation of the autopsy results, are somehow missing (though the X rays of Connally are published in the report, exhibit 681). Here is a report which explicitly tries to answer troublesome critics, taking great pains, for example, to demolish almost every individual point raised by Mark Lane during the time he was defending Oswald in theatres and lecture halls all over the world. And, yet, the one set of documents which could disarm the speculations of its most serious critics has seemingly disappeared.

There is, of course, the sinister explanation that the autopsy is false, as the appearance of the X rays and photos would demonstrate. If so, there can be little question that there was a second assassin; that the commission covered this up and either helped in or silently observed the fabrication of evidence which would point to Lee Harvey Oswald as the sole assassin. The exposure of such a conspiracy could not fail to discredit the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, the District Attorney of Philadelphia, and many, many other prominent people. I believe it would cause a major political crisis in this country.

Is there an innocent explanation? Let me suggest one in which government officials act like government officials and the Kennedy family acts like the Kennedy family, emphasizing that what follows is only a theory, to be proved or disproved by the publication of the pictures and X rays and an explanation of where they have been.

It is now fairly well known that President Kennedy suffered from Addison's disease or adrenal insufficiency. Theodore Sorenson is quite frank about that in his biography, Kennedy (Harper & Row). Explaining why Kennedy was so near death after his back operation in 1954, Sorenson writes: "The chief cause of his hospitalization and discomfort was his back; but the cause of his near death in the fall of 1954 was the shock of a spinal operation upon his inadequate adrenal system. . . . The effect of surgery on his adrenal shortage caused, as he had been told might happen, severe postoperative complications. Twice the last rites of the church were administered. Twice he fought his way back to life, as he had once before in the Pacific." As Sorenson makes clear, the development of adrenal hormones, in the last decade and a half, has almost completely eliminated the debilitating and eventually fatal effects which Addison's disease once visited upon sufferers. With "simple medication by mouth," as Kennedy liked to describe the dose of cortisone type drugs he took daily, the disease can be fully controlled, much as diabetes can now be controlled. So there is nothing about the disease to keep a man from being President. As Dr. Milton Helpern said to me: "I don't know if Kennedy had Addison's disease, but if he did, I think it would be a marvelous thing if sufferers knew that this unmistakably vigorous man, who was our President, also suffered from the ailment."

Still, the malady was a political embarrassment, and the Kennedys took pains to cover it up, or at least to avoid the public use of the ominous term, "Addison's disease." Though Sorenson is candid on the subject, a recent television series on Kennedy mentioned that the back operation in 1954 brought him to the edge of life, but failed to indicate why a back operation should have caused such peril. Occasionally rumors about Kennedy's health take a nasty turn, as when Rep. Walter Judd (a physician) commented disparagingly forty-eight hours before the election in 1960, on the "physical and mental health" of Addisonians. Or, as when Oswald's mother told writer Jean Stafford that her son may have been a mercy killer hired to put a President dying of "Atkinson's disease" out of his misery.

Conceivably, then, to avert low-minded speculation that Kennedy was a dying man when he was shot; to avert, in other words, on the occasion of his death, the kind of speculation about his health that he had tried to discourage during his life, Kennedy's family requested that several of the autopsy findings be kept a private matter. Such a request would explain a curious omission in the autopsy which has not yet received public comment: that the report contains no description of the adrenal glands. Nor is there any mention of the adrenal glands in the Supplementary Autopsy Report of December 6, 1963, though that report does contain the results of microscopic examination of the brain, heart, lungs, liver, spleen and kidneys. The omission of any mention of the adrenal glands in the post-mortem examination of a man with Addison's disease is incredible, according to Dr. Helpern and several other doctors. It is even possible (and this is my speculation, not that of the doctors) that the first bullet which passed harmlessly through Kennedy's neck would have caused a fatal adrenal crisis even if he had not been struck, fatally, in the head. Such a possibility must have been a matter of conjecture among the autopsy doctors, though the medical record does not reflect it.

As for the X rays: Dr. Austin J. McSweeney of the University of Wisconsin Medical School writes that in cases of "chronic adrenal insufficiency . . . an X ray of the abdomen may show calcium in the adrenal glands." When I pressed a radiologist, Dr. Sanford Bluestein, with my layman's questions, he estimated that X rays show calcium in about 40 per cent of the cases.

My theory, then, is that certain aspects of the autopsy dealing with the adrenal glands were excised at the request of members of the Kennedy family who did not wish the public or anyone to have the X rays or, for that matter, any material which would encourage speculations about the state of the President's health. The photographs were not released, as stated, for reasons of taste. If the family asked that this material be kept in the family, the Warren Commission might not have pressed to examine it.

Such a theory would clear up some other mysteries. It would explain, for example, why the autopsy report reproduced in the Warren Report is undated, a fact Epstein seizes as proof that the original observations of the autopsy doctors were altered. According to the theory we are offering, the autopsy was altered, or shortened, after the fact, though not for the sinister purposes Epstein suggests. Such a theory also might explain why Dr. Humes inserted a note in the record announcing that he had destroyed notes prepared immediately after the autopsy—a fact which Cook and Salandria stress to indicate the general dubiousness of the autopsy. Humes's action may simply have been that of a faintly guilty and thoroughly bureaucratic professional conscience. (Why Humes—who would be neck deep in guilt if the autopsy was falsified—should have taken pains to incriminate himself is something Cook and Salandria can probably explain.)

I will not pursue the theory further; the reader is probably testing it against notions of his own. But certainly everyone with an opinion on the Warren Report—those who, by and large, accept it, as I do, and those who seriously criticize it, can agree that the X rays and photos must now be made available for competent study and interpretation. If the Kennedy family—which probably has legal title to the documents—will not release them for publication, or even place them in the National Archives for the use of scholars, perhaps a committee of trusted scholars and doctors can be assembled to examine them. Sinister accusations have been made, and the longer these X rays and photos are hidden, the more credible these accusations will appear. If there is something sinister afoot, let us expose it. If there is not, let us silence these accusations and also inhibit what promises to be decades of dreary fantasizing.

THE BRASS PYRAMID

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Washington

Some people in Washington feel that the military has already begun its quiet coup of the civilian government. Retired colonels and generals climb into positions of authority and then hire their buddies for other important posts. The pyramid of ex-brass grows higher.

Officials in the American Federation of Government Employees, Air Force Lodge 1092 (representing 4,000 civilian employees in the Pentagon) recently estimated that there are 200,000 second-career military retirees on the federal payroll, many of them in top positions and all of them drawing double compensation from the government—that is, they are drawing most of their retirement pay as well as their regular salaries.

"The situation has reached such a magnitude as to constitute a real and genuine threat to continued civilian control of the federal government itself," said Charles J. Kenny, president of the Pentagon civilian group.

Significantly, the Civil Service Commission has refused to debate the issue, stating that the cost of determining how many retired brass are in Washington, and in what positions, would be prohibitive. It has admitted there are about 26,000 retired military men now holding civilian jobs in the Department of Defense alone.

The bitterness of the civilian government labor unions on this point (they claim the military "buddy system" of employment is ruining the chances for advancement to the better jobs) is so intense that periodically the military propagandists crank out a rebuttal. One, issued recently by Col. Benjamin B. Cassiday, Jr., secretary of the Air Staff, actually resulted in substantiating the charges. Speaking of the Pentagon's Air Force Headquarters only, he said that last year twenty-two retired military men were hired, out of 999 appointments, a measly 2.2 per cent of all the appointments.

Ah, yes. But where did these retirees wind up? Thirteen of the twenty-two moved into the six top-ranking government levels (GS-13 through GS-18). Four others were hired at the level of GS-12. This is equivalent to being drafted into the army at the rank of lieutenant colonel.

As for the years 1960 through 1964, when the ex-brass were supposedly really rolling into Washington, no statistics have been released despite repeated requests for such information from the unions.

The Dual-Compensation system was revamped in 1963 to permit military retirees to receive full pay for a civilian government job, plus the first $2,000 of their retirement pay and 50 per cent of the remainder. Thus a colonel who was earning $9,600 on Monday could retire on Tuesday, step into a GS-13 job and start earning $19,310—doing the same job, actually, that he was doing the day before. Legally, he should wait six months, but special dispensations are easy to come by.

The most notorious example of the bounty of the Dual Compensation Act was the appointment by President Johnson of Gen. William F. McKee, U.S. Air Force (ret.), to become administrator of the Federal Aviation Agency last year—a neat trick that took a special act of Congress, inasmuch as the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 specifically prohibited the appointment to this position of a person on either "the active or retired list of any regular component of the armed services."

Not only did Congress side-step that prohibition; it gave McKee a combined retirement pay-salary income of $38,404—the third highest pay check in Washington, just under the President and the Vice President, and considered by many a fine tribute to the growing prestige of the retired military in Washington.

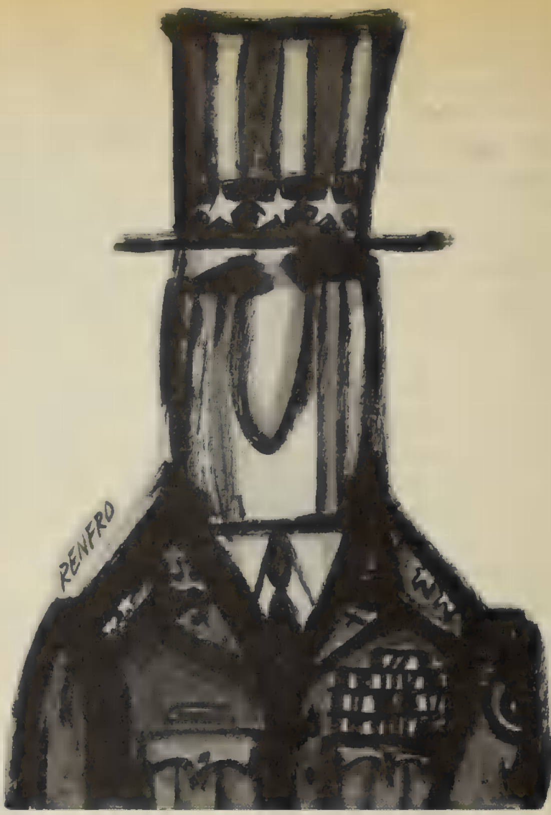
So much opposition to the Dual Compensation Act was voiced by the regular civilian civil service employees at its passage that a report of the first ten months of government operation thereafter was demanded by Congress. Even with the buddy system somewhat decelerated by this supervision, 645 ex-army officers with the rank of colonel and another 492 ex-majors were hired into the top civil service ranks.

This influx has aroused considerable skepticism about the Department of Defense's "civilianization program"—the conversion of 75,000 military jobs to 58,500 civilian jobs. Many civil service employees believe that this will turn out to be a huge hoax, with the military simply retiring into these 58,500 jobs at Dual Compensation pay, while the "militarization" of federal jobs will actually increase.

Morale is low at the Pentagon among civilian employees as a result of the promotion block. Recently the AFGE Lodge 1092 solicited comments and opinions from its 4,000 members as to their complaints about working conditions. The following comments are typical:

¶ "In my opinion, a 'retired military officer junta' is taking over the civil service system and control of most of our large federal government departments and agencies. The appointment of retired Admiral Raborn as head of CIA and retired Air Force General McKee as head of FAA are only two examples. There are tens of thousands of others. NASA and State Department, for instance, are loaded with twenty-year military retirees (colonels and generals who start their second careers at GS-14 and up, plus Dual Compensation privileges). The Civil Service Commission recently admitted that about 9,000 federal civil service jobs are being taken over each year by the retired military. I think the wholesale dumping of retired, overage, military deadwood into high-paying federal jobs is aging and warping our national policy-making processes. Who says it can't happen here? An American military junta is already becoming entrenched in Washington—ironically, with the help of the Civil Service Commission and the Dual Compensation Act."

¶ "Merit promotion in our directorate is a joke! Every time a career civilian transfers, retires or drops dead, particularly at the GS-12 level and up, the general sends over the name of a retired buddy of his as a suggested applicant. Almost always, the 'suggested applicant' gets preference over any other civilian. I have been a GS-11 for nine years."



¶ "I am a veteran of World War II now in civil service. I will have to wait until I am 62 years of age before I retire. All this time I will have to pay 6.5 per cent retirement deduction (before taxes) out of my pay. By contrast, my professional military buddies (I call them super-veterans) can retire after twenty years of military service at the age of 38 without contributing a red cent to the military retirement fund. I have seen as much military combat as nine out of ten of today's so-called professional soldiers. However, the military are allowed to quit at age 38 and enter a second-career civil service job without losing their pensions. I don't have this privilege even though I'm a veteran. No wonder the military retirement fund has an estimated deficit of $52 billion. When is Congress going to wake up?"

¶ "When is somebody going to expose the real reason for soaring defense costs? As a career civil service employee, I am tired of being the scapegoat for federal economy. In view of today's military payroll and fringe-benefit costs, I doubt if we can ever fight a major war again; we would go bankrupt the first year. The $10 billion annual costs for the Vietnamese small war illustrates what I mean. Military manpower costs are now consuming more than 60 per cent of the entire defense budget. The recent military pay raise of 10.6 per cent, plus promotion speed-ups, twenty-year retirements with no contribution, free medical care for military dependents, state income tax exemption, PX and commissary privileges, Dual Compensation in civil service jobs, etc., are making war a most lucrative profession."

The Federal Times also took a survey of civil service employees and found similar bitterness, with 66 per cent of the respondents claiming that a military buddy system exists, 34 per cent denying it. It added that "readers who denied that such is the case, were, almost to a man, retired military."

While John W. Macy, chairman of the U.S. Civil Service Commission, claims he can't find out how many ex-brass are running the civilian show in Washington, and Department of Defense officials claim only 2.2 per cent of their employees are ex-military, a survey conducted by the University of Michigan in 1961 showed that 12 per cent of the retiring military officers go into civilian positions with the federal government.

Two or 12 per cent, the point is that the ex-brass tend to concentrate in the upper brackets, and it is their concentration in these important posts that presents the real threat to government of, by and for civilians.

LETTERS (continued from page 34)

American Friends of the Middle East is a private, nonprofit organization supported by over 800 individuals, and by business concerns and other organizations of integrity which share and endorse AFME's goals and purposes.

AFME is dedicated to the proposition that American ideals and fundamental national interest require broad-based growth of friendship and understanding between the citizens of the United States and the peoples of the Middle East and North Africa. AFME's activities are solely and consciously directed to that end. We are against only those ideologies and self-serving elements which seek to undermine or negate this high purpose.

It is regrettable that a reputable publication would give credence to the discredited statements of two recognized—and self-admitted—lobbyists for foreign interests: I. L. Kenen and Bushrod Howard, Jr.

Earl Bunting

'journal de combat'?

Freeport, Me.

DEAR SIRS: Regarding your recent editorial on Encounter magazine [May 16], I wonder if you have read Conor Cruise O'Brien's recent collection of essays called Writers and Politics. He devotes one essay, "Journal de Combat" to Encounter. O'Brien supports your general view saying, among other things: "It seeks rather to carry the impression that its anti-Communist and pro-capitalist propaganda is not propaganda at all, but the spontaneous and almost uniform reaction of the culturally free, of truly civilized people."

Andrew Lillywell

dynamite

Flushing, N.Y.

DEAR SIRS: Just read Alexander Werth's "America's Colony in Hell" [The Nation, June 13]—a digest of Robert Guillain's series of five articles for Le Monde. It's tremendous in its impact of the truth about Vietnam—and it would shock the American people into needed action to stop this shameful war. . . . Practically none of the American people are aware of the facts mentioned—and yet these facts are dynamite. Can The Nation run an appeal for funds to get this article before the masses—at least before the readers of, say, The New York Times?

Leon Forer

'cultural freedom' and the CIA

New York City

DEAR SIRS: The charges and denials regarding the alleged involvement of the Congress for Cultural Freedom with the CIA and/or other agencies of our government recalled a story that I heard from two independent sources sometime in 1950, which my informants said had come from Richard Wright.

According to this story, Wright was to have been one of the speakers at the first Congress for Cultural Freedom. The speech contained a strong attack on racial bias in the United States, and an American "cultural" official in Paris tried hard to get Wright to tone down the attack. When Wright refused to do so the exasperated official pounded the table, shouting, "Who the hell do you think is paying for this Congress, anyway?"

Harry Grundfest

Lubove mistaken

Omaha, Neb.

DEAR SIRS: As a professional social worker, retired after almost forty years in public and private agencies, Roy Lubove's article, "Social Work and the Life of the Poor" [The Nation, May 23], strikes me as written primarily to startle. It is hardly an analysis based on facts. The way in which he makes social work the whipping boy for all the ills of our capitalistic society seems to be common among young anti-poverty workers who do not know the history and roots of social work, which presumably would not be true of Mr. Lubove. Nevertheless, here are a few facts he seems to have overlooked:

(1) There was so little professional social work prior to World War I that hardly any improvements in the condition of the poor were made. Nevertheless, stalwarts like Jane Addams, the Abbotts, Florence Kelley and others devoted their lives to achieving broad social measures such as child labor laws, workmen's compensation, mothers' pensions. Yet would Mr. Lubove have had these pioneers demand a basic family income, or guaranteed annual wage for all families, back in 1910? How could one infinitesimal group, no matter how concerned, have influenced legislators to pass laws fifty years ahead of their own thinking? . . .

(2) All the defects he attributes to social work were largely the defects of society as a whole. To castigate the young profession of social work for not having changed the economic structure of the United States is like a parent being angry with a baby for acting like a baby! Social work as a profession was barely in existence prior to 1920 and was little known to the general public before 1935. Private agencies were (are?) dominated by the local power structure of businessmen, not by social workers. Also, only a small percentage of counties in the United States had any kind of public welfare agency prior to 1935, other than elected officials who administered "poor relief" on a bare subsistence level. It should not be surprising, therefore, that private agencies were reluctant to turn over social welfare functions to government, which was likewise reluctant to perform them. . . .

(3) Most social workers have always been concerned about the low level of payments in public welfare. Many of us have worked hard over the years to get legislators to see the need for adequate financial aid, to remove residence requirements and other eligibility restrictions. It is the lawmakers and the general public which elects them who have made of public assistance the limiting, damaging kind of program it is in many counties. The result is that only a few really dedicated workers remain in public agencies. . . .

Dorothy Swisshelm

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Pablo Neruda: The Poet in New York

JOSE YGLESIAS

Mr. Yglesias is a novelist and essayist, and a translator of modern Spanish fiction.

The arrival of Pablo Neruda in New York for the PEN international congress, his first visit here in twenty-three years, seemed more evidence that the cold war is over. Neruda, unquestionably the finest poet in the Spanish language, is also unquestionably Communist in a way that few Communist artists are: he held elective office in Chile as a Communist, was forced into hiding and political exile in Mexico in the fifties, and during the McCarthy period addressed some of his most ambitious poems, among them "Let the Rail-Splitter Awake!" to the imperialist giant of the Americas. His presence here, as that of some other left-wing intellectuals, required a special visa dispensation from President Johnson, an act of which PEN was justifiably proud but about which its American president, Lewis Galantiere, so often boasted to Johnson's credit that it made some delegates restive. Apparently, they felt such dispensation should have been unnecessary. Neruda is used to the role of great poet and controversial figure, but when he walked on the stage of the 92nd Street YMHA for a poetry reading sponsored by PEN on the hot Saturday night before the congress opened, he was startled and moved by the standing ovation of the audience. Archibald MacLeish introduced Neruda as a great poet whose vision of what the Americas should be is the same as ours, however different our ways of attaining it may seem, and with every seat taken, standees spilling down the aisles and many other admirers in the lobby still hoping for a ticket, Neruda stood again while applause rained from an audience which ran the gamut from chic ladies of the literary and diplomatic communities to youngsters whose very manner of dress is a defiance of the Establishment. The head of the Poetry Center had told me that Neruda was not going to read any political poetry —"He feels that people may not know his real work because of his reputation"—and with this disparate audience at his feet there seemed little reason to fear he would rock the boat and prove her wrong.

The first International PEN Congress held in the United States in forty-two years met in June at New York University's Loeb Center. More than 500 delegates from over fifty PEN centers throughout the world addressed themselves to the theme of the congress, "The Writer as Independent Spirit," at four round-table sessions, following keynote speeches by Arthur Miller, president of International PEN, and Saul Bellow. U.S. PEN entertained the delegates at a piquenique sur l'eau—a boat ride around Manhattan, complete with basket supper, courtesy of the Brasserie—and with the brazenly American Annie Get Your Gun of Ethel Merman.

Back at the sessions, some of PEN's most valuable moments occurred as a result of the confrontation of cultures and ideologies of delegates from Communist, Latin American and Western countries. More important, delegates focused attention on the unfortunate isolation of the literature of certain countries.

A beginning is made here to present a glimpse of the rich quality of Latin American literature in the poetry and views of Pablo Neruda of Chile, reported by Jose Yglesias. Alan Cheuse reviews two important Brazilian novelists, translated from the Portuguese. Subsequent issues will cover the literature of additional South American countries.

Ivan Boldizsar furnishes a view of international congresses from the East. He will report on the current literary scene in Hungary in a future issue.

EDITOR

In slow but perfect English he thanked the audience and said that he had bought a copy of Walt Whitman on Fifth Avenue that day. "Oh how many times in the course of my life I have bought this book," he said, and then recited the opening lines of the seventh section of "The Song of the Exposition": "Away with themes of war! away with war itself!" And paraphrasing another line of that poem he added, subtly modifying MacLeish that, like Whitman, he loves all the works of reasoning men. He did not rock the boat, he cradled it, and in a way that was perhaps imperceptible to the Poetry Center, carried it a little further on the course he has traversed since the days when, as an already famous young poet in the consulate of Chile in Madrid, he was witness to the Fascist uprising.

Born in Parral, Chile, in 1904, Neruda began publishing poetry at the age of 15. A 1962 edition of collected works contains 1,832 pages of his poetry in small print. This does not include the volume Canción de gesta nor the four-volume Isla Negra published since then, and when I asked him, Neruda was not certain of the total number of poems he has published. It was inevitable that the fifteen poems on the program—read in English by translator-poets Clayton Eshleman, James Wright, Ben Belitt, H. R. Hays and Robert Bly—should neglect some of his themes and moods, but it ranged from the early volume of Residence On Earth, sensual and surrealist, to the second and third volumes of the same title dating from the thirties and early forties, personal and social visions of peoples and places: and included several poems from Canto General and Elemental Odes of the fifties, witty, sardonic, observant comments on such subjects as the United Fruit Co., Toussaint L'Ouverture and a pair of socks knitted for him by an Indian woman.

The audience would not let him go at the end of the program, so he brought two more poets—Selden Rodman and Alistair Reid—to read a translation each from a late volume entitled Estravagario, a book of uncharacteristically short poems, except for the final long poem "Autumn Testament." The title is a word Neruda invented: it suggests extravagances, vagaries, super-laziness, leisurely or wild road, a word which once invented seems necessary to the language. "You must read it," a Cuban poet said to me in 1960, after we had heard Neruda recite in Havana. "An intensely personal book. Think of it!—in his 50s Neruda breaks new ground, when we'd thought he had hardened into a political poet, a writer of public poetry."

The poem Alistair Reid translated from this book is called "Lazybones" and tells of the space ships which are traveling among the stars, how man will land on the moon and there set up pharmacies. In Chile the vines are maturing, Neruda says, and he describes the different wines they will produce. At home his woman has eyes the color of wild hazelnuts and at night she dresses in white and green. The one-line last stanza states quite simply, "I prefer my planet." A superb ending to the reading and it brought the audience to its feet again: the Cuban poet and the head of the Poetry Center were wrong.

The poem also paralleled his comments at the first round-table session of PEN devoted to the subject "The Writer in the Electronic Age," chaired by Marshall McLuhan. Neruda had been scheduled to participate, but when he arrived here, he protested that it was no subject for him. Some members of the Latin American delegations told me they thought that this was PEN's way of neutralizing Neruda, and the objections were finally solved by shifting him to the session on "The Writer As Public Figure" set for the last day of the congress. Nevertheless, he was called on at the first session and was quoted by the newspapers as saying that the first airplane he saw as a child seemed magical and beautiful, but that when he saw planes dropping bombs on Madrid he changed his mind about them.

ODE TO MY SOCKS

PABLO NERUDA

Maru Mori brought me a pair of socks
which she knitted herself with her sheep-herder's hands, two socks as soft
as rabbits.
I slipped my feet into them as though into two cases knitted with threads of twilight and goatskin.
Violent socks,
my feet were two fish made of wool,
two long sharks
seablue, shot through by one golden thread,
two immense blackbirds,
two cannons,
my feet
were honored in this way by these heavenly socks.
They were so handsome for the first time
my feet seemed to me
unacceptable,
like two decrepit
firemen, firemen unworthy of that woven fire,
of those glowing
socks.
Nevertheless
I resisted
the sharp temptation to save them somewhere, as students keep fireflies,
as learned men collect sacred texts,
I resisted
the mad impulse to put them in a golden cage and each day give them birdseed
and pieces of pink melon.
Like explorers
in the jungle who hand over the very rare green deer
to the spit, and eat it
with remorse,
I stretched out
my feet and pulled on
the magnificent socks and then my shoes.

The moral of my ode is this:
beauty is twice beauty and what is good is doubly good when it is a matter of two socks made of wool in winter.

Translated by ROBERT BLY

I asked him about this the next evening, following a private reading he gave to young poets in a modest apartment in the upper West Side, and he said that statement by itself made him sound naive. "I was also saying to this McLuhan that technology is something the poet must absorb and decide about," he said. "He must bend it to his purposes, not surrender to it."

He had been ill the morning of the private reading and had needed a doctor at his hotel room. The young poets, who knew that he was the lion of the congress—he never appeared anywhere without a dozen people importuning, photographers clicking and at least one young lady from Life taking down everything in shorthand—worried that he might be kept from his appointment with them. But in the early afternoon he showed up for an unscheduled round-table discussion of the problems of Latin American writers. When I asked him if he could keep his evening appointment with the poets, he was surprised that there could be any doubt: he had asked a young American poet to organize the evening, it was too close to his heart for him to miss.

"Sure, a great man like him isn't interested in just talking to the Establishment," one of the poets said when I reported back. That evening Neruda filled in the gaps of the Poetry Center reading: the love poems and the angry poems were represented, since he did not have to be guided by available translations, and he chose for the last the extraordinary "Autumn Testament."

After talking about his vocation, he says in this poem: "I have left my worldly goods/ to my Party and my people,/ and now it is time to talk of other things." There soon follows a passionate section to Matilde Urrutia, his wife, who is also the subject of 100 sonnets. She sat in the room watching him, as she does unobtrusively wherever he goes; sometimes she takes out a small camera from her purse and photographs him. When he recited, "My love is a crying child/ who does not want to leave your arms," she closed her eyes; and when he recited, "You are red and you are peppery,/ you are white and you are salty/ like pickled fish with onions," she laughed with everyone else.

"And now behind this page/ I shall go and not reappear. . . ." And the poem ends, "and then I shall grow again/ until I become so small one day/ that the wind will carry me away/ and I'll not know my name/ and I'll not be when I awake:/ Then I'll sing in silence."

But the young poets did not let him disappear: they took him down to Emilio's in the Village where there are tables with benches in the backyard and where the bill is manageable when shared. They took turns sitting across the table from Neruda, and he reminisced for them, for there is no Spanish or Latin American literary figure he has not known intimately: Nicolas Guillen, Cesar Vallejo, Federico Garcia Lorca, Vicente Aleixandre, Rafael Alberti.

I mentioned that I had met Aleixandre in Madrid last year, and that we had talked about him and about Miguel Hernandez, a Spanish Civil War poet whom Neruda had first encouraged and who died at 30 in a Franco prison.

"How is Vicente?" he asked.

"He is old and well," I said.

"Old?" Neruda said, and brought a hand to his heart. "A good old comrade, Vicente."

Someone asked him if he had seen To Die In Madrid. "No, I do not think I could bear it," he answered. "I saw so much with my own eyes, I could not see it again."

He has not been back to Madrid. "During the war they used to announce on the Fascist radio that I was on the list to be executed. I suppose I could go back now. . . ." After a pause he added, "I have been on ships that stopped at Spanish ports and went ashore, for the Spanish port police are the least like police I have known anywhere. But I have not been back in Madrid." He gazed away with those heavy-lidded eyes which on stage give him the air of being very grand, and looked unapproachably mournful.

Then, with a smile, "My apartment in Madrid was right where the University City began, and the Loyalist militiamen used to shoot at the Moors from my windows. During the years in consulates in the Far East I had collected Balinese and Burmese masks and the militiamen would put them on, stick their heads out the windows to frighten the Moors and then shoot!"

When his plate of celery and olives and a portion of spaghetti with garlic and olive oil arrived, he explained how much he loves garlic. "I think in your country it is not looked on with favor?"

Someone explained that one of the uglier epithets for Puerto Ricans is "garlic mouth." He translated it into Spanish for himself, and changed the subject. "Now, your celery cannot be matched," he said. "Nor does anyone serve it so nicely. Ours is all strings."

One of the poets asked if the Federico he had mentioned was Lorca. "We were very good friends," he nodded, "and there was no quarreling with Federico. I was the only one who was ever allowed to call him out of a rehearsal and it was about that that we once quarreled.

"Some of us were together at Pascual's Tavern on the Calle de la Luna—Pascual was very good to us and oh the things Pascual put up with from us! Everyone wanted Federico to join us. He was rehearsing Blood Wedding; and I was delegated to call him. Lorca was told there was a call for him from home and he came to answer thinking it had to do with his mother, who was old. So he berated me for frightening him that way and I became very angry at his thinking I would fool about such things. In any case, I was very angry and I hung up on him and went back to the bar.

"A little later, I am there drinking and someone taps me on the shoulder. I look back and there is Federico and I turn back quickly and take up my drink. Again, he taps me on the shoulder and this time he begins to take a handkerchief from his jacket pocket, in so strange a manner that I am forced to watch him. Slowly Federico unfolds it and places it neatly on the sawdust floor and then kneels on it before me! How can you quarrel with such a man!"

Neruda asked us if the I.W.W. still existed, and we told him no. "And yet in my country they had great influence," he said. "There are still some important trade union leaders who began as converts to the I.W.W. of your country." He leaned back, took a sip of his beer, and placed his hands happily on his stomach. In a deep voice, he imitated Paul Robeson: "I dreamed I saw Joe Hill last night. . . ."

"I try not to be sectarian or dogmatic," he said with a theatrical sigh, "but it is very difficult." And when I asked him if those intensely personal poems of Estravagario—with titles such as "Don't Ask Me," "Don't Mind Me"—were not politically inspired, he nodded readily. "They are about the Stalin period of course."

For the last PEN panel—"The Writer As Public Figure"—Neruda was seated between H. P. Tseng of Taiwan and Ignazio Silone of Italy. Silone's speech called for support for all who fight totalitarianism, equating the situation of Pasternak, Daniel, Siniavsky and of Polish, Hungarian, Czech and East German intellectuals with the Spanish university students and the anti-Nazi writers of Hitler's days. It was a standard Committee For Cultural Freedom speech and, in New York, sounded unprovocative.

When Neruda's turn came, he talked about finding both happy and unhappy writers in Socialist and capitalist countries, but more happy ones in the Socialist than in the capitalist countries. In passing, he said that Socialist countries are those countries which capitalist writers call totalitarian. "I had begun to think the cold war was over, but a colleague has awakened me from my dream."

The chairman, Douglas Young, insisted on telling Neruda that though he lived in England and Silone in Italy neither was a capitalist writer and, with the exception of Arthur Miller, all other panelists who followed also attacked Neruda's opening statement. Diffidently, in an even more imperturbable manner than before, Neruda explained that he had used the word capitalist in its ordinary sense and that they could give it whatever interpretation they preferred. I had heard him speak in that tone only once: in reading the final lines of "The Ship" to the young poets.

"The Ship" consists almost entirely of

FUNERAL IN THE EAST

PABLO NERUDA

I work at night, the city all around me, fishermen, and potters, and corpses being set afire among saffron and fruit, rolled in scarlet muslin:
those terrifying corpses go past under my balcony, making their chains and copper flutes give off noise,
they let off harsh and sharp and mournful whistles, among the brightness of the flowers that are heavy and poisoned, and the cries of the dancers covered with ashes,
and the constantly rising monotony of the drum,
and the smoke from the logs scented and burning.

For once past the corner, near the muddy river, their hearts, either stopping, or starting off at a greater speed, will roll over, burned, the leg and the foot turned to fire, and the fluttering ashes will settle down on the water,
and float like a branch of chalky flowers, or like an extinct fire left by travellers with such great powers they made something blaze up on the black waters, and bolted down a food no longer found, and one finishing drink.

Translated by ROBERT BLY

the anguished questions of people who arrive at a ship where all the places are taken: Why is there no place for us, they ask. "But we have already paid for our fares in this world/ why, then, don't you let us sit and eat?" If this is a sad joke, they say, end it quickly, talk seriously now, and the poem concludes: "Afterward the sea is hard/ and it rains blood." For those two last ominous lines, Neruda's voice had taken on that anticlimactic, diffident tone.

That PEN session caused much discussion and excitement among the delegates. The New York Times was to head its story; "Ideologies Stir PEN Delegates"; and Socialist delegates, consulted with Western colleagues during the lunch break on whether they should answer Silone from the floor. For one Eastern European delegate, to whom the term Communist means strictly a member of the Communist Party, it presented a tremendous diplomatic problem. "It is all right for Neruda to speak that way," he protested, "he's a Communist!"

At the end of the session, Neruda got up, apparently unaware of the stir he had caused, and began to shake hands as graciously as always with the people who rushed toward him. From the audience his wife walked toward the stage, and she too looked quite contained. She is a beautiful and elegant woman, but readers of his verse know that like him, she comes from the southern section of Chile, an area which he describes in a memoir as an impoverished frontier similar, it would seem, to the West of our cowboy films.

In one of his many sonnets to her, he writes: "You are from the poor South: where my soul comes from/ In its sky your mother still washes clothes/ with my mother. That is why I chose you, compañera."

At the bottom of the aisle, Mrs. Neruda took out her camera and focused it on the stage. She waited calmly until someone there stepped aside and Neruda came into view. Then she clicked the camera and put it away.

The View from the East

IVAN BOLDIZSAR

Mr. Boldizsar is deputy president of the Hungarian PEN Club and editor in chief of The New Hungarian Quarterly, an English-language journal published in Budapest. He is a novelist and a dramatist and has translated into Hungarian works by Kafka, Huxley and Mauriac, among others.

I started writing this article at the beginning of February, and I am completing it in June, about the series of international meetings I have attended during the past eighteen months. The attraction, characteristics, significance and success of each of them was due to the fact that they were attended by intellectuals from both the Eastern and Western halves of Europe, as well as from the United States, Latin America, Asia and Africa, and even, at the PEN conferences, from as far afield as Australia.

But I am straightaway pulled up by that much abused word "intellectual." In all the languages known to me the word has a variety of meanings—sometimes with unpleasant overtones. In America, when they call intellectuals "egg heads," it is with a combination of irony and respect. "Intellectual" in English has a more restricted meaning than the Hungarian word értelmiségi. Our word includes not only those the English call intellectuals but also professional people—everyone who makes a living out of professional work of any kind, indeed all "white collar" workers.

Nonetheless, I use intellectuals in the more restricted sense of the word —in both Hungarian and English—to describe the people who assembled at these international meetings. They are men and women who—embracing this or that ideological outlook, belonging to this or the other philosophical persuasion, or professing eclecticism—are in any case humanists. They guard their intellectual independence, insist on seeing both sides of any case, look for no exclusive panacea; they believe with Voltaire that though they may fight what you say, they will fight to the death for your right to say it. This intellectual independence, this careful examination of both sides of every case, and this respect for the opponent's point of view do not, in my modest opinion, prevent them from throwing their weight behind the struggle for a given cause—and, if need be, risking and sacrificing their lives not only in the metaphorical sense but in the very real, physical sense of the word.

I thought this little excursion into semantics necessary not only because it provides an appropriate basis for the notes and conclusions which follow, but also because some readers might join with some Western participants in believing that the broad definition of an intellectual I have given is all very well in the West, but cannot be applied to the more or less

"What prompted the papal silence which has cast such a shadow across the memory of Pius XII?

"The author of this valuable book . . . shows that the Vatican was clearly informed from the very beginning . . . about the barbarous German murder of the Jews . . . and that the Pope made a deliberate decision against speaking out on this unparalleled atrocity . . . Friedländer's outlook is far removed from the militant anti-clericalism which has marred so much non-Catholic work dealing with Pius XII . . . Extremely interesting."
— KLAUS EPSTEIN, Boston Pilot

"Astonishing documentation."
— Look

"Exciting reading about tragic events and dilemmas at the zero hour of European history."
— HANS KOHN,
University of Pennsylvania

PIUS XII AND THE THIRD REICH

A Documentation
by SAUL FRIEDLÄNDER

Includes recently uncovered secret telegrams between the Vatican and the Wilhelmstrasse, British and American diplomatic papers, public and private statements by Pius XII, by two of his successors, by the Chief Rabbi of Palestine, and by Hitler, Colonel Gerstein, Myron Taylor, and many others closely involved. Translated from the French and German by Charles Fullman.

$5.95 • now at better bookstores

ALFRED · A · KNOPF

official delegates from the East. Fortunately, it has become abundantly clear, from recent international meetings, that my attempt at a definition of the intellectual does apply equally well to the intellectuals of the Eastern Socialist countries. That among the latter there are more who could be called committed intellectuals, to widen Sartre's expression, is not all the result of political pressure but the consequence of several hundred years of social and historical development. In Hungary, just as in Poland or Czechoslovakia, centuries of foreign oppression and subjugation gave the intellectuals a greater and more active role in public life, in patriotic movements and on the international stage than in, say, England or France.

I have said all this a number of times at the international gatherings I have attended. The first of these took place in Budapest in October, 1964, under PEN auspices: its theme was "Tradition and Innovation in Literature." For many years, International PEN Congresses had been scenes of cold-war skirmishes, with Hungary in the direct line of fire. An English writer, trying to sound out contrary points of view, standing in a corridor of the Academy of Sciences in Budapest overlooking the Danube, said: "You know if anybody had told me seven years ago that PEN would today be holding its executive meeting in Budapest and arranging round-table discussions to follow with numerous participants from East and West, and with Soviet writers present as observers, I should have stared at him and run for the nearest psychiatrist."

The best thing about the Budapest round table was that it remained round; no one tried to make it square with anything else, either unduly in favor of tradition or innovation. The second PEN meeting was the 1965 annual congress in Bled, Yugoslavia, with the complex theme of "The Writer and Modern Society," with the innovation of real round tables in the first sense of the words, a rather refreshing change for an international conference. For here were the Eastern and Western and the Northern and Southern partners in the debate arguing, clashing, picking quarrels and making them up, agreeing and disagreeing, scoffing at one another, sympathizing with complete ease, as if they had been friends sitting around café tables and shouting at one another for years. No one kept minutes of what went on, the press was only there insofar as they were writers or in their private capacity, and no one had the feeling that he was making a public statement, or wondered about the possible reactions of his worst enemy—or best friend—at home. We all found ourselves saying on the third day that though of course we were, every one of us, staunch defenders of proceedings in public in all other matters, our honest and fruitful exchanges had been possible only because we didn't have to bother about readers, publishers and newspapers.

> It is natural that PEN's reason for existence would seem completely bound up with its defense of the writer's right to express himself and to publish. When in the Fifties, American writers were being hounded by government committees and blacklisted, forced to write under pseudonyms or barred outright from movies and television and in some cases from publishing; when Portuguese writers are arrested, when Soviet writers are tried for the political implications of their work and sent to jail for long terms, the duty of PEN is clear and unavoidable. When Yiddish literature in the Soviet Union is not permitted the same publishing accommodations as other literatures; when the language of Catalonia is suppressed in Spain—these and unfortunately many other suppressive actions cry out for PEN's protests. But as important as this function is, it is not or ought not be PEN's sole reason for existence.
>
> —Arthur Miller

There was no chairman at any of the tables; it was merely that the conversation tended to gravitate around some person who had an equal command of English and French, and so could channel the discussion.

The informal café atmosphere did not get under way at once. On the first day we all sat rather stiffly around the tables. Tell a man to talk freely, and he dries up. One of the subjects on the first day was the writer's responsibility. The tongue-tied silence was resolved by an Italian writer—we all promised not to mention names. "What if we talked, instead, of the writer's irresponsibility," he suggested. I urged him to begin. He made a witty and animated case for the argument that the writer had no responsibility to anybody except . . . and in ten minutes' time, because he was a very good writer, because he had to draw the positive from the negative, because he couldn't help himself, there he was, nicely involved with the writer's responsibility.

The first day had as official subjects for discussion on the agenda: Was literature more or less important today than it had been in the past? Had the writer's responsibility and role in society increased or decreased? To the first question all five tables gave the same answer: more important. On the second point, it was agreed that the importance of the individual writer had diminished, but that of literature as a whole had increased in stature. I had better leave Douglas Young to clarify this; the subject is a somewhat delicate one and liable to bring a hornet's nest about one's ears. "It has been stated that in some countries the writer enjoys complete freedom. This complete freedom at the same time decreases the writer's influence upon the readers." What on earth does that mean? I happened to sit at the table where the statement was discussed, and I joined in. An American author, the editor of a magazine with a mass circulation, said at the height of the battle about freedom that though it was true that there was nothing which could not be said in his paper, including the opposite, nobody cared. He would willingly give the half of his kingdom if he and his paper could enjoy the attention society commonly gave to similar writers and journals in some East European countries.

The second meeting in 1965 was held in Vienna, the seventh in a consecutive annual series bearing the name of Europa-Gesprach; but it only became truly European in that year. It was the first time that the Russians, Poles, Czechs, Yugoslavs and Hungarians were also invited.

It all got off to a bad start, with a lot of boredom and some irritation. Avalanches of speechifying. Gentlemen, the Mayor. Gentlemen, the President of the Republic as former mayor. Gentlemen, the deputy mayor in charge of cultural affairs. I slip out before the fourth speaker begins. I am enticed back by Mozart. Following the speeches a string quartet; after all, we are in Vienna. The Europa conversation is opened by an American. Not just any American, but one of the most interesting and controversial figures of the postwar years: George F. Kennan, described in the program as "Botschafter und Prof."—"Ambassador and Prof." But for the last two years he has been ambassador neither in Moscow, nor in Belgrade, nor in New Delhi, but only a professor at Princeton. That rising of the hackles is produced by a chill reminiscence of the dead days of the cold war; why must a European conversation begin with an American lecture?

Is it perhaps because the Vienna hosts wanted to have a big and "impressive" name? Maybe; but chiefly to stress how far we have come from the cold currents and icy seas of the cold war. How come? Who? Just now, with things as they are in Vietnam? The Vienna conversation has also proved very instructive from this point of view. The Austrians had invited, as they said, "the world of European intellectuals through their representatives."

It turned out that they had invited none but humanists, Center and left of Center, from England, France, Switzerland, Norway, the German Federal Republic and Holland. It seems that the word intellectual is beginning to mean the same thing in both halves of Europe.

This is the "we" who have come a long way from the cold war. This first person plural includes the West European partners of the conversation, and they too write we, meaning the Polish Adam Schaff, the Czech Hajek, Prof. Ota Sik, the "Kafka expert" Goldstücker, the Yugoslav Supek and, I hope, myself as well. It is worth paying a little attention to Vienna because it has given eyewitness proof of how far Western intellectuals have come from the cold war.

Kennan's striking language was a faithful reflection of his thoughts. The ideologist of the first phase of the cold war—with practical experience of the theory of "containment," taking his point of departure from philosophical and political coordinates different from ours—made out a nice case for the necessity, indeed inevitability, of coexistence. Backed by solid arguments and in the restrained language befitting a professor, he took a stand against the armaments race and the nuclear policy, pointing out the dangers of nationalism in European (and not only European) thinking, and finally, with a cautious show of patriotism, declared that he would not like to see his country continue to play the part of "the guarantor of European security."

Isn't this Viennese picture a bit too seductive? True, Kennan, as I said, is no longer in a position of power. Obviously it is because he thinks as he does. But this does not lessen the fact that his stand is symptomatic. Kennan and the best part of the participants in the Vienna conversation, as well as those whom they were representing (without credentials it is true, but not without approval) a few years ago were committed to the same position as is officialdom today. This is true of all questions concerning the cold war, nationalism, nuclear superiority, disarmament, and the leading role of the United States. That something had changed in Western thinking in the relationship of the intellectuals and politics had already been indicated by Kennedy's policy, and above all by his attitude. The Vienna conversation testified that this change in the attitudes of the best minds in the West had deeper roots and was more decided than we in the East would have thought, judged by Western political symptoms.

On the second day of the Vienna conversation the Prague professor, Eduard Goldstücker, told me before the session: "I shall begin my talk on Kafka tonight by asking what they mean by the title of the conversation: 'Bridges Between East and West.' Prague is 80 miles west of Vienna."

Goldstücker could not raise the question that day because someone had already done so. It was Kogon, also Eduard, who lectures on sociology in Frankfurt am Main and is the editor of the Frankfurter Hefte. He asked the same question from the chair in the afternoon session, and he too cited Prague.

Professor Kogon, the director of the Vienna conversation and the chairman of most of its sessions, is a Catholic who opposed the Nazis and spent years in a concentration camp. When liberated he wrote a book, the first of its kind, about the concentration camps, The SS-State. The book, including pocket editions, has sold millions of copies, and teachers in some German schools use it as a textbook. Kogon became hostile to the "East" by the successive waves of the cold war and the long delay in the ebb of Stalinism. The Vienna conversation demonstrated the process by which people like Kogon find their way back to their original position and resume the dialogue left off fifteen years ago. Incidentally, one of the dangers of the Vietnamese adventure is that it creates divisions where they shouldn't be and puts the clock back.

The conversation introduced another type of person, also in the chair. Kogon was occasionally replaced by a certain Herr Czernetz, an Austrian Social Democratic deputy, who was very regrettably bent on exacerbating the differences between East and West and kept dredging up ten- to fifteen-year-old arguments. I imagine it was not quite what he intended, but he certainly played the role of the negative catalyst in the experiment. Participants from abroad naturally received his strictures with icy disapproval, or argued with him, put him right on a number of points, those from Western Europe quite frequently undertaking the task instead of ourselves; on the second day the audience booed him, and from that day on he was not seen again on the rostrum, nicknamed by our witty writers the "altar."

Jiri Hajek, editor of the journal Plamen (published in Prague), read a very elegantly written contribution with the title, "The Specific Mission of Writers." He was described as "Prof. Hajek" in the program, but for simplicity's sake the organizers promoted all and sundry to "Doctors" and conferred professorships indiscriminately as the waiters used to do in Budapest cafés, and the Italian waiters do today. The task of literature, he said, is not to cheer people up in and out of season but exclusively to explore the human condition of the age we live in. The Dutch idealist Staellert and the Marxist Hajek read prepared texts, but somehow they seemed to have agreed beforehand to make the same points. According to Hajek, good literature seeks the truth in both halves of our divided world, and by doing so makes the world less divided: "Good writing in both parts of the divided world has this further trait in common: it reveals the tragic in the human condition of our age in all its fullness." True enough, each side offers diametrically opposed interpretations of the tragic: the humanist "Right," to borrow the phrase of the Polish philosopher Lesek Kolakowski, holds that the tragedy inherent in this situation is unalterable. The humanist "Left" sees a rational way out in socialism, and that progress along

How You Can Get Any 3 of these 21

BEST SELLERS: $1 EACH

Check Your 3 Choices — Save up to $43

		LIST
☐	STORY OF O — PAULINE REAGE	$ 6.00
☐	GAMES PEOPLE PLAY — ERIC BERNE. M.D.	5.00
☐	THE OLYMPIA READER — MAURICE GIRODIAS, ED.	12.50
☐	ORIGINS: THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF WORDS — ERIC PARTRIDGE	16.00
☐	THE WORKS OF MARQUIS DE SADE (Complete Justine, Philosophy in the Bedroom)	15.00
☐	ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE GREAT QUOTATIONS — GEORGE SELDES	15.00
☐	THE CRADLE OF EROTICA — EDWARDES & MASTERS	9.50
☐	UNDERSTANDING MEDIA — MARSHALL McLUHAN	7.50
☐	PERVERSE CRIMES IN HISTORY — MASTERS & LEA	9.50
☐	THE GINGER MAN — J. P. DONLEAVY	5.75
☐	PROSTITUTION AND MORALITY — BENJAMIN & MASTERS	12.50
☐	MANCHILD IN THE PROMISED LAND — CLAUDE BROWN	5.95
☐	A CLASSICAL DICTIONARY OF THE VULGAR TONGUE — GROSE	7.95
☐	THE COMMENTARY READER — NORMAN PODHORETZ, ED.	12.50
☐	LOVE AND ORGASM — ALEXANDER LOWEN, M.D.	7.95
☐	MASTER POEMS OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE — OSCAR WILLIAMS, ED.	10.00
☐	NOVA EXPRESS — WILLIAM S. BURROUGHS	5.00
☐	AGAINST INTERPRETATION — SUSAN SONTAG	4.95
☐	LBJ — MICHAEL DAVIE	2.95
☐	THE DEMONS (2 vols.) — HEIMITO VON DODERER	13.50
☐	LSD: THE CONSCIOUSNESS-EXPANDING DRUG — SOLOMON & LEARY	5.95

Check 3 books wanted and mail with your name and address to The Mid-Century Book Society, 5 East 44th Street, N.Y., N.Y. 10017. Only obligation is to buy three additional books in the next 12 months, at reduced member's prices, from the many to be offered. Invoice for $3 plus handling will accompany books. NA-13 this road will recognize and overcome at least the social cause of the tragic.

In the course of further debates the most exciting—in the political, more cinematic, sense of the word—was the Munich publisher Kindler's Ehrenburg affair, or rather scandal; in the literary field, Goldstücker's Kafka analysis; in philosophy, Adam Schaff and O. Flechtheim's debate on ideological coexistence; and in human terms, the lecture by the Czech Prof. Ota Sik.

At first I was puzzled to account for the presence of Kindler, then owner and publisher of the West German mass-circulation picture magazine Revue. He has since sold it. He told us what had happened to him because he had published Ehrenburg's memoirs. First he was called a traitor to his country. Next a statement was forged in Liechtenstein, purporting to have been written and signed by him, and it was sent to his business partners. His family and children were threatened. He was called a Moscow agent. A paper published a statement by someone who declared he knew Kindler was a homosexual. Another said that he was given to raping young girls. Both said he was syphilitic. So far all this is more humorous than tragic. The really alarming thing was to follow. The day after the publication of the memoirs, a Saturday in October, after all the shops in the big cities and university towns in West Germany had closed, the windows of all the booksellers in which copies of Ehrenburg's memoirs were displayed were pasted with placards saying: "Paid Agent of the Jews! Traducer of the People!" Since that day—one and a half years ago—not more than 120 copies of the book have been sold in the whole of West Germany.

Kindler was followed by Goldstücker who told us that Kafka was first published in Nazi Germany in 1934, with a band round it reading "Only for Jews". . . . That was not the main point of his lecture, but the process by which, thanks in the first place to Goldstücker's own personal efforts, Kafka was—to use his own phrase—demilitarized, a phrase I think I first heard used by Sartre at the 1963 World Conference on Disarmament.

I began with a PEN meeting, and finish with another, the June meeting in New York. It was a good and interesting congress, sometimes even important, but the really important feature of it was neither literary nor intellectual; it was geographical. I use this word here as a euphemism for "political." Why? Was it a political Congress? Not at all. It was less so than it could have been; less than some feared it might become.

I don't intend to be more political than the congress was: the war in Vietnam was mentioned only on the last day and very casually. But for many delegates from Europe, Asia, Africa and Latin America, the outstanding fact was that they could come to the United States at this time—despite the war. This was a job well done by the American PEN Center.

The great attraction was also geographical: New York itself. One needed quite an amount of discipline and literary self-sacrifice to attend the meetings instead of discovering New York, north and south of Washington Square. Some did not go further and I wonder how many personal notes, diaries, poems and TV chats will identify New York with the microcosmos in and around that fountain in the Square. On the other hand, the bearded and long-haired Lilliputs may have discovered that some literary Gullivers are surprisingly "cool."

This word should lead me to another microcosmos, that of Marshall McLuhan, who uses cool and hot as part of the terminology of the post-Gutenberg age. Much of the discussion of the meeting revolved around McLuhan's concept. But let me say first that the greatest merit of the Thirty-fourth PEN Congress was what it did not become: either a review of the Siniavsky-Daniel trial or an indictment of the absence of Soviet observers. This creates the possibility that the next PEN meeting will be attended by Soviet writers. The congress was a place where one could speak with a human voice.

These were the words of Arthur Miller in his closing remarks. He performed superbly as international president in the closed session of the executive committee and in public debate. Like one of his major characters in his best plays, he proved his dramatic talent by consistently finding the adequate words for all situations. His closing remarks were a sort of keynote address for future PEN congresses but I could use it also as a motto for this paper on East-West meetings of intellectuals: "You and I should emphasize what is similar and isolate what separates us." I don't think that is the solution, but it is the road to it.

The beginning of understanding is information. Eastern writers read their Western colleagues, but very few Western authors' knowledge goes beyond Solzhenitsyn, Yevtushenko, Voznesensky. Paustovsky, maybe. I have become accustomed to the encouraging smiles I receive (to me hateful) when I state that there is a literature in Hungary. "Go on, chap. The ancient Peruvian civilization was also very interesting." All of the writers of Eastern Europe, for instance, knew Saul Bellow and read his novels (and not only Herzog), and were therefore astonished at the anger in his keynote speech against the "literati." I felt a certain uneasiness; I had heard the same superiority and irony, sometimes even the same arguments, against intellectuals in my country in the early fifties. These were uttered by spokesmen very, very different from that distinguished American author. The arguments tried also to separate the writer from the environment of intellectuals and thus place him on an elevated podium above the multitudes. Do I need to add that I like Bellow's novels very much and that I am more than sure that he did not intend to echo the literary debates taking place in the early fifties far away in Eastern Europe? But I still do not understand his anger. He should have attended the round tables and participated in the corridor small talk to learn about his colleagues and to experience the good atmosphere of the common language of writers and "literati" intellectuals.

> What do these intellectuals do with literature? Why, they talk about it, they treasure it, they adorn themselves with it, they make careers of it, they become an elite of it, they make discourse of it. It is their capital, their material. They take from it what they need for their own work in culture history, journalism or criticism of manners, producing hybrid works, partly literary, sometimes interesting in themselves but postulating almost always the decadence or obsolescence of contemporary literature. . . . They seem to have it both ways. On the one hand they share the distaste of the modern classic writers for western civilization, they are repelled by the effrontery of power and the degradation of the urban crowd. They have adopted the Wasteland outlook. On the other hand they are very well off. They have money, position, privileges, power, private schools for their children, elegant dental care, jet holidays in Europe, stocks, bonds, houses, even yachts and with all this, owing to their education, they have a particular sympathy with the heroic artistic life, they have tastes and judgments formed by Rimbaud and D. H. Lawrence. What could be neater.
>
> —Saul Bellow

This congress discovered another need for a dialogue—not only between East and West but between North and South. Discussing one of the themes of the congress, "The Writer as Public Figure," delegates from Western Europe and North America heard the same points of view expressed by writers of Peru and Poland, Uruguay and Hungary. In a word: literature and national existence—sometimes even literature and survival—are as inextricably interwoven in our distant Eastern and Southern countries as literature and politics are separated in the West and North.

The principal theme of the congress was almost left undiscussed, perhaps because every writer is an independent spirit, or he is no writer. It was very good that we did not debate the question of the degree of independence enjoyed by the so-called independent writer.

The real theme of the round tables was not that suggested by the program but what the writers of East, West, North and South felt they should discuss: the writers' position in our new electronic, nuclear age, in the world of mass media, in confrontation with science fiction, and in the duel between fiction and documentary. The doomsday prophecies of Marshall McLuhan, though passionately rejected, were also passionately considered. There was general agreement that electronics may create a new environment but cannot replace the written and printed word. Nor can it supplant the creative force of the writer whose raw materials were, are and will be the reality and the dreams.

Brazilian Diamonds

BARREN LIVES (Vidas Sêcas). By Graciliano Ramos. Translated by Ralph Edward Dimmick. University of Texas Press. 131 pp. $4.75.

SAGARANA. By Joao Guimaraes Rosa. Translated by Harriet de Onis. Alfred A. Knopf. 303 pp. $5.95.

ALAN CHEUSE

Mr. Cheuse, formerly an editor of Studies on the Left, now lives in Mexico.

Like those diamonds that are washed up along the river banks of their Brazilian homeland and left to sparkle only under their native sun, these collections of short fiction might have remained unknown to readers of English, but for the efforts of their partisan translators. Ramos' book was first published in 1938, Guimaraes Rosa's in 1946. Their appearance now in English finds both writers still unfamiliar to most North American readers. Their genre, the "cycle" or group of tales linked by mutual characters or setting is more recognizable. Barren Lives has a yanqui cousin in Winesburg, Ohio. The landscape of Sagarana is as lovely, dark and deep as Faulkner's woods—another Eden. But in ways more crucial than technique or setting, these works prove telling and meaningful for Americans.

The Ramos volume, slimmer of the pair, is composed of thirteen short sequences, all taking place within the course of a single year, in the life of a wretched backlands peasant family. Ramos, later a Communist and, still later, a minister in the Fascist Vargas government, found politics for his protest. Luckily, he wrote and published this evidence of his outrage before he was tempted to trim Barren Lives to any party pattern.

Nomads in a land of drought, the family of Barren Lives squats on a temporarily abandoned farm. The father, Fabiano, is a herdsman hired to work for the always offstage owner of the farm. Vitoria, the mother, tends to her meager household; the boys play with the animals; the dog hunts and sleeps; on feast day they visit a town. Even their speech is barren. Forced to kill their parrot for food, Vitoria > justified the act by telling herself that the bird was quite useless—it didn't talk. That wasn't its fault. The family was one of few words and with the coming of the disaster [the drought] all had fallen silent, only the briefest utterances passing their lips.

Rather than the fierce, bullying, superstitious, partisan country dwellers one meets in Verga or Silone, Fabiano and Vitoria are dispirited and more recognizably related to the poor of our ghettos and farms. The unseen owner is given bitter homage, as from sharecropper to overseer. Illiterate Fabiano cannot protest the scrawls that rob him of his rightful pay. He and his wife sleep on knotty tree boughs for lack of better bedding. They see themselves "as a pair of useless dogs." Fabiano knows what happens to useless dogs: he shoots their own sick beast.

The only mystique in these lives is the arrival of the next drought. Time is the wind to their eroded existence: this debilitating ignorance reinforces itself daily. Their one hope is that the boys will learn to read, like Tomàs the miller, their ex-neighbor, who died in the flight from the drought. (From scene to scene the memory of Tomàs is a link, one of the few recurring images that give the book its novel-like effect). But the mother admires Tomàs the miller not for his knowledge but really for his bed > made by a carpenter, with a frame of sucupira wood, smoothed with an adze, the dovetails cut out with a chisel, and neatly fitted together, the frame covered by rawhide, well stretched and nailed down. That was a bed on which a Christian could stretch his bones!

Flights of birds signal the approach of another drought season. Last trek they killed their parrot. Now they move on without their dog. Kernels of memory—of the dog, of the parrot, of Tomàs the miller—lie scattered in their wake. From the soul's dust bowl, from the heart of dryness, rises a singular lament.

To combat the withering effect of despair, Ramos offers a few sips of water. Guimaraes Rosa gives us steak and rice, fancy cakes and ices, plus the liquor of his language. Dogs useless? Never! Bushes, bugs, rocks, trees, lakes are demonstrations, emulations, echoes, simulations, mocks or props of the themes and byplay of his epic of ambiente: Man or animal, bee or palm tree, one finds one's function as one's fate. And until we have gone through nature's educative cycle, until we are sure in whose zoo we are kept, by institutions or our own slack wills or both, we should pay hard attention to the beasts of the field, fish, fowl, snake or marmot.

Nine novellas make up this story "cycle." The first, "The Little Dust-Brown Donkey," introduces the beast, Seven of Diamonds, who participates in a cattle roundup marred by a fatal flash flood. Cool, self-contained creature that he is—"seeking himself out, discovering himself, finding some essence of his being"—Seven of Diamonds saves two out of many herdsmen, carrying one unconscious man on his back through the rising waters while another clings to his tail. This is not donkey ex machina. It's Existentialism, Brazilian style. Because of the animal's durability, man is saved; to push the word play, saved by this tale, a blend of the pastoral and a fated encounter with nature's flood force.

Animals play a role, as reflectors of the action, in "The Return of the Prodigal Husband." Lalino Salathiel sells his wife to a covetous Spanish immigrant and goes off to find his fortune. The action is mirrored in an ironic side show in the swamp nearby where > . . . the king of all the frogs . . . was dying and discussing his last will and testament with all the low-life frogs. . . .

>
> "When I die, who will take care of my children?"
>
> "Not me. . . . Not me. . . . Not me. . . ."
>
> "When I die, who will take care of my wife?"
>
> "Me! Me! Me! Me!"

In the gently ironic love story, "Mine

FREE! With every new subscription to

THE NATION

BROTHERS UNDER THE SKIN

by Carey McWilliams, Editor, The Nation, 365 pp.

When BROTHERS UNDER THE SKIN was first issued (April 21, 1943), it evoked this comment from Oswald Garrison Villard in the Saturday Review:

> "Mr. McWilliams has rendered a very great public service in producing this volume, which is worth any twenty of the wartime books dealing with other phases of the national problem forced upon our attention by the crisis in our national life."

■ ■ ■

Now, twenty-three years and many editions later, BROTHERS UNDER THE SKIN has been issued with a lengthy, new introduction assessing civil rights developments from 1943 to the present time.

The new edition drew this comment from William Hogan, Book Editor of the San Francisco Chronicle: "A classic study of American race relations."

• • •

For your FREE copy of BROTHERS UNDER THE SKIN, fill out the subscription coupon below, and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest weekly journal of opinion—a truly independent, critical weekly—which since July 6, 1865, has been in the forefront of the fight for civil rights.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of BROTHERS UNDER THE SKIN.

☐ One year, $10 ☐ Two years, $18

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

CITY .... STATE .... ZIP No. ....

7-11-66

Own People," a standard for love is glimpsed in the relationship between a mare and her colt:

> . . . the newborn colt, still so long-legged, comes leaping behind her, eager to nurse. As it buries its muzzle under its mother's belly and thighs, its whole body is a long-drawn-out greediness. The mare waits. Nobody knew how to give with greater dignity.

To bird song Guimaraes Rosa adds lyrics. The grackles in "The Straw-Spinners" caw as they steal seeds from an imaginary planter: "You put them in, put them in / I pull them out, pull them out."

Guimaraes Rosa treats the natural world as if he were constantly in a state of receiving new vision. Sometimes he makes Whitman-like catalogues of landscape; when describing the bunched horns of corraled cattle (". . . the arms of a cross, the barbs of an anchor, the holders of a candelabrum, the forked limbs of a dead tree, the pincers of a crab, the insignia of Satan, lyres without strings. . . .") the effect is that of catching the inner- and overtones of the material world.

> We ride. We ascend. We go higher Now a steady slope up the long ridge of the sierra, scaling the summit. And suddenly the world becomes clearer: the ascent has ended and we are in amazing altitudes.

Describing a ride to a ranch in the mountains of Minas Gerais, Guimaraes Rosa might be telling how his language works upon his matter.

We are carried to amazing heights of invention, where amazing things take place. In the tale before last, "Conversation Among Oxen," animals do more than speak. As in the first piece, they act as agents of fate. How young Tiao, a cart boy, aided by a team of disgruntled oxen, revenges himself on the carter, Agenor Soronho, for cuckolding his dead father, is a triumph for beast and boy. The story is a mixture of folk materials, imported philosophies and a deep dredging of human and animal psychology; it is the peak of the man's work, and a masterpiece.

During the trip from town to graveyard, while the father's corpse lies on top of a load of brown sugar, a moment of karma-like beauty is achieved. The oxen are enraged by the carter Soronho's goad. They plot rebellion. Their consciousness and that of Tiao, walking alongside the cart almost in a trance, fuse:

> . . . I am the ox Dansador. . . . But there is no ox Dansador. . . . There is not the-one-who-has-a-big-head-and-a-hump-on-his-back. . . . I > am the strongest of all. . . . There are no oxen, no man. . . . We are strong. I am very strong. . . . I can strike at all sides. I strike at Mr. Soronho with a halter rope, a quince switch, a goad . . . until I draw blood. . . . And I become even stronger. . . . I am Tiao . . . Tiaozinho. . . . I killed Mr. Agenor Soronho. . . .

Thus the crime is planned. Oxen and boy, nature and man, join forces to commit it, an "accident" caused by the cart boy's dreamy condition and the rambunctious team. The coda keeps covenant with the Eastern flavor of this union. In a kind of Old Testament celebration (mountains leap like rams, hills skip like lambs) where once it was only animals that spoke, now even inanimate objects rejoice as the heavy wheels sever the carter's head from his body. Yea, > even the cart is happy—cre-e-ak, cre-e-ak—and opens the throat of its axleshaft in a triumphal tune.

Basic to Guimaraes Rosa's style are his epigrams and anecdotes, birdsong, whore's calls, chants and bull stories. Basic to his vision is the recognition of the bite in the idyll. In "Woodland Witchery," a homage to the magical powers inherent in his people, every tree is the tree of knowledge:

> . . . from the gypsy liana and the velvet bean, libidinous creepers, with polyandrous flowers; even the grayish toadstools, with their earthy effluvia, and the erotic golden trumpet whose leaves, however crumpled, always quickly stiffen again.

In the final tale, "Augusto Matraga's Hour and Turn," where a man's impulse to bully his neighbors is transformed into a search to contribute to the natural order of the world, one finds a will kin to that of the donkey, Seven of Diamonds, evidence that the cycle, the sea change, is done. The grain has gone into the mill, been ground to flour and made into dough, baked in the ovens: here is the bread.

TELEVISION / Peter Gzowski

Mr. Gzowski was formerly managing editor of Maclean's Magazine and is now entertainment editor of the Toronto Daily Star.

Toronto

An American friend of mine once spent part of a trip to Canada asking Canadians, who devote a lot of time to worrying about their independence from the United States, just what it was they were trying so hard to preserve. "Well, there's the C.B.C.," he reported most of them as saying, "and . . . well, there's certainly the C.B.C., and the . . . I don't know, I guess the C.B.C. sort of sums it up."

The C.B.C., the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, does fulfill a unique and important function—at least as far as Canadians are concerned. Films, magazines, newspapers, records, books and, of course, radio and television signals flow virtually unhampered across the border from the United States into Canada. In most of their tastes, people who live in Vancouver are more like people who live in Seattle than they're like people who live in Montreal; what's hip in New York this month will be hip in Toronto next month, just as certainly as it will be hip in Cleveland. But there are still differences, and the C.B.C., a crown corporation that requires about $100 million of federal government money to make up its annual deficit from advertising, helps to preserve them. It forms a kind of East-West counterforce to the natural North-South pull of American geography.

Because of its relative freedom from the dictates of advertising, the C.B.C. is also, as I imagine most readers of The Nation know, probably the best big television network—in terms of not being afraid sometimes to appeal to minority tastes, even in prime time—on the continent. That doesn't mean it's as good as I understand many Americans who aren't able to watch it believe. But it is good. Here is a breakdown of a reasonably typical week on my own local channel, in Toronto: 25 hours of straight American imports (Bonanza, Hogan's Heroes, Ed Sullivan, and so on); 19 hours, 45 minutes of Canadian entertainment shows, generally no better, if no worse, than their American counterparts (although this list does include a 90-minute production of A Doll's House at 9:30 Wednesday evening); 12½ hours of movies, nearly all of them American; 10½ hours of children's programs, nearly all of them Canadian; 10 hours of sports (this was the last week of the Stanley Cup playoffs); 3 hours of educational and 2½ hours of religious programs; 1½ hours of material imported from England; and 17 hours of 15 minutes of news and public affairs.

It's that last category that makes the difference. The C.B.C. news, which is, of course, unsponsored, is a national institution. Lorne Greene learned how to sound like everyone's daddy by reading it on the radio during the war and, on television, it now provides the one truly Canadian medium of communication. But in recent years the Public Affairs Department has become even more important. Which is why tremors that have shaken the Public Affairs Department of the C.B.C. this spring have made a lot of Canadians worry about whether the really excellent parts of the corporation can continue to survive.

For the last two seasons, the heart of public affairs broadcasting on the C.B.C. has been an hour-long program with the Zen-like name, This Hour Has Seven Days. Seven Days runs—or has been running—in the primest of times, at ten on Sunday evening. It has what television people call a magazine format; it deals with as many as a dozen topics a

FOR THE GREAT THRILL
Obtain a copy of
THE MARQUIS DE SADE'S
120 DAYS OF SODOM
If your bookseller is sold out, send $12.50, the price, to BOOK AWARDS, Dept. N, 458 Broadway, N.Y. 10013, and it will go to you postpaid.

I WANT TO KNOW
(How Citizen Exchange Corps Helps Americans Find Out)
IF RUSSIANS HAVE HORNS

Send me Free reprints of N. Y. Times articles and editorials telling about CEC, a non-profit, tax-exempt foundation. Tell me how it brings together Americans and Russians of all ages and occupations to meet their counterparts in both the United States and the Soviet Union . . . and how I can participate in this program, which will lead eventually to exchanges of Americans and Soviets to live and work in each other's country for 6 months to 2 years as a major step toward mutual understanding and survival.

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP ....

Mail to:
CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS., Dept. N
550 Fifth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10036

week. In fifty shows, those topics have included LSD, teen-age prostitution, political corruption, automobile safety, French-Canadian separatism, the American Negro, thalidomide, labor bosses, spies, stock manipulation—almost everything that is noticeable on American television by its absence. Seven Days has broadcast interviews with perhaps half the Canadian cabinet and a wide assortment of other important, interesting or controversial Canadians. There have been interviews also with Collie LeRoy Wilkins, George Lincoln Rockwell, Robert Kennedy, Arthur Schlesinger, Buckminster Fuller, Pete Seeger, Cassius Clay, Ralph Nader, Bertrand Russell, Edith Sitwell, Susan Sontag, Julian Huxley, Jules Feiffer, I. F. Stone, Herman Kahn, McGeorge and William Bundy, Orson Welles, Robert Morley and Carol Doda, the topless dancer from California, of whose act we Sunday evening viewers got a slightly edited version on film.

Seven Days edits everything ruthlessly. Its producers, some of whom are among the world's leading disciples of Marshall McLuhan, seem to have grasped the idea that public affairs broadcasting is not so much journalism—no matter how journalistic the subject—but television. Rather than explain stories or ideas, it has exposed them; it has given its viewers not a complete picture of the people it has interviewed but a genuine experience of them.

And even when it has dealt with subjects like the birth control pill, the influence of Tony Richardson and Jean-Luc Godard has been more evident than the influence of Fred J. Cook or even Edward R. Murrow. And it has worked. In spite of some frequently sophomoric satirical pieces and some ventures into what even its ardent fans have felt is questionable taste (should George Lincoln Rockwell be on television at all?), Seven Days has been enormously successful. Next to hockey, which is the real national bond in Canada, Seven Days has been the most popular Canadian show on the air this season. In a nation with a population of 20 million, roughly 5 million of whom speak French first, it has achieved an audience of more than 3 million—right up there with Bonanza.

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 7-11-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

CITY ....

STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

In mid-April, with Seven Days still having three editions left to put on the air, a vice president of the C.B.C. went over the heads of the show's executive producer, a soft-spoken former newspaper man, Douglas Leiterman, and informed the two on-air hosts, Patrick Watson and Laurier LaPierre, that their contracts wouldn't be renewed next season. The vice president's reasons, as they've come out, were cloudy. He questioned the "loyalty" of both Watson and LaPierre to C.B.C. management. (Watson, who along with Leiterman, founded Seven Days in 1964 and emerged as an on-camera personality only this season, was the president of the C.B.C. producers' association last year, and signed a brief to the Fowler Royal Commission on Broadcasting, whose report turned out to be highly critical of the C.B.C. management. LaPierre, a professor of French-Canadian studies at McGill University in Montreal, who has been commuting to his weekly job with Seven Days in Toronto, had made some speeches in which he didn't exactly butter up his part-time bosses.)

The crucial question, however, as most people on both sides of the dispute have seen it, was really the matter of Seven Days' excellence, and particularly its predilection for controversy. Through the past winter in particular, there has scarcely been a Monday morning when the newspapers haven't been forced to carry some report of what Seven Days has done the night before, and usually it has been a front-page report. Quite a few toes got stepped on. And, instead of taking the bold and direct action of firing Leiterman, it seemed, the C.B.C.'s management had tried to de-fang the show by taking away the two hosts and, by implication, some of Leiterman's independence.

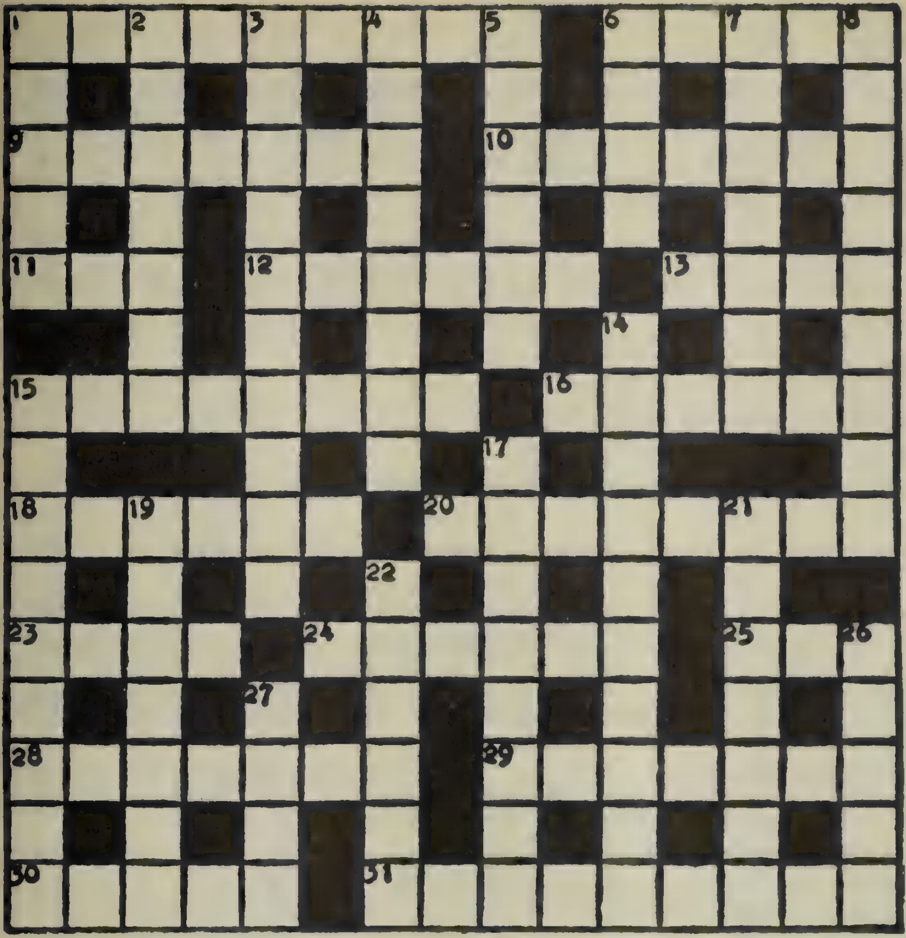
It was, as Judy LaMarsh said, only the top to the iceberg. Miss LaMarsh is the Secretary of State. As such, she answers to Parliament for the C.B.C. And, while one could have wished for a fresher figure of speech—there must be some other way to get that idea across—Miss LaMarsh seemed to be right. The C.B.C. has been divided into two factions for years: on the one hand, the people who make radio and television programs; on the other, the civil servants who administer the crown corporation. Each faction has had a different idea about whether boats ought to be rocked, and neither has always believed the other acted in constant good faith. "It's totally impossible to carry on a sensible conversation with the principal officers of this corporation," said Reeves Haggan, the corporation's supervisor of public affairs, English language division, and the owner of another head that had been gone over in the firing of Watson and LaPierre. (In his turn, Alphonse Ouimet, the C.B.C.'s president, said later that Haggan hadn't been given a raise last year because "his supervisor performance had not been up to expectations.")

The creative people—the producers—quickly closed ranks over the Seven Days firings. Unless there was a satisfactory solution, the producers' association announced, not only to the Watson-LaPierre affair but to the whole running battle, they would "withdraw" their "services." (Since the producers don't negotiate as a body on any other question, they've been very careful to avoid the word "strike.") They were riding a remarkable wave of public support. On the evening of the first edition of Seven Days to go on the air after the announcement of the firings, pickets surrounded the C.B.C.'s Toronto studios. Most of them were students—WE LOVE YOU LAURIER; GIVE US FOOD FOR THOUGHT, and so on—but they obviously represented a strong body of public opinion. The C.B.C. got more than 11,000 phone calls protesting the firings.

A citizen's committee to "save Seven Days and restore the integrity of the C.B.C." sprang up around a group of professors and journalists in Toronto. People who in the past have worked hard to prevent political interference with the C.B.C. wired their Members of Parliament to have the decision reversed. Both the Parliamentary Committee on Broadcasting, chaired by Gerard Pelletier, a tough-minded former labor journalist and editor of the Montreal daily La Presse, held hearings on the issue. At the last moment, Prime Minister Lester Pearson, who once won a Nobel Peace Prize for his international diplomacy, announced the appointment of a mediator, Stuart Keate, a newspaper publisher from British Columbia. The "withdrawal of services" was averted. Seven Days completed its season, with Watson and LaPierre in their usual chairs, although their futures, and the show's, are still in doubt.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1161

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 One way to carry conservation of resources to extremes, if you do, you sap! (9)
6, 30 and 11 How to lose control? Make false notes, and more false notes, being of the imaginary sort. (6, 7)
10 What one might be doing after a shake and a rattle, but associated with a sort of 30 it doesn't gather the green stuff. (7)
12 Might it stretch two games out of three? (6)
13 Thought to have this father, if you recognize Henry IV. (4)
15 Might it keep one from banging the arm? (8)
16 Noted the transaction called so? (4, 2)
18 She had a set arrangement placed before her. (6)
20 It's a struggle indeed, when provided payment. (8)
23 Equivalent to the merrier writer? (4)
24 Spread bad news about the Rough Rider. (6)
25 Field-tripper in implied agreement?
28 Nothing should go 6 for 1000, when 8. (7)
29 Players' garb? (7)
31 They're said to be improper, but a close miss, perhaps. (9)

DOWN:

1 The agency of television, relatively speaking? (5)
2 The old word for "do" in a fluid state, following an obligation. (7)
3 The way a bean might appear for a chapparal cock. (4, 6)
4 Not exactly 2, but one is obliged to be so. (8)
5 The one Arne described as having something well-deserved? (6)
6 Might be found in cabinet rank. (4)
7, 9 and 27 Suggests the ruling Persians and Afghans? (7, 4, 3, 4)
8 Humpty-Dumptyish? (3-6)
14 Johnson might typify it, but it's no Y.M.C.A. trip! (10)
15 At most, be a Mississippi type for example! (9)
17 It might tell you where to go and whom to see. (8)
19 The sort of twisting one might find in roots. (7)
21 Found in New England, any northern state, or just any place in the country? (7)
22 Stirred in haste? The man heading for the office does quite frequently. (6)
26 Bad skids still might result in records.

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1160

ACROSS: 1 Supporting cast; 8 Convertibles; 10 Eradicable; 11 Chic; 13 Yeomen; 14 Integral; 16 Small fry; 17 Sonnet; 19 Axle; 20 Incursions; 22 Perambulated; 23 Changeableness. DOWN: 1 Society Islands; 2 Pentagonally; 3 One-sidedly; 4 Titian; 6 Chef; 7 Chocolate sodas; 9 and 5 The Ring of the Nibelung; 12 Demoiselle; 15 Frontage; 18 Hubbub; 21 Bean.

$2.95 each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF THE NATION

- Each file holds a full year's copies.
- Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.
- Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send check or money order.

MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London. $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002

HOMOSEXUAL theme fiction, non-fiction listing available free. Trojan Book Service, Box 2121B, Philadelphia, Pa. 19103.

BIRTH-CONTROL POLICIES AND PRACTICES IN FIFTY-EIGHT CALIFORNIA COUNTY WELFARE DEPARTMENTS, by Carl Reiterman. Planned Parenthood, 482 West MacArthur Blvd., Oakland, California. $4.00.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), [illegible] Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

WE MOVE YOU WITHOUT TEARS — Economical, insured moving and storage. Vans, wagons—NYC, resorts, long distance. The Padded Wagon, Inc., AL 5-8343 (NYC), 692 Greenwich Street, New York 14, PSC 709.

VACATIONS

OVER 200 acres on private lake. Excellent swimming boating-fishing-golf. Summer theatres, excellent restaurants. Long Island Sound nearby. Rooms with private baths. Charming house. Breakfasts only. Telephone: 669-2465—Cudroff.

PERSONALS

WALDEN THREE, Semi-Skinnerian Utopian Community being planned. Write to Gerald Baker, Cresco, Iowa.

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED
71¢ a line (6 words)
Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

68

Printed in the U.S.A. by RCR Publication Printers Corp., N.Y.C.

"If you had printed more about the (Bay of Pigs) operation, you would have saved us from a colossal mistake."—Pres. John F. Kennedy to Turner Catledge, then Managing Editor, The New York Times, at the White House, May, 1961.

". . . The Bay of Pigs operation might well have been cancelled and the country would have been saved enormous embarrassment if The New York Times and other newspapers had been more diligent in the performance of their duty—their duty to keep the public informed . . ."—Clifton Daniel, Managing Editor, The New York Times, June 1, 1966.

"Look, if you think any American official is going to tell you the truth, then you're stupid. Did you hear that?—stupid."—Arthur Sylvester, Assistant Secretary of Defense for Public Affairs, to a group of U.S. war correspondents in Saigon, July, 1965 (quoted in article by Morley Safer, CBS News, inserted into The Congressional Record, May 12, 1966).

IF it is true that until now we have not had all the facts—

IF it is true that facts have been deliberately withheld—

IF it is true that only certain officials and certain institutions are permitted to have all the facts—

THEN isn't it time that average American citizens began to depend on their own fact-gathering resources?

Isn't it time to join and support AMERICANS WANT TO KNOW—a group of your fellow-citizens who have come together so we may never again be faced with appeals to national unity based on spurious arguments and "news" doctored to lure us into disastrous new adventures?

Our first project is to send a Citizens' Mission to Cambodia, leaving Washington on July 25. The Mission members are:

KAY BOYLE, internationally famous writer,
DONALD DUNCAN, of Ramparts, former member Special Forces,
RUSSELL JOHNSON, American Friends Service Committee,
WILLIAM KUNSTLER, well-known civil liberties attorney, and FLOYD McKISSICK, National Director, CORE.

The Mission is assured all cooperation of the Cambodian government, which has repeatedly asked for honest and responsible border inspection—including that of U.S. Senators, accepted in principle by Vice President Humphrey, although no date has yet been set, and no Senators have been selected.

The Mission will have full freedom to investigate what is happening on ALL the borders of Cambodia—and to get the facts concerning alleged "Vietcong sanctuary" and a so-called "Sihanouk Trail."

We are requesting that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee invite the Mission's members to testify on their findings—in addition to our own publication of the Mission's Report on Cambodia.

YOU can help make a success of the Mission to Cambodia and assure the permanent role of AMERICANS WANT TO KNOW as a future watchdog against press and official misrepresentations, by contributing NOW to the costs of this trip ($1500 per person), all of which will be raised exclusively by voluntary contributions.

Use the coupon below to become part of this NEW development in the peace movement, the best preventive action we as Americans can take against further military interventions, aggressions and escalations.

AMERICANS WANT TO ? KNOW

Honorary Co-Chairmen:

DAGMAR WILSON
OSSIE DAVIS
D. F. FLEMING
ALBERT SZENT-GYORGYI

Mrs. Mary Leckie, Treasurer, AMERICANS WANT TO KNOW,
2930 Legation St., N. W., Washington, D. C. 20015

I enclose herewith $__________ toward the cost of the Citizens' Mission to Cambodia.

Please send me__________copies of your Statement of Purpose.
Please send me__________copies of your REPORT ON CAMBODIA.

Mrs. (Miss) (Mr.) ______________________________
Address ______________________ City ______________
State ________________________ Zip ______________
Telephone(s) ___________________________________

WILL SUCCESS SPOIL ASPEN? P. G. ERNST

THE NATION

JULY 25, 1966 35 cents

JUL 26 19

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.

PORTENT FOR THE FUTURE • • •

WELFARE IMPERIALISM IN VIETNAM

. . . JOHN McDERMOTT

BIRCHISM AT THE GRASS ROOTS

. . . ARNOLD FORSTER

SOCIETY IN AGONY
THE SPANISH CIVIL WAR REMEMBERED

I Become 'La Pasionaria' / DOLORES IBARRURI

Homage To The Brigades / JOSEPHINE HERBST

Ralph Bates's Olive Field / GABRIEL JACKSON

• • •

Annotated Booklist

5-22-67 PLS-801
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA

LETTERS

a pledge of conscience

New York City

Dear Sirs: In your issue of July 11, James Baldwin described the case of six young men who are now serving life sentences for murder—"The Harlem Six." The Charter Group for a Pledge of Conscience, formed in 1964 as a means of bringing together and developing a role for white persons concerned about racial injustice in New York City, has retained four attorneys—William M. Kunstler, Conrad J. Lynn, Mary M. Kaufman and Gene Ann Condon—to file an amicus brief in connection with their appeal.

The Charter Group has not taken a position on the guilt or innocence of the six, but it has become convinced that their constitutional rights were violated from their arrests through their convictions. The primary issues on which the amicus brief will be based are the facts that the two confessions admitted into evidence were illegally obtained, and that the six defendants were denied court-appointed counsel of their choice. (The New York Civil Liberties Union is filing its own amicus brief on the latter issue.)

The Charter Group plans to follow the case of the Harlem Six through the Supreme Court. Contributions can be sent to the committee at Box 346, Cathedral Station, New York, N.Y. 10025.

Anthony J. Garro
Louise Lander

how to succeed?

Boulder, Colo.

Dear Sirs: My husband and I had been meaning to write and thank you for your editorial ["California, There She Blows!" The Nation, June 20] commending Governor Brown of California. Mr. Jerry Engelbach's letter in the July 4 issue claiming that Governor Brown "failed as a human being" because he did not "save Caryl Chessman" prompts us to write the long delayed letter.

Governor Brown acted with both great "human" and political courage in the Chessman case. He first stated unequivocally that he was opposed to capital punishment and that he would certainly commute Chessman's sentence if the laws of the state of California would permit him to do so. However, by law, the Governor could not commute the sentence of a man previously convicted of felony. Then the Governor called a special session of the California legislature and laid it on the line to members of both parties, thus alienating many members of his own party by exposing their determination to retain capital punishment.

Few acts of any governor of any state have been any bolder or any more "humane." We wonder what, in the view of Mr. Engelbach and other uninformed persons, Governor Brown could have done in order to "succeed as a human being."

Lois Phillips Hudson
Randolph H. Hudson

the viability of violence

Syracuse, N.Y.

Dear Sirs: I long ago gave up hope that the editors of The Nation . . . would disavow violence as a viable solution to all problems of the modern world.

But I did believe that in these days the editors never would make so shallow an observation about nonviolence as appears in the editorial on James Meredith's views in the June 27 issue. (continued on page 90)

EDITORIALS

Snow Job

As the founding fathers well knew, undistorted information about public affairs is as vital to democracy as universal suffrage. As we are now being taught, modern techniques of management of the news are destructive of the democratic process. A current example is the way in which the latest escalation of the Vietnamese war—the bombing of the oil installations in Hanoi and Haiphong—was turned into the most prophylactic combat operation in history, with domestic protest effectively muffled in advance.

The present campaign was not entrusted to underlings like Arthur Sylvester, the accomplished juggler of fact and fancy at the Pentagon. This time it came straight from Papa at the White House and, from a purely technical standpoint, one must admire his performance. Nothing was left to chance and every possible loophole for truth was closed off. Top officials received outlines of the points to be stressed—that the United States was winning, that Hanoi knew it was losing, that domestic opposition was negligible and that the latest bombings were proof of our peaceful purpose and our carefully graduated, humane way of fighting the war which had been forced on us.

Against the protests of C.B.S. and N.B.C., the Defense Department withheld films of the Hanoi and Haiphong bombings. Accounts in the French press reported the wailing of ambulances and other indications of casualties, but the Administration insisted that only one or two civilians had been hit. Precision bombing had achieved miraculous levels of accuracy, and the home folks could enjoy their vacations assured that our fliers burned only oil, not people.

Another prong of the news management operation consisted of a chorus of optimistic statements by the President, Secretary McNamara, and acting Secretary of State George Ball—statements which, without actually saying so, gave the impression that with these bombings, and perhaps a few further escalations, we were on the home stretch. In The New York Times, Max Frankel referred to these paeans as a "sustained celebration of progress" designed to persuade Americans that the war had reached a turning point. "By blunting the criticism at home," Frankel suggested, "officials are said to seek not only political advantage but also a further demonstration to Hanoi that it cannot count on domestic opposition to inhibit the American war effort."

It is scarcely likely that except for their own home propaganda purposes the leaders in Hanoi ever harbored any such idea. How often has a great military power been seriously handicapped in the prosecution of a war by minority opposition? Even the often cited French example in Vietnam has been greatly exaggerated; the French army was defeated by the Vietminh, not by Mendès-France. But in the way of political advantage, and muting such opposition as Mr. Johnson has encountered in his design for conquest in Southeast Asia, the campaign worked perfectly. The President's Harris rating shot up 12 points, from a pre-bombing low of 42 per cent to 54 per cent. The President, who reckons in percentages without asking questions when the arithmetic favors him, was elated. Harris himself was more discerning and pointed out that the 5-to-1 support for the bombings had to be interpreted. People are tired of the war. They want it ended. They hoped that the bombings might do it, although on the face of it how could an enemy like the Vietcong, without an air force, tanks, and heavy artillery, be greatly handicapped by a shortage of petroleum?

But this acquiescence, and the entire record of management of the news in this war, only shows that crude methods of manipulation work quite well with the mass of citizens. The intellectuals may be disturbed, together with politicians like Fulbright, Morse, Gruening, Aiken, et al., but most of the people are still committed to the "my country right or wrong" mores and are glad to receive the President's assurance that we are reluctantly combating a godless enemy. They believe in democracy in a desultory way, as if it had been established in 1776 and nothing could ever happen to it. These millions of self-satisfied Americans had better learn to read the news, to become sophisticated about news management, and to be utterly skeptical about anything this Administration tells them. Otherwise they will find themselves with the forms of democracy but none of the substance.

The Coming Crisis

Giving Mr. Johnson all due credit (or discredit) for his masterly manipulation of public opinion in the Hanoi-Haiphong bombings, he still faces a turbulent political future. The dissenting minority can grow into a majority; the very fluidity of the polls shows how unstable the situation is. Nor does one poll make an election, when it is still four months off and may turn on a war that has never been popular. What does Mr. Johnson make of the Ayrshire, Iowa, poll which shows a catastrophic drop in his standing in a bellwether county? What does he make of California polls showing Senator Robert Kennedy steadily gaining strength among Democrats, primarily on the basis of a mildly critical stand on the Vietnamese war? And what of primary returns showing votes of 40 to 45 per cent of the total for peace candidates who were never heard of before and lacked a political machine of any sort? Or the persistence of "independent" candidates, such as David Frost for the U.S. Senate in New Jersey (not to mention the general disaffection of the Democratic Party in that state), the clear disaffection of the party in Wisconsin, and something approaching it in Minnesota? Or Maine, where Thomas L. Maynard, a highly respected educator and investment executive, has decided to run in the First Congressional District as an independent opposing the Administration's policies in Vietnam?

Assuming that Mrs. Gandhi's peace overtures and similar efforts fail and that the United States is still heavily engaged in Southeast Asia as the Congressional elections approach, one can predict Mr. Johnson's forthcoming moves with considerable assurance. In late September or early

SUMMER SCHEDULE
During July and August The Nation appears on alternate weeks: forthcoming issues will be dated August 8 and August 22.

JAN 7

IN THIS ISSUE

July 25, 1966

EDITORIALS

66

ARTICLES

70 Will Success Spoil Aspen? P. G. Ernst

73 Birchism at the Grass Roots Arnold Forster

76 Portent for the Future: Welfare Imperialism in Vietnam John McDermott

88 Whither West Germany? C. Amery

BOOKS & THE ARTS

91 Spain's Agony: A Period of Exposure Josephine Herbst

92 Song of the Little Death (poem, reprint) Federico García Lorca

94 I Become 'La Pasionaria' Dolores Ibarruri

98 The Olive Fields Endure Gabriel Jackson

100 Spanish Civil War Booklist

102 The Meaning of the Journey Peter Hatch

103 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Assistant Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher
ANNE C. ABRAMOVITZ Assistant

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. Tel.: 242-8400.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION Volume 203 No. 3

October a crisis will develop which, to the extent that the President can control its effects, will put the peace forces on the defensive and keep them there, at any rate until after the elections. "Put in the crudest terms," Marquis Childs writes in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch (July 10), "the Johnson Administration will make the Congressional campaign in the fall a choice between patriotism and communism. Are you for our boys fighting in Vietnam or are you helping the Communists who are killing them?" Mr. Childs is putting words in Mr. Johnson's mouth, but the words have a plausible ring. Mr. Johnson has come pretty close to saying as much in the recent past, and if he finds himself with his back against the electoral wall he will say and do whatever he thinks will advance his cause.

Never, in this century at least, has an American President tried to push a foreign policy against such solid opposition from the intelligent and fair-minded section of the community as Mr. Johnson in his enlargement of the Vietnamese war. Nor has an American President faced such nearly unanimous world disapproval. The methods to be pursued by the President and his helpmates will be of commensurate impudence. A harbinger may be seen in the Haiphong-Hanoi bombing justification campaign. After the Administration build-up with all the stops pulled out, Secretary Rusk, a master of quiet effrontery, accused the press of being responsible for exaggeration! If gall has no limits now, what can be expected in the months ahead?

Another ominous sign is Mr. Johnson's speech of July 12, holding out the hand of amity toward "a misguided China." In an editorial, "Synchronized Escalation," in the July 11 Nation, we remarked on the coincidence of Mr. Johnson's peace offers and his stepping up of the war. ". . . if we stand firm in Vietnam against military conquest," Mr. Johnson said, "we truly believe that the emerging order of hope and progress in Asia will continue to grow and to grow." This familiar rhetoric should be a warning to the Asians and to Americans who oppose Mr. Johnson's policies in Asia. When Dr. Jekyll speaks of the good time to come, we can be sure that Mr. Hyde is preparing a fresh sequence of barbarities.

The 'Black Power' Rhubarb

The big guns of the editorial pages from coast to coast have been unlimbered on the militants of the civil rights movement and their use of the term "black power." The discussion would be more useful if it centered less on the phrase than on the situation which precipitated it.

Historically, the civil rights movement, if it is not at an end, is nearing the end. It came to its terminal point with the enactment of the Civil Rights Act. The agitation for civil rights legislation was successful, in the sense that the law is now on the books. It is equally obvious that the Administration is not enforcing the act, or, to be more accurate, is giving it only minimal, or token, enforcement. That is why SNCC derided the suggestion that there should be more civil rights legislation, when in truth and in fact we were not enforcing the legislation already there.

This phase would have been reached just as surely if the frightening phrase "black power" had not been called into play. It was in fact clearly and comprehensively predicted in "Freedom Now—But What Then?" by Loren Miller in The Nation, June 29, 1963. As Miller wrote then, "within the foreseeable future" the civil rights phase of the struggle would be over. At that point, "it would be a mistake to assume that these profound changes will automatically usher in a society that will make full and effective use of these new potentials for social progress. . . . Once before, almost a hundred years ago, a similar promise lighted up the American scene and was snuffed out after a decade of uncertain flickering. . . . We are back where we began. . . . The nation has been given a second chance to solve the problem."

Symbolic of what has happened is the shift of focus from the rural South to Cook County, Ill. Techniques that worked passably well in the Klan-infested countryside cannot work equally well in Chicago, not merely because Mayor Daley is one of the smartest of big-city bosses but because the problem is different. The new situation is fraught with danger for a number of reasons, three of which have been pointed out by Dr. Martin Luther King: the growing restiveness among Negroes caused by "broken promises"; the difficulty, after six months of effort, of winning significant concessions; the desperation and frustration in the Mississippi march, where, in that earlier theatre of war, the "black power" movement had its inception.

Too much trust was placed in the civil rights phase of Negro emancipation, because, difficult as that was, far greater obstacles are now ahead. Here again Loren Miller was prophetic. "Time itself," he wrote, "will drive home the lesson that problems entailed in incorporating Negroes into our tremendously complicated social and economic structure are political in nature and will propel the new militants into political action. There is no other road to reform in a political democracy."

What Dr. King lacks—and it is surely only to a minor degree his fault—is (1) a program; (2) a political strategy; (3) a political vehicle to carry out the program and the strategy. As merely one aspect of the dilemma, Mayor Daley could not, if he would, grant Dr. King's demands and remain political boss of Cook County. If he were to give in, the structure and personnel of his organization would be subverted. So he is digging in. He cannot be ousted by force. He cannot be converted by nonviolence, i.e., demonstrations. The only possibility of constructive change is by organized political power, wherever Negroes and their allies possess or can acquire it.

In the meantime, the danger that Negro frustration will reach the flash point on a regional scale is all too real. As far as the ordinary Negro is concerned (not the Negro at the Los Angeles Statler) little progress of value to him has been made. As Burke Marshall writes in American Trial Lawyers (June/July 1966), the civil rights successes have "the deceptive quality of a tranquilizer." Negroes as a group continue to be badly housed, unemployed or meagerly employed, with substandard incomes and inferior status in the things that count for them, as for whites. The "black power" rising is a revolt against these conditions. It is a race between the violence which is brewing and the political means whereby the Negro can achieve economic equality. And it is easy to see which of these forces is growing more rapidly.

The Alexander Case

The Alexander Defense Committee, an organization which has been providing funds for legal defense and family relief to prosecuted opponents of the South African Government, has recently been ordered by the Department of Justice to register as an "agent of a foreign principal." This order was initiated in supposed accordance with the Foreign Registration Act. The act provides that groups representing the interests of foreign governments must register with the Department of Justice. But the act has never, to our knowledge, been construed to include humanitarian groups such as the Alexander Defense Committee (which exists, ironically, not to represent a foreign government but to aid those opposed to one—the South African regime).

The order handed down by the Department of Justice is a divergence from precedent (if not a misconstruction of the act), and we cannot help wondering what this move against the Alexander Defense Committee means. Is it the result of some kind of pressure applied to our government by the South African regime? Is it perhaps the first in a series of attempts by the Department of Justice to harass what might appear as left-of-Center interest groups? Whatever the Department of Justice's motive, the order seems way out of line. We hope it will be quickly rescinded.

Is Peace Naive?

Washington

How can peace be brought to Vietnam?

There is only one road it would seem: by close and fair collaboration between the U.S. and the USSR. Neither may seek to exploit any settlement to promote its selfish nationalist interests. Is this naive? Then peace is naive and war is sophisticated. What, then, are the practical methods by which peace can be achieved in Vietnam?

(1) There must be a cease-fire. The thirty-seven-day cease-fire around the turn of the year indicated that another prolonged stoppage of fighting is feasible and could be longer with peace at stake.

(2) There shall be a mixed American-Soviet force along the frontier between North and South Vietnam. Its duty shall be to halt any infiltration or other actions likely to prolong the war. A similar mixed American-Soviet force shall stand guard at ports of North and South Vietnam to check military movements there.

(3) Suppose there is a dispute between the American and Soviet authorities as to methods being used to restore peace. Can there be an arbiter between those two powers? Yes. The three countries forming the International Control Commission—Canada, Poland and India—can perform the function. This correspondent has been informed, on high U.S. authority, that the United States would not propose a mediatory role for the ICC, but would not oppose it.

(4) What if the People's Republic of China tries to torpedo such peace efforts? How can it be restrained without use of force?

Could not mainland China be offered a certain amount of food for a specified number of years as an inducement to contribute to peace in Vietnam? This would give America's Food for Peace program a new, deeper meaning.

Why should not the United States, as tangible proof of its love for peace, contribute among others to such an arrangement, just as the U.S. sent food to the Soviet Union in the early period after the Bolshevik revolution, with Herbert Hoover administering that move and lending it respectability as well as humaneness? Could the Chinese afford to refuse such an offer with the contumely that would evoke in world opinion, to say nothing of the immense saving in scarce foreign currency for China? Last year the wheat China bought in Canada, Australia and elsewhere consumed 40 per cent of China's total foreign currency expenditure.

(5) How shall South and North Vietnam be governed pending a lasting settlement?

There cannot be fair elections under the present regimes in both those states. That is, not unless they are supervised by thousands of observers. Which nations could provide the observers? Again, why not mixed groups of the ICC? This has the disadvantage that Canada, Poland and India are all opposed to mainland China. How might that obstacle be overcome? The United Nations is ruled out because neither Communist China nor either of the two Vietnams belong to the UN.

Would it not be possible to add Chinese Communist observers to watch the elections in the South and, say, British observers to fulfill a comparable role in the North?

Would the governments of South Vietnam and North Vietnam concur in such an arrangement? That is where the U.S. and the USSR could exert important pressure. But would such a plan thrust North Vietnam into the embrace of Red China? Not if Communist China has promised to keep its hands off in return for substantial supplies of food for its bulging population.

(6) Would the foregoing proposals involve U.S. recognition of the government of the People's Republic of China? Certainly not. We gave food to the Soviet Union many years before we recognized its government.

Furthermore, it took us about sixteen years to discover that we could not abolish the Bolshevik government in the USSR by pretending that it did not exist. Recognition in 1933 certainly did not convey approval.

Critics of these suggestions may demand: "Who is to be the commander in chief of the proposed mixed American-Soviet force at the North-South Vietnamese border?" Why not alternate? Why not an American commander one fortnight and a Soviet the next, and so on?

Is there any incentive that would impel Soviet Premier Kosygin to cooperate with President Johnson to end the Vietnamese war? The risk, small today but susceptible of increase, that the Soviets might be involved in a major war is a menace worth eliminating. In the longer run this factor could be telling among the rulers in Moscow.

The rising generation of leaders in Communist China may be more tempted by the time factor: the time during which, with peace on its boundaries, China could far more rapidly build its economic strength.

This reporter is aware that all these plans may seem chimerical at a time of stiffening and escalation on both sides in Vietnam. But nothing could be more civilized than to put reverse English on the old cliché and in time of war prepare for peace.

FREDERICK KUH

WILL SUCCESS SPOIL ASPEN?

P. G. ERNST

Mr. Ernst, a well-known sports writer, has visited Aspen every year since World War II.

Aspen

This past spring a group of European hoteliers headquartered in Rome sent an executive to Aspen, Colo., with the idea of acquiring some land and building on it. The chain has large hotel-motel holdings among the palaces of Florence, on the shores of Lago di Garda, and in the lavish ski resort of Courmayeur. The group's establishments in Kitzbuehel, St. Anton and Garmisch serve many American guests. It was logical, therefore, to toy with the idea of moving into America, too. Why not Aspen? Indeed, summer brochures showed the Colorado town from far away in its lush green valley, mountains shooting up on all sides, bright with aspen trees, wild flowers, and over it all, a deep blue sky. Publicists had billed Aspen as "truly cosmopolitan"—"a diet of Haydn and hiking," "the world's most magnificent ski resort." It was also supposed to be a kind of intellectual summer shrine — with music festivals, executive seminars and writers' workshops.

So the Roman came and saw. But Aspen did not conquer him. To be sure, it did not take him long to know that he had been oversold by the Aspen publicity office. True, the surroundings were impressive: in a nearby canyon loomed rock castles and granite fortresses, and Aspen's adjacent valleys were lush, wild, utterly romantic. And true, there was an attraction and glamour about the young girls in their dirndl dresses, the sunny Aspen children in lederhosen, the tanned, athletic young men.

But Aspen itself was an ugly town. It had obviously grown without planning. It had the marks of the fast dollar. There were touches of pomp, but also of shabbiness. The visitor knew it the moment he checked into one of the many motels. This one looked like a barracks. A miniature, not quite clean swimming pool was surrounded by a low wall; the owners had been too miserly to put up one high enough to guarantee privacy. Coffee was served alfresco on card tables, and while the traveler did not expect espresso, he had hoped for more than gray water after the long journey. The moment of truth came when the Italian began to look over the much touted town on foot. The lack of sidewalks, the unpaved roads, the large potholes were all disturbing.

And Aspen's architecture seemed a frightful hodgepodge. Here were the false front Wild West stores, the log cabins and Victorian homes of the early miners, the shacks of the twenties, deserted now, and left to fall apart. There were crumbling cinder-block houses, plastic buildings shaped like tents and apparently serving as Indian-style motel units; there were ramshackle cracker boxes, fake Swiss villas, curtainless A-frames that offered no privacy. A potato-sack hill was covered with rows of gray apartment houses. At the bottom of the ski runs, beer cans bloomed amid the crocuses. A fancy-looking restaurant served dinner on paper plates.

The man from Rome left the next day.

He is not alone. Last winter, a well-known photographer-lecturer drove in all the way from Trenton, N. J. He had a soapy martini in an Aspen saloon next to a lot full of weeds, steered past the inevitable trailer courts, made a U-turn and settled elsewhere in Colorado. Indeed, thousands have fled Aspen, never to return. Yet the town has become almost sacred. Rave stories have appeared in many national publications. The Saturday Review, for instance, has called Aspen (pop. 1,500) a "Salzburg in the Rockies," although there is no ground for such comparison. The Saturday Evening Post once devoted a whole article to the "special charm" and "scintillating night life" of Aspen. And writers stand in awe before the financial success of the resort.

Business indeed has been good. So good that hysteria shakes Aspen's town fathers when there is a 1.5 per cent drop of tourist dollars. The average cost per visitor per day is $35, although a good number of guests spend over $50. And the well-heeled Aspen Skiing Association estimates that skiers leave some $20 million a season in town. Last December, almost $1 million flowed through the Bank of Aspen between Christmas and New Year. And Bill Dunaway, publisher of the Aspen Times points out that every house on one of the hills is inhabited by a millionaire.

Real estate values have skyrocketed. Even in the magnificent nearby wilderness area, at Snowmass, an acre goes for $9,000 and up (it was worth just $100 seven years ago). In Aspen itself, enough ground for a home costs some $16,000. To this one can often add the cost of tearing down one of the many ghost houses. Self-owned condominium apartments go for $19,000. A woman with a small lot and a flimsy abode that were worth only $900 in 1948 recently refused a $90,000 offer for her property. And when a supermarket group wanted to buy an Aspen block, they were told bluntly that they would have to pay $240,000. Natives and visitors thus continue to queue up for their expensive groceries in a few small markets.

Still, money isn't everything. The Texas-based Humble Oil Company was quite prepared to plunk down a tidy sum. Could their service station be located at the entrance curve of Aspen? The city said no. Zoning regulations. Humble sued and lost. Oddly enough, Phillips 66 used to ply its trade at the very spot years ago. Was there a conspiracy against Humble by the four local stations? Not so, claim Aspen citizens. They were willing to let Humble settle elsewhere in town (at an astronomical price).

The high prices of the oversold resort come up again and again. Last winter, for instance, the Chamber of Commerce and the Skiing Association banded together to sponsor a marketing survey. Just how did visitors feel about the town? One April day marketing analyst Ed Furia furnished the sad answer. Of 35,000 winter visitors, 9,000 went away angry, because they had been exploited. Among the charges: $50 for some rooms, $8 for a meal (worth $1.50 according to an Aspen reporter), $8 for a day's lift ticket, $30 for a private music lesson, and a stiff $900 for two weeks at an Aspen executive seminar. Yet Better Homes & Gardens recently crowed about "vacation luxury at a modest cost."

Actually, most of the financial victims are skiers. Every late fall, thousands of young people arrive from Illinois or New York or California to spend a few months in Aspen. It is true that no one has asked them to come. But they do not fare well. One young lady, a Pennsylvanian, did not choose Aspen for its many wild parties. She wanted only to ski on the exceptional mountains — three of them, all honeycombed with lifts. She just longed to be close to nature, to savor the silences of Mount Haydn, Pyramid Peak, Ashcroft. But she came without funds, and needed work. She took several jobs. In the end, she worked morning, afternoon and evening for a pittance. And she rarely got to ski. "Employers certainly pushed me around," she recalls.

Aspen's growing rudeness was also revealed in the Furia marketing survey. During a slack month, when ski instructors had trouble making ends meet, they snapped at and insulted their students. When a busy Denverite wrote to one of the better lodges, reserving a room for four days, he received the curt reply that only six-day reservations are accepted. On his next one-day trip, the Denverite challenged the lodge owner. "You were lucky we answered at all," the visitor was told. "We don't have time to write letters." At a highly recommended restaurant, the same man found a sign explaining that only cash or credit cards were acceptable. The Aspen Bank has a novel "ski-up" window, but a sign tells us: "No checks cashed here for non-customers."

There are a few charming shops in Aspen, including two superb patisseries, a fashion boutique, and at least one excellent restaurant, Guido's Swiss Inn. But in general, stores remind one of commercial resorts anywhere in the world. As you walk down a typical Aspen street you will see the customary German beer mugs (made in Japan), the Bells of Pakistan (made in Hong Kong), or cuckoo clocks manufactured in New Jersey. Meanwhile, there are not enough capable auto mechanics, and even residents have bitter words for men posing as electricians, carpenters or bricklayers. "They're in such a hurry to get rich they don't even clean up their mess," complains Mrs. Ann Ferris, a longtime resident of Aspen.

While underpaid waiters, bus boys, waitresses and room clerks project their discontent on the innocent guests, many "chefs" come to Aspen from the hamburger circuit. Guido Mayer, a former St. Moritz maître de cuisine, who still bakes his own bread, and who may spend half a day on the creation of a few Schwarzwaelder Torten, is incensed at the state of Aspen's cookery. "They just put on chefs' hats and think they're chefs. No training. No experience. They're not cooks but crooks," Mayer says.

Mayer is equally critical of his colleagues who not only toss empty cans into the alleys, but the fat as well. And as a neat Swiss—along with other Aspenites—Mayer is infuriated by the trash everywhere. Aspen's streets are allegedly cleaned only once a year. Businessmen are not exactly eager to shovel snow in winter. So the sidewalks are always caked with huge mounds of snow and ice, despite a city ordinance which demands shoveling twelve hours after a storm. Businessmen just can't be bothered; they're too busy making money. Come spring, Aspen is transformed into a large mud puddle, which has soiled many a pretty lady's stretch pants. And in summer, the empty beer bottles are at last visible in Aspen streets and alleys.

Strangely enough, the people of Aspen are indifferent to the beautification of the city. Not long ago, some Aspen architects decided that the planting of more trees would be a good idea. But when they approached the store and restaurant owners, only a few agreed to spend $12.50 for a tree (the other $12.50 would have come from the city). This seems all the more shocking because retail sales amount to $9 million a year. Despite Aspen's riches and cultural aspirations, the county library has sufficient funds to keep open only a few hours a day. And there are still no funds for a professional librarian. The Aspen police is housed in the huge barn where it has been for seventy years. A smoking city dump still sits right in front of the town's major ski hill, often obscuring the slopes. And even more important, there is still no adequate water-purification plant.

As a consequence, Aspen has a water problem. Last April, State Health Director Dr. Roy Cleere received nineteen letters from individuals in ten states who had developed a diarrheal illness after a trip to Aspen. According to Dr. Cleere, these people had become infected by the Giardia lamblia parasite. Health inspectors immediately descended upon Aspen, where they found cross connections between ancient sewer lines and drinking water. In short, the sewage mingled happily with the water. The Health Department gave orders that all water had to be boiled, and authorities warned of a possible epidemic. No Aspen visitor has died, although the 1966 convention business is pretty sick.

BEST
BEER
Moss

Meanwhile, the building boom also poisoned the fine Aspen rivers. Hasty construction companies shoved sand, leftover cement, boxes, sacks, crates into the Roaring Fork River. And the Maroon Creek bears a melancholy U. S. Forest Service warning: "WATER NOT SAFE FOR DRINKING!" It seems that septic tanks are now leaking into this once pure creek. So far, most Aspenites have been too busy to worry about these—and other—serious problems. "There is really no community spirit here," says Benjamin Bianco, a well-known Aspen designer. Harold Pabst, one-time mayor, adds: "Aspenites wake up only when something concerns their pocketbooks," and Dunaway: "Too many people have taken everything out and put nothing in." Dunaway has been especially critical of the Aspen Ski Corporation. "They're fifty years behind the times," says Dunaway. "They tried to suppress a ski lift worker's union. But then, what do you expect from a lot of Republicans?"

To understand Aspen fully, we must go back to 1879, when silver was discovered here. Hundreds of fortune seekers soon flocked across the gleaming white saddle of Independence Pass into the valley. Every man was for himself; and the lawless crowd literally tore the Aspen mountain to pieces. There was so much ore for some men that it had to be stored in the streets. By 1892, 12,000 silver-hungry people lived in Aspen. Thirteen years later the bottom fell out of the silver market. The miners and their women went elsewhere, looking for gold. Some dismantled their houses for firewood; others let their homes rot.

Aspen lapsed into obscurity until shortly before World War II when American businessmen first became interested in the skiing industry. In 1948, skiing started in earnest. At this point, the late Walter Paepcke, a Chicagoan, sparked Aspen into its best years. Culture-conscious, widely traveled and a man of great taste, Paepcke also started to lay the groundwork for summer programs. He founded the Aspen Institute for Humanistic Studies (which brought the late Albert Schweitzer to Aspen for a few days in 1949). Paepcke created a health center, the music festival, the executive conferences. And he sought considerable sums to start the network of ski lifts. Tourism became salvation to the dead town, although old-timers were indifferent and often unfriendly. It was Paepcke's plan to restore the old architecture, and he succeeded with his own Victorian homes, and the ancient, still imposing Jerome Hotel. But when he offered paint and a decorator's counsel gratis to the natives, only one family took him up. Before long, internal Aspen politics shattered many of the Chicagoan's dreams, and frustration broke Paepcke's health.

He was still alive when speculators pounced upon the ski town. Arriving from everywhere, they bought up acres of land. Bulldozers once more ripped into the hills. Every summer since 1960, streets became clogged with enormous trucks. The sleepy valley echoed with dynamite blasts, and choked with dust. Unfortunately, design control was voted down, and Aspen grew into a mad architectural hodgepodge. Contractors put up an apartment house on stilts, fakes of fake Swiss chalets, a shop with Roman arches, gingerbread Bavarian villas, conventional lodges, motels resembling factories, homes papered with plastic imitation bricks. Someone built a French tourist castle that looked as unlikely in Aspen as a log cabin in Versailles; another man—no doubt the worst offender—slapped down a series of puny $20-a-night A-frames. The roofs leaked, so they were covered with a thick, silvery plastic goo, which looks like cake icing. Among all the writers who came to view the new Aspen, only one—Wolf von Eckhardt—saw the mess. "Chaotic litter of laissez-faire building . . . visual chaos . . . surrender to greed and vulgarity," Eckhardt observed.

A few architects, such as Aspen's Fred Benedict, also protested. But other colleagues wanted creative freedom. And the city wanted the taxes. This was not tradition-bound Stowe, Vt., where building restraint comes before revenue. "Aspen just grew too fast," says Bianco, the designer. "There were too many influences. And they ruined the town."

Meanwhile, Paepcke's restoration dream was all but forgotten. Scattered between the pompous lodges sat the old miners' weather-beaten shacks. Some of them were no longer inhabited. The windows had been boarded. The walls were sagging. Newcomers were not here to maintain the old. Even the nostalgic Wheeler Opera House (built in 1889), although still containing offices, has been left to its decay. Front windows are broken or patched with plywood. The once red stone is sooty. Aspen's many wandering dogs urinate against the threshold. In time, warns Bill Dunaway, Aspen may well become an "urban slum." Harold Pabst, a former mayor, thinks, on the other hand, that Aspen might turn into a "congested tourist trap." Already, some of the delicate aspen trees have given way to houses, and lodges sit so close to the ski lifts that you can look into the rooms from the upward-moving machinery. Aspen's tremendous growth also brought the flotsam of undesirable elements—drug addicts, adventurous young girls, motorcycle gangs. This resulted in a sudden rise of break-ins, hold-ups and rapes. When Pabst declared that he didn't want an additional invasion of a Coney Island "hot dog" set, citizens called him a snob, and didn't re-elect him. And Dunaway, of the Aspen Times, stirred up controversy when he demanded better zoning. Right now, Gerald Brown, a San Francisco city planner, is on the carpet for suggesting an Aspen "density control."

Only Paepcke's cultural ideals have survived. The music festival is still vigorous. And the Aspen Institute for Humanistic Studies still gets important speakers. The institute's purpose—the "relationship of man to others"—has not changed, although Paepcke's well-meant words now sound a little incongruous in this money-mad town. The institute is housed in a modern and rather strange-looking cinder-block building. Perhaps paradoxically, it is the site of a yearly international design conference. In the past years, the institute has started to give an award to an outstanding individual—an award which Time (in a weak moment) compared to the Nobel Prize.

The 1966 "Aspen Award in the Humanities" went to Dr. C. A. Doxiadis. He lives in Athens and specializes in the "Science of Human Settlements." Let's hope that the Greek city pioneer takes a close, close look at Aspen, Colo.

BIRCHISM AT THE GRASS ROOTS

ARNOLD FORSTER

Mr. Forster, general counsel to the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, is a nationally known authority on human and constitutional rights. He is the author of A Measure of Freedom (Doubleday), Some of My Best Friends (Farrar, Straus & Cudahy), Danger on the Right (Random House) and, most recently, The John Birch Society 1966 (Random House).

Dan O'Brien took a deep breath and blew his football coach's whistle directly into the telephone receiver. That would sting—but it would not stop—the man at the other end of the wire, one of many who had been calling late at night to shout "Communist!" at the former Marine officer and popular coach. Nor would it stop the notes marked with hammers and sickles which were left on his desk in the classroom where he taught social studies, or the signs taped to his automobile questioning his loyalty or his wife's character. All of these harassments had quickly followed Dan O'Brien's classroom defense of the United Nations against a local barrage of radical Right propaganda, some of it stuffed into teachers' mailboxes and passed out among students. The teacher's 7-year-old son had been sent a postcard reading: "Your daddy is a Commie"; it was typed, a postal investigation proved, on a typewriter in the teachers' lounge at school. On the same day, O'Brien himself had received a letter containing a live .22-caliber dumdum bullet.

Dan O'Brien stopped blowing the whistle and left town—but not until a year later, not until the school board had refused to grant him a contract which would have protected him against unjustified dismissal. He believed that the board had so acted because he had dared to stand up against the sneaky pressures of local extremists. And when he finally departed for a more secure position elsewhere, there were good-bys from his friends and a few expressions of regret, but nothing more. The "responsible" elements of the community had watched the whole long episode in silence, and even most of O'Brien's friends had refused to commit themselves. Few were willing to become personally involved.

Yet this small Ohio town was indeed very much involved in the expanding efforts of America's radical Right to gain influence or control at the local level and to organize disruptions and discord in so doing. An official of O'Brien's school district admitted that the activities of extremists were making his life miserable. Local ministers confided that they were constantly under similar pressures. One man said that a "pall of fear" had silenced support for the beleaguered football coach.

This is just one community among many. Scores of cities and villages across the country have felt the efforts of the extreme Right to infiltrate, to intimidate, to grab control of (or failing that, to harass) schools and PTAs, libraries, political clubs. The fear and suspicion thus generated can tear a town to pieces. It has happened from Santa Ana, Calif., where extremists infiltrated and could have destroyed the police department, to the New England island of Nantucket, where they captured control of the schools, intimidated teachers, produced an educational system later branded as "unfit" by the state's teachers association, and split the community itself into bitter factions.

It was six years ago that Robert Welch, leader of the John Birch Society, first advised his members to "join your local PTA at the beginning of the school year, get your conservative friends to do likewise, and go to work to take it over." The attempts of the Birchers and their friends to "take over" have been obvious and spectacular. The National Education Association has estimated that one school district in thirty throughout the nation had "experienced some sort of attack, opposition or attempt to infiltrate the schools by extremists and dissident critics."

All too often such local campaigns have taken place in the deafening silence that surrounded Dan O'Brien. Apathy or fear take hold. "What can we do against them?" the more concerned people ask, when a vocal and thoroughly organized minority gradually seizes the day.

TEACHER IZ A COMMIE
RENFRO

What, indeed, can be done? The obvious answer is that like Dan O'Brien we must blow the whistle. But how?

First of all, we must face the dilemmas that resistance presents:

(1) The extremists cannot be arbitrarily denied their individual and collective rights. Nor can they be ignored, for often, through sensational words and deeds and through the professional use of publicity, they have made it impossible and even dangerous to ignore them. On the other hand, they cannot be gratuitously provided with the spotlight—unless it is a searching and uncomfortable one. But even then, speaking out against their wickedness inevitably provides them with the right to answer—on a platform they might not otherwise have had.

(2) Discourse and debate are frequently fruitless. Extremist argument has displayed an immunity to both fact and logic, and always the extremists will turn any attempted meeting of the minds into a recruiting session. Radio and television forums—their allotments of time severely limited—are perforce superficial, often providing more heat than light, and more entertainment than learning. Their educative value is questionable. On the other hand, unconscionable propaganda and tactics must somehow be challenged publicly, lest reason and decency lose by default.

(3) Fighting back is not a simple task. One must reject the opponents' weapons—the barrage of baseless propaganda that feeds emotional reaction and ignores truth. And yet this propaganda is the point where the fight begins.

When first faced with this set of dilemmas in the fall of 1964, the citizenry of Attleboro, Mass., improvised what may be a model solution. It began with the concern of two young obstetricians at the local hospital, who were aroused when staff doctors began receiving unsolicited mailings of right-wing propaganda from a secret but neighborhood source. It took organized form when others—professional men, clergymen, housewives—became equally disturbed and realized the need "to let the public know what's going on."

One of the young doctors, Joseph F. Kerrins, a Roman Catholic, had become further troubled at a meeting of his church's Christian Family Movement group, an organization dedicated to improving the quality of family life. Here, a physician new to the city had delivered a long address on former Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, John Birch Society stalwart and hero to the most radical of America's rightists. Dr. Kerrins, puzzled by the irrelevance of the topic to the church group's purpose, began to understand something of the mechanics of fanaticism.

With a colleague, Dr. L. Lynton Goulder, Kerrins invited Gordon Hall, a lecturer and writer on extremism whom Dr. Goulder had known in Boston, to address a special meeting at the high school in Attleboro. Almost immediately the "treatment," so often experienced elsewhere, began. The young doctors received hate literature aimed at discrediting their speaker—mailed locally and anonymously. On the day of Hall's appearance, they were told that the police had received a mysterious call from New Jersey warning that there would be a riot at the school if and when the speaker appeared.

The meeting was held and no riot occurred. But extremist partisans showed up in strength and heckled loudly. Hall, in Factual data is urgently important if the impact of the divisive, disturbing far Right propaganda is to be neutralized. Primitive exhortation is useless. Americans simply will not refrain from joining a movement because someone says it's bad. But reasonable people can be persuaded with accurate facts if the trouble is taken to dig them out and present them intelligently. And, in an earnest effort to awaken interest, it is not unfair to publicize some of the more irresponsible radical Right distortions: "John F. Kennedy was assassinated by the Communists when they learned he planned to turn American." "Lyndon Johnson has betrayed his oath of office and is guilty of treason." "Where there is no poverty, there can be no freedom." "Defense Secretary Robert McNamara ordered the United States Army to rehearse President Kennedy's funeral one week before he was assassinated." The citing of such obviously ludicrous statements can sometimes lead to more careful scrutiny of what else the radical Right is saying and doing.

It is the rare individual who can sufficiently arm himself from his general reading to battle the ardent radical rightists who spend their every available moment obsessively absorbing extremist propaganda. Organized education is thus essential. For the part-time opponent of the radical Right a basic pamphlet is "How to Listen to a John Birch Society Speaker," written by the Anti-Defamation League's Harvey Schechter. It was prepared to help community leaders deal with the most common gambits and half truths employed by John Birch Society spokesmen.

his talk, revealed that the doctor who had extolled General Walker was an active Birch Society member. In the weeks that followed, the physician acknowledged his Birch ties and founded the Forum of the Attleboros, a typical Birch front-group operation, as a vehicle for bringing right-wing speakers before local audiences. With the announcement of the first of these speakers, an "anti-Communist" Baptist minister, Drs. Kerrins and Goulder took on an immediate educational job.

They knew that until very recently the minister had held a key position in the national headquarters of the Birch Society, a fact ignored in the advance publicity circulated by his local sponsors. Dr. Kerrins and his friends in the Christian Family Movement made certain that interested townsfolk received a more accurate "biography" of the speaker, and it was distributed on the evening of his appearance. An Attleboro Baptist minister also became concerned when the visiting preacher labeled some of America's Baptist clergy as "pro-Communist oriented." The local minister fought back from the pulpit and in letters to the newspapers. He also conferred with Dr. Goulder.

As a result, in January, 1965, Drs. Kerrins and Goulder called together a few professional men, clergymen and other interested persons to organize a forum from which they could retaliate collectively. It was to be an informal group, meeting periodically to keep abreast of the latest expert information on extremist activities, to sponsor informative talks when necessary and—most important—to rally the available human resources of the town into a united effort against those who would profit from the typically disorganized nature of the moderate majority.

The group has become known as the Birch Watchers. It has developed an active core of more than two dozen persons and has secured the enthusiastic cooperation of the Social Action Committee of the Attleboro Area Council of Churches, the Attleboro B'nai B'rith and members of the Christian Family Movement. Further, the Birch Watchers maintain direct contact with the Boston office of the Anti-Defamation League as a source of factual data on the extremists and their plans.

For its part, the right wingers' forum has continued to bring a parade of speakers to Attleboro, most if not all of them supplied by the Birch Society's speakers' bureau, and including Scott Stanley, Jr., managing editor of Robert Welch's magazine American Opinion. The Birch Watchers, however, have their own programs and speakers, such as Harry and Bonaro Overstreet, to help illuminate the issues in the struggle for a community. And Dr. Kerrins has recently traveled as far away as Chappaqua, N.Y., to tell others of Attleboro's experience and of its proposed solutions. At least a dozen communities in Massachusetts have now initiated "Birch Watching" programs, and the idea has spread recently to towns in several other states.

An editorial in the Providence Journal commented that the original Birch Watchers movement had "made of Attleboro an experimental laboratory in democracy where it is being demonstrated that a well-informed, intelligent citizenry can effectively combat Birchers who diminish faith in our government, clergy, educational system, military and fellow townspeople. . . ."

The necessity for such "counteraction" is growing. The organizations of the extreme Right, and the pressures they mount, have grown steadily in the past two years. Their efforts have grown more political, their assaults more brazen.

Last November, in Saratoga, Calif., highly organized Birchers elected their members or sympathizers to all eighteen positions on the advisory board of directors for an area center of the poverty program—a program they oppose. In Mount Prospect, Ill., a community effort to improve race relations was made a shambles by Birch infiltration and tactics. On orders from a local chapter leader of the society, members showed up in force at the organizational meeting for a human relations council, succeeded in getting their own people elected to office and appointed to draft the by-laws. The Birchers made it clear that they would propose a strong stand against racial "mongrelization" and that they favored watching out for "Communists," and perhaps even dissolving the organization itself.

And while the infiltration efforts and the activities of local "front groups" have been stepped up, harassment tactics by anonymous supporters of the far Right have not ceased. In North Attleboro, Mass., a part of the original Birch Watching locale, a Catholic priest who advised his parishioners to stay away from a lecture by Father Francis Fenton, a member of the Birch Society's National Council, became the target of abusive telephone calls and underhanded pressures.

The "watchers" of extremism realize, of course, that such outbursts cannot be stopped. What can be stopped is the general apathy that makes intimidation possible, and infiltration by fanatical minorities profitable. The radical fringe is by temperament active, and readily marshaled for an organized propaganda drive or local take-over. More moderate citizens tend to be less firmly dedicated to specific points of view, less demonstrative, less easily drawn to organizations. That is to the good in good times, but we cannot afford the luxury of apathy when those of opposite inclinations tax it so heavily. The Birch Watchers have shown at least the beginnings of a community program to awaken people to some ugly facts of many a town's life.

What remains is to refine or extend the program. National organizations stand ready to help; some can provide literature and films dealing with the problem. But "counteraction" succeeds or fails in the willingness of the citizen to defend the integrity of his community—with at least half the determination shown by the local Bircher in his attempts to control or disrupt. Teachers, churchmen, civil organization members, union officers, businessmen—all divided by unconcern and more personal interests—can offer a great deal when awakened to the fact that the extremist is everyone's problem. And from a common meeting they can carry back to their groups, particularly those slated for infiltration or other "treatment," the appropriate facts and warnings.

The radical-Right thrust has largely failed on the national level. Now the extremist hopes to reverse the direction of American life and government at the grass roots. There, where a more concentrated political pressure can be organized, and where infiltration and propaganda drives are more easily effected, the small, monolithic coterie gains strength from apathy and ignorance.

The members of the Birch Society are now aiming, under openly published orders, "to control the political action" at the precinct level across the country. In the grab for PTA power, they are, according to the PTA's national president, "attempting to gain control of it to get at their real objective—the educational system." Samuel Blumenfeld, one of Robert Welch's editors, shares with the Birch leader a hatred of democracy, and promises that it will be replaced "when and if the John Birch Society becomes a dominant political force in America."

The challenge could not be expressed more plainly. Responsible people must act in their own defense, wisely and soon.

PORTENT FOR THE FUTURE

Welfare Imperialism in Vietnam

JOHN McDERMOTT

Mr. McDermott is an associate editor of the magazine Viet-Report and the author of Profile of Vietnamese History. He is a lecturer on political theory at Long Island University's Brooklyn Center.

Imperialism used to be thought the last stage of a decaying capitalism. Nowadays it appears to be the last epithet of a decaying political rhetoric. Both judgments are inadequate. Contemporary imperialism is neither decaying nor capitalist nor rhetorical. We are misled into thinking so only because we are still looking for a Cecil Rhodes through the eyes of Lenin.

America's Welfare Empire

All great powers, by definition, try to exercise a guiding influence over the diplomacy of other states. Some, however, go a step further. For them an influence over external policies is not enough; they find themselves constrained to exert a guiding influence over the internal policies of other countries as well. Those which succeed I call empires, and in this nonpolemical sense of the word America is truly an empire, the largest and most powerful in the present world.

United States imperialism is of a new kind. It is primarily political and ideological, finding its expression less in our overseas investments than in the system of alliances our government has created since 1945, and in the foreign aid programs which parallel those alliances and give them life. Equally novel, our empire is ostensibly committed to the value of national independence for others, as well as humane and orderly economic development and social reconstruction. The commitment to these values is not a negligible factor in the everyday business of empire but, as I shall try to show, these commendable objectives are profoundly contradictory.

The peculiar nature of the new American imperialism rests in the fact that Americans have overlearned the lesson of the welfare state. For three decades now Americans have used their federal bureaucracy as the primary tool for bringing about social progress, economic development and a host of other desirable changes. The philosophy of the welfare state has served them well because of two basic and competing factors. On the one side, the huge financial resources and impressive technical skill of the federal bureaucracy have been sufficient to master almost any problem to which it turned its hand. On the other side, counterpoised to this huge agglomerate of power, there has been the democratic electorate. Sometimes useful in its political interventions, sometimes not, it has in the long run served to keep in equilibrium the power of the federal bureaucracy, with the result that the system has by and large served the purposes of the electorate (i.e., the purposes it was intended to serve).

This has not at all been the case overseas. There too, through alliances and aid programs, we have tried to use our governmental bureaucracy as an instrument of social progress, trying to establish a welfare empire there as we have established a welfare state here. But the weakness of popular political institutions in the underdeveloped world is legendary; thus there has been little to counterpoise the massive American military and economic aid bureaucracy. The results of the imbalance are predictable. In the countries where we have succeeded in building our empire we can observe a loss of national independence, erratic and imbalanced economic development and growing social chaos. This process may be observed in many countries of the underdeveloped world, but nowhere is it as useful to observe as in South Vietnam.

The choice of South Vietnam as a prime example of the failure of American empire is natural. Both for Americans and for Vietnamese, the tragedy of that country's recent history owes more in the way of fruitful and preventive lessons than it has yet yielded. Vietnamese history also provides, and uniquely so, instructive comparisons between the older empire of the French and the newer American variety. These, however, are secondary reasons for our choice. Much more important is the fact that in South Vietnam we find the future blueprint for American policies in the underdeveloped areas. For there, more than in any other place, naval, commercial and diplomatic ties to the past—so strong elsewhere—were missing. The United States began afresh in South Vietnam in 1954. It began without any significant residue of an earlier Vietnamese policy and its personnel; until the 1960s no such ties developed. Contrary to some popular myths our policy in South Vietnam was not guided, for the most part, by men committed to the protection of this or that tradition-bound institutional interest. Instead, our policy there was directed by men of liberal outlook who were committed to Vietnamese independence, and who attempted to bring about the development of Vietnamese society guided by the same concepts of economic and social development which more and more guide our policies elsewhere. Thus, it is no exaggeration to say that an examination of the history of our Vietnamese policy will reveal far less a remnant of the past than a portent for the future.

French Pattern in Vietnam

One of the most striking things about the French presence in Vietnam was that it came about as the result of the efforts of a small segment of the French polity and continued in this narrow character, never gaining the full support of either the French people or their government. From early modern times the Church was concerned to protect the large Catholic minority from the continuing persecutions of the Vietnamese emperors. In the 1840s the navy, joining with the Church, began to seek Far Eastern coaling stations and naval bases. In the 1870s, following their terrible defeat at Bismarck's hands, French generals grew interested in Vietnam in the hope that native levies would strengthen the French army against its more numerous German foe. There were some investors, though not very many, since the Bank of Indo-China retained a near monopoly on investments in the area. Finally, there grew up a tiny class of colons who resided in Vietnam, serving in the civil apparatus, at the numerous military posts, or as supervisory personnel on the few plantations.

It was the sum of the special interests of these groups and theirs alone which constituted French policy throughout the Indo-China states, and when military defeat threatened their control, as finally it did in 1954, the government and people of France, with profound disinterest, washed their hands of the whole affair. This small group of interests had controlled Vietnam through the Colonial Office in Paris. Though differing in legal status, the colony of Cochin-China (southern Vietnam), the protectorates of Annam (central Vietnam) and Tonkin (northern Vietnam) were ruled in much the same manner. When the French "occupation" began in the middle '80s it disturbed the formal Vietnamese governmental apparatus very little. It simply paralleled it, reducing its role to empty ceremony: the Emperor and his Mandarin civil service continued, the province councils met, but decisions were made and executed by the French. Ultimately, French authority rested on the police which was French staffed, and on the Foreign Legion and army posts scattered along the main roads and in the larger towns.

Unlike North Africa, there were very few Frenchmen in Indo-China before World War II—only about 18,000 in 1939. Again unlike North Africa, few Frenchmen took up homesteads: what French agriculture there was was of the plantation type worked by native labor.

Consequently, after one has considered Franco-Vietnamese trade, investments and some aspects of military and naval policy, the position of the Catholic villages and the juridical status of temporary European residents, one has about exhausted the relevant information about France in Vietnam and, more important, the totality of its policy interests.

This is not to say that the French did not set in motion profound changes in Vietnamese society. The decline in the status of the Emperor, the withering away of the Mandarinate's vitality, the growth of Western ideas, and the creation of a small French-speaking urban class were to have great effect on Vietnam's future. Similarly, the decline in the real standard of living in the countryside, and the growing separation between developing cities and a stagnating countryside were to have enormous impact.

But these changes were related to French policy only inadvertently and were by no means the intended and foreseen result of that policy. French interests, because they were so limited and specialized, did not care about changes (or the lack of them) in village life. France hardly touched the dispersed rural settlement pattern. Peasant agricultural technology was left alone; village social and political institutions were, for the most part, ignored. Though the Europeans did disrupt an already existing Vietnamese school system, they did not try fully to replace it with a French system and, consequently, the literary continuity of the native culture was never seriously threatened, though the literacy rate fell sharply. The French accepted popular hostility; the rebellions which kept cropping up—no decade of the French occupation was free of them—were dealt with in the most savage manner and with no quarter given. For the colonialists did not care what the Vietnamese thought of them or how the Vietnamese lived. If a Vietnamese stayed out of politics, avoided the Communists and other nationalist agitators, performed his labor service, paid his taxes, and went off once per generation for service against the Germans in Europe, colonial policy was finished with him and didn't care who he was, what he did or what he was to become.

'Progressive' and 'Colonialist' France

Much is now made of the civilizing mission of France in that part of the world but the dissemination of French culture was not originally a part of colonial policy, and very little civilizing was done in Vietnam where Church, army, navy, colon and the Bank of Indo-China held sway. Each of these groups—together the core of the French Right—acted resolutely within the colony to prevent the "natives" from becoming "civilized," for that meant acquiring the ideals of 1789. It was only when a Vietnamese left his own land and went to Europe, as many did, that the other France—Republican France, Socialist France, literary France—became a reality for him. (Even today most Vietnamese Communists still draw a systematic distinction between "progressive" France and "colonialist" France.) When in the aftermath of World War I some effort was made by enlightened Frenchmen to better the lot of the subject people and to provide more schools, particularly in higher education, it was from the standpoint of colonial policy only an afterthought and one which received, relatively speaking, very little attention.

It is a tribute to French culture that so many Vietnamese now consider themselves part of French civilization. However, the culture they share with their European brethren is understood to be a French culture, part of the unique historical experience of a specific historical people. What is shared is a heritage of the past, not a blueprint for the future. The ideals and achievements of French culture are understood as belonging to the past; for the present and for the future they provide only the basis of a limited community and withal, for the Vietnamese at least, a community only of feeling and regard, certainly not one that implies any concrete future political or economic relationship between France and Vietnam. Most important, even those Vietnamese who consider themselves part of a French civilization remain nonetheless Vietnamese. This was and is recognized on both sides and is perhaps best expressed in a remark quoted by Bernard Fall in The Two Viet-Nams. Replying to a proposal that native Vietnamese be permitted to become officers in the French Army, a colon is reported to have declared:

> Either they will be worthy of becoming French officers, > in which case their highest ideal will be to liberate the soil of their fatherland and their most noble endeavor should be to throw us into the sea. Or those people will content themselves with getting their pay and wearing a beautiful uniform while preserving a servant's soul—and in that case, I don't want them as officers in the French Army.

The frank recognition of an ineradicable Vietnamese cultural identity is utterly alien to the American-Vietnamese relationship which was to develop after 1954.

Arrival of the Americans

In the late summer of 1954 a major American effort began in Vietnam, one calculated, it was hoped, to save the country from the until then victorious Communists of Ho Chi Minh. France appeared ready to abandon all political claims in the area and to U.S. policy makers this was perhaps the most hopeful sign of all, for the continued presence of the French had been undermining the efforts of anti-Communist Vietnamese nationalists to build a counterforce to the Communist-led Vietminh. The Vietnamese chief of state, former Emperor Bao Dai, was widely acknowledged to be a French puppet. He "ruled" through the French administration, and the French army protected him from the legions of Ho Chi Minh. Similarly, the Cao Dai and Hao Hoa religious sects and the squabbling politicians of Hanoi, Hué and Saigon were, according to the Americans, creatures of the French and tainted by collaboration with them: on the latter's departure they too would disappear from the scene and open the way for a genuine anti-colonialist and anti-Communist nationalism to assert itself.

Heretofore, the Americans believed, the Communists had been ceded the nationalist issue. Through the dreadful depression years of the thirties, marked by stark poverty, fitful insurrections and the ruthless hounding down of independent elements by the French police, the Communists had almost alone maintained an effective opposition to the occupation. When Japan took control of Vietnam during the Second World War, the Communists had formed a league of nationalist elements—the Vietminh—which then conducted a difficult and successful guerrilla resistance against the new invader. They had declared Vietnam's independence in 1945 and had successfully defended that independence in the eight-year war against the French which followed. The Americans recognized that to this general regard and esteem the Vietminh had added the loyalties of a considerable part of the peasant population. The Vietminh, openly dominated by the Communists, had re-established the autonomy of the village councils and had carried out a widespread and popular land reform; it had brought schools and medical services to the villages; it seemed to promise a prosperous and modernized rural economy for the future. Equally important, it alone among all of the Vietnamese political groups had long worked with the peasantry, recruited them into its cadres and shown them the way to independence. Like the Trung sisters and other national heroes out of the dim past who are so celebrated in the folk literature of rural Vietnam, the Vietminh had trained and led peasant troops against powerful foreign adversaries and had won epic victories over them. Columnist Joseph Alsop, who traveled through many of the former Vietminh districts in late 1954, confirmed the existence and importance of this bond between the peasant population and the Communist party. As he wrote:

> In the area I visited the Communists have scored a whole series of political, organizational, military, and one has to say it—moral triumphs. . . .
>
> The thing that impressed me most, in fact, was not the Communists' extraordinary feat of organizing, maintaining and expanding an independent state in southern Indochina without exterior support, and in the teeth of French power. What impressed me, alas, was the moral fervor they had inspired among the non-Communist Vietminh cadres and the stout support they had obtained from the peasantry.

Americans believed that with a peasantry so infected by Communists and communism, other Vietnamese nationalists seemed to have little chance of winning popular support, but that perhaps the massive power and appeal of the United States could tip the balance. The United States was new to the area; it had its own anti-colonialist traditions; it had shown its good faith by setting the Philippines free; it had unlimited resources, and it was desperate to stop what it believed was the southward march of China's conquest.

A Strong U. S. Commitment

By the terms of the Geneva Agreements the Vietminh had withdrawn its main forces and cadres north of the 17th Parallel in late 1954, and it was into the chaos south of that demarcation line that the new U.S. presence and the new U.S. policy had already begun to take effect. Two leading ideas characterized this policy. First, in place of France's discredited colonial solution to Vietnam's problems the United States would try a nationalist solution. Allying itself with the forces of anti-Communist nationalism, the U.S. would work to preserve the southern zone from the Vietminh. Second, since it was the poverty, misery and gullibility of the peasantry which seem to have enabled it to be duped by the utopian and millennial appeals of the Communists, it was decided that a strong American commitment to economic development would help lead the country to prosperity, that the peasantry could thereby be won away from the Vietminh. Accordingly, even before the fall of Dienbienphu in May, the United States had thrown its support to one of the numerous anti-French Vietnamese nationalists, Ngo Dinh Diem. Under American pressure, Diem was finally appointed Prime Minister in late June and, together with him, U.S. officials worked to remove the French from the scene. This was substantially achieved by early 1955. The first step in the American solution was complete; France was gone, South Vietnam was independent. There now remained the much more difficult task of counseling the new regime in the ways of building a firm political base and in bringing about the necessary economic development which promised the best long-run solution to South Vietnam's ills—internal and external. To this task fell not a narrow and limited segment of the American polity but the full force of the United States Government.

The French ruled Vietnam as a colony. Committed as it was to a nationalist solution and facing, moreover, an independent Vietnam jealous of its newly won prerogatives, the United States had a far more difficult task in bringing its influence to bear. Officials representing the interests of the U.S. Government had to compete with other interests, Vietnamese interests, to gain from the decision-making processes of the sovereign Vietnamese government policies Americans favored, laws they desired, administrative edicts they thought necessary. An analysis of this lobbying process reveals that the resources brought to bear by the American interest far outweighed those of any combination of its competitors, so much so that South Vietnam's political independence became in certain respects meaningless. More important, the aspect of Vietnamese life in which the government's political independence meant least was precisely that aspect which determined Vietnam's future: its internal economic development. This is just the reverse of the colonial experience where the modern power dictated day-to-day decisions but left future internal developments in the colony to work themselves out by chance, inadvertence and the incoherent impulses of the colony's domestic forces.

Influencing an Independent Nation

The task of gaining decisions for the American interest was made easier than might otherwise have been the case by the over-centralization and authoritarianism which were characteristic of the Saigon government (and of the governments of underdeveloped nations generally). That so many national activities rested in Saigon's hands meant that most frequently the competitors to the U.S. interest were one or more sections of the Vietnamese bureaucracy. Aside from other considerations this facilitated the mechanical task of locating where and how important decisions were to be made. In addition, because the regime was authoritarian, the power which various native social and economic interests could bring to bear on decisions and policies in their favor was very limited. The Chinese minority which dominated internal trade, the Buddhists, the landlords, the traditionalists who surrounded Bao Dai at Hué and Dalat had few means to pressure the Diem government. Although each of them did in fact pressure Saigon at one time or another in the period from 1954 to 1961 and, with the exception of the former Emperor's retainers, each had some success, the nature of their demands and the extent to which they could press them were limited by the fact that Diem could, if necessary, resort to his police to gain his will; they had no counter to arbitrary police power. Finally, Diem was an outsider. American officials liked him because "no taint" of Saigon's politics or French collaboration had touched him. Though this was an exaggeration, it was to a large extent true. It also meant that he was not the representative or prisoner of one or more domestic interests, that he ruled, in a sense, freely. His interest was the state apparatus and he controlled it absolutely for nine years.

Against this truncated social system American officials brought the immense prestige of the United States which no Chinese merchants' association and no landlords' cabal could rival. The magnitude of U.S. influence is suggested by the fact that in the "normal" period, 1954-61, direct U.S. aid accounted for about one-third of Saigon's budget and still another third came from taxes on American subsidized imports. In addition, in this period the U.S. Government, exclusive of the military, retained a skilled staff of almost 200 full-time lobbyists for its interests, the AID Mission.

U.S. influence was exerted at a remarkable diversity of points; no domestic competitor could match it. The Americans had influenced the choice of Diem in the first place. They gave technical and dollar support to a revamping of the entire Vietnamese educational system from elementary schools through the university and technical institute level. This included both teacher training and the rewriting of textbooks. They gave technical assistance in revising the banking and currency system and in framing general economic and monetary policy. The United States Operations Mission (USOM—the AID Mission) undertook planning and dollar support for the reconstruction and development of the entire Vietnamese transportation and communications network—railroads, canals, highways, civil aviation, coastal transport, radio and television, and the telephone system. They assisted in planning and executing the various agricultural programs, including crop diversification, land reclamation, land reform, agricultural extension and mass peasant regroupment (the Refugee Resettlement, Land Development, Agroville and later Strategic Hamlet Programs). Finally, they exerted extremely strong influence over the nation's two largest economic activities (exclusive of farming)—military operations and the import business.

Military Aid Threatens Inflation

The U.S. Government directly subsidized the swollen South Vietnamese army.

Because these large military expenditures in Vietnam threatened a dangerous inflation, the U.S. also subsidized a special import program designed to soak up excessive buying power from the Vietnamese public. Such an import program, which is the standard American complement to military aid programs, encourages imports by pricing them at artificially low levels. Vietnamese citizens who wished to import goods paid over the (low) cost of the goods directly to the Saigon government, which used the money for its own budget. The Americans then paid directly for the goods at regular prices. In this manner the problem of too much money chasing too few goods was solved. U.S. officials have since admitted in Congressional testimony that the program had other than anti-inflationary purposes. For the most part only urban civil servants and the officer corps were able to afford imported goods, even at the artificially low prices we maintained. By subsidizing the importation of large quantities of consumer articles USOM officials believed, accurately enough, that the U.S. was thereby creating a prosperous middle class which was dependent on the Diem regime, i.e., a domestic base of support for the Vietnamese government.

As always in lobbying, the locus of one's influence is important. In Vietnam, U.S. influence was invariably at the key planning level. There, where decisions on what was to be done were made, and with what priority, where a choice existed between competing values, the U.S. had exceptionally strong authority. In addition it had a special relationship to the three decisive Vietnamese bureaucracies:

the civil service, the military and the police, including the secret police. Within each of these bureaucracies U.S. officials shared explicit responsibilities for personnel selection, training, indoctrination and equipment. The Michigan State University Advisory Group (MSUG)—American professors under contract to the Vietnamese government—ran the National Institute of Administration (civil service academy) and the National Police Academy, and provided technical assistance at the operating level to both the civil police and the security police. The Military Assistance Advisory Group (MAAG) duplicated these services for the Vietnamese military. In addition, Americans had unique access to the leader of the totalitarian state. Aside from U.S. ambassadors and traveling VIPs, Edward Lansdale of the CIA was an intimate adviser to Diem and Nhu. Wesley Fishel, head of MSUG, followed Lansdale as intimate adviser to the dictator, breakfasting with Diem thrice weekly.

Coordination of Power and Skill

There were no American companies to speak of in Vietnam, no clamoring that their divergent interests be served. Instead, the full power and skill of the U.S. Government was coordinated to bring about changes in Vietnamese life. True, the State Department and CIA, Pentagon generals and USOM economists often competed and often were played against one another by the wily family that ran the country. But on the overall objectives of U.S. policy—on bringing about the modernization of Vietnamese society, on building the nation's internal political structure, on supporting the incumbent government, on taking those steps necessary to keep the Communists out of power—there was a single policy, and it was carried out with few lapses. Against this coordinated effort there was posed chiefly a Vietnamese bureaucracy notorious for its clumsiness, dishonesty and inefficiency. And each of these three weaknesses of Diem's bureaucracy offered systematic opportunities for American officials to win their way.

U.S. intelligence services gave Americans information of a quantity and quality not likely to be rivaled except by the secret police of the regime—to which we had a special relation. Much more important, the U.S. had a near monopoly in the decisive area of technical information: military and agricultural technology, economic and industrial techniques, statistics, accounting, management and record keeping; it is the lack of these skills which defines what we mean by an "underdeveloped" society.

Last, the ability of the U.S. to reward its friends and punish its enemies was greater by far than any of its potential rivals. The U.S. could use bribes (as it did on some of the sect generals in 1955); it could hold back dollar support for programs it thought inadequate. (It is widely acknowledged that the paratroop coup of November, 1960, failed for lack of U.S. support. As David Halberstam has shown in The Making of a Quagmire, the successful coup of 1963 awaited indications that the U.S. would not oppose its result.) And for a Vietnamese to have friendly relations with the Americans might mean travel to the U.S., selection for a special training program, a good performance report, occasionally a word to the President. Later, even when Vietnam's internal crisis quickened and Diem tried to appear more anti-American than the Vietcong (in order to deny the Vietcong their highly successful propaganda theme that the dictator was our puppet), many Vietnamese believed that having an American friend was as good a way as any to avoid disappearing into one of the regime's prisons.

The American lobby was overwhelming. Possessing great prestige, spread throughout the Vietnamese government but thien

SAIGON
VIET NGUYEN TU
LIBR
HBU956

Catherine Merrill

clustered at the strategic points, well coordinated, with a near monopoly of technical information and armed with a significant stock of favors for its friends and threats for its foes, the U.S. interest in Vietnam was in a position to achieve almost any policy it desired. Provided it was determined enough, not even the dictator himself could withstand the U.S. choice.

Thus, it is understandable why and in what way the U.S. interest was more important for Vietnamese life than the French interest in the earlier period. The French controlled everyday affairs but directed that control to a relatively narrow range of Vietnamese events. Outside that range French influence was inadvertent and, therefore, blind. However disruptive their influence was on Vietnam's future the colonial French hardly controlled that future. The U.S. presence was far more important. The U.S. didn't care about everyday affairs. The U.S. was concerned about economic development, i.e., about the future of what are among the most decisive aspects of a culture: how a people work, what they work at, what they produce, the institutions which govern the distribution of that product, the principles which those institutions embody. In these areas the U.S. influence was focused and, I think it may fairly be said, the government of South Vietnam could not act independently. The policies it followed tended to be, in the final analysis, the policies of the U.S. government.

The Peasant Problem

From the beginning American officials foresaw conflict between U.S. policy and the likely direction in which the peasantry—constituting the major part of the population—would assert its interests. The peasantry was understood to be politically unsophisticated and, as a result, infected by Communist sympathies. Superstitious and credulous, rural Vietnam seemed an easy mark for the semi-religious appeals of the Communists who seemed to promise a paradise in a future period called roughly "after the national revolution." The Americans saw the Communists not as the champion of the peasantry, but rather as infiltrators into its ranks—manipulators of its discontent, ruthless exploiters of its misery and ignorance. There were Communists and there were peasants: there could be no Communist peasants. Nevertheless, implicit in the situation was peasant opposition to U.S. policies. The likelihood of this opposition was reinforced in American eyes by the belief that the peasantry, beneath its Communist appearance, was fundamentally traditionalist and thus opposed to change even if that change meant emancipation from the miseries of its great poverty.

Viewing the matter in this way it was natural that the Americans should assign to the interests of the peasantry a low priority in the economic development process they were committed to bring about. They were committed to modernization and this implied that urban interests had to take precedence. Briefly, the degree of the commitment to urban over rural development is indicated by the U.S. aid that was directed to the two sectors of Vietnamese life. Of the $1,544 million of economic assistance given Vietnam between 1954 and 1961, only $42 million (less than 3 per cent) was directed to programs involving the peasantry; and this is somewhat exaggerated because it represents the total of American project assistance to education, health and agriculture. Yet in education and in health the needs of the rural areas took second place to those of the cities; urban technicians and urban civil service were understood to have a positive and creative role in economic development, and the peasants did not. In addition, the Import Program served to provide a means of gaining the voluntary cooperation of urban Vietnamese, and no analogous device seemed available (or was deemed either necessary or desirable) for the countryside.

A ramification of this view was that the U.S. had to commit itself to a policy which would neutralize the political role of the peasantry. So long as we were committed to anti-communism and the development of a high-consumption urban economy, the peasantry could not play an important role. The best that could be done was to check their influence on events until such time as the benefits of economic development reached them and brought about the political sophistication which comes from being immersed in modern technology. Operating on this premise the Vietnamese government pursued a three-pronged attempt to neutralize the peasantry, and in each of these prongs it had important support from the American officials who gave planning advice, dollar aid and technical assistance.

The first part of the effort at peasant neutralization consisted in the development of a totalitarian control apparatus—copied from Communist models and not differing from them in any significant way. From the 15th century on, Vietnamese villages were governed by councils elected by all of the adult male villagers. But in October, 1956, the Saigon government abrogated this traditional autonomy and undertook to appoint village chiefs and council members. Hamlet chiefs were also appointed from Saigon and, in addition, the population was organized into five-family cells called lien-gia, each with an appointed chief. As in totalitarian countries everywhere, mutual spying was systematically encouraged; passes were needed for movement in and out of the village; the population was fingerprinted, and identification cards were issued. There were the usual rallies in support of the national leaders and something new—rallies to denounce communism (modeled on the Chinese rallies against class enemies and imperialists). Arrest and detention were made an administrative matter rather than a legal one, and those unfortunate enough to be arrested were sent to re-education camps (also copied from Communist models).

The Pacification Campaign

As this apparatus was introduced gradually into the countryside in early 1957, many villages resisted. Against this resistance a second prong, the pacification campaign, was directed. Full-scale military operations with infantry, armor, artillery and air power were used to subdue the rebels. After government control was introduced it was maintained somewhat in the manner of the French system. Garrisons of troops, usually the Civil Guard, were planted in forts along the main roads and in the larger towns, and periodically sent out on forays against the recurrent unrest in the villages. It should be mentioned, however, that U.S.

officials opposed this latter strategy, feeling that once a village was initially "pacified" authority there should be maintained by police techniques and not military measures. They correctly pointed out that the French had tried and failed with such pacification campaigns and that there was every likelihood that Diem would also. But by 1959 the security situation in the countryside had so deteriorated that it was not safe for police units to operate there. The Americans relented and dollar support for the Civil Guard, which had been held to a minimum, was increased to what Saigon thought was an adequate level.

The final prong in the campaign to neutralize Vietnam's peasantry involved mass population regroupment. In 1955-57, northern Catholic refugee villages were resettled in the countryside in such a way as to contribute to the control of the rest of the peasantry. Growing out of what appeared to be the success of this program, the Diem government, at American urging, undertook a series of regroupment programs aimed at improving rural security. The successive programs had different names and each was larger than that which preceded it. Called variously Land Development in 1957-58, the Agroville Program in 1959-61, and the Strategic Hamlet Program from 1962 to Diem's fall—the current name is New Life Program—they embodied refinements in carrying out basic objectives. These objectives involved grouping disloyal villagers in secure districts, loyal villagers in rebellious or strategically important districts, and changing the settlement pattern to bring the peasantry under closer control of the Civil Guard posts.

A South Vietnamese village is not a settlement—it is a political unit. Within the village the peasantry live in widely separated clusters of houses called hamlets. A typical village might have, say, five or six hamlets, each of several hundred people. By grouping the hamlets together the task of controlling the population was made easier. Eventually, under the Strategic Hamlet Program about 80 per cent of the rural population was so regrouped and, as in the earlier programs, almost always involuntarily.

In the short run this triple program was successful. The peasantry were successfully neutralized, if we understand by this term that they were prevented from competing in the decision-making processes of the South Vietnamese government. In this sense the U.S. interest had effectively muted its major competitor. Of course, in a larger framework the policy was a dismal failure, since such frustrated interests as there were among the peasantry found outlet in the form of open and large-scale insurrection.

U. S. Ignores Interests of Peasants

Americans believed, as apparently they still do, that they were acting as trustees for the "real" interests of a politically simple and credulous peasantry. Yet they paid little attention to the apparent and expressed interests of the peasants. The desire for schools was one of these. Recruitment to the precolonial mandarinate had been at least partially dependent on merit, as measured by periodic competitive examinations. As a result the French had found a fairly high literacy rate in the rural areas when they began their occupation. Although they abolished this school system and replaced it by a smaller French-administered one (to which relatively few Vietnamese were admitted), the peasantry continued to place a high value on education throughout the colonial period. In many regions the Vietminh had built schools in 1946-54, but the Diem government quickly suppressed them. In the MSUG studies of Vietnamese village life, investigators found that the development of adequate schools ranked high on the list of expressed peasant concerns. Despite this, and despite the fact that in 1956 only 1,000 of Vietnam's 6,000 villages had schools, the USOM was content with a leisurely fourteen-year program to bring at least one school to each village. In rural medicine there was a similar situation. The French had provided fairly good rural medical services but these had been disrupted by the first Indo-China war, though characteristically in this area too the Vietminh had improvised an effective program. Again U.S. policy makers showed little regard for expressed rural preferences. Although tuberculosis and malaria were constantly at epidemic levels, although a USOM survey indicated that perhaps 15 per cent of the rural population were blind as a result of trachoma, and although other tropical diseases were rampant, planning encompassed only the modest goal of bringing first-aid levels of medical services to the villages at the end of five years. In addition, the very crucial years 1957 and 1958 were characterized by poor harvests, falling rice prices and a general increase in the price of manufactured goods used by the peasantry. There was no response to these problems from Saigon and its American advisers.

Besides ignoring peasant interests, the United States ignored the effect of Saigon's (and our) policies on the countryside. A land-reform program enacted with great fanfare in 1956 (and not actually begun until early 1958) demanded payment for land which the peasantry believed it already owned: the Vietminh had accomplished its own land reform prior to 1954. Naturally there was intense, and often armed, opposition. The centralization of village administration carried out by the Diem government on American urging in 1956 had equally serious effects. Over 10 per cent of the rice land of South Vietnam was owned by the villages themselves and, by conservative estimate, these lands were the chief (and often the sole) support of at least one-fifth of the rural population. Traditionally, the village councils had charge of these lands, and it was customary to rent them out at very low rates, the resulting income being the chief source of village revenues. Similarly, small acreages were also rented out to support the village bonze (Buddhist priest) and the priests of other religions and cults. Since all adult male villagers participated in the election of the village council the system tended to be a reasonably effective and stable way of protecting the interests of the very poorest classes of Vietnamese rural society. When Diem's appointive village councils replaced the electoral system in October, 1956, this protection was lost. The Saigon government immediately ordered the new councils to rent the land out at the highest rates obtainable, thus, in a stroke, creating serious religious grievances and, more important, canceling the livelihood of a considerable part of the peasantry. Finally, U.S. policy ignored the very real and deep desire for reunification of the 2,000-year-old Vietnamese nation. Vietnamese nationalism is a folk tradition; it has, as Martin Nicolaus of Viet-Report has pointed out, "more heroes than the Catholic Church has saints." Diem's refusal to allow the elections of 1956 which (as provided by the Geneva Agreements) would have reunified the country was a sharp blow against clear peasant sentiment. And in this action Diem had strong and explicit support from the United States.

In short, the U.S. tended to ignore or, when necessary, frustrate the interests not only of the peasantry but of all those Vietnamese who did not fit into the plans we had for Vietnamese development. Sometimes this took the form of ascribing our own interests to the Vietnamese as their "real" interests. Then when they came into conflict with American interests their activity was judged illicit and steps were taken to curb them, usually by force. This attitude, still prevalent, was most concisely expressed last fall by Henry Cabot Lodge:

> The Ambassador said that he would know when the war was won in Vietnam . . . when one morning the young man who's been in the Vietcong wakes up and says, "I am not going back today and the reason I'm not going back is (a) I think I'll get killed, and (b) I look around me and I see the rice and fish and the ducks and the coconuts, the pineapples, American aid coming in and life looks pretty good right here."

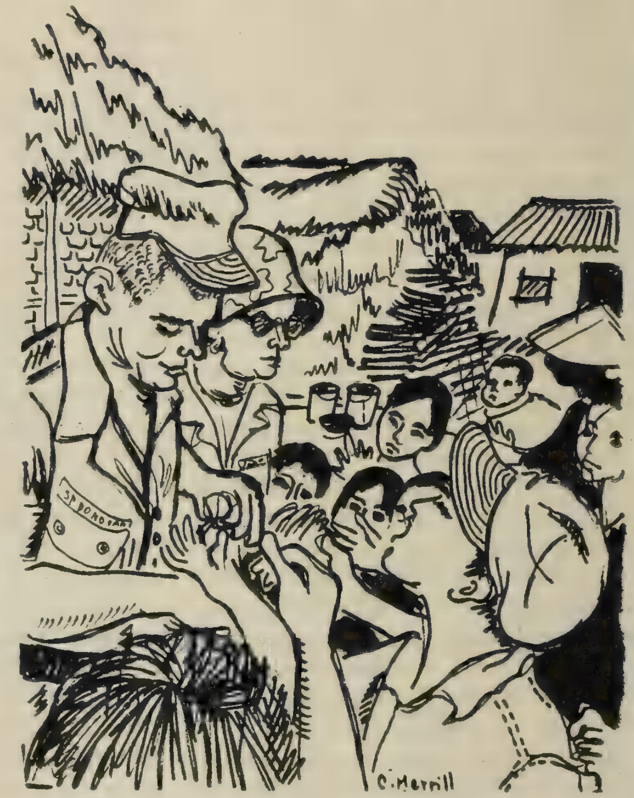
The French colon understood that good Vietnamese made bad French officers. Lodge, by arguing that even "bad" Vietnamese can be turned into "good" consumers, reveals a familiar tenet of contemporary American ideology. He suggests, too, that in exporting its goods and advice America exports itself as well.

The Nature of the Conflict

Anti-communism is only a stance; the commitment to economic development is a strategy, a program, an outline of actual policies. In this sense, the chief source of conflict between the mass of the Vietnamese peasantry and the policies of the United States Government was our commitment to a policy of rapid economic development. For Americans, economic development entailed a planned program to bring about a society of a definite kind—one that would set primary value on increasing productivity by means of the maximal exploitation of a given level of technical knowledge. The role of Americans and the influence of American attitudes were paramount here. The very meaning of economic development—with its emphasis on the production of consumer goods and a consumer class—reflects a desire on the part of most Americans to help developing nations follow the same course as American economic history.

But while most Americans think of economic development as something "scientific," out of the realm of politics, U.S. offiicals in Vietnam recognized that it was indeed a political matter. They understood that "modernization" required changes in Vietnam's institutions, and thus they were prepared to help design and execute the Agroville Program. They understood that it required profound social changes, for as the society and the economy changed and some classes and their functions became obsolete, new classes with new social roles had to arise. They recognized that outlooks and values would change inevitably under the impact of economic development, and so they concerned themselves with guiding those outlooks and values. They took a profound interest in the totality of the Vietnamese educational system, even to rewriting the textbooks; they undertook to establish and staff Vietnam's communications network in the early years and to advise it thereafter.

Our officials there understood that with change would come social and political disorder. As a Washington official put it to me recently: We understood that we had to "filter out anti-social behavior" and encourage what we believed to be creative and integrating behavior patterns. Thus the Import Program encouraged the consuming proclivities of the urban civil service, while MSUG's police advisers and later our Special Forces men tried to "filter out" peasant rebelliousness.



The conflict which developed in Vietnam did not arise out of a failure to carry out a policy. It was not the stupidity of senior American officials which was to blame. This popular explanation holds that our officials grew too committed to Diem and his entourage and, as a result, allowed themselves to grow distant from events in the countryside. This certainly happened; but officials were not ignorant of the fact that the peasants were hostile to the regime and engaged in resisting it. This they knew; it was the very thing they had planned against since 1954. Their ignorance merely concerned the extent to which American policies drove the rebellion on and the ineffectiveness of the new countermeasures which followed.

Similarly, the conflict is not traceable chiefly to an overreliance on military aid as against economic aid though this is also a popular notion. Until mid-1959 U.S. military aid had little to do with the peasants. Until then the army, which obtained most of it, was kept within its posts because its French-trained leadership was still mistrusted by Diem. Of far greater importance to the rebellion were the MSUG Police Program, the Land Reform Program and the economic contrasts between city and country—each attributable to the economic aid program. Nor is it traceable to an over-reliance on authoritarianism. That Diem's regime was authoritarian did make it easier for U.S. development programs to be lobbied through, but it is difficult not to believe that even a very democratic regime would have found its developmental independence severely curtailed by overwhelmingly strong American influence.

The nub of the Vietnamese problem was not, as Senator Fulbright would have it, that we were trying to be the world's policeman. It was instead that we were trying to be the world's social worker. Only when that failed did we turn the coin over and call in the police. Yet in a deeper sense the policy was a "success." As intended, our developmental program succeeded in setting off changes in Vietnamese society, in Vietnam's institutions, in Vietnamese values. As expected, it created social and political disorder. But this disorder developed with such rapidity and such magnitude that it nearly overwhelmed our efforts to "filter it out."

Modernization, American Style

The conflict in Vietnam was and is in the very broadest sense a cultural one. The United States succeeded in imposing a development pattern which was but a thinly disguised version of modernization, American style. It succeeded in imposing this pattern but at the expense of allowing various elements in Vietnamese society to work out an alternative modernization pattern, one which would reflect the national past of Vietnam and not of the United States, one which would reflect the interests of the Vietnamese people not merely the desires of American technicians. The United States succeeded by damming up those social groups, particularly the peasant majority, which a normal pattern would have encompassed as its dynamic force. The pattern we brought about was imported — what was needed was a native one; it was bureaucratic — what was needed was a political one.

The French had proposed that their culture was relevant to Vietnam as something which, while remaining French, had universal aspects which could be shared in the form of a common heritage. By dominating the developmental process and imposing on it an imported pattern, American cultural influence attempted to determine the course of Vietnamese national life for the next epoch. Is it any wonder that good Vietnamese reject our pretty uniforms and strive desperately to throw us into the sea?

U. S. Welfare Imperialism: the Future

United States developmental policy in Vietnam is, to a large degree, the same policy that our government presses in the rest of the underdeveloped world. As in Vietnam, we attempt elsewhere to influence in a decisive way the process of economic development, the process which will choose the institutions, the social classes, and the values which will constitute the new nation that is coming to be.

To the other countries where we have development programs, we make the same forceful offer of our own economic experience; we expect it to be universally relevant, able to guide nations which differ in a thousand important ways from one another and ourselves. This requires the same dismissal of native interests and impulses. And as in Vietnam, the United States has the same overwhelming means to lobby its interest into effect.

This is not to say that there are not differences, but I fear that the differences are relative to the past, while the similarities bear most heavily on the future. U.S. economic interests grow daily more intertwined with government policy and more committed to its objectives. In Venezuela, for example, the oil and steel firms which play so important a role there pursue policies which are to a large extent integrated with those of the aid program. And U.S. officials seem committed to the proposition that Venezuela shall be the archetype for the hemisphere. In addition, while there remain nations whose rulers are not yet committed to the necessity for modernization, our government's activities have, with some exception, tended to decrease their number. That, of course, is the explicit meaning of the Alliance for Progress and the programs we pursue in Asia and Africa. And almost everywhere the influence of the old colonial powers wanes while ours grows stronger. In Belgian Africa and British India the long-run prospect is that American influence will replace that of the former colonial powers.

America is building a curious empire, a kind which has never before been seen. It is committed not to the exploitation of the native peoples but to their welfare. One must not overlook this fact and think of our imperialism as a variant of the colonial imperialism of a past era. They are not analogous. Certainly venality, brutality, the urge to acquire illicit power are present in our executive bureaucracy no less than the bureaucracies of the French or Portuguese. Certainly we too have our share of seekers after martial glory—the Green Berets come to mind—and overseas profits. But most Americans, military and civilian, in government and in business, believe that to the best of our ability we are working to help the poorer nations—not merely to increase our own power.

We have been so blinded, however, by our commitment to the ideology of modernization that we fail to see the political imbalance we thereby create. There has been no effective democratic counterpoise to our welfare empire overseas. Not only has this counterpoise been missing but the central thrust of our development policy has been to prevent its inception—neutralize it, filter it out—until the developing nation has achieved "stability." Whether the politics of such imbalanced development will ever permit stable societies to come about is doubtful. But the question is now academic. For the present we may expect to see the bureaucratic power of the U.S. Government more and more opposed by armed resistance as native peoples seek to control their own future.

America's welfare imperialism promises to disrupt the life of other nations far more than did the older colonial imperialism of the British, French, Dutch and Portuguese. Each of these empires was exploitative in the sense of seeking monetary profit, prestige and military or naval standing. But the United States seeks more from the underdeveloped world; it is vitally concerned with the central processes of social and economic development. Colonial imperialism dealt mainly with questions of boundaries, ports and commodities. But U.S. imperialism extends into the lives of ordinary people and tries to control them, now and for the future.

U. S. Policy vs. Communism

It follows, too, that our developmental influence is in some ways more of a danger to the stability of these conflict-torn areas than is communism, whether of the Soviet, Chinese or national variety. Our policy shows many similarities to that of communism, which, ironically, in some measure determined it. Our policy also proposes a universally relevant social blueprint, and surely this blueprint is no less "revolutionary" than the one proposed by the Communists themselves.

However, the revolt of the Hungarians against the Russian occupation in 1956 seems to have left within the Soviet Union specifically, and within Communist parties generally, an understanding of and commitment to the reality of independent national development. While the U.S. has also publicly agreed to the rightness and desirability of independent development, its agreement is merely rhetorical. In addition, American policy has at its disposal economic resources far greater than the Soviet Union or China. In the 20th century it is economic resources and technical skills, not masses of people, which are decisive in acquiring and maintaining influence over others. Those Americans who quail at the specter of an isolationist China which controls a quarter of the world's people might well consider the standpoint of Vietnamese, Peruvians and Nigerians who see instead the specter of an America which alone controls over half the world's economic resources and technical skills and is, as well, fully committed to an ideology of social and political interventionism.

We are mixing together the two great explosive forces of the 20th century. Our overwhelming resources and influence constitute, for most of the people of the underdeveloped world, what they believed was a thing of the past: the compromise of their national independence at the hands of an advanced power. And to this already potent source of violence we add all the turmoil inherent in the difficult process of transition, from traditional society to the modern technological age—from the familiar to the alien. The magnitude and tenacity of popular resistance in Vietnam are indeed stark warnings that this mixture is calculated to create Vietnams everywhere.

Some Proposals

There is a need and demand everywhere for the resources that bring about improvements in people's lives. Education and health programs, increases in agricultural productivity, a greater supply of useful manufactured items are all strongly desired by the peoples of the world. The United States, which alone is able to supply these resources in quantities equal to the actual and potential demand, has aided nations, as I have tried to indicate, in ways which seriously threaten their independence, distort their internal political life, and encourage the forces of chaos and disorder.

A way to get around this dilemma—which seems increasingly to be the policy of our government—would be to increase the counterinsurgency capacity of our armed forces: train ever greater numbers of internal security policemen from the developing nations; accept (as the Johnson Administration has already done in the Alliance for Progress) an inadequate rate of economic development in exchange for the decreased likelihood of social disturbance; practice pre-emptive pacification as we are now practicing it in Thailand, and attempt to gain from the Soviets and the Chinese the frank recognition that beyond certain real and imaginary international lines they will not interfere with the processes of our imperialism.

This, fundamentally, is the way of force. It is the way proposed by those who should rightfully be labeled radical nationalists, for they propose that the smaller nations of the world are to find the pattern of their future development already anticipated for them by the collective experience of the American people. They fail to see that the "revolution of rising expectations," as it is understood in this country, is a fiction—an eloquent phrase which projects the folk mythology of New Deal man over some two billions of unwilling Asians, Africans and Latin Americans. As successful Asian nationalists have shown in India and Ceylon, North Vietnam and China, Cambodia and Burma, the peoples of that part of the world will willingly make great economic sacrifices, supporting large military forces or enduring slower economic growth, if they are secure in their belief that the nation itself is free of foreign domination and that the great mass of the people are working together and with a sense of equality to build the national community. There is convincing evidence from Africa and Latin America that the same is true there, that national independence and social reconciliation come before rapid economic growth as meaningful objectives of government policy.

The object of a new and humane internationalism ought to be to support the great mass of the people of the world in governing their own lives as they see fit while offering such resources as we can afford and they can control. The following proposals are put forward in that spirit:

¶ Foreign aid programs must be removed as far as is possible from the cold war and its conflicts. The most likely way to accomplish this is by ending their bilateral character and placing them under the policy supervision and administration of an international body. Heretofore United States officials have seen such efforts at internationalizing aid as ways either of bringing our allies into support of our welfare empire or of sharing its costs. The object of this proposal is vastly different. To borrow a phrase from the counterinsurgency lexicon, the object of the proposal is to "filter out" overwhelming U.S. influence, to interpose an international agency between the donor nation and the recipient. Such filtering can never be wholly successful given the fact that the U.S. would most likely be the major contributor to the effort. But by bringing other powers into the administration of aid, differing national styles and objectives should serve to check any tendency toward American domination and provide more opportunity for the recipient nations to control the development process within their own borders.

¶ There should be a far greater reliance on the project approach to foreign aid and correspondingly less on the developmental approach. In the developmental approach, the system of American advisers attached to the recipient nation tends to become a shadow government: the structure of the host government is paralleled by a foreign aid mission whose capacity to coordinate information and influence is greater than its own. These parallel hierarchies, which any Communist organizer must envy, seem to be the chief means by which the host nation loses its sovereignty. In the project approach, of which the World Bank is a notably successful practitioner, projects are initiated by the host government, though ad hoc international assistance in planning is available if desired. The team of foreign technicians is brought in on a commercial basis to work on the specific project, leaving when it is finished. This approach has four advantages. First, no parallel hierarchy is established. Second, the essential planning initiative is in the hands of the recipient nation and not those of the donor. Third, foreign technicians have a commercial contract status and are not present in the host country as agents of the donor nation and lobbyists for its interests. Fourth, projects are customarily supported, (as by the World Bank, for example) primarily on the basis of their economic usefulness to the country and its capacity to encompass the resulting economic infusion without distress. Cold-war political and military considerations, in principle at least, have no bearing on the matter.

¶ We must devise aid projects and other foreign assistance which will go directly to localities, semi-public groups, etc. One of the more objectionable features of our current foreign assistance in the underdeveloped world is that it inordinately strengthens the central government over the localities, the city over the country, and the meritocracy (usually the army and the civil bureaucracy) over the rest of the population. In an age where centralizing ideologies are so popular and influential, this has served to reinforce tendencies toward authoritarianism in those countries. Aside from our own anti-authoritarian political commitments, there are other important objections to this process. To the exact extent that a government can rely on U.S. aid it becomes independent of its own people; then it need not and probably will not govern well. Direct aid to cities, villages and other localities, to trade and cooperative associations, to organizations of peasants and farm workers should serve to correct this political imbalance.

¶ The U.S. should get out of the nation-building business and return to a classical style of diplomacy. Nation building is per se imperialist. The underlying assumption of a classical diplomacy is that the internal policies of a government may tend to orient another's diplomacy, but are not decisive for it. Here again the Yugoslavs provide a most cogent example. It was that nation—led by a band of ideologically intractable and recently victorious guerrillas —which first broke the bloc system of the cold war. Classical diplomacy clearly has grave limitations, but the degree to which it effects change by mutual consent rather than by unilateral coercion recommends it to the present world.

¶ To the extent that the United States, however unwillingly, is drawn into the internal affairs of other countries, its primary objective should be to encourage the growth of representative institutions. It has been axiomatic in foreign aid discussions that the only thing we cannot export is our political principles. Sometimes this view rests on a commendable desire not to bend others' institutions to our ways. But if the view rests on the belief that representative institutions are viable only in Western nations or in countries with large and literate middle classes, it seems very misguided. Parliamentary democracy is indigenous to the West, but the concept of representative government is not. Elected village councils in Vietnam, which played a useful and humane role, had a history going back several centuries. We have been destroying institutions like this when we ought, instead, to have been encouraging them.

¶ Private citizens and groups must play a more direct role in the conduct of our foreign affairs. Foreign policy is now too extensive and important an item to be left to the Executive bureaucracy. I therefore propose a division of labor. Let only the government itself make and break treaties and do all those things it did before the advent of welfare empire. Americans, individually and by groups, ought continually to enter into the conduct of foreign affairs, querying foreign governments' intentions on this or that question, visiting areas heretofore closed to private visits, exposing clandestine operations hidden only from our own public, communicating to the appropriate governments their reservations on this or that aspect of Washington's policy —in short, making the orderly conduct of our foreign relations as difficult as it can for the United States Government, just as we make the conduct of our domestic affairs as difficult as we can for the same government. Only a broad front of contact between private Americans and foreign governments and nationals is capable of providing sufficient information and a net of relationships to counter the extraordinary power which the development of military and communications technology has placed in the hands of our foreign-policy officialdom.

The usefulness of the proposal rests in the fact that the peculiar genius of our people cannot be transmitted through a government agency—not even the Peace Corps. Our fundamental egalitarianism, anti-militarism and sense of social justice cannot be thus transmitted, nor can our remarkable skill at bending government and its officials to our will. These qualities can best be transmitted through the participation and cooperation of private Americans in the popular movements of the Third World.

The Issue Is Freedom

The commitment to freedom, to its preservation and its extension, is at the base of America's moral rationale for its role in the world. This commitment implies our opposition to Soviet or Chinese domination of other societies, and it implies that within those societies we are committed to opposing home-grown tyranny. Our record is spotty on this last matter; on occasion, as in Vietnam, it has even been shameful. I believe, nonetheless, that this commitment to freedom is widespread both in our society and among our government officials. And our commitment to economic development, in the way it has been understood heretofore, is in fundamental conflict with it. Our understanding of the modernization process has entailed our control of it—indirectly, of course—by means of lobby and persuasion. Thus we arrogate to ourselves the choice of the future, the only dimension in which freedom is relevant to the underdeveloped world. The real issue is not whether Americans are determined to help other people. I believe that that is our aim. The real issue is whether our commitment to freedom is one that will, in the last analysis, create conditions under which people can be free.

WHITHER WEST GERMANY?

C. AMERY

Mr. Amery is a German novelist and journalist who has done postgraduate work in American universities. His latest book, on German Catholicism, will soon be available here. As a member of Gruppe 47, Mr. Amery reported on their meeting this year at Princeton (The Nation, May 16).

Munich

In recent elections, the National Democratic Party (NDP) managed to create quite a stir in West German politics. Neo-Nazi groups have tried their hand before, and many such postwar groups have certainly gained greater popular support. But there are two features about NDP which give particular reason for concern: it has successfully integrated most extremist right wingers and has also proved particularly attractive to people between 18 and 21 years old.

NDP's success has led to a considerable amount of soul searching among the ranks of the political establishment. Cologne University, along with the EMNID poll institute, was asked to make a study of the motivations and possible future drives of West German right-wing extremism. The findings, published by Dr. Erwin K. Scheuch, have proved interesting.

Scheuch pointed out that it is still impossible to ask people outright whether they are Nazis or not. For purposes of his investigation, then, he attributed the following characteristics to his model "extremist":

¶ A strong preference for "leadership" over "liberty."

¶ A puritan approach to the question of public morals.

¶ A belief that the community is more important than the individual.

¶ An aversion to the present Western alliance policy (called "giving in to the victors").

Scheuch emphasizes that these characteristics do not necessarily define a "Nazi" but they can be safely used as an index of authoritarian, anti-parliamentarian attitudes. The researchers found that there is a core of voters in West Germany who think in these terms—about 10 to 15 per cent of the population (cutting across class and educational lines). Scheuch thinks that this percentage was—and is—rather constant. He cites a "Strategic Bombing Survey" of World War II which estimated that at the height of his power Hitler could count on 15 per cent of the population as "ideologically fortified Nazis." That the percentage of Nazis (or "Nazi types") has remained constant is a depressing fact, and speaks poorly for all the re-education efforts since the war; but it also indicates that short of a national disaster, right-wing extremism is not likely to develop into a threat to the parliamentary system.

Two particular results of the poll, however, deserve closer scrutiny. Scheuch found that a surprisingly large percentage of right-wing extremists favors a German-Russian entente; they would have the U.S. and Russia combat "economic liberalism" together. Scheuch also found that more than half of all German citizens questioned consider the "common welfare" more important than "personal happiness."

With this in mind, let us examine another aspect of domestic policy in West Germany: the drive for passing a set of emergency laws. Seven of these laws, deemed in accordance with the principles of our constitution, have already been passed. They provide means for the government to maintain stability in times of national crisis; it is able to take over production, distribution and personal services. But there is nothing in the laws about a time limit for these emergency powers—it is simply stipulated that a majority of both houses of parliament would be required to recall such measures. And there is no clear definition of "emergency," leaving the determination of this to the discretion of the government. Finally, the laws give no safeguards to freedom of the press, of assembly and of the right to strike.

Rudolf Augstein, in an article in Spiegel, argues that at least four of the seven laws are intrinsically unconstitutional. It seems, however, that the opposition party—the Social Democrats—have decided to play along. This year a constitutional amendment is planned in order to give a "legal" framework to these measures.

What is the effect of the laws? Do they really prepare the nation for any eventuality? Not really, says Augstein. He points out that the measures envisaged (mobilization of the Civil Defense Corps, shift to wartime economy) would have pushed situations like the Cuba and Berlin crises of 1961 and 1962 beyond the brink of war.

Do these laws—as their parliamentary supporters claim—constitute a necessary last stone in the edifice of German sovereignty? It is argued that with these new laws would end the last allied prerogatives in the Federal Republic. Close analysis has shown that the allied "prerogatives" are either a myth, skillfully played up by the government, or ipso facto results of the fact that Western troops are stationed in Germany. No American commander, surely, would hesitate to ignore a German emergency law, if there were a war and his superiors ordered him to do so.

What, then, is the meaning of the drive to pass these laws? Does the present government or its supporters want a dictatorship? This does not seem to be the case. At present there is no dictator on the horizon. The only possible candidate for the job, Franz Josef Strauss, is out of favor: his maneuverings have become more awkward, his policy aims more befogged than ever.

What else does the government want—war? This might happen, but it is certainly not the government's intention. And it would be more than unjust to accuse the upright Social Democrats of warmongering. They must have other reasons. Since these are not discussed we can make our own guesses.

Herr von Hassel—the Minister of Defense whose attitudes can only be called 19th century—has demanded a speedy passage of the emergency amendment. His argument is most revealing: "The Bundeswehr (Federal Force) must know that it can feel at home in the common will for defense." The argument shows Herr von Hassel as a mental dwarf; but the imagery is significant. The army, and with it Herr von Hassel, has a need to feel "at home" "geborgen" (which means, literally, in a safe haven, embraced by motherly arms).

Our leaders are faced with problems worthy of giants, and they do not really want to face them. For almost twenty years, Herr von Hassel, the right-wing citizenry, and certainly the NDP voters have had to endure democracy: the bureaucracy has had to give at least lip service to the principle of public control; the leaders have had to direct a changing and confused nation. Now the government wants to curl up into a nice safe routine, even if such routine, in the face of reality, is mere escapism.

It is interesting to study the seven emergency laws that were passed: they are an orgy of administrative detail, a ritual chant in German officialese. The recipe for answering any crisis is administrative ordinance—nothing else.

What about the Social Democrats' avowed aim to secure a minimum of democratic safeguards within the emergency framework? The sad fact is that they seem to be caught in their old fear—that of being thought "unrespectable" or "irresponsible." They would rather risk their traditional close ties to the trade unions than their new hard-won image of a national party "ready for executive responsibility." Their leaders have spent twenty years pressing their noses against the fence of power—pressing so hard that (to paraphrase Churchill) the rust has gotten into their souls. They fear now that unfurling the banner of liberty will only inflame anxieties deep within the German breast.

In a recent booklet entitled "Wohin treibt die Bundesrepublik" ("Whither the Republic?"), Karl Jaspers has analyzed these anxieties. He traces all present dilemmas to one root: the refusal of the majority, particularly the responsible group, to acknowledge its own part in the crimes of Nazi Germany. Jaspers, apparently, has too heavily favored the moral over political questions; but on the whole no thinking German can refuse to heed his arguments. His predictions are depressing. He foresees the rise of a faceless dictatorship—an oligarchy of party heads committed to implementing a policy that will lead first to loss of liberty, then to war.

There exists a curious agreement between Augstein's analysis of the emergency amendment question and Jaspers' broader view. They both conclude that a new war will not be the result of a reckless policy of revenge but rather the result of foolish and arrogant little steps in the wrong direction—of an atmosphere of repression—of a leadership that refuses to learn what the term really means.

What, the American reader will ask, can the United States do to help Germany on the road to a healthy democracy? First the U.S. must dismiss the principle of noninterference in the domestic affairs of an ally. "Noninterference" does not exist. The presence of U.S. troops in West Germany is interference; any Russian-American discussion over the future of West Germany is interference.

Certainly the United States cannot force the German people to embrace democracy; even if it could, a democracy that is "forced" is not a democracy. But the U.S. can make one thing clear to those in power in West Germany: that the two largest and most powerful nations in the world want peace; that increased military preparedness in Germany will not be tolerated. The Germans are very eager that the U.S. fulfill its European commitments—that it keep its troops in Europe. The U.S. can use this as a bargaining point. It can make it clear to the Germans that America's commitment in Europe will be treated with the same respect (or lack of it) that West Germans give to their commitment to help maintain peace in the world.

The question of freedom within West Germany is not primarily an American concern. However, it would hardly be in the interests of the U.S. to underwrite the yearnings of a few German souls for a closed society—a society that might answer certain emotional needs but would prevent any reasonable settlement for decades to come.

LETTERS

(continued from page 66)

Mr. Meredith equates nonviolence with begging and pleading. The Nation editorial accepts this false assumption. Truly to practice nonviolence takes far more guts than to be a soldier, as you imply in your observation about it being a burden to the Negro people. But to accept Mr. Meredith's misconception as you do is as much as to say that the American Negro people who supported the nonviolent movement have accomplished nothing through it.

But what is more disturbing about the editorial is its suggestion that violence in this situation will accomplish for the Negro anything other than more violence and his possible ultimate destruction.

If The Nation has no better alternative to nonviolence than violence it has learned no lessons from history. Self-defense can be accomplished by nonviolence. There will be losses, even of life, whichever method is used, but the method of violence leads only to more disruption, hate and brutality. . .

Such an editorial as the one I am criticizing is to be expected from the shortsighted National Review but not The Nation.

Roland Wolseley

Mr. Wolseley has misread our editorial. We did not advocate violence—we merely said that the American tradition was one of violence, not of nonviolence.

Editors

unanswered question

New York City

DEAR SIRS: Several years ago, someone asked me if I knew that Encounter was subsidized by the CIA. "No," I said, and added that I thought it most unlikely. Then came The New York Times's reports of this spring. I phoned the Someone. "My God, you were right!" I said. "Oh, no," was the reply, "haven't you seen the letters Encounter has sent to the Times? The Encounter people deny it completely, and the Times has printed a retraction." That, then, was that.

But eventually I did read what the editors of Encounter had written. First I read it as one reads things in a newspaper—hurriedly, selectively, finding what one is intended to find. So Encounter did not get money from the CIA. Yes, that was that. But, wait a minute, had they said so? I reread. Oddly enough they had not said so. They had said their contributors were fine fellows. They had said their independence of spirit was conceded on all sides. And yet the main question had not been answered.

May I put it to them in the time-honored manner: Are you now receiving, or have you ever received, money—through whatever intermediate channel—from the CIA? People who pride themselves on their openness of nature can surely be open about so crass a thing as this. People who pride themselves on knowing what goes on surely know what goes on in their own cash register.

Eric Bentley

correction

In Raymond Williams' "Letter from Britain" [The Nation, July 4] the sentence beginning "If the sailors get their raise" should have continued "then bankers abroad will decide that the Labour government's incomes policy has failed, and will no longer be prepared to support the pound."

Editors

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Spain's Agony: A Period of Exposure

THE INTERNATIONAL BRIGADES. By Vincent Brome. William Morrow & Co. 317 pp. $6.

JOSEPHINE HERBST

One of the few women correspondents allowed at the front lines during the Spanish Civil War, Miss Herbst reported from the Jarama front (on the International Brigades); from Barcelona in May of 1937; and from front-line villages in Spain. She is presently completing an autobiographical work dealing with her experiences in Germany, Mexico, Cuba and Spain during the thirties. The following came as a letter to the literary editor explaining why Miss Herbst felt she couldn't properly review the book.

July 18, 1966 marks the thirtieth anniversary of the Generals' revolt precipitating the Spanish Civil War, an event involving the passionate commitment of intellectuals in Spain and other countries to a degree unparalleled in contemporary history. Under the leadership of Freda Kirchwey, The Nation was a distinguished voice during the years of the struggle to avert what was to result in a major tragedy of Western democracy.—Editor

So much has happened in the world since the Spanish Civil War that in the space of a review of Vincent Brome's The International Brigades what should be explicated for people who don't know the background has to emerge in statements. And I don't want to sound pompous about Spain. Nor is it possible for me to be completely dispassionate. I was and am a partisan. I don't like Brome's book. But it is a work of solid research and parts of it are of genuine value. It should be read in conjunction with other works; particularly Hugh Thomas' The Spanish Civil War and Orwell's Homage to Catalonia. Orwell's book is partisan, and for that very reason brings insight to the Spanish character. Orwell did not fight with the International Brigade but with the Trotskyist POUM, and he was not in Madrid but on the Aragon front. Orwell's views are firm; he knew what he thought.

But Orwell was also misread once his book reached the States and the cold war was on. His book was taken as a blanket indictment of the Communists who were finally accused by our literary interpreters as the cause of the Loyalists' defeat. The story of Spain as told by Orwell and Koestler, and then vulgarized into a myth, has helped to cripple the political imagination of a generation. The Spanish Republic and its foreign sympathizers have been painted as dupes of the Comintern. The Communists have been painted as cynical conspirators, trading on the idealism of others. Thus, the story of the last of the great revolutions of Western Europe has been anachronistically distorted to fit the logic of the cold war.

The truth is a great deal more complicated. Not that Orwell and Koestler were telling lies; they weren't. But the actual historical picture bulges out all around their accounts. It is true, of course, that the Comintern used Spain, and the Spanish Communist Party, for its own ends. Stalin's tactics were dictated by considerations of power politics. But without arms from Russia the Loyalists would have been helpless against Franco's aggression. A war demands firepower and at no point was Russia able to equal the materiel Franco got from Hitler and Mussolini. The governments of Britain and the United States apparently preferred to see Spanish Republicanism strangled rather than fight in support of a popular revolution. After Munich, the Russians gradually stopped sending arms altogether. In the same way, the Spanish Communists used the opportunity of the war to liquidate their rivals on the Left—the generous and passionate anarchists and Trotskyists.

I don't think it is possible to bring the Spanish Civil War to life without a confrontation of the anarchists and Socialists. Brome not merely skimps the anarchists—he sweeps them into the dustbin. He has nothing to say about the uprising in Barcelona in May, 1937, which pinpoints the decline of the revolutionary fighting spirit. He denigrates Durruti, the leader of the Catalan anarchists. It's true that the anarchists began to seem like a debating society. Centralization, even centralization for the war effort, had to be resisted. Governments, all governments, were evil. They said: "We want to be militiamen of liberty. To the front certainly. But to the barracks as soldiers not subject to the Popular forces, certainly not." They recalled that the people in the French Revolution defied the world; but Napoleon's uniformed army led to Waterloo. And nowhere in Brome's account is there the story of the early resistance to Franco which was led by the organizations of the Socialists and anarchists.

To impress foreign opinion, the government was composed of Liberal Republicans; it lost all authority when it proved inept in stopping Franco's advance. Through their party and trade union organizations the Socialist and anarchist workers became the real rulers of the country and the organizers of the war. Like the juntas in the Napoleonic war they were the effective organs of resistance. They armed the militia and carried the war against the enemy. By terrorism they destroyed or intimidated the enemies in their midst. They took over factories and estates, abandoned by their owners, and in one way or the other ran them. Where the anarchists took over, there was a definite policy of collectivization, intended as a step for a thoroughgoing revolution. The ruthless acts of the militia on the way to war cleared the way for the revolution and made certain there could be no surrender by the government and no fifth column rising behind their backs. It was this spirit which inspired the volunteers who became the International Brigade. I agree with Orwell that the men who went to Spain weren't going to help perpetuate some tepid notion of "democracy" but to help effect profound social and economic change. The slogan for democracy came later, and ironically enough with the Communists who appeared as unwilling as the existing outside governments for a genuine revolution in Spain.

Brome begins his book with a question: "How did it come about that in the year 1936 there gathered a modern crusade of men from America, England, Germany, France, Italy and Poland and half of Europe to submit voluntarily to a life of danger, hardship and death, in a mixed-up, brutal, and sometimes romantic war, which did not directly concern their own countries?" Who is to account for the possible secret motivations of 40,000 men? Why did people go to Selma? Or risk death and even die in Mississippi? Certainly what governments did or did not was the least of it. The democratic governments of the thirties were hardly models. For the youths the British dole or the handout WPA job was hardly an

The plight of twelve veterans of the Lincoln Brigade now being held at Ellis Island is another evidence of the inconsistency of our Administration's liberalism. Most of them are in danger of deportation to fascist countries where death or concentration camp awaits them. Though aliens, all had lived in the United States for many years before going to Spain. . . . "We have no home but the United States," they write in an appeal sent from Ellis Island. . . . "Some of us are married here. Not one of us has a criminal record, but all earned their living here honestly. Now we are detained on Ellis Island for trying to enter the United States illegally. Right at our door stands the Statue of Liberty. But she does not seem to like us. What awaits us in France? A jail sentence and possible deportation to fascist countries where we were born."

—Editorial, The Nation, October 29, 1938

answer to life expectations. As late as December, 1936, the big auto sit-down strikers were fighting for union recognition. The decade of the thirties was electrically charged, and the lagging economy, which never picked up until the later war economy moved in, was not all of it; the more that was hoped for included visions as well as bread. Few of the men who volunteered for Spain knew the language. What did they know of Spanish history? But the Civil War was all of that history, rolled up into a knot as hard as a bullet. The violence in Spain sprang from the intolerable oppressions of the past; the Communists in their final cynical maneuvers merely topped a violence already vibrant. What the volunteers responded to was something in themselves—some need, some hope. That they miscalculated is not really the point. Who cared in 1936 if the Comintern was manning the induction centers? What does it matter if some of the Internationals were Communists and some not? Underneath, below the slogans, there are connective links which have meaning for us today. The war in Spain was not only 1789 and 1848 rolled into one. It was also one of the great social revolutions which have swept through the world and among which we live. Without some sense of the economic and social background, there is no way to communicate the blind, spasmodic heaving of a society in agony—and that was the Civil War.

Brome is not pretending to write a full history. But I believe his photographic studies are not sufficient at this date. He doesn't seem able to make up his mind about the fighting Internationals; at one moment they are heroic, then again, they appear more like the tattered crew of Brecht's The Threepenny Opera. This is particularly true when he relates scenes around the induction centers in Paris. For this he takes as guides Mrs. Charlotte Haldane and W. G. Krivitsky, a Stalin agent who later defected. Their facts don't need to be disputed, but I do dispute the coloration.

Mrs. Haldane became a worker in a Comintern induction center in Paris after her son volunteered for Spain; subsequently she was disillusioned about more than the Spanish War. Her ex-husband, J.B.S. Haldane, was in Madrid during the spring of 1937 studying the situation for possible gas attacks and eating moldy rice and stale bread with the journalists in the basement restaurant on the Gran Via. I imagine his coloration of the same facts would be quite different from those of his former wife. As for Krivitsky, even Brome admits that he "probably exaggerates." Between these two witnesses, the induction centers emerge as conspiratorial scenes; much whispering, dark glasses, sinister figures gliding in and out. Of course the induction centers had a conspiratorial, secret air. To cross the border to Spain had been made illegal by the notorious non-intervention pact. Hitler and Mussolini were getting their well-equipped troops in without any trouble. But the volunteers for the Loyalists had to make it over snowy mountain passes or by leaky fishing boats. None of this really matters.

As for the party affiliation of the men, I believe too much has been made of it. What was the Communist Party, so far as the volunteers knew it, in 1936? If you take the Americans alone, their attitudes were diversified, even among party members. In some ways they seemed more akin to the old Wobblies than to Bolsheviks. But again, it is presumptuous to deal en masse with these men. They were only in the mass as war material, and as war material they did what they could. Maybe they should never have come. But that's an entirely different question.

They came—and they offered their lives—at a time when the Communists seemed the only force willing or able to oppose the Fascist forces. Even this statement needs more background and qualifications. Trotsky's analysis of the Communist role in the Weimar Republic is devastating and stands up. But in 1936, what was remembered more was that the Weimar Republic had proved inept. How much was known actually about the Soviet Union in 1936? It was too late for men to become students of history. They had to take what was afloat as the war wouldn't wait. The Bolsheviks had been so thoroughly slandered for years that the climate created doubt about accusing rumors. The purges had not yet come to light. And in a decade when all the victories had been won, step by step, by the Fascist forces, the Communists were the one lone bet.

There aren't any easy answers about Spain. But Brome poses the wrong questions. Before the war Spanish Communists were a handful; 3,000 to 1.5 million anarchists. A year after the outbreak of the war the Communists numbered 300,000. By the end, they almost dominated the Republic. But they owed this spectacular advance to the timidity of the Western democracies. Without Russian intervention the Communists would not have achieved their position in Spain. The power to distribute arms arriving from Russia put the anarchists in their hands. The prestige of the Interna-

SONG OF THE LITTLE DEATH

FEDERICO GARCIA LORCA

Mortal lunar meadow
And blood under the ground.
Ancient bloody meadow.

Yesterday, tomorrow.
Mortal grassy heaven.
Light and sandy darkness.

There I met with Death.
Mortal earthy meadow.
Tiny little Death.

The dog on the roof top.
And my lonely left hand
Crossing endless forests
Where the flowers wither.

Cathedral of the ashes.
Light and sandy darkness.
Tiny little Death.

Death and I, a man.
A man alone with her,
Tiny little Death.

Mortal lunar meadow.
The snow heaped high and sifted
Across the very doorway.

A man, and what? I told you,
A man alone with her.
Love, light, and sand, and meadow.

Translated by ROLFE HUMPHRIES (Reprinted from The Nation, November 28, 1936)

tional Brigade that saved Madrid at a critical moment was another factor. But besides holding control of arms, the Communists had a dynamism no party in Spain possessed; they had discipline, organizing capacity, drive, understanding of modern machinery, political technique; something new in Spanish history. Their missionary fervor appealed to many youths.

The series of formidable reforms the parliamentary Republicans put into effect (particularly in the realm of education) after King Alfonso abdicated in 1931 merely alienated the old order without satisfying the masses. All great revolutions promise liberty and bread. By failing to give the second before they had given the first, the Republicans insured that Spain would get neither.

Brome has a rich source of material to draw on. Probably no other modern war has been written about by its contemporaries with so much passion or with so great a sense of loss. He is conscientious in his use of quotations, but taken from their shells they do not always ring true. Brome senses his difficulties and hence focuses on battle scenes. They are all excellent. But battles are the same in every war: fear, bravery, blood, death. He aims at objectivity and therefore often relates several versions of the same episode. But the episodes are not that important. This is a war where the cool look will not illuminate much. He gives sketches of the volunteers and is especially good at handling the more exaggerated types. But I could do with less about the nephew of Winston Churchill and more about the civilian population who took the brunt of the hardships and who also suffered daily casualties.

A connection between the Internationals and the Spaniards is important; the Spaniards became the test of the war and demanded fresh appraisals as their fate dangled in the balance. The war changed, and men changed if they didn't die. Some hardened to the required cast-iron state; some stuck by their views, right or wrong. I doubt if Brome's narrative form—chronological, precise as to detail, pedestrian—is capable of sustaining the wealth of the diversified material. In a certain sense, the movie To Die in Madrid, which has been running for months in New York, communicates more of the reality.

Orwell and others who went to Spain believed in the necessity of a genuine revolution. But how to get it? Not all Spaniards wanted it; it was a war intended for fundamentals, for the unlanded peasants, the many poor; and it was intended to lift the country from its rack of feudalism, to free it from its medieval Church. Hugh Thomas says the war was

"GREAT SOCIETY" OR NATION IN CRISIS:
What Are You to Believe?

IS AMERICA'S STAR RISING toward a great new Utopia. or sinking into a morass of overpopulation. poverty, and crime? Are we making enormous strides toward a golden era of peace and prosperity, or rapidly digging our own collective grave?

Read the papers and books. listen to the reporters and commentators. participate in informal discussions—on a given day you can hear "the truth" that proves either end of the scale, as well as any interim degree. And every answer comes fully equipped with its own set of statistics!

Well . . . what can you believe? Are two-fifths of our citizens sadly impoverished, or do nine-tenths of us live in homes with modern plumbing, television sets and other modern conveniences?

There is only one way to see the true picture, and that is to be sure that you're seeing the whole picture. You can believe the facts . . . but you can't be certain of their significance unless you've got access to all of the facts. And all of the facts about American society, past and present, are contained in a new Library that has been compiled by Fairfield Publishers for this special mail-order offer—the Library of American Data, three interrelated volumes of vital information, including the immensely readable and controversial best-seller, This U.S.A.

TRUTH—FROM PRIMARY SOURCES

Virtually every statistical fact relevant to American life is part of the Library of American Data. In fact, a major portion of this unprecedented collection actually consists of U. S. Government data gathered specifically by the Bureau of the Census for its own publications.

But even the millions of facts gathered and recorded by our government in the past 175 years cannot provide the whole story of America's historic evolution—and so, supplementary data have been collected from more than two hundred additional private sources, then organized and edited by the Census Bureau.

The perceptive individual can discover for himself. with this prodigious (yet remarkably well organized) fund of information, the full truth regarding everything about America and Americans—who we are, where we came from, where and how we live . . . and how we've changed in the past two centuries, the past two decades, the past two years.

THREE INDEPENDENT, INTERRELATED VOLUMES

The Library of American Data consists of three separate books, each of which performs a unique and invaluable function:

(1) THE STATISTICAL HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES from Colonial Times to the Present — a unique correlated edition of two monumental master references prepared by 125 distinguished scholars, with the cooperation of the Social Science Research Council, for the U. S. Government—Historical Statistics of the United States, Colonial Times to 1957 (published 1960) and Continuation to 1962 (published 1965). Nowhere else is this wealth of information available in a single book By providing comparable data from successive periods, it presents a wide view of the march of American history—revealing developing trends and changes in population, health, labor, national wealth, prices, industry, resources, trade, business, military, religion . . . virtually every facet of American life from pre-Colonial days to the modern era. The Boston Globe called it "the greatest do-it-yourself social and economic history of the United States . . . the raw data of how America got to where it is today . . . a statistical masterwork."

(2) THE U.S. BOOK OF FACTS, STATISTICS & INFORMATION, 1966 — a home-and-office reference book that presents a thorough and comprehensive view of the United States in the mid-1960's. It is actually composed of two parts—an unabridged edition of the Statistical Abstract of the United States, compiled by the Bureau of the Census; plus a special review section on current trends, prepared by leading columnists of The New York Herald Tribune. This close-up view of modern America, as timely as any work can possibly be. is the book upon which most "almanacs" and "information books" are based!

(3) THIS U.S.A.: An Unexpected Family Portrait of 194,067,296 Americans, by Ben J. Wattenberg in collaboration with Richard M. Scammon—the controversial Doubleday best-seller that has altered the thinking of innumerable people with its readable and entertaining contradictions of several American "myths." Subjective, outspoken, provocative, this book has received critical acclaim and attention in Time, Look, Library Journal, and other important magazines because of the unusual conclusions its authors draw—from statistics—regarding the population explosion, American poverty, big cities, crime, life expectancy, and other controversial subjects. A particularly valuable feature of This U.S.A. is "The Short Census"—an extensive compendium, nowhere else available. of the most useful facts in the latest Decennial Census—a complete book in itself, included as a 200-page appendix.

SAVE BY BUYING ALL 3 VOLUMES

The combined retail value of these three large, fact-crammed volumes—2,500 pages, in all— is $22.95 . . . but now Fairfield Publishers can offer them to you at the special Library price of only $17.45—as if you were receiving the $5.50 U.S. Book of Facts, Statistics & Information free! And you may examine all three volumes at no risk. for two full weeks. Send your check today, receive your books by return mail. If after fourteen days you are not convinced that the Library of American Data belongs in your home or office, just return the books and your money will be instantly refunded Send today—begin to decide for yourself about our society, this week!

FAIRFIELD PUBLILSHERS (Dept. N-725), 40 Guernsey St., Stamford, Conn. 06904

Please send me the book(s) checked below for which I am enclosing the price indicated. I may take fourteen days to examine them; if I am not completely satisfied I may return them within that time for full refund.

☐ THIS U.S.A. $7.50
☐ U.S. BOOK OF FACTS, 1966 .... 5.50
☐ STATISTICAL HISTORY OF THE U.S. 9.95
☐ ALL 3 BOOKS — Library of American Data $17.45

NAME ______________________

ADDRESS ______________________

CITY ____________ STATE ____________ ZIP NO. ____________

lost in London, Washington and Paris. But what prevailing governments would have tolerated the original revolutionary vision? Even the Communists damped down the revolution while fighting the war. For the kind of war it was to become—with the new force of Hitler and Mussolini—the Communists were the only group in Spain capable of promoting it.

Brome's last section dealing with the fate of the Internationals is his best, for he brings new material to light. The Russians in Spain were liquidated on their return to Moscow. The Americans and British were put in sealed trains and taken to points of embarkation for America and England. Brome doesn't know what happened to most of them. The Poles, Hungarians, Yugoslavs? Some became partisans in the Second World War. The Germans? They had no country with Hitler in power. Some got into the Second World War; others migrated to Mexico, the Argentine. The veterans weren't wanted in the United States. Americans and British, in some instances, fought with their nationals in World War II. In Europe, many joined with the Resistance. But they became an anonymous horde, modest, on the move; or passed silently into oblivion. Mostly, the returned internationals were an embarrassment to their countries of origin. Only Germany and Italy welcomed home their fighters for Franco in Spain with great thunderous celebrations. In the United States, the veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Battalion fell finally into the blind alley of McCarthyism and were exiled from some of their legitimate hopes by the fateful designation "subversive."

The Spanish Civil War was a profound personal experience for me and I am hopelessly biased. It was also a period of exposure. Exposure can be merciless and when it is we can gain the most valuable sort of understanding there is to be had. Then we are forced to examine what we believe about ourselves and our experience, our justifications of our institutions, our practices and conduct.

Dear Sirs: A recent dispatch in the New York Times announces that General Franco is making arrangements for the reception of the tourist trade in Spain this summer, and I am writing to inquire if someone could inform me if there are going to be any personally conducted tours.

According to the account in the Times, no expense has been spared to make Spain an agreeable resort this summer. General Franco, for example, has ordered forty new and brightly painted char-à-bancs, which will swiftly transport the tourists from one end of his beautiful country to the other. In addition, it is understood that he has not only taken considerable pains in the work of restoring and preserving the most notable of the ancient ruins, but he has also shown extraordinary ingenuity in the creation of new ones. For my part, although I by no means share the too general lack of veneration for the monuments of antiquity, I must confess that on the whole the evidences of the modern spirit are more exciting to me. If I had to choose between two sets of ruins, I should be inclined to visit the new ones rather than the old.

To mention but a few that have already suggested themselves to my awakened curiosity—I should like to visit the various craters and ruined masonries throughout the town of Barcelona, paying particular attention to the subway entrance where a bomb exploded and killed 126 men, women, and children. I should like to visit the ruins of Madrid, the ruined villages around Teruel; and being of a religious turn of mind, I should like to pay a visit of devotion to the chapel, a photograph of which was recently reproduced in the press, where General Franco's wife and daughter go to offer prayers for the success of the Defender of the Faith.

—Letter, Thomas Wolfe,
The Nation, May 21, 1938

I Become 'La Pasionaria'

DOLORES IBARRURI

Known as La Pasionaria, Dolores Ibarruri was one of the founders of the Spanish Communist Party and an elected member of the Cortes under the popular front government. In the first days of the Spanish Civil War she gave eloquent voice to the resistance against fascism with the slogan: "It is better to die on your feet than to live on your knees. No Pasaron!" They Shall Not Pass is also the name given to her autobiography to be published in September by International Publishers. Primarily an orthodox Communist view of the war, it provides other intimate insights into the life of that period. The following excerpts deal with La Pasionaria's childhood and her development into a political radical.

. . . I was born in Gallarta on a December day in 1895. I was the eighth of the eleven children of Antonio the Gunner, as my father was called because of his job in the mines.

All of my relatives, Castilians and Basques, were miners. My paternal grandfather died in a mine, crushed by a block of ore. My mother worked in the mines until she was married, and my father was a miner from the time he left the Carlist army at 18 until he died at the age of 67. My brothers were miners and my husband a miner.

I come, then, from mining stock, the granddaughter, daughter, wife and sister of miners. Nothing in the life of mining people is strange to me, neither their sorrows nor their desires nor their language nor their roughness. . . .

I've not forgotten anything. Among the painful memories of a sad childhood and an adolescence without hope, I see my father, an old man, cleaning up the wastes washed down the embankments by the rain or by the water from the ore tanks.

He worked with a small group of old miners like himself, who stood in a sea of mud with their pants rolled up above their knees, shoveling the mire, which contained small pieces of ore, onto screens.

When they came out of the water they could hardly put their shoes on. They were livid, trembling with cold, exhausted. But they couldn't give up that painful job. As old men they had no alternative. It was either that inhuman, killing labor, or begging; and begging was even more horrible, humiliating, dehumanizing. It meant picking up a piece of bread thrown to them as if they were dogs, or a couple of pennies, or just a "God help you." It meant becoming a heavy burden to one's children and entering a new social category, pauperism. It was better to die than do that. Better to meet death with dignity, working until the end. . . .

During my adolescence I was filled with a bitter, instinctive resentment which made me lash out against everything and everybody (at home I was considered incorrigible), a feeling of rebellion which later became a conscious indignation. . . .

As soon as we knew how to talk and walk we were taken to the kindergarten through which several generations of miners' children had passed.

In that school, and for the modest sum of one peseta a day, the teacher freed our mothers from the need to care for their small children during the greater part of the day.

The school, which was located in a large old house, was dark, cold and damp, with virtually nothing attractive about it. Our first school had the following educational materials: Two ancient posters showing the alphabet in small and capital letters, riddled with holes from years of being poked at with pointers; a blackboard, and a map of Spain, which was never taken down to show us the towns and cities of our native land.

The "kennel" or town jail was located on the floor under our school, thus giving it a macabre touch. We could look through the holes in the old, rotten wood and see the men whom the law considered dangerous but who were almost always rebellious miners jailed on orders from their bosses, or men who had been caught in Sunday brawls, or beggars.

That incongruous relationship between the jail and the school, which was our first step in the acquisition of a social consciousness, made us cruel and tended to distort our natural feelings. Anyone who acted contrary to the established order of things was a criminal who had to be punished—that was how our teacher explained the arrests of the prisoners we saw. This impelled us to do our bit to help the forces of justice.

When the teacher was not paying attention, the older boys urinated through the cracks in the floor or poured water through the holes from the water jug. The infuriated prisoners below shouted and sometimes threw their shoes against the ceiling to the immense pleasure of the children who knew then that they had hit their target.

When the children were 7 years old, they were supposed to enter the elementary school, although sometimes they stayed in kindergarten until they were 8 or 9, because there were no places vacant.

At school we learned to read and write, but our real university was the streets. When we left school in the afternoon, it was there that we settled our childish arguments and quarrels and discussed local events, which often had to do with the tragic accidents that occurred in the mines almost every day. . . .

An average of 120 girls attended the elementary school for girls, and as many boys went to their own school. Class lasted from 8:30 A.M. to noon, and from 1:30 to 5 P.M. As for our teachers, they had to have truly encyclopedic knowledge for their task, and the truth is that some of them did. To their credit it must be said that they endeavored with apostolic zeal—between slaps and pinches—to combat our ignorance and polish up our intelligence.

Even though the children loved their teachers (I remember my teacher with real devotion, Doña Antonia Izar de la Fuente, who, old and retired, was killed in the bombing of Guernica), and even though the school was not ugly, with its large windows and its walls decorated with colored plates representing religious scenes from the Fall down to the Crucifixion, it did not appeal to us.

This was because of the routine teaching, the monotony of the classes and the application by our teachers of the Latin maxim, "Letters enter with blood." Many times we felt their pointers descend on our shoulders when we didn't know the lesson. . . .

At school we studied, sang and prayed. But we were the children of those miners who shook Viscaya with their strikes and protests, and although they forced us to sing at school of our love of God, in the streets we sang the songs from the union hall. These appealed to us even more because they were forbidden at school, so we sang:

Emperors and popes, kings and bishops,
And all reactionary ministers,
Say they are poor while they swim in wealth—
May their heads roll in the Revolution!

At school we sang:

The mountains of Vizcaya
Are pure iron and nothing more . . .
And her sons mine the ore
In utter joy and contentment.

But in the street we sang a stanza from the song which was considered the most revolutionary of all:

Come, workers, let us abandon Fields, factories and mines,
Abandon the labors that enrich the idle
And get on with the Revolution.

When we were admitted to elementary school we really came into contact with science. "Who made the world? How many days did the creation take the maker? What did he make on the first day and the second and the third, up to the sixth, because, on the seventh, he couldn't do any more and rested?" This gigantic task of creating suns and constellations, millions of stars, larger and smaller than our planet, and every kind of plant and animal, from man and woman down to insects, Batrachia, microbes and viruses, was disposed of in a few brief questions and answers, repeated over a period of several years until they became an inseparable part of us.

The short and simple summing up of the most complicated problems of astronomy, natural science and world history which I assimilated during my school years from 1900 to 1910 was to be repeated to me twenty years later, in the sacramental words of the same text, when my daughter Amaya returned from her first day in school.

"...a classic in scholarship, in perception, in style...

KHRUSHCHEV
A CAREER

by Edward Crankshaw

"...a thrilling adventure for any reader. Crankshaw presents a vast assemblage of details about Khrushchev, many of them hitherto unrecorded." —MARSHALL MAC DUFFIE, Saturday Review

With 16 pages of photographs, chronology, notes, index. $7.50

THE VIKING PRESS
625 Madison Avenue, N.Y. 10022

In the church in my town, the "grave" where we prayed to the dead of my family was near the altar of the Passion, and on the altar there was a glass box in a niche with a bony Christ lying inside, the terrifying sight softened with a tulle and lace veil. Above the mortuary niche Saint John and the sorrowful Virgin watched from their respective recesses over the eternal sleep of Christ, while their pain was depicted with more or less artistry in their sad, pale faces.

My faith was concentrated on that altar. The sorrowful mother and her dead son moved me to tears. In that simple figure I worshiped the living image of the Virgin Mother, whose heart, pierced with seven daggers, shone on the black velvet dress. At times, when the reflection of the candle flames danced in the glass tears encrusted in the Virgin's face, it seemed to me that she was really crying. This made a profound impression on me.

I never stopped to think about what that image was made of, or for what purpose it had been made. I was used to seeing it just as it appeared on the altar, and if anyone had asked me, I wouldn't have hesitated to reply that it was made of rare substance and animated with the divine breath. . . .

Until one day, when my faith suffered

Black Power!

To find out what it is

READ

MALCOLM X SPEAKS

Speeches – Interviews – Letters

$5.95

order from:

merit publishers
5 east third street
new york, n.y. 10003

FOR THE GREAT THRILL

Obtain a copy of

THE MARQUIS DE SADE'S

120 DAYS OF SODOM

If your bookseller is sold out, send $12.50, the price, to BOOK AWARDS, Dept. N, 458 Broadway, N.Y. 10013, and it will go to you postpaid.

I WANT TO KNOW

(How Citizen Exchange Corps Helps Americans Find Out)

IF RUSSIANS HAVE HORNS

Send me Free reprints of N.Y. Times articles and editorials telling about CEC, a non-profit, tax-exempt foundation. Tell me how it brings together Americans and Russians of all ages and occupations to meet their counterparts in both the United States and the Soviet Union . . . and how I can participate in this program, which will lead eventually to exchanges of Americans and Soviets to live and work in each other's country for 6 months to 2 years as a major step toward mutual understanding and survival.

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP ....

Mail to:

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS., Dept. N
550 Fifth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10036

a deep shock. The teacher in my school was curator of the sisterhood of the Heart of Jesus, and it was her responsibility to arrange the altar every week. She usually took the older girls along with her to the church to help her, and I went with her several days without anything out of the ordinary happening. But one day, following her instructions, I climbed onto the altar table to dust one of the niches. When I got down—without turning my back on the images, which was considered a sinful breach of reverence—I looked over my shoulder to keep from stepping on the altar slab and saw a sight that froze me in my tracks. Two Sisters of Charity were handling a kind of manikin without the slightest ceremony. Where there should have been legs there were two triangles made of strips of wood. The dummy stood on the bases of the triangles. Big wires ending in very white hands came out of the sides of the sack of sawdust, and on top—merciful heavens!—on top was the Virgin's head. Her hair with its blond curls undone fell over her face and shoulders as though she had just gotten out of bed.

My Virgin was like one of those scarecrows the peasants put in the wheat fields to frighten off the sparrows!

I watched them dress the manikin as though I were hypnotized. First a batiste chemise, then her petticoats and her dress, then they curled her hair and finally they put on her black robe with silver embroidery, her crown of stars and her heart with the seven daggers.

I shivered and my teacher asked if I felt ill. I stammered out an excuse. We finished arranging the altar and left. I didn't look at the Virgin. . . .

At 15 I finished school. I was in poor health and not able to go to work. This meant an added burden for my family, which I was reluctant to impose on them. Since my good grades qualified me for further academic training, I decided to take the one-year preparatory course for the Teachers' Normal School and then the two-year teacher-training course. After completing the first two years, my adolescent dreams faded in the face of hard economic realities; books, food, clothes were all expenses my parents simply could not continue to meet. So I transferred to a dressmaking academy for two years. After this apprenticeship, I worked as a domestic for three years in the homes of local businessmen. At 20, seeking liberation from drudgery in other people's homes, I married a miner whom I had met during my first job as a domestic.

My mission in life was "fulfilled." I could not, ought not, aspire to more. Woman's goal, her only aspiration, had to be matrimony and the continuation of the joyless, dismal, pain-ridden thralldom that was our mothers' lot; we were supposed to dedicate ourselves wholly to giving birth, to raising our children and to serving our husbands who, for the most part, treated us with complete disregard.

My mother used to say: "She who hits the bull's-eye in her choice of a husband cannot err in anything." To hit the bull's-eye was as difficult as finding a pea that weighed a pound. I did not find such a pea. May the happy wives forgive me; but each of us judges the market by the good values we find there.

Although I had no tendency to be nostalgic about the past, I used to long for the time when women worked in the mines. However brutish the work, it offered an outlet no longer available to women in the mining valley; in addition to wages it had added a social dimension to women.

When the demand for ore fell off and there was an excess of manpower, women workers were no longer hired. This discriminatory act was carried out under the hypocritical cloak of solicitude for the mother, the woman, the family and the home. Women were freed from brutalizing mine work only to be converted into domestic slaves, deprived of all rights. In the mine, the woman was a worker and, as such, she could protest exploitation together with other workers. In the home, she was stripped of her social identity; she was committed to sacrifice, to privation, to all manner of service by which her husband's and her children's lives were made more bearable. Thus her own needs were negligible; her own personality was nullified; in time she became "the old lady" who "doesn't understand," who was in the way, whose role eventually became that of a servant to her household and a nursemaid to her grandchildren. This was the tradition of generations.

When my first child (a girl) was born, I had already suffered a year of such bitterness that only love for my baby kept me alive. I was terrified not only

> The Falangists and the traditionalists took communion in the morning, and before beginning their political work for the day used to go round to the jail and accompany ten or twelve to the cemetery. For half an hour they had target practice on them, and could then go back to their houses, kiss their children, and talk to them about morality, the family, and the country.
>
> —Ramon Sender, The Nation, October 30, 1937

by the odious present but also by the dismal, pain-filled future that loomed before me, as day by day I observed the lives of the miners' wives. Nevertheless, like other young people, I built castles in the air. And, full of illusions, I closed my eyes to my surroundings and built my dream house on the shifting sand of "contigo pan y cebolla" ("with you, bread and an onion"), believing that mutual attraction and fondness would compensate for and surmount the difficulties of privation. I forgot that where bread is lacking, mutual recrimination is more likely to enter; and sometimes, even with bread, it still creeps in.

Raw, stark reality struck at me, as at other women, with merciless fists. A few fleeting days of illusion and then. . . . Afterwards, the icy, wounding, pitiless prose of existence. Out of my own experience I learned the hard truth of the popular saying: "Madre, ¿qué cosa es casar? Hija, hilar, parir y llorar." ("Mother, what is marriage? Daughter, marriage is weaving, giving birth, weeping.") Weeping, weeping over our hurts and our impotence; weeping for our innocent children, to whom we could offer nothing but tear-stained caresses; weeping for our dismal lives, without horizons, without hope; bitter weeping, with a curse in our hearts and on our lips. A woman's curse? A mother's curse? What is so surprising about that, since our lives were worse than that of the most accursed?

Was life worth living? My companions in misery and I asked the question as we discussed our situation, our wretchedness. They spoke with resignation; after all what could we women do? I rebelled against the idea of the inevitability of such lives as ours; I rebelled against the idea that we were condemned to drag the shackles of poverty and submission through the centuries like beasts of burden—slapped, beaten, ground down by the men we had chosen to be our life companions.

I was then 21 and my daughter Esther was still an infant. When my husband's wretched wages were not enough to pay the rent; when instead of meat we ate a few potatoes cooked with red peppers to give them color; when we had to mend our alpargatas (rope-soled canvas shoes) with wire; when I had to patch the patches on my husband's work clothes; when, for lack of food, I hadn't enough milk to nurse my baby, I confronted my husband with a desperate question: "Do you think we can go on living like this?"

The answer was disheartening: "How do you think the others live?"

"The same as we. But I can't resign myself to living worse than animals. Let's go away; let's go somewhere else where Fifty-one of the best articles and stories that appeared in Commentary Magazine

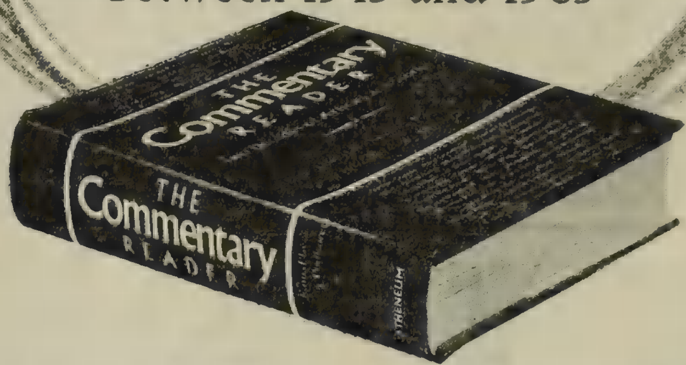
between 1945 and 1965



"One of the spring's biggest books—physically, and intellectually as well." — WILLIAM HOGAN, San Francisco Chronicle

"A selection of some of the magazine's best articles written by some of the era's shrewdest minds: Sidney Hook, Lionel Trilling, Edmund Wilson, George Lichtheim, Daniel Bell. The book also contains a sampling of short stories (Saul Bellow, Bernard Malamud, Wallace Markfield) which invariably carry a social message."—Time

"One can scarcely open the book without encountering a fresh idea or an old one in new perspective." — THEODORE PETERSON, Chicago Tribune

"A truly exciting, timeless anthology...a book both to be read and treasured."—ALFRED BALK, Saturday Review

"So many of the contributions exhibit breadth and vitality...The contributors do not capitulate. In fiction, literary criticism and personal reminiscence, they explore intensely personal modes of resistance to a crass society." — PETER LATHROP, The Nation

"Commentary is generally recognized as having the greatest social relevance of any review in America...Several magazines have brought out such anthologies. The Commentary Reader is the fattest of the lot, and in some ways the most significant."—ROBERT GORHAM DAVIS, Book Week

THE Commentary
READER
Edited by NORMAN PODHORETZ
Introduction by ALFRED KAZIN
$12.50, now at your bookstore
Atheneum

life isn't so hard, where we can at least feed our children."

"Somewhere else? Wherever the ox goes he will be harnessed to the plow."

The intimate daily contact with harsh reality began to fray the fabric of my religious convictions. And every day I moved a little further from religious superstitions, prejudices and traditional fears of the supernatural. I was beginning to learn that our poverty—the lack of the most basic human necessities—was not caused or altered by the will of any deity. The source of our misery was not in heaven but on earth. It arose from institutions established by men which could be altered or destroyed by other men.

I began to read Marxist literature and for me it was a window opening on life. My ideas and sentiments began to change and take concrete form, although there was much I did not yet understand. My former Catholic beliefs began to dwindle, although not without resistance, as if they were determined to leave a shadow, a fear, a doubt in the depths of my consciousness. The struggle for a Socialist society—even though it was clearly not imminent—began to give content and substance to my life; it was the force that sustained me under the oppressive conditions of our pariah-like existence. The more I learned about socialism, the more reconciled I was to life, which I no longer saw as a swamp but as a battlefield on which an immense army of workers was gaining daily victories, advancing even through its defeats.

My new faith was more reasonable and more solid than my religious faith had been. Now I expected nothing from the mercy of an unknown and unknowable god; my expectations were anchored in the strength of mankind—our own strength, our own struggle. I was not willing to leave the world as we had inherited it. I would struggle to change it, to make it a better world, to open a path for our children that would lead to a society without oppression and poverty.

In my eagerness to learn, I read every book in the library of the Somorrostro Casa del Pueblo. And I must acknowledge that, accustomed as I was to Catholic literature of the Quo Vadis type, I found Socialist prose as rough as sandpaper. Out of sheer boredom I would let the "labor press" fall from my hands. (This still sometimes happens now.)

I read Marx and Engels, who more than compensated for the mediocre Socialist literature I had been reading. After virtually memorizing the Communist Manifesto, I boldly plunged into an abridged edition of Capital; although the selections were perhaps not the best, they helped me understand, if only on the simplest level, the cause of our poverty and the origin of our exploiters' wealth.

> Anarchists? When I hear people decrying the Loyalist government of Spain because they say it is composed in part of Anarchists and Communists, I do not know whether to laugh or cry. Good Lord! Could there be greater anarchists under the sun than the war lords of today?
>
> —Oswald Garrison Villard, The Nation, September 25, 1937

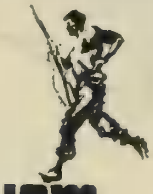
However, the study of Marxism was difficult for me, since there was no one to help or advise me; at that time there were no courses, no political schools in the vicinity. The study and understanding of Marxism was difficult for others as well. The secretary of the Miners' Union, a well-known Socialist, asked me one day, after I had begun to work on the publication El Minero Vizcaíno (The Biscayan Miner), how much I knew about socialism; he asked me what works I had read. I told him, and also mentioned that I was studying Capital; he looked at me pityingly and asked, not without sarcasm: "And have you understood any of it?"

"Not much," I answered, "but enough to learn the origin of our capitalists' fortunes. I've learned how surplus value is created. This helps me understand many things which, until recently, I thought had a divine origin; today I see them in a different light."

He smiled ironically: "How are you going to understand these concepts if I, who have studied them for ten years, don't understand them too well?"



THE ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRIGADE

NOW FOR THE FIRST TIME the full story of the American volunteers who fought in Spain, written by ARTHUR H. LANDIS, a veteran—based on years of research and hundreds of interviews with Lincoln Brigaders.

"As it tells the story of what one generation dared, it gives insight into the courage and present movement of another." —Dr. Edward K. Barsky ORDER NOW: A specially bound, limited, pre-publication edition, containing a signed drawing of Abraham Lincoln by Siquieros, also a Spanish war veteran.

32 pp. of pictures, maps, notes
640 pages $10.00

VALB, Room 405
49 East 21 St., N.Y.C. 10010
Herewith $ .... for .... copies of THE ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRIGADE for November delivery.

Name

Address

City State Zip Code
Make checks to M. Fishman, Sec'y

The Olive Fields Endure

THE OLIVE FIELD. By Ralph Bates. Washington Square Press. 438 pp. $6.95.

GABRIEL JACKSON

Mr. Jackson, author of The Spanish Republic and the Civil War (Princeton University Press), teaches history and humanities at the University of California, La Jolla.

Originally published in 1936, The Olive Field gave to thousands of readers their first understanding of the issues underlying the Spanish Civil War. It has now been reissued, and it must be said immediately that Bates's analysis of Spanish political emotions in the 1930s stands up very well to the test of historical perspective. The Olive Field is a novel about a community rather than an individual—the village of Los Olivares in northern Andalusia.

The political and economic life of the village had been dominated for several generations by the family of the Marquis Don Fadrique Guevara. But the Republican revolution of 1931 had created new currents of uncertainty, tension and hope. In early 1932, when the story opens, the villagers are working the olive fields in the same manner, and under the same direction, as for many years past. But they are also anticipating change, particularly in Church-state relations and in control of the land. Anarchists, Republicans, Socialists and Communists are all preaching to the rural workers and tenant farmers. The landlord, the priests, and the Civil Guard—the traditional holders of authority in the village—stand nervously on the defensive. During Holy Week a faction of the anarchists break up a religious procession and burn many of the images. The anti-clerical government, wishing particularly to avoid a confrontation with the radical workers, blames the local priests for "provoking" the outbreak. During the summer, a bitter drought tempts the workers to dynamite the dam which gives Don Fadrique control of the only dependable water supply for the village fields. But at the last moment the would-be dynamiters decide against an act of senseless destruction.

During the summer the workers also debate the meaning of the proposed land-reform law, but the passage of that law in September, 1932, makes no real difference in their lives. Meanwhile the drought has led to lowered wages, to the firing of many workers and to a poor harvest. The resulting poverty drives some of the workers to migrate to Asturias in search of jobs as miners. The scene shifts to Oviedo in October, 1934. Here a number of the main characters are reassembled to participate in the brief Asturian rising, during which the workers' militias held the city of Oviedo for about a week before the Foreign Legion and the Moors recaptured it under General López Ochoa.

I read The Olive Field during a week when I was also reading a number of anthropological works. Ralph Bates must have studied Los Olivares with all the care of a scientific field worker. He knows in detail the basis of the village economy. He knows its social hierarchy, its family structure, its religious and political life. He knows the standard of living, the manners, the style of speech, the hopes and fears which characterize every group in the village: the aristocratic landlord; the old priest, and his younger, more politically oriented assistant; the lawyers and civil servants; the tenant farmers and the landless workers; the peasant women, still deeply attached to the Church; the men, divided roughly among clients of the old regime, anarchists, and a minority who are evolving toward Socialist or Communist affiliations.

The story develops primarily around the personalities of the anarchist worker and guitarist, Mudarra; the olive worker and tenant farmer, Joaquín Caro; and the girl, Lucía Robledo, whom both men love in a different fashion. Mudarra is a man of great aesthetic feeling, but also of uncontrolled and destructive passions. He is recognized as a great musician by both the highly educated and fastidious Don Fadrique and by the popular audiences in the cafés of many Andalusian towns. He seduces Lucía Robledo, in full knowledge that his friend Caro is awaiting her answer to a marriage proposal. Mudarra is one of the leading rioters at the breakup of the Holy Week procession, and it is he who planned the abortive attempt to dynamite the dam.

Joaquín Caro is an intimate friend of Mudarra, but a cautious, less expressive individual. In politics he moves from an anarchist to a Communist outlook. In love, he is too inhibited, too uncertain of himself to win Lucía directly. After her seduction by Mudarra, Joaquín rejects both friend and sweetheart. One of the more dramatic, but not entirely convincing, scenes in the novel is a knife fight between the two men, both of whom seem to feel that they must settle accounts by battle. At heart, neither really wishes to kill the other. Joaquín injures Mudarra; the estrangement lasts, but their impulses to violence against each other have been satisfied. Both rescue Lucía when she tries unsuccessfully to induce a miscarriage. After her baby is born, and after Mudarra has been jailed, Joaquín marries her, but the memory of Mudarra prevents them from uniting their souls completely. During the Asturian revolution the friends meet again. In this case, true to the fundamental difference of their temperaments, Mudarra fights to the death as an anarchist, leading one of the desperate,

THE CRAFTS OF FREEDOM

FROM COOPERATIVES IN MISSISSIPPI

Developed by

THE POOR PEOPLE'S CORPORATION

COUNTRY CALICO DRESS . . .

So pretty for a little girl. Washable cotton. Comes on a red, brown or blue background. Sizes 4-6x $3.95

TOTE-BAGS . . .

Available in brown cowhide, or suede (navy, blue, burgundy, gray, rich brown, loden green or burned gold) $15.00

MEN'S HAND-CRAFTED LEATHER BELTS . . .

Available in brown or black quality cowhide, with a solid brass buckle. 1" or 1½" widths. Please specify waist size. $4.00

Clip and send with check or money order to:

LIBERTY HOUSE P. O. Box 3193 JACKSON, MISS.

Item(s)	Color and Size	Unit Price

Total..........

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

CITY .... STATE .... ZIP CODE ....

PLEASE send me a COMPLETE mail order catalog ☐

Spanish Civil War Booklist

JOURNEY TO THE FRONTIER: Julian Bell and John Cornford, Their Lives and the 1930's. By William Abrahams and Peter Stansky. Constable (London), 1966. 430 pp. 50s. To be published in September by Atlantic-Little, Brown. $7.50.

Reviewed in this issue.

THE OLIVE FIELD. By Ralph Bates. Washington Square Press, 1966. 438 pp. $6.95.

Reviewed in this issue.

THE GRAND CAMOUFLAGE: The Communist Conspiracy in the Spanish Civil War. By Burnett Bolloten. Hollis & Carter (London), 1961. 350 pp. Out of print.

Markedly anti-Communist in tone, a well-documented and persuasive account of the events that led to the ouster of Premier Francisco Largo Caballero in May, 1937.

THE SPANISH COCKPIT. By Franz Borkenau. University of Michigan Press, 1963. 303 pp. $4.40. Paper $2.25.

Reissue of a book published in 1937. A vivid, sensitive, informed interpretation, based on knowledge of radical politics and on two visits to war-time Spain.

THE SPANISH LABYRINTH. By Gerald Brenan. Cambridge University Press, 1960. 384 pp. $1.95 paper.

Originally published in this country by Macmillan in 1943 and revised in 1950, it is still the best survey of social, economic and political factors in the period from the overthrow of the first Republic (1874) to the establishment of the second (1931).

LA REVOLUTION ET LA GUERRE D'ESPAGNE. By Pierre Broue and Emile Témime. Editions de Minuit (Paris), 1961. 542 pp. 30 fr.

History and interpretation written from a Socialist position. Not translated into English.

THE STRUGGLE FOR MADRID: The Central Epic of the Spanish Conflict, 1936-1937. By Robert G. Colodny. Paine-Whitman, 1958. 256 pp. $6.

An excellent military history by an American who fought in the Lincoln Battalion.

FREEDOM'S BATTLE. By J. Alvarez del Vayo. Alfred A. Knopf, 1940. 381 pp. $4.50.

Story of the Franco rebellion and the Civil War from 1936 to the end.

THE WOUND IN THE HEART: America and the Spanish Civil War. By Allen Guttmann. The Free Press, 1962. 292 pp. $5.95.

A comprehensive analysis of American responses and interpretations and a sympathetic account of why Americans reacted as passionately as they did.

APPEASEMENT'S CHILD: The Franco Regime in Spain. By Thomas J. Hamilton. Alfred A. Knopf, 1943. 327 pp. Out of print.

A good overlook of Spain before, during and after the war, with information on the roles played by Germany, Italy, England, the United States and Russia. Hamilton reported from Spain for The New York Times 1937-39.

THE SPANISH REPUBLIC AND THE CIVIL WAR: 1931-1939. By Gabriel Jackson. Princeton University Press, 1965. 578 pp. $12.50.

Balanced in assessments, this is the most trustworthy of comprehensive accounts in English on the Republic and on the war as it took place inside Spain. (Reviewed by Jose Yglesias, The Nation, November 29, 1965.)

MAN'S HOPE. By André Malraux. Random House, 1938. 511 pp. Out of print in English.

Less well known than Hemingway's For Whom the Bell Tolls, for which less historical background is necessary, this novel is the best of those written about the war.

THE YOKE AND THE ARROWS. By Herbert L. Matthews. George Braziller, 1961. 258 pp. $4.

A first-rate reporter's account of the Civil War first published in 1957 and revised in October, 1960, after Matthews' fourth visit. (Reviewed by Joseph Silverman, The Nation, September 7, 1957.)

HOMAGE TO CATALONIA. By George Orwell. Beacon Press, 1955. 232 pp. $1.75.

Paperback edition of the novelist's famous work. An honest, personal account of his experiences with the POUM militia and in the street fighting in Barcelona in May, 1937. (Original edition, published by Harcourt, Brace, was reviewed by Herbert Matthews, The Nation, December 27, 1952.)

FALANGE: A History of Spanish Fascism. By Stanley G. Payne. Stanford University Press, 1961. 316 pp. $6.

The first reliable study of the origins and the present role of the movement.

SPAIN AND THE GREAT POWERS: 1936-1941. By Dante A. Puzzo. Columbia University Press, 1962. 296 pp. $7.50.

A survey of the international complications of the war.

THE LINCOLN BATTALION. By Edwin Rolfe. Available through Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade. 321 pp. $2.

A first-hand account by a poet who fought in the battalion and edited Volunteer for Liberty, the newspaper of the English-speaking battalions. (Reviewed by Samuel Romer, The Nation, November 18, 1939.)

THE UNITED STATES AND THE SPANISH CIVIL WAR: 1936-1939. By F. Jay Taylor. Bookman Associates, 1956. 288 pp. Out of print.

Outdated in some respects but still a good study of American diplomacy, with some attention given to the domestic sources of foreign policy.

THE SPANISH CIVIL WAR. By Hugh Thomas. Harper & Row, 1961. 720 pp. $8.50. Paper $2.95.

Lively, and good in analysis of military aspects of the war, but not always reliably documented and sometimes erratic in judgment. (Reviewed by Ramon Sender, The Nation, September 30, 1961.)

BRITAIN DIVIDED. By K. W. Watkins. Thomas Nelson (London), 1963. 270 pp. 30s.

Traces the political response with emphasis on the formation of policy toward Spain by the Conservative Party.

> If I search through the privacy of my own mind, using every scruple to reject all that comes from prejudice and instinctive passion, I can still only give one answer. The true Spanish creation, the creative tradition, is in the keeping of those men who have gone out to battle, ill-armed, often literally unarmed, against the destructive machines of international fascism.
>
> —Ralph Bates, The Nation, January 23, 1937

suicidal groups that tried to resist the entry of government troops. Caro, now a Communist, favors calling off the struggle after it has become clear that all rational hope of a successful Asturian revolution has been lost, and that the army and the Moors are about to enter the city in overwhelming force. At the end of the novel Joaquín and Lucía, having escaped over the mountains from Asturias, decide to return to Los Olivares.

There are many other vivid portraits, such as Argote, the mayordomo of the Guevara estate, a master olive farmer, work director and political boss. There is Justo Robledo, the intelligent town secretary, with a weakness for tomcatting, and an understanding attitude toward his sister Lucía and her rival lovers. There is the aristocratic Don Fadrique, lover of fine books and guitars, devoted neurotically to the memory of his deceased wife, and most parsimonious in his contributions to the local priests and Holy Week brotherhoods. There is the cowardly, but intelligent and ambitious young curate Soriano. There is the coldly efficient Civil Guard captain, Montaña, well informed on local politics, and as ready to shoot demonstrating workmen under the Republic as under the Monarchy.

> I well know that war is violence. I know too that a government bomb might by accident miss its military objective, and fall into a city and wound civilians. . . . We destroyed the airdrome of Seville but we did not bombard Seville. We destroyed the airdrome of Salamanca, but we did not bombard Salamanca. I destroyed the airdrome of Avila at Olmedo, but I did not bombard Avila. For many months now the Fascists have been bombarding the streets of Madrid.
>
> —André Malraux, The Nation, March 20, 1937
>
> Have we then no hearts? No understanding? Shall we let ourselves be unresistingly deprived of our last remnant of free human judgment by interest, which unfailingly appeals to the worst instincts, though it clothe itself in lying names such as order, culture, God, and native land?
>
> —Thomas Mann, "I Stand with the Spanish People," The Nation, April 17, 1937

Bates's great strength lies in his authentic characterization of the villagers and their way of life. He respects and understands the viewpoints of all his characters; few novelists have known peasants and workmen as intimately as he. Some weaknesses would seem to be inevitable in a work which attempts to be historically accurate and, at the same time, to portray the inner lives of people whose language is not that of the author. "Wounds, man," and "God's teeth" are the accurate equivalents of colloquial phrases used by Andalusian peasants, but they cannot be made to sound equally natural and colloquial in English. Similarly, since he cannot assume the reader's knowledge of Spanish life, Bates must explain that "chewing iron" means to court a girl at her window. Many a political dialogue is also more self-consciously elementary than would have been necessary if the author were writing about a country and people well known to his readers. An editor of classics in translation, or the author of a nonfictional narrative, can gracefully supply the necessary background explanations, but a novelist is greatly hampered if he must constantly explain political and cultural traits, and if his dialogue must depend on untranslatable colloquialisms.

The Asturian episode comprising the last 80 pages of the novel fails to establish the intimate, lived-through quality of the major portion which depicts events in Los Olivares. And the end of the novel is puzzling. Joaquín and Lucía—having escaped from Asturias after the collapse of the revolution—help an old peasant repair a water course. They enjoy his gratitude and his hospitality, and Joaquín dreams happily of the town and the olive groves to which they are returning. Since the earlier events of the novel clearly have symbolic meanings, the reader assumes that the same is true for this final incident. The chapter suggests an end to strife, and a more satisfactory relation between husband and wife. But has anything changed in Los Olivares? Have the political struggles and the Asturian fighting been meaningful? What have Joaquín, Lucía and others learned from their atrocious sufferings? Is the desire for a peaceful farm life the only sentiment with which they face the future? This ambiguity perhaps reflects the author's honest uncertainty as to the ultimate meaning for the survivors of the events preceding the Spanish Civil War which he has so powerfully described.

you work hard for that dollar all your life..

. . . .

make sure you reap the rewards!

Let us send you information about our exciting retirement plans. Call or write giving us your date of birth and the age at which you want to retire. We'll introduce you to a rather startling concept which may change your attitude about saving for retirement. You'll love the rewards of our retirement plans.

Jafco Life
AGENCY, INC.

INSURANCE SPECIALISTS
431 Fifth Avenue, N.Y., N.Y. 10016
MU 4-5779

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. [illegible]

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 7-25-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

The Meaning of the Journey

JOURNEY TO THE FRONTIER: Julian Bell and John Cornford, Their Lives and the 1930's. By William Abrahams and Peter Stansky. Constable (London). 430 pp. 50s.

PETER HATCH

Mr. Hatch is a recent graduate of Princeton University. He has just completed a novel and will be attending graduate school at the University of Toronto next year.

The Spanish Civil War is often said to have been the decisive event for young English intellectuals of the 1930s. Peter Stansky and William Abrahams say it again and have tried to write a history of certain aspects of the English thirties through the biographies of two young Englishmen who died in Spain.

Julian Bell was the son of Vanessa and Clive Bell and the nephew of Virginia Woolf. He was brought up in the midst of the flourishing Bloomsbury circles, went to a Quaker public school and to King's College, Cambridge. He spent a year and a half teaching in a Chinese university and then went to Spain where he was killed driving an ambulance when he was 29.

John Cornford came from an equally distinguished family. His father was the famous classicist, F. M. Cornford, and his mother, Frances Cornford, was a widely published poet. His great-grandfather was Charles Darwin. He went to a preparatory school and a public school, and at the age of 17, to Cambridge. Before going to Cambridge, he worked for part of a year in various London left-wing organizations; and at the university, he became one of the chief Communist leaders. He was an outstanding student and could have stayed on at Cambridge after his undergraduate years, but instead he went to Spain to see a people's war and stayed to fight. He was killed in 1936, either on, or the day after, his 21st birthday.

There have been many memoirs of the war in Spain and there are an increasing number of histories. Ideally, this book would fall somewhere between the two categories. It would have much of the immediacy and enthusiasm of a memoir but would place the lives of these two young men in a wide historical setting of the events leading up to the war and the war itself. But unfortunately, there is never very much interest generated either in the war or in the importance one would expect it to have had for Bell and Cornford. The authors say that they have pursued the question: "Why, and how, had John Cornford and Julian Bell gone out to Spain?" In order to do so they have had to "go back into the early 1930's, and the 1920's, and the years of the First World War, and the plush Edwardian era, and even the final decades of the nineteenth century." The problem is that they have gone back to what is irrelevant to the lives of John Cornford and Julian Bell.

SUBSCRIBERS

Please cooperate with the Zip Code Program of the Post Office Department for prompt receipt of YOUR issues.

One result is that the biographies themselves are often too sketchy to give any real sense of what these two men were like. For example, it is said that there is some significance in the war games which Julian played as a child, but the authors never give any clear idea of how they are significant or how they differ from the war games of every other young boy. It is the particular details which would make Julian understandable that are missing. Again, the love affairs of the two young men are obviously important; but too often only the barest facts are given, making it difficult to tell what their motivations are in crucial situations. While John was at Cambridge, he lived quite openly with a girl he is said to have loved very much: "They were deeply fond of each other, and so, when Ray became pregnant, that did not disturb them; in fact, they rather enjoyed shocking the more 'respectable' of their friends." But only a few sentences later it is said that "the arrival of the child simply hurried the process of separation, which had actually begun some months before," and that is all that is to be said about John Cornford's relationship to his first mistress and his only child.

The problem is similar in the descriptions of Julian's love affairs, but it is aggravated by having his women lettered "A" through "M." If it is important that all of his women remain anonymous it would be better to give them fictitious names. As it is, it suggests a callousness toward them which is probably unfair to him.

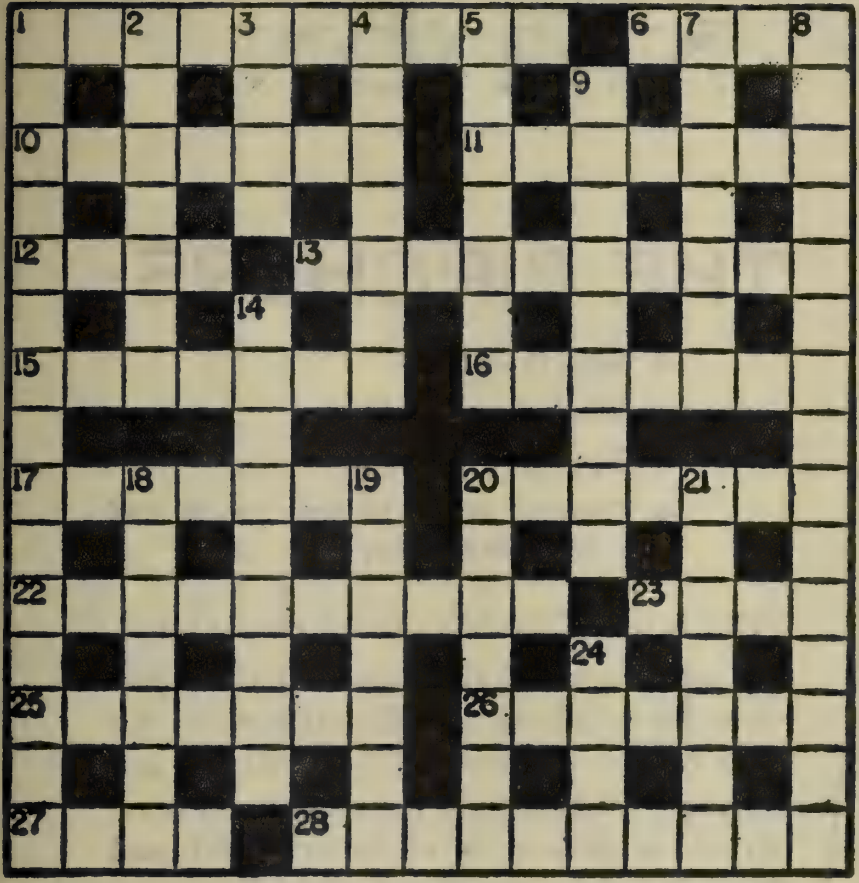
It is in only one section of the book, "Julian Bell in China," that the authors begin to get close to either of the people they are writing about. Since his trip to China is entirely irrelevant to the historical aspects of the book dealing with the thirties in England, they are forced to concentrate on the details of his life as a teacher and on his affair with "K," the wife of one of his Chinese colleagues. In this section, they show—rather than merely tell about—his inability to come to decisions, his defensiveness toward strong emotional attachments, and his peculiarly strong relationship with his mother (he writes her detailed letters about the affair). There is often the feeling that the authors are holding back all the most important biographical material and only stating that it exists.

Because the authors manage not to get very close to Cornford or Bell, the decision of each of them to go to Spain does not seem as interesting or as important as it should. Moreover, the history of the broader English interest in the war, of the enthusiasm which certainly was growing, is entirely missing from their account. They give quite a good picture of the rapid surge of left-wing activity in Cambridge from 1930 to 1936, but they break off early in the war because Cornford died very soon after it began, and Bell was in China during most of the period when interest in the war was building in England. Still, since the book goes up to July, 1937, there should have been some way to include what would seem essential material. There are interesting comparisons which could be made between the attitude of the Left in the thirties toward the Spanish Civil War and the attitude of the American Left in the sixties toward the war in Vietnam. The contrasts are perhaps more striking than the similarities. The English Government was not the chief villain with respect to the war in Spain; but in both instances, a great many people, who were not otherwise strongly committed to the Left, joined a particular cause. It is unfortunate that the book does not provide a basis for such comparisons.

Of the quarter of the book which actually deals with the Spanish Civil War, much is based on the best-known memoirs and histories (particularly on Hugh Thomas' The Spanish Civil War). There are a few interesting details of the parts played by Cornford and Bell, but too often the history of the war which the authors give seems familiar and secondhand. "During the day the advance continued without the loss of any territory," is probably the most widely quoted sentence to come out of the war; it is unfortunately too characteristic of the authors' selection of historical material that they have included it.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1162

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Butterfly time, good eventually! (3, 4, 3)
6 Sultanate practically equivalent to the head of 8. (4)
10 A logical place to see the surrounding country. (7)
11 Might be thrown by one not in perfect balance. (7)
12 They might raise hob when a British politician is around. (4)
13 Formerly Edinburgh that Scott gave a heart to. (10)
15 Certain aspects of a number of wise men? (7)
16 Are they likely to skip on the way to school? (7)
17 Are they typified by Goldilocks when it comes to soup, or parts of beds? (7)
20 Such language at a family gathering around! (7)
22 One isn't on shaky ground here. (5, 5)
23 Is this a book a body returns? (4)
25 His name sounds right for a birdman!
26 Put two and two together to finish a number of things in addition. (7)
27 Unique fish found on the bottom? (4)
28 Did reputedly what it pays to do. (10)

DOWN:

1 "Come in!" "Entrez!" "Kommen Sie!" (4, 11)
2 Slips away and somehow sees about a little percussion job! (7)
3 One was considered great, and one terrible. (4)
4 Those who are not my friends see mine in a different light. (7)
5 Like to chance this? (Elaine's home!)
7 I follow a branch of learning in place of 8, but one would probably appear strange here. (7)
8 Donne's answer to the question "Is a tailless cat's home part of the continent?" (2, 3, 2, 2, 6)
9 Equivalent to escheat, which is wrong? (9)
14 The sort of girls the Lord Chancellor gave away in Iolanthe? (9)
18 Confess to pound, contract and wrinkle? (7)
19 Compensation, point by point. (7)
20 Study relative worth, and arrive at about an acceptable standard. (7)
21 What Jeremiah does for people in last straits. (7)
24 A straightforward entrance of mine might get an E in Communication. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1161

ACROSS: 1 Undermine; 6, 30 and 11 Forget oneself; 10 Rolling; 12 Rubber; 13 Wish; 15 Silencer; 16 Rang up; 18 Esther; 20 Defrayed; 23 More; 24 Strewn; 25 Nod; 28 Oviform; 29 Rompers; 31 Solecisms. DOWN: 1 Uncle; 2 Dutiful; 3 Road runner; 4 Indebted; 5 Earned; 6 File; 7, 9 and 27 Raining cats and dogs; 8 Egg-shaped; 14 Patronymic; 15 Steamboat; 17 Referral; 19 Torsion; 21 Yankees; 22 Stumps; 26 Disks.

$2.95 each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF THE NATION

• Each file holds a full year's copies.

• Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.

• Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send check or money order.

MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

PUBLICATIONS

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 418 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002

HOMOSEXUAL theme fiction, non-fiction listing available free. Trojan Book Service, Box 2121B, Philadelphia, Pa. 19103.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), [illegible] Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

1½" PEACE STICKERS. 20c/100. Self-addressed envelope. R. Hogen, Box 259 Stuyvesant Sta., N.Y.C. 10009.

ESCALATION NEEDS IMMEDIATE RESPONSE. Support Democratic anti-Vietnam War Congressional candidate to bring issue before voters. Contributions — RICHARD LORD, 116 Park, Yakima, Washington 98902.

Buy Your Books

through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to: The Nation, 333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014.

FREE! With every new subscription to

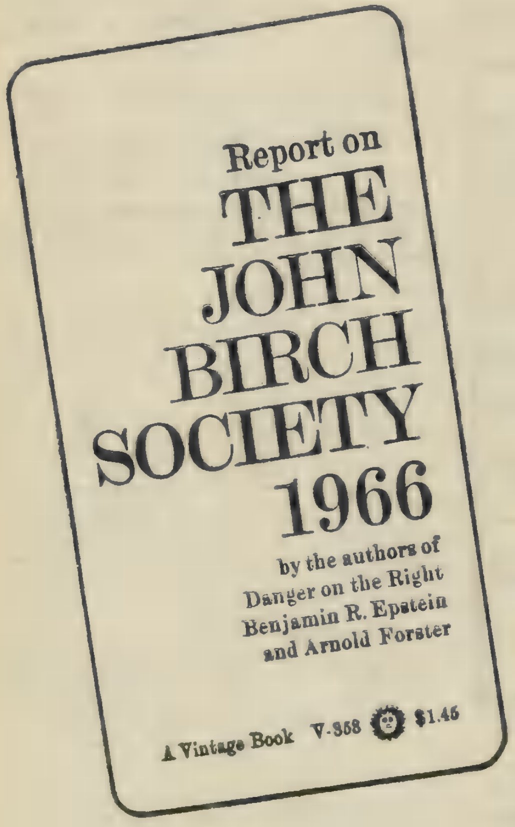
THE NATION



Report on
THE JOHN BIRCH SOCIETY 1966 by the authors of Danger on the Right

Benjamin R. Epstein and Arnold Forster

A Vintage Book V-358 $1.45

THE BIRCHERS:

- Who they are
- What they want
- How they work
- The real extent of their power and influence today

> "This is pamphleteering in the classic sense. The authors who have collaborated on previous books, including Report on the Ku Klux Klan, are never shrill. The Report is a revealing tour through the theory and practice of the philosophy of Robert Welch and the influential forces behind him."
>
> —William Hogan in the San Francisco Chronicle

For your FREE copy of REPORT ON THE JOHN BIRCH SOCIETY, fill out the coupon below, and start receiving THE NATION, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of opinion.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N. Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of REPORT ON THE JOHN BIRCH SOCIETY.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

CITY .... STATE .... ZIP No. ....

7-25-66

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.
AUG 6 1966

THE NATION

AUGUST 8, 1966 35 cents

A WHITE LOOK AT BLACK POWER

PAUL GOOD

ARMING THE NEAR EAST

Pandora's Ammunition Box

JOE ALEX MORRIS, JR.

'FOOD FOR FREEDOM'

Paradox of Foreign Aid

BRUCE J. OUDES

LETTERS

TV whistle stops

Rego Park, N.Y.
DEAR SIRS: Commenting on the relationship between TV and politics in his article ["TV and Youth: a New Style for Politics," The Nation, June 6] Harold Mendelsohn predicts that with the development of low-cost "local TV outlets . . . the strangle holds that local courthouse gangs have had on our city halls and state houses will be ultimately broken." One aspect of Reform Democrat Ted Weiss' attempt to unseat the party regular, Rep. Leonard Farbstein, in New York's 19th Congressional District involved a dramatic advance in exactly this direction.

A principal campaign technique was the candidate's attendance at "coffee klatches" held in the apartments of sympathizers around the district. Although as many as fifty people would attend these, it was felt that wider dissemination was desirable. Remarkably, Weiss was able to use TV to achieve this without the purchase of a minute of air time. Through the efforts of Morty Schiff, a Yeshiva University research physicist . . . a meeting in one living room was broadcast over a closed circuit on an unused channel to anyone in the same apartment building who wanted to tune it in.

This technique can be important . . . wherever large housing projects are found. Oscar G. Chase amplification

Last week Mr. Bainbridge of the Aspen Skiing Corporation phoned long distance to suggest that P. G. Ernst may have been a bit harsh on the amenities of Aspen ["Will Success Spoil Aspen," The Nation, July 25]. Another survey than that referred to by Mr. Ernst indicates that 70 per cent of a sample of skiers prefer Aspen to other ski resorts. Moreover, the Alpine town of Garmisch has made Aspen its sister ski city and will rename one of its streets "Aspen"; Aspen is reciprocating by naming its main street "Garmisch." A delegation from Garmisch is visiting Aspen and will bring with it 500 gallons of beer. Editors food bribe

Santa Monica, Calif.
DEAR SIRS: I find Frederick Kuh's proposal [editorial, "Is Peace Naive?" The Nation, July 25] to offer China "a certain amount of food for a specified number of years as an inducement to contribute to peace in Vietnam" . . . repugnant. . . . In this context it strikes me as a bribe to restrain China from "torpedoing" peace efforts. . . . Mr. Kuh does not offer mainland China a part in negotiating a settlement in Vietnam although he does generously suggest adding Chinese Communist observers to watch elections in South Vietnam. Yet he envisages a collaboration between the United States and the USSR . . . despite the fact that Russia has no part in the present conflict. . . . In view of China's direct interest in Southeast Asia, a lasting settlement in Vietnam can hardly be negotiated without its participation. Irmgard Lenel funds for justice

Oakland, Calif.
DEAR SIRS: Contributions are sought to assist those now being jailed and fined for their participation in the San Francisco hotel and auto row sit-downs of March, 1964 (see editorial). Checks should be drawn to Funds for Justice and sent to Edward Stern, 690 Market Street, San Francisco. Jessica Mitford

EDITORIALS

Mr. Johnson's Labor Problem

Generally, in a prolonged and disruptive labor dispute more is at stake than the immediate issues on the surface. This is particularly true of the air-line strike, which has tied up some 60 per cent of domestic passenger traffic and completely cut off seventy cities from air-mail service. Nor are the carriers, the machinists' union, the traveling public and the postal service the only interests affected. This strike contains the makings of a political crisis between President Johnson and organized labor, and Mr. Johnson's reluctance to take a direct hand in it shows that he is well aware of the fact.

A factor not generally recognized is that the prestige and future authority of the Council of Economic Advisors and the wage guidelines formulated by the Johnson Administration are teetering in the balance. The principle underlying the guidelines is that wage increases should not exceed rises in productivity, thus providing a rule-of-thumb limitation on union demands. The union movement in general detests both the council and the guidelines. Moreover, the members of the International Association of Machinists who are employed by the air lines—some 35,000 mechanics and other ground service workers—know well enough that other unions, the United Auto Workers for instance, have broken through the guideline barriers in the past and gotten away with it. They wish to do the same.

The carriers would be amenable to a settlement in conformity with the guidelines. They are in the advantageous public relations position of patriotically supporting the President and being able to blame the inconvenience to the public on the rapacious unionists. Economically, they could meet the union demand of 53 cents an hour over the $3.52 an hour top rate for mechanics, spread over thirty-six months, and the vacation, health and welfare benefits superimposed on the wage demands. But it is only in the last two years that their jet transports have proved to be a bonanza; before that some of the lines were in real trouble and the industry as a whole was more or less depressed. Management has not forgotten these recent hard times, and it is apprehensive of a recurrence. When the time comes for the industry to invest in supersonic jets—and when one major carrier buys the others must follow suit—there will be financial problems which may make those of the subsonic age look almost trivial. The carriers want to pay dividends and accumulate reserves during the present comparatively lush times, and their managements would like stock options and bonuses. The guidelines and a patriotic stance are a convenient front.

From the union's standpoint again, the leadership must secure substantial benefits for the rank and file or Jimmy Hoffa's Teamsters may move in on their domain. The longer the strike lasts, the more insistent the members will be on a total victory, since they are out of work in the meantime. Neither side will succumb readily to attrition. The union has something like 900,000 members and less than 5 per cent are on strike. The domestic air lines operate under an agreement whereby any extra profit accruing to the operating lines because of a strike is distributed among the struck lines. Thus both sides are well cushioned against destitution.

MAY 14

The situation is not one in which Mr. Johnson can knock heads together. By all indications, only political intervention can get the grounded aircraft flying again. The President will have to declare a national emergency before the Congress can act. Such a declaration will be stretching a point, but there is enough confusion to support it. Inconvenience, says George Meany, is a small price to pay for freedom. But as inconvenience is prolonged, the public will treasure freedom, in Mr. Meany's sense, less and less. The freedom an influential sector wants at present is freedom to fly.

Legislation halting the strike for 150 or 180 days and, if no settlement is reached, empowering the President to settle the dispute "in the public interest," will be passed if the President requests it. That way lies compulsory arbitration, and labor's affection for Mr. Johnson, less than ardent even now, will be further attenuated. The 150-day return to work will get him past the November elections, but what of 1968?

South Africa's Victory

Few Americans have any interest in the International Court of Justice; many are not even aware that it is the principal judicial organ of the United Nations. The emergent African states, in contrast, are very much concerned over the Court's deliberations, and their leaders and their people alike are bitterly disappointed in the outcome of the complaint of Ethiopia and Liberia against South Africa's imposition of apartheid on the mandated territory of South West Africa. The decision could hardly have come in a worse form: it is almost as if it had been calculated to weaken further the UN's authority and prestige. The Court did not rule on the merits; it neither upheld racism nor condemned it. The ruling was on the technical ground that the complainants did not have any legal right or interest in the subject matter of their claims. On this procedural issue the Court was divided 7 to 7 and the President, Sir Percy Spender of Australia, cast the deciding vote. It is a lugubrious end to nearly six years of litigation, sixteen printed volumes of written pleadings and nearly 6,000 pages of oral argument. It leaves South Africa free to extend its brand of racism with no legal impediment, while the African nations must resort to other means to gain their ends.

Justice Philip C. Jessup of the United States voted with the minority and registered a long, vehement dissent. He described the case as "a procedure of utter futility," a conclusion with which not only most laymen but a majority of international lawyers will agree. Mr. Jessup held that in accepting the case in 1962, the Court had precluded the finding that the complainants had no standing. Another inconsistency to which he called attention was the advisory opinion of 1950, to the effect that the UN retained supervisory authority in South West Africa. In the tie vote, the

SUMMER SCHEDULE

During August, The Nation is appearing on alternate weeks: forthcoming issues will be dated August 22 and September 5.

IN THIS ISSUE

August 8, 1966

EDITORIALS

106

ARTICLES

109 Pandora's Ammunition Box
Joe Alex Morris, Jr.

112 A White Look at Black Power
Paul Good

117 Salvage Archaeology: Saving the Past from the Present
J. O. Brew

120 "Food for Freedom": The Paradox of Foreign Aid
Bruce J. Oudes

BOOKS & THE ARTS

125 Death of the Recital
Benjamin Boretz

126 Poem of Negro Boys I Swam With in the Mississippi Seven Years Ago (poem)
Galway Kinnell

127 Pondering the Negatives
Katharine Topkins

128 Violence of the Dreamer
Martin Tucker

129 Gentleman Without a Past
Joyce Carol Oates

130 Theatre: New England
Julius Novick

131 Between Thoreau and Me (poem)
Saul Touster

133 Films
Robert Hatch

134 The Night Harbour (poem)
Sandra Hochman

135 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Assistant Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher
ANNE C. ABRAMOVITZ Assistant

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. Tel.: 242-8400.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION Volume 203 No. 4

Court neither confirmed nor reversed this ruling, but evaded it and all the other ethical issues. A statement by the United States Mission to the United Nations, which in marked contrast to Mr. Jessup's almost scornful dissent seemed to heave a sigh of relief that a confrontation with Cape Town had been avoided, emphasized the purely legalistic nature of the Court's decision. It read as though the State Department found virtue in this anticlimactic end to years of deliberation.

One reason for the change in the Court's views was a change in the composition of the tribunal, particularly the death of Badawi Pasha in 1965. The judges are selected by vote of the General Assembly, where Afro-Asians and the Socialist countries have a clear majority. These factions should mobilize their forces to block the appointment of justices who either have a reactionary bias or are indifferent to the human issues involved in cases of this type.

Another proposal that has been discussed in the UN delegates' lounge is for the Afro-Asian countries to acquire a better bargaining position, so that they can twist arms when necessary, as the United States has never hesitated to do in the issue of admission of Communist China to the UN, and other controversies in which it had a special interest. Although Justice Jessup voted against South Africa and castigated the majority, the United States has given a minimum of support to the Afro-Asian countries' stand against racism. American investments in South Africa speak louder than American words deploring apartheid. The Africans could introduce a draft resolution to refer the legality of U.S. military intervention in Vietnam to the International Court of Justice for an advisory opinion. The Court would presumably be in no hurry to pick up this hot potato, but the request would go some distance toward providing a base of bargaining power for anti-colonialist and anti-racist objectives.

An Instructive Episode

The furor over the threatened trial of the American flyers held by the North Vietnamese provides rich material for study in that realm where war, diplomacy, psychopathology and public relations overlap. When it appeared that Hanoi might try the prisoners, Sen. Frank Church, speaking for a group of "doves," issued a calm and measured appeal to Ho Chi Minh to refrain. Dr. Spock, Norman Thomas, U Thant and Pope Paul were among others who set an example of civilized good sense; but a far more numerous group of Americans in high position plunged headlong into hysteria, whether genuine or contrived. Some of the prisoners had been paraded through the streets of Hanoi—a standard technique of governments which are impotent to protect their people from air attacks—and on this premise Congressmen, editors and others behaved as if the prisoners had already been condemned and were on the scaffold with the noose around their necks. It was almost as if they wanted the men to be put to death, so that their hawkish passions would be justified by the event.

If the flyers themselves were not war criminals, it became perfectly obvious that genocide did not repel numerous U.S. politicians and publicists. Few were willing to advocate it forthrightly—the gimmick was that the American people would unite in an irresistible demand for the nuclear destruction of North Vietnam if the flyers were harmed. It was not until after several weeks of this uproar that Ambassador Harriman said what the President should have said immediately: "The United States Government is not going to be a barbarian because the North Vietnamese act in a barbaric way." Undoubtedly there was—there still is—a possibility that selected prisoners might be tried, but that their lives were endangered was a possibility so remote that the only sensible attitude would have been to wait and see.

A particularly disgraceful feature of the affair was that, ever since President Johnson made this a predominantly American war, we have been turning over captured Vietcong and North Vietnamese to the South Vietnamese forces, who have tortured and killed hundreds or thousands, throwing them from aircraft, drowning them if the water torture did not elicit the desired information, and in every possible way violating the elementary rules of humanity and the Geneva Convention. Photographs of the torture of prisoners by the forces of the Vietnamese government have been shown on U.S. television and published in the newspapers. With few exceptions, from the Administration down to the man in the street, Americans viewed these atrocities with indifference. Nothing could be more revealing of the character of the Johnson Administration and the people who support it.

The prisoner episode also had its ludicrous side. We are constantly given hints of the mysterious channels through which the Administration ferrets out the enemy's intentions. As far as the prisoners were concerned, the Administration feared the worst, although, as usual, all was confusion. Then Robert Little, foreign assignment manager for the Columbia Broadcasting System, had a brilliant if obvious idea. He cabled Ho Chi Minh asking him kindly to advise whether he intended to put the captive airmen on trial. "No trial in view," Ho replied laconically and, at greater length, reiterated his conditions for peace. The White House then disclosed that it had learned two days earlier that the trials were to be "postponed." There was no sign that it proposed to take advantage of the opportunity for further discussion with Ho, whose image as an Asian devil had been somewhat impaired, if only for the moment. By all indications the Administration will continue to rely on escalation, with no end in sight.

Cranston on Birch

Few politicians are willing to stick their necks out in a good cause; Alan Cranston is one of the few. He has just released a 26-page blast at the John Birch Society. This is the more remarkable in that California is a hotbed of the society, and Cranston is comptroller of California.

This is not the first time that Cranston has given fanatical rightists a going-over. Returning from Germany in 1938 as a foreign correspondent for INS, he revealed that the Mein Kampf on public sale in America was "a fraudulent, cleaned-up version." Analogously, the current edition of Robert Welch's magnum opus omits a charge made in the original —that Dwight D. Eisenhower was "a dedicated, conscious agent of the Communist conspiracy."

Cranston's principal service in "The John Birch Society: A Soiled Slip Is Showing," is a conclusive demonstration that the Birchites, as a group, are inherently racist, and are pursuing the same line as the old-line bigots who preceded them. Gerald L. K. Smith, who started in business with the pro-Nazi Silver Shirt movement in the 1930s and is today selling the same bill of goods, wrote in the August, 1963, issue of his magazine, The Cross and the Flag, that he was "highly pleased" with the work of the John Birch Society and that as its members "matured," they would surely delve into the "Jewish question." Since both Smith's Christian Nationalist Crusade and Welch's John Birch Society keep their membership secret, there is no way of determining the overlap of membership, but Cranston believes it to be substantial.

The present membership of the John Birch Society is estimated at 100,000 and it is increasing rapidly. Among 100,000 people there must be many with decent instincts. They owe it to themselves to read Cranston's dossier on the society and to decide whether it is a fit place for patriotic Americans.

Delayed Injustice

The California atmosphere in which the Birch Society thrives may be sensed in San Francisco's current action against a group of men and women who in March, 1964, took part in civil rights demonstrations against the hotels and auto dealers of that city. The sit-ins, which were staged to protest against the inadequate employment of Negroes in the two industries, were remarkably successful: both the hotels and the dealers agreed to correct their employment practices and have, at least in part, done so. The Human Rights Commission, established by the mayor shortly after the sit-ins, has acknowledged that the pioneering demonstrations facilitated its work. If anything, the demonstrations deserved the city's vote of thanks.

But in California, where the rapidly rising population seems to be as rapidly moving to the right, there has been a public clamor to make such dramatic appeals to justice impossible in the future. Accordingly, several hundred individuals have been brought to trial for the offense of trespassing, which for first offenders, as the bulk of these were, normally brings a suspended sentence and perhaps a small fine. The result in these cases has been jail sentences totaling 4,940 days and fines totaling $13,289. The pressure on San Francisco's courts was so great that judges were brought in from the outlying areas, including Judge David D. French of Orange County, who describes himself as "a country boy" and who sentenced Dr. Thomas N. Burbridge, professor of pharmacology at the University of California Medical School and former chairman of the NAACP, to nine months in jail for sitting-in at an auto agency. Orange County is one of the state's citadels of conservatism.

The men and women who in 1964 forced two groups of San Francisco businessmen to adopt policies which even one of their own spokesmen called "a milestone in community relations," are now being vindictively punished for their good citizenship. The tragedy of Watts fell between the demonstrations and the jailings; clearly it has taught the white fathers of San Francisco nothing about the springs of human action.

PANDORA'S AMMUNITION BOX

JOE ALEX MORRIS, JR.

Mr. Morris is Middle East correspondent for the Los Angeles Times. He has been reporting from the Arab world over the past fifteen years.

Beirut

It is not always easy to explain the logic whereby America sells to supposedly friendly countries arms which will in all likelihood be used against other countries with whom we are on equally good terms. Yet this practice has been established U.S. policy for a number of years. We sell or give tanks and aircraft to Jordan, which rattles them in the face of Israel; and we provide similar equipment to Israel for use against the Arabs. The billions of dollars worth of military hardware that went to Pakistan and India was offered in the cause of defending the free world against communism; but it was used in the Kashmir war. Greece and Turkey, two other recipients of American military largess, came very close to blows over Cyprus two summers ago, and may yet find themselves dodging each other's Yankee bullets.

It does not follow from this that we deliberately fan conflagrations among our friends and allies, and indeed we take some precautions to avoid that result. But the supposed safeguards written into arms deals have proved of little or no force when traditional enemies are determined to have another go at conflicts that sometimes date back for centuries. Furthermore, the image of Uncle Sam, the impartial arms merchant, evokes little gratitude and even less admiration in the recipient countries—outside the military caste. Israel complains bitterly over guns delivered to its Arab neighbors, and the Arabs raise the propaganda roof when some forty obsolescent Skyhawk jet bombers are sold to Israel.

We are not safe from criticism even in a country like Iran which, aside from the Soviet Big Brother to the north, is not seriously threatened by any of its neighbors. Our military handouts over the years have led to a crisis of sorts because we are reluctant to supply the Shah with a navy. His Imperial Majesty wants a Persian Gulf flotilla because he suspects that his brother Arabs to the south may one day try to seal off the Gulf and prevent his oil from getting out to—among other places—Israel. In a moment of pique, he asked the docile National Assembly to appropriate $200 million for the purchase of a navy anywhere he sees fit. He hasn't spent the money yet, and no doubt figures that the United States will eventually sell him what he wants. He may be right, but the animosity has been engendered.

It is the Arab-Israeli confrontation, however, that makes American arms policies seem truly the product of a demented computer. This is so, primarily, because the arms race in this tense region has broken out of control, and there is precious little the United States can do about it. Prior to 1955, America, Britain and France, acting in consort, were able to maintain something like a military balance between Israel and its Arab neighbors. But at that time Russia had not entered the picture; today it occupies the center of the stage.

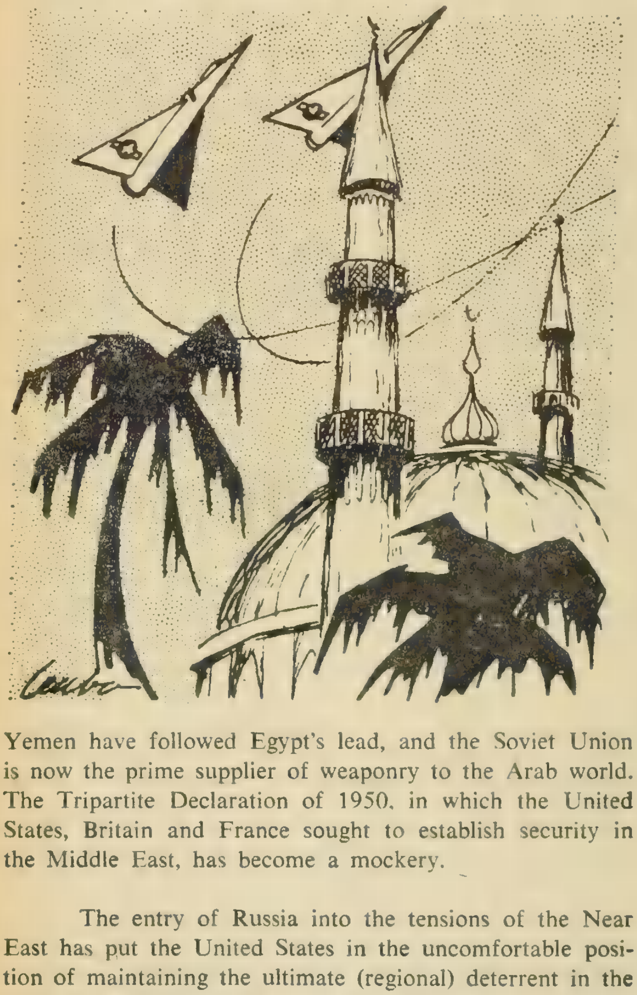
The 1948 debacle of the Palestine war laid the groundwork for a break in traditional Arab ties to the West, but the rupture was surprisingly slow in coming. As late as 1955, Gamal Abdel Nasser was willing to buy arms in the West. What he was no longer prepared to do was accept secondhand equipment, the use of which was to be carefully restricted by conditions attached to the sale.

John Foster Dulles was unwilling, or unable, to understand this change of attitude and Nasser turned to the Soviet bloc for weapons. Since then, Syria, Iraq, Algeria and Yemen have followed Egypt's lead, and the Soviet Union is now the prime supplier of weaponry to the Arab world. The Tripartite Declaration of 1950, in which the United States, Britain and France sought to establish security in the Middle East, has become a mockery.



The entry of Russia into the tensions of the Near East has put the United States in the uncomfortable position of maintaining the ultimate (regional) deterrent in the Sixth Fleet, while at the same time having to watch helplessly while the Arabs arm to the teeth. Rather than abandon these nations as a lost cause, the State Department has adopted what it calls a policy of "selective sales . . . based on careful case-by-case examinations and a determination that such a sale would not be a de-stabilizing factor."

In effect, this means that it's okay to provide Jordan with arms (whatever their eventual use), if the transaction keeps the Russians out of what remains of a dwindling Arab market. Politically, it makes sense: Jordan would probably be forced by Arab political pressures to take Soviet arms if it could not get them from the West. And without question, the West has been losing political influence over Arab governments as they have freed themselves from dependency on Western armaments.

There is an interesting corollary to U.S. policy in this respect. We will also sell arms to countries that have gone all-out for Sovietization of their military equipment when we see a chance to break the Communist dominance of a particular Arab market. Thus in recent years we have sold Iraq some 200 armored personnel carriers, and American "Diamond T" heavy duty power units for tank transporters have gone to Syria to replace Soviet equivalents that did not stand up to the grueling desert conditions.

American arms policy in the Arab-Israel conflict would thus appear to make some kind of sense, but in practice and even within the present limited terms of reference, our arms sales in the Middle East often seem to do more harm than good. We expect kicks from the other side when we sell arms to the Arabs or the Jews. Now we are being criticized by Arabs for selling weapons to other Arabs.

Following the recent sale of Skyhawks to Israel, Nasser, who has now shed his halfhearted efforts to get along with his more conservative brothers, accused both King Faisal of Saudi Arabia and King Hussein of Jordan of conspiring with the United States to help Israel. The reasoning is that Washington would never have dared to sell Israel offensive weapons had not the Western powers, led by the United States, paved the way with big arms sales to the Arab states.

Nasser's public chastisement of the two monarchs came after both had reached agreement with Western powers on new arms, following protracted and, to them, highly irritating negotiations which contrasted poorly with the standard Soviet policy of cheap prices, quick delivery and easy payment at very low interest rates. King Hussein, under pressure from the United Arab Command to equip his air force with supersonic fighters comparable to those of Israel, shopped around anxiously in the United States, Britain and France. All three Western nations were willing to sell, but none would give Hussein credit and repayment terms which his poverty-line fiefdom could afford. Furthermore, the best price Hussein could get for new aircraft was something like three times that asked for a comparable Soviet MIG-21, which the Russians offer on the Arab market at the uneconomic and obviously political price of around $400,000.

Hussein wanted no part of a Soviet deal, and with the help of other pro-Western Arab states successfully resisted Nasser's pressure to standardize all Arab armies with Soviet equipment. Nasser gave way on this point with understandable reluctance—any military expert would agree that coordination of Arab armies against Israel would be vastly simplified if all used the same equipment. At the same time, certain of the more affluent Arab states, among them Kuwait, agreed to help Jordan (which has the longest frontier with Israel of any Arab state) by subsidizing certain arms purchases up to the rock-bottom price on the current world market. This was an open encouragement to Hussein to buy Soviet, and for a while it seemed that he might have to. Eventually, a deal was worked out whereby Formosa sold him some thirty-six early model F-104As.

Faisal had a different problem. He was willing to spend $500 million and perhaps more on an air defense network, and he had the oil revenues to pay for it. Yet he too was shabbily treated. Faisal wanted American F-104s, but eventually the Saudis were persuaded to accept an Anglo-American package in which short-range British Lightning interceptors replaced the 104s. To the dismay of Lockheed and other American firms, the United States backed this British proposal. It turned out later that Washington and London had agreed privately that the British jets should go to Saudi Arabia as part of a complicated offset costs arrangement which will enable Britain to buy American F-111 jets and other advanced equipment without an unduly burdensome outlay of dollars. This made everyone happy except the Saudis, who could truly look upon themselves as the victimized third party in a neat little arrangement.

One place in the Middle East where the United States has been following its official policy "to refrain from becoming a major supplier of arms in this area" is Israel. This worked out well enough as long as the West Germans were prepared to supply Israel with arms under the reparations agreement and France was willing to sell it weapons. But West Germany, eager to restore ruptured relations with the Arabs, has now stopped selling arms to Israel. Last year, the United States had to complete a shipment of Patton tanks under a deal originally made through the Germans.

France too would like to re-establish what it sees as its rightful place in the Arab world—a place that dates back to Napoleon's military conquest and cultural romance with Egypt. The Arabs, who tend to view de Gaulle as a Tito-like maverick in the Western camp, have responded with enthusiasm to French overtures. This could make France reluctant to continue as a traditional supplier of military equipment to Israel, and the French are showing themselves extraordinarily sensitive on the subject. There was a practically instant denial from Paris of a story leaked to The New York Times in Washington that French intermediate range missiles were being sold to Israel. With the German source gone and the French position dubious, the big question is whether the United States will now become Israel's prime source of arms. The years of carefully avoiding this commitment may soon be over.

Under what circumstances are America's "occasional selective sales" not a "de-stabilizing factor" in the Near East? The answer, as far as can be determined, rests on three fundamental points.

First, Israel insists on maintaining a credible capacity to conduct reprisal raids against its hostile neighbors. Correctly, it does not count on outside intervention, either through the UN or by friendly big powers, to stop Arab terrorism. Israel's determination to maintain its own military capability does not stop there, of course; but it is certain to gain Western acquiescence at least to that extent.

The second major factor is the conservative Arab states, who demand help in creating a military potential impressive enough to discourage the aspirations of their revolutionary brethren. The most pressing current example is Egypt's threat to invade Saudi Arabia if that country resumes military aid to the Yemeni Royalists. This poses no policy problems for Washington, and the competition for the multimillion-dollar Saudi defense contract was waged vigorously by American, British and French manufacturers.

The third—and by far the dominant—element is the famed Arab-Israeli confrontation. For years, the State Department and other Western governments have taken it for granted that the Arabs could wipe out Israel, if they could ever organize themselves and if there were no outside military deterrents. A senior American diplomat now in Bagdad is convinced that they would attack Israel tomorrow if they thought they could get away with it.

However, most responsible Arab leaders, including Nasser, are very much aware of the outside deterrents. The biggest of these is the Sixth Fleet, stationed in the Mediterranean. Others include the British bases on Cyprus, and probably the NATO bases in Turkey.

Neither side, however, is taking anything for granted, including the awesome presence of the Sixth Fleet. No amount of arming of Israel's 2 million citizens will give that country anything approaching quantitative equality in military strength with 85 million Arabs, or even with the 40 million living on its doorstep. At least not since the Soviet Union began flooding the Arab market with weaponry. And how effective can any qualitative superiority be under these circumstances? Egyptian Field Marshal and Vice President Abdel Hakim Amer put it this way: "No matter what quantity of arms Israel may get, she will have to reach the point of saturation over which she cannot go."

Despite their own bitter divisions and differences, the Arabs are expanding their armies and improving their equipment. Timetables and deadlines have been set, funds are being made available by the Arab oil states, and in some countries, notably Jordan, the results have been impressive. The United Arab Command has been established but is a long way from effective operation. Both Jordan and Lebanon have declined to afford full transit facilities in peacetime to other Arab armies, and neither of these two nor Syria has agreed to allow Egyptian troops to be based on their territory.

All this could change, but meanwhile Israel profits from the lack of confidence and affection the Arabs exhibit toward one another. Probably 50,000 Egyptian troops are still stuck in the Yemen, far from Egypt's Sinai desert border with Israel, and virtually all of Iraq's combat units are in the north of that country fighting Kurdish rebels. Two of the four Arab states bordering on Israel have actually profited from its creation. Beirut has become a boom port since Haifa was cut off from the Arab hinterland. Tourism is Jordan's biggest foreign exchange earner, and this would rapidly dry up should Jerusalem become the capital of an Arab Palestine.

Such factors may make the Arab plans less alarming than they appear on paper, but no one underestimates the danger

The Other Continent

In the coming weeks, The Nation will publish a series of related articles on the political and social condition of the major countries of Latin America. The first of these, "Peasants and Guerrillas" by Norman Gall, will appear in the issue of August 22.

that a chance incident might spark a conflagration in the Middle East, and the chances of that happening increase with every step toward military preparedness taken by the Arab states. Furthermore, the recent revival of organized Arab terrorist raids across the Israel frontier has provoked more frequent Israeli retaliations, and any one of these brushes could lead to a major commitment of forces on both sides. The United Arab Command has exerted some pressure on the Arab states to control terrorists, since it wants to be fully prepared when the day of confrontation comes; but even should it be dragged into a full-scale war with Israel by the hit-and-run route, its armies would be much better prepared than they were two years ago.

Although U.S. explanations of its so-called policy in selling arms to the Middle East seem remarkably offhand, it is difficult at this point to imagine an attitude that would improve the situation. King Hussein would almost certainly feel obliged to accept Soviet arms if his Western sources were cut off. The Lebanese might not, but their 10,000-man army is relatively insignificant in the large picture. As for the other key nations—Egypt, Syria and Iraq—the West no longer controls their ordnance supplies.

The United States will no doubt continue, however reluctantly, to sell tanks and airplanes to both Arab and Jew—meanwhile hoping anxiously that they will be used for bluffs that never quite come to blows.

A WHITE LOOK AT BLACK POWER

PAUL GOOD

Mr. Good is a free-lance writer who specializes in reporting events from the South.

In the middle of June, the words "Black Power" were shouted by a handful of Negroes marching along a Mississippi highway. The national reaction to this small verbal stimulus was extreme; it was as though someone had cried "fire!" in an excelsior factory. Before the echo had died, the civil rights movement was in disarray. The White House, many white liberals and most white men in the street were aghast, angry, or both. Not a few black men were upset. Why should these two words have produced such exorbitant reaction? The answer involves many racial facts and fictions current in American life.

Among the most violent reactors was Roy Wilkins of the NAACP, who exercised his prerogative as a veteran Negro leader to denounce Black Power. "It is the reverse of Mississippi," he told the NAACP convention in Los Angeles. "A reverse Hitler, a reverse Ku Klux Klan."

Dr. Martin Luther King sagaciously concentrated on trying to interpret what the words really meant, but he also dissociated himself from them; there was obviously some awful taboo about using the word "power" in conjunction with the word "black." President Johnson made that clear. "We are not interested in black power," the President declared. "And we are not interested in white power. But we are interested in American democratic power with a small 'd.' "

This was heartwarmingly biracial and bipartisan. But like so many of Mr. Johnson's statements, it did not come to grips with the issue. Because whether or not "we" are interested in white power, it is a fact of national life that virtually all power in America is white. There is black poverty, white power; black aspiration, white power; black pressure, white power.

Manifestations of white power have been sometimes gross, sometimes subtle. While the controversy over Black Power raged on front pages, the social, economic and political proofs of white power were scattered over the inside pages. One story told about an amusement park in Lawson, Okla., that barred Negroes. Another reported that the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers was being forced by court order to eliminate a constitutional provision denying membership to anyone "unless he is a white man." The union, representing 40,000 jobs, has for half a century made sure that all the trains thundering across the continent would have white hands on the throttle while black hands made up the Pullman berths.

Up in the air, Vice President Humphrey and the chief of the Justice Department's antitrust division had flown to the All Star game in a plane owned by the Anheuser-Busch Company. Company executives had recently donated $10,000 to the Democratic Party. A Justice Department antitrust suit had recently been dropped against the company. Surely these facts were related only by coincidence; yet a Negro, reading the story and remembering the national uproar a few years back when a colored FBI driver gave Dr. King a five-minute lift, might ponder how white folks just had a way of flying high together—to get some place.

Such stories—and thousands more they could tell—spelled out to Negroes the frustrating phenomenon of white power which the majority of whites were taking for granted. Understandably. Power of any color corrupts, and white America's power had had a disabling influence on its ability even to recognize the powerless position in which the American Negro found himself. All these factors of power, and the lack of it, combined on the Mississippi march to produce the new Negro rallying cry at a historic moment of change in the civil rights movement. An attempt to understand Black Power may begin with the march.

By June 15, the marchers had been trudging for nine dissension-ridden days through Mississippi, the heartland of white power in action and of Negro powerlessness. James Meredith was back in New York, wrapped in his personal mystique, nursing his wounds and suspicions about what civil rights leaders were doing to his original march concept. Dr. King, Floyd McKissick of CORE and Stokely Carmichael, chairman of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, were running the march with help from the Medical Committee on Human Rights, the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party and the Delta Ministry. Charles Evers and the NAACP were giving on-again, off-again support. CORE and SNCC sneered at NAACP as representing the black bourgeoisie; NAACP huffed that it made racial progress while the others agitated.

Compounding the organizational stresses was the fact that McKissick and Carmichael were stepping into the national spotlight for the first time since being elected leaders and were eager to establish reputations. Dr. King's presence assured widespread publicity. But SNCC, in particular, had long been at odds with Dr. King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference and the patchwork unity of the past was badly frayed. March leaders were divided over objectives although McKissick saw strategic value in this.

"We're not getting sucked into one objective," he said. "So they can say, Well you got your civil rights bill. What else do you want? Get off the streets!"

For many miles, the spirit of going-on-ness, the spiritual lift of seeing Negroes leave their woebegone shacks to join the big parade had swept dissensions and tactics underfoot. And there was full agreement on one thing: the reality of life along Highway 51 (Meredith's original route to Jackson) and then along Highway 49 as the column swung west into the Delta. It was a reality that the lazy national eye slid over. Civil rights workers hadn't been killed lately and Congress had passed a whole bunch of civil rights laws and why the hell get out on a highway just to demonstrate? Particularly when the nation had enough trouble in Vietnam.

But quantities of federal law were being broken along both highways, and white men in control in Washington were doing nothing about it. The marchers passed no integrated schools, although the Supreme Court had ruled twelve years before that school segregation must end. Restaurants, courthouses, theatres and many hospitals were as segregated as they had been at the turn of the century, despite the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and other legislation. The job-rights section of the same act had produced little or no change in the scattered factories—most of them Northern-owned—along the route.

Mississippi Governor Paul Johnson was talking so moderately you could hardly believe he was the same man who once said NAACP stood for "niggers, alligators, apes, coon and possum." Yet there wasn't a single Negro in the Mississippi executive, judiciary or legislature. Thousands of Mississippi Negroes were being drafted to fight in Vietnam but there wasn't one Negro on a Mississippi draft board. The Poverty Program, fought by white Mississippians as if it were a Vietcong plot, the vaunted Poverty Program had done almost nothing to relieve poverty in a state where the median Negro income is around $600 a year. It had only created a few hundred jobs inside OEO agencies like Head Start and a job training program called STAR that somehow wound up being run by the Catholic Church.

Hoehands in the cotton fields shimmering in June heat were getting $3 for a ten-hour day, with no minimum wage or age safeguards. A multibillion-dollar cotton support bill financed by U.S. taxpayers was forcing drastic acreage cutbacks, but it contained not a word or a dollar to aid Negroes forced off white land without jobs, training or hope. The only federal law that had produced measurable results was the Voting Rights Act. About 100,000 Negroes had registered since its enactment in August, 1965. This made a total of 130,000 on the books with more than 300,000 still unregistered against 545,000 white voters. Atrophied Negro political instincts and limited federal involvement, along with white power employing all the intimidating tricks the Deep South knew so well, had reduced registration to a trickle as the march came through.

All this reality of national failure to insure a democratic society of equal opportunity had been on display when the marchers reached the segregated city of Grenada on June 14. How much got across to the American public at large is debatable. Television newsmen were busy asking alarmed questions about campsite debates over nonviolence. UPI sent out a story calling the march "part movement, part circus." It stressed that many marchers wore T-shirts and denims, reported that one youth told a newsman that the coming sexual revolution would center around homosexuality, and concluded that most newsmen agreed with a highway patrolman who declared: "This is a great assembly of kooks."

Segregated Grenada smiled a crocodile smile, let Negroes use white courthouse bathrooms that had been numbered One and Two, not scatalogically but racially, and hired temporary Negro registrars. It even swallowed its indignation when a black speaker slapped a bust of Jeff Davis and called him a "joker." "They're really trying the patience of this town," said a reporter whose journalistic myopia enabled him to overlook the Negro patience that had been tried for a century.

But Grenada didn't need sympathy. It planned to redeem its Deep South reputation with firings and jailings after the march moved on. The country didn't seem to be paying too much attention anyway. The Negro leadership was painfully aware that the town's analysis was correct, that something was needed to awaken America's comatose conscience. SNCC's Carmichael decided that his own moment of truth had arrived.

Stokely—as friend and foe alike call him—is 24, Harlem-bred and one of the young "old Mississippi veterans." He has been jailed twenty-seven times, survived the horrendous summer of 1964 in charge of the Greenwood COFO Freedom House that came under firebomb attack, and is an articulate spokesman for the ultra-militant wing of SNCC. That wing, under the philosophical spell of Bob Parish, né Moses, had carried the SNCC convention in May and Stokely was elected, replacing John Lewis. Reporter magazine reported that Lewis had been "dumped." The truth was that Lewis, a dedicated militant himself but spiritually committed to nonviolence without modifiers, had become a minority member in his own organization. SNCC, with Northern membership dominating its once-Southern character, had swung from nonviolent activism to a new, harder look which Stokely epitomized.

Tall and energetic, theorist and activist, Carmichael was outspoken if not always precise. He was orienting SNCC to all-black direction and limiting those whites who remained to work only in white communities. The white press, always eager to sit in judgment on the content and tone of the movement, had viewed him with an alarm it did not exhibit at continued Southern defiance of federal law. This has been standard procedure whenever the Negro has begun to make assertive gestures, but Stokely reacted with a contempt that blocked free exchange with even the few perceptive reporters who covered the march—those from the Los Angeles Times and The New York Times, for example.

POLICE
moss

"There's no point explaining ourselves to the white press anymore," Stokely told me. "All they want to do is put us on the defensive. It isn't my job to make black people love everybody or to pick up guns—but to help black people get the things they deserve. We have to address ourselves to the black people, not to the press or the black bourgeoisie. Integration is an insidious subterfuge when initiated by blacks alone." It's his style to repeat dogma and he did.

"Integration is an insidious subterfuge when initiated by blacks alone. So we've got to move to control neighborhoods, sections and counties politically and economically just like every other American minority has done."

The next day, June 16, as the march entered Greenwood, he gave the word to SNCC supporters in the column to send the cry "Black Power" booming over the Delta. Carmichael himself was arrested that day for trying to put up the marchers' tents against police orders. A graphic example of what white power means to black men can be seen in two photographs—one, of his arrest appearing on the front page of the Times, June 17, the other, the arrest of Aubrey James Norvell after he allegedly shot James Meredith, which was on page 29 of the June 7 issue. An AP photo shows Stokely, grimacing in pain, as white policemen twist his arms behind his back to handcuff him. He had not resisted arrest. The UPI picture of Norvell shows him with both hands free, puffing calmly on a pipe as he enters a police car with no official hand on him minutes after firing a shotgun three times at Meredith.

Stokely was bailed out—apparently with NAACP money—and came to a night meeting at the campsite with fire in his eye to tell the crowd:

"We're asking Negroes not to go to Vietnam but to stay in Greenwood and fight. We need Black Power. What do we want?"

"Black Power!" roared the crowd, and the question and answer was tossed back and forth in the night.

"If they put one more of us in jail," Stokely shouted, "we're not going to pay a bond to get out. . . . We're going up there and get him out ourselves. Black Power!"

"Black Power! Black Power!"

"You can't depend on the march here in Greenwood," he went on. "You must build a power base . . . the power base has to get you a black sheriff. . . . White people aren't going to do it for you . . . you have to stop being ashamed of being black and don't try to be white. . . . Now that doesn't mean to be anti-white . . . but get the nappiest-headed black man with the broadest nose and the thickest lips and make him sheriff!"

The crowd exulted. It seemed that a long-mute chord had been struck. But what did it all mean exactly? Storm courthouses? Run over whites? After the shouting died, Carmichael and I talked quietly together.

"When I talk about going to the courthouse," he said, "it's an allusion. Negroes understand me. But whites get nervous when we don't keep talking about brotherly love. They need reassurance. But we're not about to divert our energies to give it to them."

Nationwide, Negroes are a minority of 22 million out of a total population of 190 million, as President Johnson on July 20 pointedly reminded them. In Mississippi they could potentially out-register whites in 40 per cent of the counties, with black majorities possible in another dozen counties across the line in Alabama. But how could a minority on its own ever take significant national power?

"You can't everywhere," Carmichael said. "You take it anywhere you can out in the country, and in the cities you use bloc pressure like the Irish, Italians and everybody else. But you do it on your own terms, not on what the white man thinks you should do. This nation has only responded to demands in civil rights legislation. Whites never give anything. Even today Johnson won't send in federal registrars unless we speak to it. And as far as making coalitions in a place like Mississippi, who you gonna coalesce with? You can only talk to them on the basis of political power and you have to become more militant—in Mississippi and all over—because whites get more militant as we thrust into areas of real control they don't like to think about."

Yet there were immediate ambiguities. Other minorities had worked inside existing political parties to exert power, but Stokely sometimes seemed to be saying that Negroes should create their own independent parties. Except on a limited local basis, it sounded politically suicidal. Black Power was not intended as a call for black violence, but a few marchers talked of spilling white blood, their words stridently publicized by the press and given the ring of policy. The concept of nonviolence was a black gift to white America, but white America had developed a proprietary feeling toward it and now was insisting that even though violence was a one-way street against Negroes, they would have to continue to buck the traffic and be run down. White fear of Negro riot was universal, and riot itself the ultimate weapon of desperation, self-annihilating to the rioter submerged in a mob and a confession of his own failure to challenge politically a society that had failed him. Already, riot was lacing the air with a whiff of brimstone.

Was Black Power a call for retaliatory combat and riot? It sometimes depended whether a Black Nationalist or a black voter registration worker was interpreting it. The day after Greenwood, Dr. King's right-hand man, Rev. Andrew Young, was trying to come to grips with Black Power as he marched past Negro shacks, surrounded by rows of cotton whose owner would share in billion-dollar-a-year federal supports.

"Even Gandhi preached that he would rather a man be violent than be a coward," Reverend Young said. "Dr. King has never said a man didn't have the duty to defend his person or home against attack. But we insist on nonviolence in demonstrations because it works. The thing that worries me now is that nondiscipline is spreading. Black Power means one thing to one man and something else to another.

"Now what I think Stokely is doing is trying to fill the gap left by Malcolm. He's trying to project a militant image, push Negro protest as far as he can, carrying white liberals along with him as far as they will go. Then he may edge back a little. Actually, SNCC's position on Black Power isn't too far from ours except in style and semantics."

This was partially true. In the May Alabama primaries, Dr. King had urged Negroes to bloc vote for certain candidates, almost all black. SNCC, meanwhile, boycotted the primary, partly from principle and partly to conform with state "third party" laws as it prepared to run all-Negro independent slates in the fall. King backed State Attorney General Richmond Flowers in the gubernatorial primary and, as expected, he was trounced by Mr. and Mrs. George Wallace. The Times's Arthur Krock promptly lectured about the "counter polarization of white voters that Dr. King's counsel inevitably stimulated." It required a special brand of Krockian obtuseness not to see that Negro bloc voting was a countermeasure against already existing white Alabama polarization. But nowhere was the gulf between white and black, and the tensions and tactical differences among Negroes so obvious as in Mississippi.

In 1963, the NAACP's Medgar Evers paid with his life for trying to bring power to the black people of Mississippi within the existing system. His brother Charles succeeded him and was immediately involved in a power struggle against both the whites and SNCC, which was starting to practice the concept of Black Power without preaching it. SNCC entered Mississippi determined to leapfrog over any transitional accommodations with white power to a position of self-created strength to which whites would have to respond. Since more than 95 per cent of the state's Negroes were poor, politically impotent and educationally impoverished, it determined to work with them in a basically class struggle against the Mississippi bourgeoisie, white or black. (It may be noted here that on a national scale 95 per cent of Negroes are ghettoized and represent a similar latent power source. The majority do not belong to SNCC, NAACP or CORE, and scarcely seem to belong to America. In Harlem, most belong simply to Adam Clayton Powell.)

Mississippi SNCC callously used the black bourgeoisie assembled under the NAACP aegis while trying in every way to undermine the organization and promote an egalitarian vision of a society that would be revolutionary but which otherwise was never clearly defined. Evers, continuing his brother's unrevolutionary approach and shrewd in the art of political survival, caught on early in the game. As far back as 1964 he boycotted the first convention of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party, the political action arm set up by SNCC and CORE.

If SNCC was using NAACP's painfully established foothold in the state for its own ends, NAACP benefited from SNCC's headlong courage in openly challenging white authority and making the Negro aware that he should control his own destiny. Through a season of violence, SNCC —with CORE—forced the federal government to make the presence of the FBI and Justice Department more strongly felt, and that eased the organizing problems of all Negro groups. Salvos of bad publicity from the killings and bombings also jarred the white power structure to a legitimate fear that the state would be ruined economically if at least a façade of law and order were not erected. A memorable example of what could happen occurred in McComb, where SNCC workers and sympathizers were the principal targets of eighteen church burnings and Freedom House bombings in the '64 summer. This violence convinced three northern firms to abandon factory relocation there. White McComb leadership quickly worked through the NAACP for a well-publicized and successful test of public accommodations, while quietly and completely throttling SNCC efforts to rouse black citizens to independent political action.

The results of this internecine power struggle were still inconclusive as SNCC workers proclaimed Black Power on the march. The Freedom Party had made a moderately good showing in the June 7 state primary although all candidates—as expected—were steam-rollered by white opposition. SNCC influence still was strong in its council, but not absolute; the party ran one white Congressional candidate, thus nominally remaining open to whites.

Evers meanwhile was doing pretty well with his own voter organization, particularly in two counties (Jefferson and Claiborne) which had overwhelmingly Negro population majorities. It was not Black Power but it was black power. He had taken the NAACP into alliance with a new biracial group called the Mississippi Young Democrats which is put forward as a coalition of Negroes and white Mississippi liberals. The total number of publicly declared white liberals in Mississippi could ride with comfort in a Volkswagen. Hodding Carter III, editor of the Pulitzer Prize-winning Greenville Delta Democrat, is the Young Democrats' co-chairman, along with a University of Mississippi Negro student, Cleveland Donald.

Carter is a liberal within narrowly defined Mississippi terms. For example, when striking Negro cotton workers were shamefully handled by Greenville authorities last year, his paper looked the other way. But there are already signs that the Johnson Administration is giving tacit support to the Young Democrats to get the albatross of the regular white Mississippi Democratic Party off its neck. The President also has never forgiven the Freedom Party for rejecting his compromise over the seating of the white Mississippi delegation at the 1964 Democratic Convention. Charles Evers may someday be invited to dinner at the LBJ ranch, but Stokely Carmichael never will. It seems as obvious as it is dangerous that this alienation will draw the Administration even further than it has presently drifted from responsiveness to Negro realities. It also helps buttress Stokely's contention that in order to get into the game with the powers that be, Negroes must let the whites call the rules.

This controversy physically and ideologically dominated the Mississippi march and made it vulnerable to sniping from within and without. Dr. King was in the most exposed position. He did not want to disavow SNCC, which he had supported even when SNCC elements were freely taking pot shots at his "bourgeois" belief in coalition with the whites to create nonviolently the "beloved community." At the same time, Black Power was being equated with Negro violence, and violence remained anathema to Dr. King, and to his white moral and financial supporters.

"I prefer not to use the phrase Black Power," he said. "Not that I don't sympathize with aspects of it. But it seems to say, black supremacy, and this would be as evil as white supremacy. I do know the Negro must have power if we're going to gain freedom and human dignity."

Dr. King's interpretation was challenged in New York by Lincoln Lynch, CORE's second in command, who gave a most persuasive explanation of the Black Power rationale. As quoted in The New York Times, he said:

> This power, economic, political and psychological has been denied the black man for too long and must be realized. We need black people standing on their own two feet and all the shouts of "Freedom now" are meaningless and empty phrases until we accomplish this.
>
> The white man will not respect you until you can stand toe to toe with him and eyeball to eyeball. History has shown that if you're really depending on the vast majority of whites to help you're really leaning on a very broken reed. . . . As time goes by the militants will appear more militant and the moderates more moderate. But what we must remember is that no man can be "moderately" free.

On June 21, Dr. King led a side march in Philadelphia, Miss., along with local Negro leadership. Deputy Sheriff Cecil Price, named in the killing of Schwerner, Goodman and Chaney, controlled the lawmen there who permitted and encouraged white townspeople to attack the marchers in one of the most terrifying outbreaks I have seen in the South during three years that include St. Augustine and Selma. Dr. King cabled the President for immediate federal intervention. The President instructed his assistant press secretary, Robert Fleming, to reply. Fleming said the President had been assured by Governor Johnson that state highway patrolmen would furnish adequate future protection.

"The President," said Fleming, "knows it is going to take a lot of effort to produce understanding down there."

Two days later, I stood with the marchers in a field behind a segregated Negro school in Canton while highway patrolmen fired tear-gas canisters directly at them, then kicked and beat with gun stocks those who were too sick or blinded to run. One patrolman, kicking a woman into semi-consciousness, said: "Nigger, you want your freedom? Well, here it is." Dr. King sent another cable and this time Attorney General Katzenbach was delegated to express the President's concern. He said that the violence, while deplorable, had resulted because Negroes refused to accept a white choice of campsites and had illegally gone to the school. It took a good deal of effort to understand why the Administration was responding with a legalism instead of indignation to the raw display of old-time white brutality. Lynch's "broken reed" dangled.

Washington indifference had another important and probably far-reaching effect. It undermined Dr. King at a time when his strength within the movement was being tested. In the past, at Selma for instance, he had been able to marshal strong Washington pressure when he called. Now, he was just another dismissed Negro voice. If the President had wanted to boost Black Power, he could not have chosen a better way.

By the time the march reached Jackson, Dr. King received another setback. SNCC, CORE and the Freedom Party outvoted his effort to have Charles Evers appear at the Capitol rally for the sake of unity. The militants would not forgive Evers for his vacillating and sometimes critical attitude toward the march leadership (that this has worked in Evers' favor among white Mississippians is ironic, but indicates how the scorching mantle of "good nigger" will increasingly be bestowed by whites on Negro civil rights leaders who oppose Black Power).

Dr. King felt he could no longer cooperate with SNCC. Privately, he blamed SNCC's "meanness of spirit . . . too much infighting that wastes energies." Publicly, it was announced that SCLC henceforth would work alone in Mississippi. Black Power had forced the movement to drop its mask of solidarity, cracked and peeling anyway, and confront America with the varied faces of Negro demand.

Whites looked and were not pleased. Sen. Robert F. Kennedy decided "there is a militant group of Negroes who are not anxious to work with the white community to find answers to these problems." Author Lillian Smith, who had lent her personal courage and beautiful words to CORE for many years, was anguished when its convention endorsed Black Power. She resigned her membership, declaring that CORE had been infiltrated by "nihilists, black nationalists and plain old-fashioned haters . . . the new killers of the dream."

But many Negroes felt that white power, which had led whites to prosperity, was leading to slow death for Negroes. They believed that Miss Smith's dream and the stirring one that Dr. King had recounted on the Washington march had turned to rude awakening, the alarm bell of reality ringing in Watts and in Canton and in every community where white promises to Negroes were not being redeemed. Senator Kennedy notwithstanding, white communities like the one in Los Angeles that defeated a hospital bond issue for Watts did not seem anxious to work for the common good. Negroes saw Mayor Daley in Chicago boasting that he was getting rid of the rats in the ghetto while the ghetto remained. They saw sprinklers on fire hydrants and ten portable swimming pools as the white largess bestowed to end riots there. Would the next white inspiration be to bus colored children to white hydrants?

"We are trying," President Johnson said, "to meet the poverty situation as we find it with the limited resources at our command."

Were resources in the world's richest country limited by commitments in Vietnam? The President called in Congressional leaders and told them to cut domestic spending because of possible defense increases. But months ago he had promised that the war would not affect domestic programs. Washington had enough money to build—unannounced—in Thailand one of the largest airfields in Southeast Asia. Still it could not rebuild a ghetto at home.

It is not yet possible to say how Black Power will respond to the continuation of current white policies at home and abroad. It remains primarily a shibboleth, but it certainly will be harnessed politically. If white liberals unselectively lump it with the extreme elements in black nationalism, they will be making the same kind of mistake that Republicans —and Democrats—made when they dismissed the ADA as a bunch of pinkos. Worse. Administration inaction after Canton has raised Southern hopes that stronger defiance of Negro demands and federal law may be possible. The riot-frazzled white Northern mood is increasingly hostile to pending civil rights legislation with its open housing provision. Buried nerves of basic racial prejudice are being exposed; it is gloomy to speculate what the nationwide effect might have been had the murderer of those eight Chicago nurses turned out to be a Negro. All these things will make it increasingly difficult for the responsible proponents of Black Power to work out its destiny in a way compatible with the history of American political minorities and in the process to evolve a definition which, if not noble, is at least "democratic with a small 'd.'"

Black Power is white power, only darker.

SALVAGE ARCHAEOLOGY

Saving the Past from the Present

J. O. BREW

Mr. Brew, director of the Peabody Museum, Harvard University, is chairman of the United States Committee for the Recovery of Archaeological Remains and president of the UNESCO International Committee on Monuments, Historical and Artistic Sites and Archaeological Excavations.

After a trip up the Nile, Lord Dunsany wrote: "But what I remember most clearly from that journey was a figure carved from green stone in the temple of Luxor, buried nearly up to the waist in the dust of ages; and, as I looked at it seated there, a woman came from a cottage at the back of the temple and threw into the temple over a low wall a basketful of small rubbish, so that I actually saw what it was that buries cities."

That was fifty or sixty years ago. Since then, with modern technology we have improved our methods, immeasurably. We no longer only bury cities; we rip them up, push them aside and knock them down. And we do these things not only in war but in our peaceful pursuits of urban renewal, multi-purpose reservoirs, autobahns and transcontinental highways, pipe lines, land-levelings for efficient farming, airports, missile ranges, factories, strip mining and an ever increasing number of other good causes. For such purposes the surface of the earth upon which our forebears have lived for hundreds of thousands of years is being constantly revised.

Much of this, though not all, is desirable. We gain by it. The purpose of this article is to draw attention to the things we lose, and to suggest ways by which the losses can be avoided or, at least, minimized.

Man has always speculated about his origins; some part of his thoughts has ever turned toward his creation and the reasons for his being. Even those societies which officially deny religion honor "folklore" and "cultural orientation" and spend much money and effort to trace their history. The number of people conducting research in archaeology, ethnology and social anthropology in the more advanced Soviet republics is a constant surprise to visitors from the West. The scientific papers coming out of China indicate that the same process goes on there.

So, on whatever side of whatever "curtain" you happen to be, modern life and thought seem to demand a growing knowledge of what man did and built and considered important in the past. Yet our bulldozers and blasting powder continue to rip the very guts out of the past.

What, then, is being done about it? Actually, quite a lot is being done, in the United States and elsewhere. The trouble is that the effort, though extraordinary by comparison with attitudes toward such matters of only a few years ago, is not enough. Recent developments in salvage archaeology and historical conservation are so impressive that to list them invites the danger of lulling the reader into complacency. The next few paragraphs should be read bearing in mind the speed at which both urban and rural landscapes are being reshaped.

Salvage archaeology was probably born early in the century in Egypt when Prof. George Reisner of Harvard University excavated temples and pre-dynastic sites along the Nile in the area to be flooded by the first dam at Aswan. It passed through its adolescence, quite successfully, in the 1920s when Prof. Walter B. Emery, now of London University but then working for the Egyptian Antiquities Service, excavated the sites to be flooded by the second raising of the height of that dam. It came to maturity after the end of the Second World War when engineers freed from combat duties began building dams at home, primarily in the United States and the USSR. The story of the development of salvage archaeology in connection with our Federal River Basin program is worth telling, for it was the first major coordination of archaeologists and historians with construction engineers.

When archaeologists first became aware of the problem, in 1946, the program was well under way. In the Missouri Basin, which occupies one-third of the continental United States, 108 dams had already been authorized and many of them were under construction. Since then, many more have been added. The main stem of the Missouri, in its northern reaches, was to become a series of lakes, and reservoirs were to be scattered wholesale throughout the tributaries. At that time it was estimated that more than 80 per cent of the prehistoric and early historic living areas in the entire basin lay along the river banks and their adjacent bluffs. Every known site of five of the prehistoric northern plains cultures in North and South Dakota was to be flooded by the reservoirs. The largest of these lakes, the one behind the Oahe dam, would at high water be 308 miles long. Some 30 miles downstream was the northern end of the second largest lake, Fort Randall. A smaller check dam, authorized within the year, would flood most of the intervening valley. Other dams had been authorized on major and minor streams, from the Columbia to the Susquehanna. So our river valleys were to become a series of lakes and many thousands of sites would be inundated.

Roads, railroads, cemeteries and towns were to be moved; farmers were compensated for their loss of bottom lands. But no provision had been made for the ancient sites which would be lost. To remedy this oversight in the planning, the Committee for the Recovery of Archaeological Remains was formed, with full cooperation from the National Park Service and the Smithsonian Institution, and much needed financial support from the American Council of Learned Societies. In conjunction with the construction agencies, the Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation, a scheme was designed and financed by which archaeologists and historians made surveys of the dam sites, the pool areas, the sites of the sometimes very large construction towns, and the borrow pits which are usually extensive since most of the dams are built primarily of earth. Thus the Federal Inter-Agency Archaeological Salvage program in the river basins came into being.

During the last twenty years more than 500 reservoir areas in every section of the country and Alaska have been surveyed and more than 15,000 sites located. Unique and important sites have been excavated and historic buildings recorded by means of photographs and scale drawings. Buildings of great historical value have been moved. The Park Service and the Smithsonian have been the leaders in this program, but they have received extraordinary cooperation from some hundred state and private institutions, working under contracts with the Park Service or on their own. These include universities, museums, state and local archaeological and historical societies. In addition, other federal agencies are participating more and more.

Destruction in the river basins is only part of the picture. Since 1946, an incredible part of our land surface has been worked over and this tendency increases in a geometrical progression. A major highway through a canyon bottom in New Mexico can obliterate six or eight archaeological sites per mile. A pipe line in the same region knocks off one site after another as it cuts through the countryside for hundreds of miles. Atomic energy plants, missile ranges and NASA installations have a positive affinity for areas of concentrated archaeological occupation in the West and the South.

Nor is only the countryside threatened. Peoples of all races in all ages have tended to pick the same kinds of sites for their cities. A big city often stands on an earlier small city, which in turn may be located on top of an archaeological site. The thoroughness with which urban renewal attacks its projects surpasses even that of imperial Rome, and historic buildings go down like thunder. Despite the success of the River Basin program (and losses still occur even there); despite the success in a few states of our highway salvage program; despite the fact that an El Paso Gas Company pipe-line crew now normally includes two archaeologists, monuments of incalculable archaeological and historic interest are being destroyed practically every day in the United States.

Before suggesting what should be done about all this, however, one more example of positive accomplishment should be presented. The past, laid low by progress, is a process by no means restricted to the United States. Even remote areas in Africa and Asia are feeling its effects and will do so on a rapidly increasing scale for the rest of the century. A case in point is the valley of the Nile. The new high dam, Sadd-el-Aali, south of Aswan, will create a lake more than 300 miles long. It will increase the cultivable land in Egypt by one-third and produce a great quantity of needed electricity. It will also inundate entirely all of the places along the Nile where the people of Nubia have lived for millennia. In this completely desert country, life is possible only along the banks of the river. The human record of at least half a million years was threatened with oblivion under the waters of the new lake.

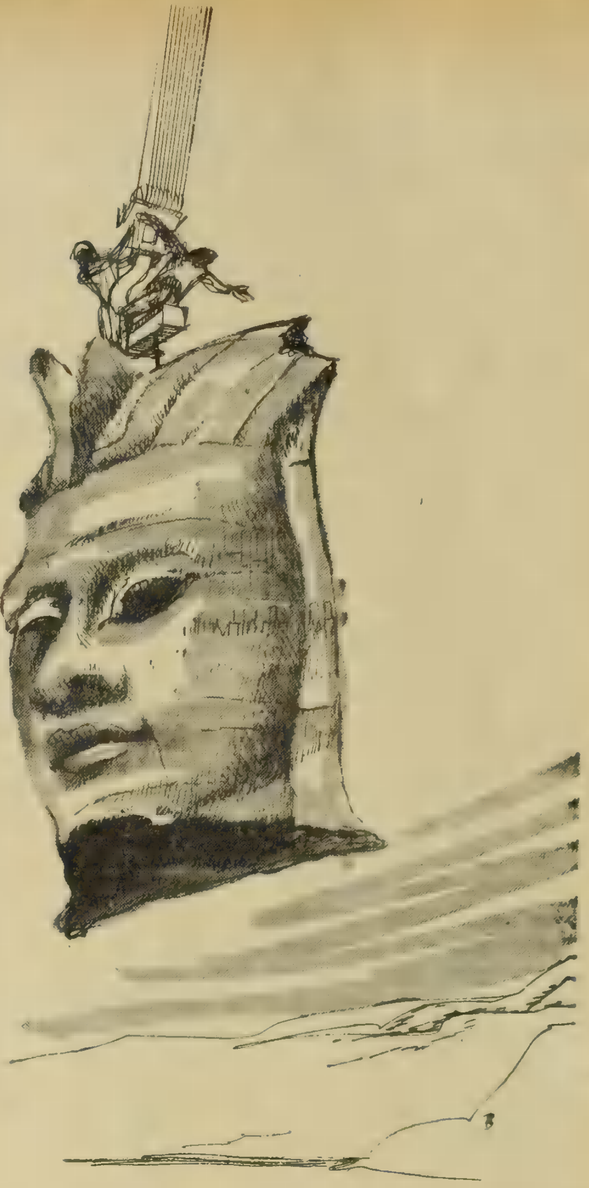
When it became certain that the high dam was to be built, Mme. Christianne Desroches-Noblecourt, now Curator of Egyptology at the Louvre, in conjunction with the Egyptian Government, brought the crisis to the attention of the International Monuments Committee of UNESCO. Thus began what has turned out to be archaeology's largest single salvage program, and at the same time the world's most extensive example of international cooperation for a cultural (or perhaps any other) project.

Twenty-six countries were involved in the archaeological field work. The activities ranged from intensive reconnaissance to large-scale excavations and included architectural, epigraphic, ecological and photogrammetric studies. The history covered was from the early Stone Age to the modern peoples who have been displaced. Some of the larger countries sent many expeditions and some of these worked for as many as seven years. Eight American universities participated, many of them with more than one expedition at a time, and many working in both Egypt and the Sudan. The American Research Center in Cairo also played an important part.

In addition to the surveys and excavations, a surprising number of the more important Pharaonic temples have been moved to new locations. The most difficult task, and the one that has caught the attention of the entire world, was the raising of the two great rock-cut temples at Abu Simbel. Aside from its significance in historical conservation, the rescue of the two temples, the larger one consisting of eleven chambers and cut 200 feet into solid rock, is an engineering triumph comparable to the building of the pyramids.

In all, twenty-four temples have been scheduled for moving, and much of the work is already done. Four temples have been moved in the Sudan alone. The outstanding achievement in this part of the program in Egypt, aside from Abu Simbel, is the rescue and reassembling of the temple of Kalabsha by the government of West Germany. The ground plan of this beautiful Greco-Roman temple is about the size of Notre Dame. Leslie Greener, an artist on the staff of the Oriental Institute, University of Chicago, says of the reconstruction: "The work has been so beautifully done . . . that the very air of antiquity seems to have moved with the stones."

Many countries which could not send scholars or engineers to aid in the work gave financial support. The fact that both Kuwait and Cambodia made cash contributions indicates how widely the idea is spreading that archaeological and historical remains are important to all the world, not only to the country where they may happen to be. The United States can be proud of the part it has played in this extraordinary international effort. Generous donations have been made by the federal government from its Public Law 480 funds in Cairo. These are the so-called counterpart funds—Egyptian pounds which have accumulated from the sale of surplus American products, mainly agricultural, which must be spent in the country of origin. They have been applied to both archaeological excavations and the moving of temples.



With respect to the great emergency situation in the United States, it is encouraging to be able to report that interest is rapidly increasing. In particular the federal agencies show a growing responsibility for the archaeological and historical sites which they inevitably encounter in the course of their work. At the annual meeting of the Committee for the Recovery of Archaeological Remains last February in Washington the following agencies were represented by responsible officials: National Park Service, Smithsonian Institution, Geological Survey, Bureau of Reclamation, Corps of Engineers, Atomic Energy Commission, Federal Power Commission, Forest Service, Fish and Wildlife Service, Bureau of Public Roads, Bureau of Indian Affairs, the Resources Program Staff and the Office of Management Operations for the Secretary of the Interior, National Science Foundation, National Aeronautics and Space Agency, Bureau of Land Management, Soil Conservation Service, Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service, Department of Housing and Urban Development, Bureau of Mines, Tennessee Valley Authority, and the Science Adviser to the Secretary of the Interior. One private agency was represented: the American Council of Learned Societies. The members of the Committee for the Recovery of Archaeological Remains themselves represent the last-named council and the American Anthropological Association and the Society for American Archaeology.

This is a far cry from the situation twenty years ago, when a plea for historic preservation was indeed a voice crying in the wilderness of constructive destruction. The federal agencies and many of the states have become aware of their obligations in this direction and are, one by one, accepting these obligations. They are not, however, receiving the support they need from state and local agencies nor, in many instances, from Congress.

One of the difficulties arises from the ways in which the money for the various federal agencies and projects is appropriated and spent. The major construction projects of the Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation in the river basins lie within their own control and, as we have seen above, these are our most successful salvage operations. The licensing regulations of the Federal Power Commission have also been used effectively. Our largest landowning body, the Bureau of Land Management, is also increasingly doing its part and has instituted a campaign of employing archaeologists in its regional offices. The Atomic Energy Commission has recently assumed responsibility for the survey and salvage of the numerous archaeological and historic sites which lie in the path of its projects.

But that is only part of the picture. In an alarming number of instances, the saving of important cultural sites does not lie within the power of the federal government. The Bureau of Public Roads permits the states to use federal road funds for cultural survey and salvage. However, it is necessary for the individual state highway departments, which spend the money, to give their approval. The Small Watershed program, which has thousands of construction projects in being or in the planning stage, although based on Congressional appropriations to the Department of Agriculture, is actually operated, and the money spent, by county and local bodies. That is also the case with Urban Renewal. The situation in the Land Leveling program is even worse. Although the planning is done by the Soil Conservation Service in the Department of Agriculture, the actual work and expenditure of funds are carried out by private landowners.

Obviously everything of the past cannot be kept, nor should it be. The most important examples of our origins, development and past glories must, however, be preserved, either by retaining the physical sites or by recording them fully before destruction. This can be achieved in many instances only by public clamor. During recent years, victories have been won when people were aroused to protect their local treasures. We must have more of this, but the chances of success will be better if the campaigns are well organized. Surveys for historical values should be made far in advance of construction. Excavations, scale drawings, or the moving of buildings should be scheduled early enough so that construction is not seriously impeded. In many cases—with roads for example—plans can be changed to avoid the historic sites. Historical or archaeological parks can be created, as was done with Pictograph Cave in Billings, Mont., so that the features we wish to save can be made an integral and useful part of the modern development. All this takes thought, planning and vigorous vigilance. It is well worth it, for the records of history are irreplaceable.

"FOOD FOR FREEDOM"

THE PARADOX OF FOREIGN AID

BRUCE J. OUDES

Mr. Oudes became interested in Public Law 480 and its impact while in Africa for three years as U. S. press officer in Dakar, Senegal and Elisabethville, Lubumbashi, Congo.

Only someone with the audacity of Lyndon Johnson could have publicly ignored the fact that the United States, in the past twelve years, has given away or sold cheaply food costing the taxpayer nearly $25 billion. "I propose," he said in a message to Congress earlier this year, "that the United States lead the world in a war against hunger."

The legislation, originally known as the "Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act" Public Law 480 of 1954 (note: trade first, assistance second), has been rechristened "Food for Freedom." President Kennedy had a program called "Food for Peace," but President Johnson, eager to put his own LBJ stamp on it, thought the name worth changing.

The President and many members of Congress claim that the bill will help make developing countries self-sufficient in food production. The paradox is that while encouraging agricultural growth on the part of the developing nations, we plan to increase our own shipments of food; increased agricultural aid can only mean increased agricultural dependency.

President Johnson proposes to lead the war on hunger by making the poor countries pay the United States more than they had before for the food they desperately need.

And the rate at which he would have them pay would bankrupt many countries before the Malthusian forecast comes to pass (which his food and population experts estimate will be around 1980).

Mr. Johnson has further suggested that to qualify for the right to buy the higher-priced food, these nations should achieve more "self-help"—which seemingly implies that they really haven't made the effort up to now. If they fail to move fast enough, they will be removed from the list of eligible food purchasers.

The bill as eventually applied probably will be somewhat more generous; still, it is enough to make one believe that Congress should consider a second "truth in packaging" law—this one dealing with truth in legislative packaging. The bill ingeniously makes allies of the Congressional supporters of foreign aid and the supporters of farm subsidies —strange bedfellows indeed. Appearing to have the economic development of the poorer nations as its purpose, the hybrid bill equally benefits the U.S. farmer.

At the beginning of this year the Administration was faced with a problem: the huge American food surpluses of the fifties no longer existed. The "Food for Peace" program, under which these products were exported on a subsidized basis, could be allowed to expire at the end of 1966. Thus, all U.S. food to move abroad would do so on a straight commercial-sales basis (no subsidy). The roughly $750 million worth of food given away annually under "Food for Peace" as emergency relief could be made a part of the regular foreign aid program. It was known that the growing world demand for food had resulted in record United States food exports in 1965 on a commercial basis—nearly $4.8 billion. Subsidized food exports under the "Food for Peace" program meanwhile had slipped from $1.7 billion in 1964 to $1.4 billion last year. The drop was attributed to dwindling stockpiles of surplus food in this country and to a requirement that importing nations pay hard cash for shipping costs. (Under the Administration's new proposals, the U.S. would be able to make dollar loans to cover shipping.) Although the Administration could have let the "Food for Peace" legislation lapse, it was aware of four additional factors:

(1) Farm interests in Congress would object to ending the subsidizing of food exports to those countries that do not have money to pay hard cash and thus need credit.

(2) Congress was going to scrutinize more carefully than usual the Administration's regular foreign aid request. With the "guns or butter" discussion then developing in Congress, it would be unwise to increase the foreign aid request by including the $750-million famine-relief program.

(3) The "Food for Peace" program, in effect, was a second foreign aid bill. Much of the money that accrued to the U.S. from these long-term, low-interest sales was loaned back to the recipient country for development projects.

(4) Any renewal of "Food for Peace" would be funded easily through "backdoor financing." The Administration would have to worry only about the authorization bill. The actual appropriation of money would come, as in the past, after the fact—in the form of a bill to replenish the funds of the Commodity Credit Corporation, the arm of the government that is responsible for selling domestic agricultural products abroad. The Administration knew that farm interests would support any bill appropriating funds to the CCC; it is the CCC that pays the farmers their subsidies.

The Administration knew that ideally—and in the interest of "tidy" legislation—the aid in "Food for Peace" should be a part of the regular foreign aid bill. But there was never much doubt that the Agency for International Development (AID), the Department of Agriculture and, ultimately, the White House would agree to renew the P.L. 480 program.

AID personnel, realizing that regular U.S. foreign aid had slipped to little more than one-quarter of 1 per cent in the past few years from almost 2 per cent of GNP during the Marshall Plan days, already had launched a program to increase private investment—which, it was hoped, would provide the capital these countries sorely needed, and Congress was not voting.

The President therefore sent to Capitol Hill in January a request to sell $2.5 billion of food on credit terms—and to give away $0.8 billion for famine relief. This program falls just $100 million short of the combined request for regular foreign aid and military assistance. At the same time, in order to replenish our food stockpiles for sales under "Food for Freedom," the Administration embarked on a program to increase our food production. Thus has the U.S. launched itself on a program of giving a double subsidy to about a quarter of our food exports: first at the time of production, then at the time of sale.

In drawing up the rather awkward and complicated "Food for Freedom" package, AID officials apparently made two wrong tactical decisions—both for the right reasons. The first was to tighten the credit terms on which American food is sold to developing nations; the second was to tie these credit terms to those on which development loans are awarded under the regular foreign aid program. The error in tying the credit terms to the foreign aid program is clear when one considers the vulnerability of the foreign aid bill. In recent weeks the Foreign Relations Committee has voted to raise this interest rate from 2.5 per cent to 3 per cent, after having flirted briefly with an interest rate of as much as 4.5 per cent. Another mistake from the standpoint of trying to make "Food for Freedom" as effective as possible was to stiffen the loan terms. Loan terms had previously been as low as 1 per cent or less annually. Now they were to be tied to the rising rate of AID loans. With some firm Presidential pressure, it is possible that Congress might have gone along with a move to reduce the terms of the development loans to match those for food—at least it was worth trying. In short, if AID's purpose was indeed "to aid," it should have reduced the relative price of tractors to the price of wheat rather than raise the wheat price to that of tractors.

Faced with an order from the White House to come up with a "bare-bones" program, AID executives had to count more on their own ingenuity to achieve their objectives than on U.S. funds. They decided that they would put loans for food on a par with other forms of loans so that receiving nations would no longer be able to use the importation of American food as an excuse for letting their agricultural growth lag behind their industrial growth. This would also have the advantage of appeasing foreign critics who argue that what we call foreign "aid" is really economic imperialism—that America's real interest is to assure itself a permanent food market.

The Administration wrote into the bill a clause which said that all food sales (with a few specified exceptions) for local currency—now about 60 per cent of the P.L. 480 total—are to be phased out by the end of 1971. Trading is to be done instead on a hard dollar basis—which now accounts for less than 10 per cent of the P.L. 480 total. Thus the "foreign aid" and "export subsidy" factors will tend to be reduced gradually. However, since total sales under "Food for Freedom" are expected to increase over the next five years, owing to increased world food needs, total overall aid under this program will also rise, despite the reduction in percentage on a sale-by-sale basis.

What all this adds up to is that AID officials abroad will take a line that goes something like this: "You might as well buy more of your food from us. Our terms aren't as good as they used to be, but they're still significantly better than anyone else's—and this is probably the only way you'll increase substantially your aid from the U.S."

AID officials recognize the necessity of bowing to Congressional pressure for tougher terms. At the same time they unhappily are forced to accept the fact that tougher terms mean exacerbation of one of the most serious problems of developing countries: debt servicing. Developing countries are increasingly unable to repay their debts, and this could bring about a crisis in the 1970s. The U.S. balance of payments problem is nothing compared to the developing countries' problem of rapidly diminishing foreign exchange reserves.

The World Bank estimates that the equivalent of about half of foreign aid given by all donor nations annually is quickly returned as repayment on interest and principal. If present trends continue, the Bank estimates that by 1980 all aid will be going into debt servicing—with none remaining for development. Indian Commerce Minister Manubhai Shah said at a recent UN regional Economic Commission meeting that only if donor nations accepted some of the manufactured goods produced by Asian and African factories as "repayment in kind" will these nations be able to meet their debt obligations.

An AID study last year forecast economic setbacks in developing countries unless lending terms are improved. Ignoring its own figures, AID did nothing to postpone the day of financial reckoning. One AID official said: "We had to discount the ultimate effect of a tightening of food aid credit because this debt servicing thing is going to require a massive, special effort of the U.S. Government to solve—perhaps involving the forgiving of a great many loans and calling a new Bretton Woods type of monetary conference agreement. For the present we just have to deal in the realm of the practical."

Congress is, of course, aware of what "Food for Freedom" means domestically. Although presented as part of the Administration's foreign aid package, once it hit the Hill the bill became what it always had been—the private preserve of the Agriculture Committees of both the Senate and the House. The committees, made up of farm district Congressmen for the most part, are very protective of the bill; only a calamity could induce them to tamper with the $3.3 billion authorization plum asked for by the Administration.

The amended version of the bill passed the House by 333 to 20 in May. As it stands it cannot but disturb the Administration: now there are political strings and provisions which could curb agricultural export expansion in developing nations. And the wording of the bill is almost mocking in the manner in which it forces the President's term "self-help" into every nook and cranny of the legislation.

Political strings were added in an amendment by Rep. Paul Findley (R., Ill.), which would force many countries to choose between exporting and/or shipping to Cuba or North Vietnam, or buying P.L. 480 food. Administration officials claim there is no precise listing of countries faced with this dilemma, but informed sources estimate the figure to be as high as 50 per cent of all countries now participating in the program. (Agriculture Secretary Orville Freeman told the Senate Agriculture Committee recently: "This language [Findley amendment] would set up restrictions upon other countries more severe than the restrictions we impose upon ourselves. We are able . . . to supply food and medicine to Cuba if we determine it is in the national interest to do so.")

President Johnson used the phrase "self-help" repeatedly in presenting the bill to Congress and he defined increased emphasis on both agricultural production and population control as the Administration's "new directions" in foreign aid policy. The House committee accepted his "new directions," writing a series of amendments which would demand that client countries commit themselves to increasing their agricultural production and population control.

One of the amendments would authorize $33 million to create a "farmer-to-farmer" approach to technical assistance—like the Peace Corps, but run by the Department of Agriculture. Another has to do with birth control. Rep. Paul H. Todd, Jr. (D., Mich.) said that this amendment marks the first time Congress has expressed a clear policy in this area. One committee staff member was astonished that after the House debate not a single opposing voice was heard on the floor.

But some civil service skeptics in the Administration look with disfavor at the slick packaging job. Said one veteran AID official, summarizing the attitude of several of his colleagues: "Self-help—hooey—what do they think we've been doing for the last twenty years? Picking daisies?"

The Economist, meanwhile, chided Mr. Johnson with a story on the program headlined, "Help Yourselves." The suggestion, moreover, appears to have an element of truth. According to one U.S. official, some foreign ambassadors engage in "self-help" kickbacks before the foods ever leave U.S. shores. They do so by electing to be their own agents, and thus become entitled to open bids from food exporters. They reveal the low bid to a "favored" bidder—then divide the profit with him.

More important, all the "self-help" amendments to the President's bill, however well-meaning, will nevertheless be undercut severely by the changeover to hard currency terms. Under existing local currency programs, most Ruritanian sawbucks accrued by the U.S. are lent back to the Ruritanians for development programs. And these programs are approved, step by step, sawbuck by sawbuck, by AID.

In hard dollar programs, the sawbucks created by the sale of U.S. food in Ruritania never come into U.S. hands. Ruritanians can spend them as they wish, U.S. leverage being exercised only when the entire program with Ruritania comes up for renewal. It is, one AID official has said, for the purpose of retaining as much of a voice as possible in Ruritania's expenditure of U.S. loan funds that our P.L. 480 programs increasingly are being extended for only six months or a year at a time, rather than for longer periods as in the past.

A further word is also necessary about the "self-help" concept. Its meaning in government circles is being expanded rapidly. The United States correctly insists that a developing country use our aid in the most efficient manner possible, committing an adequate amount of its own resources to these joint development programs. The "self-help" term, however, is so vague that its definition can be expanded to justify denying aid programs to countries with a limited amount of trained and educated manpower and thus a limited ability to "absorb" aid. Requirements for "self-help" thus can be used to deny countries programs that would expand their capacity for "self-help." The very idea of development implies expansion of the will of traditional economies to help themselves and aspire to a better life. In limiting ourselves to aiding countries with trained elites who can handle sophisticated USAID programs, we are using ""self-help" as a rationale for limiting our own aid efforts.

Another concern of the House is market expansion, particularly for cotton and tobacco (which the U.S. still has in great surplus). Agriculture Committee Chairman Harold D. Cooley, who represents a North Carolina tobacco district, refused to let the bill out of committee until the Department of Agriculture agreed to unfreeze $250,000 earmarked for promoting U.S. tobacco sales overseas. At the same time, the Department had been under fire for a film it produced to show abroad called World of Pleasure, which was about the joys of smoking.

More important, however, are two market-expansion amendments which would limit the ability of countries buying P.L. 480 food to expand their own markets when such activity might compete with U.S. interests. The first, in the guise of a "self-help" amendment, was authorized by W. R. Poage, committee vice chairman, who comes from a cotton-producing district of Texas. It provides that U.S. leverage be used to persuade developing countries to grow food crops on land now devoted to the production of non-food crops in world surplus (read cotton). Poage implies that increasing quantities of the estimated 16-million-bale U.S. cotton surplus (one-third of the world's annual consumption) should be sent to India, and India should then reduce its cotton acreage correspondingly and plant food crops in place of cotton.

Despite its initial appeal as a method of increasing food production, Poage's idea fails in that it would encourage a permanent Indian deficiency in cotton, and India would be left to hunt for another supply arrangement when U.S. cotton surpluses finally become depleted. Moreover, India and many other nations depend on agricultural crops for precious foreign exchange. To deny developing countries the right to market expansion and to ask them to reduce voluntarily their share of the market is to condemn them to permanent international monetary purgatory.

What most developing countries want the United States to do is curb its own international market-expansion tendencies. This, they say, would be an appropriate gesture of aid. One South Asian ambassador said to an American official not too long ago: "In all sincerity, what we are asking you to do is to guarantee expanding markets for the products of our inefficient industries until they are no longer inefficient."

This basic clash between the haves and the have-nots over market expansion has been a sore point for years. It is important, then, to note how all P.L. 480 legislation, past, present and proposed, helps us to obtain a corner on the market being created by expanding world food needs.

Ruritania is eligible to buy U.S. food cheaply only to the degree that its own food needs are growing. This is to prevent us from interfering with the markets of Ruritania's traditional suppliers. Ruritania, which wants cheap U.S. food badly, often juggles statistics (sometimes at the suggestion of helpful U.S. Embassy officials) to show a false rising need. Furthermore, even when the need is legitimate, the U.S. often ignores its own formula for sharing the enlarged food demand with Ruritania's traditional suppliers—to corner as much of the increased market as possible.

The second noteworthy market-expansion amendment passed by the House committee reflects U.S. fear of competition from foreign-made products. Under the clause, local currencies in U.S. hands in Ruritania may not be loaned to U.S. businessmen for manufacture of products intended to be exported to this country in competition with American products.

An American official pointed out one phase of AID legislation which—under certain agreements—prohibits developing countries from importing equipment from the United States for "processing rice, wheat, citrus fruits, cotton, oil seeds or dairy products." There is a procedure which allows AID to get around this rule. "But when they see this provision," the official said, "it takes quite a bit to convince them we're serious about this self-sufficiency business."

Nevertheless, some U.S. agricultural export promoters believe that as African and Asian countries reach some kind of self-sufficiency in agricultural production—if that day ever comes—they will revert to using all available foreign exchange in expanding industrialization; they feel this is the way to reach the 20th century in a generation. But this will mean that these countries won't remain customers for U.S. foodstuffs on a commercial basis if they can help it; the United States will have done itself out of these foreign food markets.

The President may propose the bill; Congress may legislate it, and business and agriculture may benefit, but the day-to-day business of P.L. 480 is conducted by the State Department, AID and the Department of Agriculture. The Foreign Agricultural Service quietly oversaw the exportation last year of $6.2 billion in agricultural commodities.

Under the Eisenhower and Kennedy administrations there was also a P.L. 480 office in the White House. But last year the office was abolished, and Richard W. Reuter, President Johnson's "Food for Peace" director, has been reassigned to the post of Special Assistant to the Secretary of State. Reuter's new office produces the "Food for Peace/Freedom" annual report and often serves as a mediator between AID and Agriculture—but handles little of the heavy load of administering the act. One AID official predicted that this office will be abolished altogether and its work absorbed by State and AID—"when Reuter decides to accept an ambassadorship."

Department of State officials often are involved in P.L. 480 negotiations, since these frequently revolve around questions of policy. Sometimes, particularly in the cases of smaller countries, officials at the desk level find themselves obtaining clearance from AID and Agriculture in order to expedite an agreement.

One State Department officer, learning that the new legislation eventually would require all sales to be repayable in dollars, exclaimed: "With what? They (referring to "his" country) haven't got any foreign exchange. I can see it now. We'll be involved in a whole series of debt rescheduling negotiations in the seventies." He shook his head. "They never consider the little countries when drawing up this kind of thing." The contention that the food legislation was written for India and the few other nations with civil servants who know how to deal with the complexities of U.S. aid—not for the smaller nations—was expressed repeatedly in interviews in other departments. One State official said: "This'll mean we have them coming and going. Strictures when they sign an agreement and then more arm twisting when they come around to negotiate debt rescheduling." An AID man put it this way: "It all boils down to how much 'clout' we have when we sit down with some ministers at a table and they have a hole in their five-year development plan they can't fill. We can waive some restrictions on the condition that they go along with us on other things."

AID and the Department of Agriculture end up overseeing those aspects of the bill which are most directly related to their respective interests. AID sees that the bill is helping to encourage economic growth within the developing countries; the Department of Agriculture makes sure that the bill is benefiting the farmer. Many different offices within AID deal with P.L. 480 from time to time, but only one office (about thirty people) deals with it on a full-time basis. The corresponding office in the Department of Agriculture is much larger.

This isolation of P.L. 480 from the rest of U.S. aid—"under coordination" in governmentese—has vexed Administration officials for a long time. Many acknowledge that P.L. 480 has always been some kind of afterthought in U.S. policy. "You draw up your regular programs very carefully, and when that's done you say, 'Oh, by the way, we can get you some surplus food too,' " said one Bureau of the Budget member. Thus P.L. 480 has been piecemeal (or peace meal, as one punster puts it) in conception, legislation and execution. Now, all that is changing, AID officials say. Since "food aid" is currently about one-third of all U.S. aid, and likely to be more than half before long, they argue that it's time we understood what it's all about.

It is surprising how many people in other countries believe that all our foreign commitments are motivated by economic concerns at home. Only recently, in Saigon, a U.S. reporter was told by a Buddhist student demonstrator that Americans are fighting in Vietnam "to test their modern weapons and solve American economic troubles. They bring their surplus farm products to sell in our markets."

Congress and the Administration are now serving notice to the world that those food "surpluses" no longer exist. This will serve as an important propaganda weapon for the United States. But it is more than the "under-coordination," "political strings" and "market expansion" that critics find so disturbing; the food-export subsidies are simply inefficient ways of providing aid (except as famine relief).

The "half a loaf is better than none" argument seems indeed compelling. But one cannot help wondering if this bill is really in our own long-term interests. Clearly it helps the farmer—but does it speak well for a country that claims to take a sincere interest in helping the developing countries of the world?

The pitiful fact is that the United States—by changing grants to loans, by demanding hard currency on the loans and making the terms stiffer—would seem to be phasing itself out of the whole business of foreign aid. And this is being done well before the job of developing the poorer countries has even approached any signs of completion.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Death of the Recital

BENJAMIN BORETZ

In the four years since the inauguration of Philharmonic Hall, public musical life in New York has come to be dominated, psychologically if not statistically, by the pattern of events at Lincoln Center. This is particularly evident in the prevalence of the "Festival" strategy, generated by the need to produce large audiences with which to fill expensive and oversized new auditoriums, of inflating the intrinsic appeal of an event by the creation of an associated "occasion"—an "inauguration," "commemoration," or "series." This tendency has done a great deal to exaggerate even further the disparity between large- and small-scaled performance activity; the sheer mass of these portmanteau-events has virtually obliterated public awareness of, for example, individual recitals by any but the most prestigious international celebrities, at the Horowitz-Rubinstein level. At the same time, there has been an accompanying change in the audience from a specifically "musical" orientation to one focusing on "entertainment" in general. As a result, the traditional area of regular music making, which formerly sustained the continuity of performance, is the really neglected aspect of musical activity—far more so, for instance, than events at the "specialist" extreme, which always retain their audience of professionals and, recently, extra-musical intellectuals. And the attrition in the recital world increases as the performers who inhabit it persist in offering the same "obligatory" programs, whose non-appeal is even more exposed in this age of superabundant recording.

As the public relevance of recitals has thus diminished, their professional importance has almost disappeared; for the conservatory education that prepares an instrumentalist for the nonexistent recital vocation is totally inimical not only to his development of an exploratory or serious repertory, whether traditional or contemporary, but also to serious (as distinct from conventionally spectacular, decorative or atmospheric) interpretive approaches. At the same time, whatever marginal professional existence such a performer can achieve depends entirely on his manager's ability to arrange concert tours in the American provinces, where even slightly "esoteric" programs are regarded by local managements as naked threats to their solvency. As a result, the typical recital performer is not equipped, motivated or managerially permitted to revitalize his repertory or to collaborate—or even come into contact—with those other young musicians, performers as well as composers, whose direct involvement in contemporary developments has begun to generate a new tradition for musical activity at all levels of performance.

By the same token, any promising developments that actually do take place in the recital domain are likely to be overlooked in the course of avoiding the egregious musical steam rollers at one extreme, and of recognizing essential developments taking place at the other. For there are certain performers—some active in "specialist" activities as well—whose qualities are most revealingly projected through their personal deployment of the traditional recital framework. The pianist Charles Rosen, the violinist Paul Zukovsky, the soprano Bethany Beardslee and her accompanist Robert Helps are, as I have on earlier occasions noted here, all performers whose instrumental (or vocal) "personalities" and interpretive insights are individual and broad enough to sustain interest over the span of a program composed of works drawn from a wide range of the existing literature. In this respect, at least, their capacities run counter to the "specialist" trend toward varying ensembles drawing programs primarily from the 20th-century literature, with an occasional earlier work of particular formal or interpretive relevance. Yet they have all, in varying degrees, been victimized by the curious limbo of the recital world whenever they have ventured into it; their programs safely repel any of the concert managers who make up the only remaining regular audience at recitals, and the new-music public tends to stay away out of a somewhat indiscriminate dismissal of "traditional" performances of any kind.

The press contributes significantly to this miasma by maintaining an almost strictly impartial indifference to all recital activity, although one would suppose that, from the press's own point of view, the most consequential musical "news" in any season would necessarily be the advent of a first-rate performer or composition.

During the season that is now well past, at least two such opportunities for discovery presented themselves in the Carnegie Recital Hall debuts of Paul Jacobs as harpsichordist and of Samuel Rhodes as solo violist. The scarcity of serious virtuoso playing on either of these instruments gave the appearance of performers of the caliber of Jacobs and Rhodes a special musical newsworthiness. Among American harpsichordists, for example, only Fernando Valenti, with his powerful digital command and rhythmic articulation may be legitimately regarded as a performer of major stature; of the others, only Kirkpatrick and Marlowe have been heard consistently, and their technical and musical weaknesses are only made more irritating by their great salon cachet.

Paul Jacobs, on the other hand, has for some years been familiar to new-music (and Philharmonic) audiences as a pianist and musician of extraordinary executive and interpretive capacities; and the transference of his pianistic abilities and musical perceptions to the harpsichord (previously revealed in ensemble performances of Milton Babbitt's Composition for Tenor and Six Instruments and Elliott Carter's Double Concerto) has produced a rhythmic precision, timbral delicacy and mechanical fluency that provide a completely new sense of the range of the resources available from this instrument. In particular, his performance of Carter's Sonata for Flute, Oboe, Cello and Harpsichord (with Thomas Nyfenger, Georges Haas and Robert Sylvester) was an extraordinary realization of the ensemble and rhythmic qualities of the work, all of which derive from the extension of harpsichord sonority and attack through the entire texture, requiring a precision of balance and articulation that I have heard in no other performance.

In other respects, too, Jacobs' program was impressively sophisticated. The idea of opening the evening with the Bach Four Duets, whose virtual absence of surface attraction and interior of esoteric relational ideas make perhaps the musician's music of all time, was a notable coup d'estime; and the subsequent performance of the Haydn A-flat Sonata-Divertimento revealed a remarkable work that was largely unfamiliar even to the professionals present. If the other works on the program were more conventionally recitalistic, Jacobs' spectacular ripping-off of the complex pyrotechnics of the Bach F-minor Toccata, and the precisely judged sonorities, balances and phrasing of the DeFalla Harpsichord Concerto were displays of sheer instrumental authority and musical savoir-faire that were fascinating not only acrobatically but in the nonchalance with which they virtually dispatched every previous standard of harpsichord performance, in these works and elsewhere.

Samuel Rhodes's recital demonstrated that, even at this early stage of his career, he is a violist on the superior level of such players as Walter Trampler and Abram Loft of his pre-violin days. In fact, Rhodes's evident capacity to draw a consistent amplitude of sound from the viola under every conceivable situation relates him, perhaps even more than Trampler, to a tradition of string performance that has almost disappeared. But this is accompanied by a level of musical cultivation and awareness that is even more exceptional in a musician with this kind of old-fashioned consummate virtuosity. Thus, throughout Rhodes's concert, one was aware of innumerable details of special perception and care, along with the large-scale command of direction and succession: the precise matching, for instance, of viola and piano trills in the opening Bach G-major Sonata, the continuousness of the unfolding of the Stravinsky solo Elégie, and especially the security with which the maximal complexities of pitch, rhythm and registral structure were projected in the Brahms E-flat Sonata, Op. 120.

But the focal point of the recital was the first performance of Claudio Spies's Viopiacem for viola and keyboard instruments. This work, like Spies's earlier Tempi for fourteen instruments (heard on a Fromm Foundation concert last year) is full of penetrating ideas about sonority, registration, continuity, and—especially—the possibilities of multiple articulations of the same segments of (musical) time and space, in which the extension of the viola-keyboard dialogue to piano and harpsichord, first alternately and then simultaneously, is a deeply embedded structural premise rather than simply a presentational novelty. Again, the performance by Rhodes and Richard Goode, the pianist for the entire concert, was a model of intelligence and refinement, qualities that correspond precisely to those of Spies's own compositional thought.

POEM OF NEGRO BOYS I SWAM WITH IN THE MISSISSIPPI SEVEN YEARS AGO

Arms
outstretched,
they leap from the bluff, into the silt-laden, sun-flashing swirls of green water . . . And as ancient men arise cleansed from the Ganges fouler than men can be, they burst up, flapping,
shrilly crying, cauls of burnt waterdrops all over their bodies like first feathers!

Torn,
softly irised down
I arrange, now, seven years later, uselessly in a poem.

GALWAY KINNELL

Except for such exceptional recitals, the performance of contemporary music has continued to depend primarily on those composer- and university-oriented groups that have become less the example they initially hoped to provide for emulation by the rest of the performance community and more the permanent center where most of the activity takes place. Thus the Columbia Group for Contemporary Music took a major step in expanding its activity by presenting a fully staged production of a new opera, Peter Westergaard's Mr. and Mrs. Discobbolos, as part of its regular concerts. For just as the presentation and acceptance of Don Rodrigo as a serious avant-garde work, when it was performed at the opening of the New York City Opera's residency at Lincoln Center, revealed what is desperately wrong with opera in this country, so Discobbolos was one of the best demonstrations we have yet had of what might be right with it.

It is an instance of what results when a compositional sophisticate, with an equivalent awareness of the possibilities of verbal-musical wit and insight, intrudes on the supposedly exclusive domain of the "operatic" fabricators. Indeed, the most striking aspect of Discobbolos is the thorough superiority of Westergaard's notion of what constitutes a lively and effective music-theatrical conjunction to all the dreary Rodrigos, Susannahs or Baby Does produced by the supposed specialists in the field. More pertinently, Discobbolos is an opera in the Stravinskian mold, with that kind of verbal-rhythmic vocal-line contouring within stable, slowly changing macro-events; a work, that is, of counterpointed "intervals" of pitch, attack and (dramatic) event-unfolding that creates a multi-dimensional structural richness on the foundation of the purely verbal triologue of the Edward Lear text.

A different sort of local operatic première was given by the Juilliard School Opera Workshop when it produced Roger Sessions' The Trial of Lucullus and Hugo Weisgall's Purgatory. This was more in the nature of minimal amends for inconceivable neglect by our major institutes of interpretation: Sessions' work was composed twenty, and Weisgall's ten years ago. It is impossible to conceive that a European composer of Sessions' stature would not have all his operatic works, however mediocre, recondite or impractical, performed by every major opera company. Yet this is precisely the kind of professional self-esteem American musical institutions do not possess; thus, neither the Metropolitan nor the New York City Opera appears to be humiliated by the fact that Sessions' recent Montezuma—unquestionably the major operatic work produced thus far in this country—was given its first, and so far only, performance by the Berlin Opera, and that neither of them has ever done a single work of Sessions (or Schoenberg or Krenek, for that matter; while the Metropolitan has the additional distinction of never having presented an opera by Aaron Copland, Hugo Weisgall, Bela Bartók, Paul Hindemith, and a long list of other eminent composers too numerous to mention). Typically, these first New York performances were student productions, with all the orchestral but many fewer of the vocal problems that one expects from student performers. But the memorable aspects of the evening were mainly in the remarkable sets and projections designed for Lucullus by Ming Cho Lee (who appears to be something of a genius in such matters, as evidenced also by his setting for Don Rodrigo), and the staging of the opera by Ian Strasfogel, which provided solutions in every respect but lighting to the difficult problems posed by the radio-script character of the scene succession.

Purgatory was altogether less satisfactory; it is, by comparison with other Weisgall operas, rather tenuous, and its representation was often embarrassingly weak. But again, a work of such manifestly serious compositional and dramatic concern should be available to us as a necessary part of our musical self-awareness. That we are consistently deprived of knowing such works—or even, often, that they exist—is one of the most discouraging consequences of our acquiescence in the mass narcosis into which the compulsive audience-builders are converting the remaining vestiges of our musical culture.

I should have liked to be able to comment, at equal length, on the large-scale events of some musical consequence that I heard during the past year. But it ought to be noted, however briefly, that the Carnegie Hall Festival of Visiting Orchestras is exempt from my anti-Festival strictures if only because it provides opportunities to hear some of the important 20th-century orchestral literature that the "major" orchestras simply do not perform. Moreover, there is a certain inherent interest in learning of the quality and kind of orchestral performance being developed in other parts of the country, especially if the programs reflect any special preoccupation or competence of the orchestra or conductor involved.

Of this year's series, it can be reported that the Chicago Orchestra continues to play better than any other in existence, despite a routine conductor. It has a phenomenal ability to turn on at full volume with absolute unanimity and no perceptible accentuation (a resource especially memorable in the Introduction of the Mozart 38th Symphony), as well as a virtuosity in string and wind solo and ensemble playing unequaled elsewhere, which resulted in a probably maximal performance of the Ravel G-major piano concerto, though it was hardly enough to save the Stravinsky Sacre du Printemps from Mr. Martinon's dismemberment. The Cincinnati Symphony contributed the first performance of Gunther Schuller's American Triptych, which generates many striking ideas of sonority out of the "as if" of supposed analogues to visual structure (notably the translation of the simultaneity of a visual surface into succession on an auditory "field," with a remarkable evasion of the sense of closure). And the Minneapolis Symphony gave a carefully prepared performance of Elliott Carter's Variations, which is undoubtedly the most influential American orchestral work of the post-war period, has been performed in most European capitals, but still awaits a performance by the principal orchestra of Philharmonic Hall.

POEMS OF
MAO TSE-TUNG

Published by Eastern Horizon Press. Translated by Wong Man. 95 pages. HK $15.00 (Overseas stg. £1 or US $3.00), post free by sea mail.

This new book is designed to serve both general readers and scholars in Chinese studies. The original texts are printed opposite the translations. A preface written by the translator gives a synopsis of the development of the various forms of Chinese classical poetry. The 36 pages of annotations at the end of the book will be exceedingly helpful to readers.

Readers who are interested in Chinese calligraphy might be glad to know that within the book is also a reprint of a copy of the poem "Mount Liupan" in the poet's own handwriting.

Order immediately through your local subscription agent, or write direct to us:

Eastern Horizon Press
18 CAUSEWAY ROAD, 1st FL.
HONGKONG

Pondering the Negatives

THE SECRET SWINGER. By Alan Harrington. Alfred A. Knopf. 235 pp. $4.95.

KATHARINE TOPKINS

Mrs. Topkins is the author of two novels, All the Tea in China (Macmillan) and Kotch (McGraw-Hill). Her short stories have been published in The New Yorker and other magazines.

There can be no doubt about the high seriousness of Alan Harrington's intention, or the effectiveness of his comic gift, as revealed now in two novels. In The Revelations of Dr. Modesto (1955), conformity was pushed to its ultimate absurdity. Hal Hingham sought (and temporarily found) salvation in "Centralism," a doctrine which delivers happiness by purging the individual of his individuality and sinking him in safe dull middle ground. Now in The Secret Swinger, an indecisive nonconformity played out without purpose ends in personal destruction for George Pectin. Both novels explore a tricky question: how can a pallid, underconfident man find a meaningful niche in a meaningless botched-up society?

Pectin is a suffering soul (neither hero nor anti-hero seems applicable) who takes up where Hal Hingham left off. Pectin is in the middle to begin with. A moderately inept New York journalist, at 43 he sees himself as a dreary square, albeit one who aspires to a colorful free-form existence. In a determined effort to transcend his own mediocrity, Pectin decides to confront life, give it a go. Divorce is the first ploy. After some vacillation, he abandons his wife (freshly emerged from a TB sanitarium) and small son. But his anxiety over the rift rapidly changes to irritation when he discovers that his presence is too inconsequential for his absence to be felt.

> His wife was brimming over with happiness. She didn't seem worried about the divorce any more. Where do I fit in? George Pectin thought, even though he was going to be free and didn't want to fit in.

Responsibility behind him, George returns to the Greenwich Village haunts of his youth, revisiting those who have bypassed him in the onward and upward struggle. But he finds you can't go home again (particularly when you never really lived there to begin with). Next stop: alcohol, drugs, jazz, brawls and an assortment of broad broads — wide-hipped, malevolent earth mothers, available to everyone but George.

In the course of his quest for a slippery, unobtainable Grail, he is alternately put down by uptowners and bullied by bombastic beatniks— "Go on, George, Live!" Those around Pectin seem to be living the abundant life while he is not even fractionally content. "Go mad, save yourself!" Muchnik the poet tells him, and George feels "an ancient and savage logic penetrating to the center of his being." The only sensible refuge for modern man, it would seem, is the re-creation of a world that orbits on irrationality. Madness crusts over the pain. Indeed, throughout his odyssey, Pectin retains an unresolved awe for those either strong enough or foolish enough to overplay their lives into a kind of frenetic hyperbole—Bill Genovese, courtier of death; Gretchen, who prefaces Bed with the Scriptures; Muchnik, "who fills the doorway with an exuberant hairy holiness."

Serena, a hipsterette whom Pectin meets at a Village party, finally gives him the word: what he really is is a secret swinger. George receives this insight with the childish delight of a prospective Little Leaguer who has made the team. Ultimately, a murky kind of self-acceptance comes to him, culminating in extinction the hard way—a literal retreat to the womb.

The Secret Swinger is, at least in part, satiric fantasy. But just how far are we to go with its characters as real believable creations who might reasonably be encountered in life? Their names—Pectin, Serena, Muchnik—and the grotesqueries they enact steer firmly toward allegory, but there is a façade of realism that muddles the basic design.

Certain facts which would contribute to our understanding of George Pectin are conspicuously absent. For example, we are taken on a sentimental journey back to his roots and antecedents on the occasion of the death of his grandparents. The information is necessary and evocative: through it we understand that the last vestiges of authority and familial tradition are now removed from George. He is on his own, out of the nest, but he has neither wings nor destination, and these are among the factors that precipitate a nervous breakdown. But it is not until George is institutionalized, and a staff doctor casually asks whether he would like to be visited by his parents (no, thank you) that we are led to ponder just what their role in George's saga is or was. The parents remain inscrutable, however, since they are not discussed again.

Perhaps the ambiguities are deliberate; they are also frustrating. In one incompletely explained fragment, Serena injects a mysterious fluid into a pear which she then gives George to nibble. The pear somewhat alters his vision of the world and, indirectly, his exodus from it. It would be helpful to know the general category to which this potion belongs—narcotic? aphrodisiac? private magic? placebo?

None of these objections gainsay the fact that The Secret Swinger has pace, originality and humor. In the section called "Trains," George Pectin buttonholes his fellow travelers in the club car and tries to "talk out" his plight and find a justification for his desertion of his family:

> George: . . . So I wrote her a letter to precede my visit. The coward's way, perhaps. Cutting off the dog's tail by inches. . . . But it's not so easy to be courageous when you're about to injure a fine woman.
>
> Man Wearing Polaroids: That right?
>
> George: Why do you suppose a man wants to be destroyed?
>
> Polaroids: Beats me.

Harrington prefaces The Secret Swinger with a passage from Hermann Hesse's Steppenwolf:

> Now there are times when a whole generation is caught . . . between two ages, between two modes of life and thus loses the feeling for itself, for the self-evident, for all morals, for being safe and innocent.

Perhaps we are to infer that the genuine protagonist of The Secret Swinger is the modern generation which, whether it opts for excess or abstention, fails to find an acceptable identity. If this is so, then we can forget about Lonesome George, the troubled individual, and accept him instead as a representative of a lost generation, straddling two sides of a chasm. The trouble is that every generation seems to be precariously positioned and "lost" to its writers, and the differences between the various modern eras become more those of life style than basic temper. The chasm is there and it becomes merely a question of which side we tumble from. The fall is inevitable and the bottom is the same.

Even those figures in the novel who most resist oblivion are swallowed up in its nihilism. A love of life in and of itself is not enough to deliver us. Witness George's grandfather:

> The mystery of his passing lay perhaps in the fact that the sad event produced not the slightest mystery. His last hour offered no hope, consolation, or relief. It left everyone with a feeling of emptiness and sorrow and a series of negatives to ponder.

The same might be said of The Secret Swinger.

Violence of the Dreamer

FERTIG. By Sol Yurick. Trident Press. 344 pp. $5.95.

MARTIN TUCKER

Mr. Tucker is a member of the English Department at Long Island University and is the co-editor of a three-volume reference work, A Library of Literary Criticism: Modern British Literature (Frederick Ungar).

Sol Yurick's first novel, The Warriors, centered on one teen-age thug's dream to unite all the youth gangs of New York City. The dream is blasted within the first half of the novel, and the remaining half traced in brilliant strokes the retreat—both physical and spiritual—of the teen-age heroes who had tried to go along with the dream.

Yurick's second novel, Fertig, deals with a grown man who has given up dreams. He is an accountant—anonymous, satisfied with his vague discontent, willing to accept what he has and has not. When, however, his only infant son dies, Fertig takes on a dream. This son had been born late in the lives of both his wife and himself, and since he holds society responsible for his terrible loss, he decides to make a violent and gratuitous protest. He murders seven people who were connected with the hospital which refused admittance to his son.

Again, as in his first novel, the vision, or Fertig's visionary protest, is described and completed within the first half of the book. The remaining portion is devoted to a discussion and examination of Fertig's motives, and the consequences of his act on others. The most spectacular change takes place in Fertig's dowdy and frigid wife, who blossoms into a well-dressed, well-coiffed and well-sexed female, largely on the publicity and proceeds she receives from Life magazine for her "story."

Fertig's major disciple, his Judas whom he saves at the end of the novel, is Roy Bleakie, a flashy lawyer and son of a famous judge. Bleakie is out to use Fertig's case as a stepping stone to political power. But it is he alone who understands Fertig's act as the message of a man who has seen a whole system in error and means to shame an entire society—as the rational act of a madly inspired man.

Yet it is Bleakie who perverts Fertig's cause into his own personal crusade. And it is Fertig, again the victim, but this time a willing one, who accepts the manacles of a lunatic on his way to the institution for the criminally insane.

Fertig's crime is used and abused by other characters: Heisenberg, the psychiatrist, thinks he can save society by analyzing and confining Fertig; Grinzing, the writer and sociologist, hopes to become another Zola to Fertig's Dreyfus; Jeffries, the judge, is determined to undo the permissive influence of psychology on law. It is part of the brilliance of Yurick's perceptions that these characters make sense—even when they are spouting nonsense—and that Fertig's protest continues to put in question the humanitarian ethics of a "liberal" society.

There are flaws however. Yurick's reliance on violence was justified in his first novel in the characterization of teen-age thugs. In Fertig's world the violence and four-letter words often seem excessive and forced, particularly in that section describing Bleakie's vacation—and his mammoth sleeping trysts with half a dozen beauties in half a dozen countries.

Then again, since Fertig wants to be caught, the novel after his capture becomes largely a dialogue of various points of view. The limitations of such a "talkie" novel are immediately apparent, and sometimes Yurick fails to surpass them. In spite of his inventiveness, parts of the novel are static.

Yet the impact of the book is tremendous. Indeed, Fertig and Bleakie could well be termed modern counterparts to Dostoevsky's inspector and Raskolnikov. Yurick is not much of a philosopher. But he is something as powerful—a naysayer in the Melville tradition, a nihilist seeking faith in the Dostoevsky manner. Redemption in Dostoevsky came with a faith in a Christian-Judaic God; in Melville, acceptance of ambivalence through an intellectual truce restored the balance of his mind. In Yurick's novel the air is darker and heavier, the questions left unresolved. Yurick has not been able to invest a sympathetic tone to any character; even Fertig is too much a nebbish madman, a Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde split to draw the reader intimately to him, and the other characters are bespotted with foulness. Yet the fact that Yurick, an often brilliant stylist and a rational man, ends his novel in futility rather than penance, is proof of the author's contemporary voice. He is one of the new American writers to watch.

Gentleman Without a Past

THE LAST GENTLEMAN. By Walker Percy. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 409 pp. $5.95.

JOYCE CAROL OATES

Miss Oates is assistant professor of English at the University of Detroit. She is the author of By the North Gate, With Shuddering Fall and the forthcoming Upon the Sweeping Flood (all Vanguard), and her stories have appeared in the Kenyon Review, Mademoiselle, Transatlantic Review and Virginia Quarterly.

Walker Percy's second novel, The Last Gentleman, is altogether richer and more intriguing than his first, The Moviegoer, which won him the National Book Award in 1962. It is a highly whimsical kind of picaresque tale that puts one in mind of both Faulkner and Camus, though only peripherally: the Faulknerian concern for the South, the "problem" of the South, the land, the engaging domesticity of a past tradition however past, and above all the traumatic suicide of a philosophically inclined father; and the floating, detached, "Existential" world of Camus that is rendered to us through the amnesia-plagued hero who cannot quite connect but who advances no titanic anguish because of his condition.

Percy's moviegoer was a man of a modern sort, addicted to public, commercial fantasies, and trying however numbly to break through to "reality"; his "last gentleman" is clearly kin, represented as he is by his telescope and his attachment to both love and death in an attempt to find his destiny, a man in whom something is mysteriously missing. The dissociated hero, subject to distressing attacks of déjà vu that render all reality suspect, taken up by an upper-middle-class Southern family of a comic-page type, in love with a pretty cipher of a girl, is a recognizable fictional type: a man without a soul, without an essence because he is without a sensible environment or past.

The young hero encounters a dying boy and his family, and the bulk of the novel concerns his being companion to and rendering up to the dying boy the attention that the dignity of death demands. The death of Jamie, which finally occurs in the concluding pages of the novel, is the central event of the work but it is not a very important event, strangely enough, because it works so obviously as a symbol, as theme. Percy's use of the naturalistically approached and staged death is out of keeping with his lovely and brilliant whimsy. This novel is one no critic should want to snipe at, for it is rare to encounter a work engaging in nearly every line; but Percy's strength simply does not extend to the naturalistic. Or perhaps it is beyond the naturalistic. His success with the country-club golfers, the pseudo-Negro who is really a white man working on a behind-the-scenes Negro piece, the Southern ladies who outlive their men by fifty years and 35,000 hearty meals, the Negro boy butler who falls "sappily" between Negro and white styles of living, are triumphs that suggest that Percy's power is in the reaction against the naturalistic, the half-comic half-horrified reflection of the naturalistic through a whimsical temperament.

But, how are we to take the apparently sincere love the hero feels for his brainless Chi Omega, and how are we to reconcile it with other graver, deeper pronouncements of his? The phrase "holding her charms in his arms" recurs enough to evoke in us the faintly sickish sensation we hope Percy intends, but we cannot believe that Normal Love and Life are exclusively Kitty Vaught. And how are we to reconcile the unforgettable and deeply moving death of Jamie with the ease with which he gets into college a few months before, apparently in one day, without medical examination, without the usual clutter of transcripts, applications, etc.? Trivial criticism indeed, but this inconsistency of vision mars the novel's dreamlike (though never nightmarish) logic.

Percy's writing is strangely similar to the highly gifted but rather hallucinatory pieces of Janet Frame: the more closely one looks at each sentence, each glimpse of a detail or image, the more hypnotic is the spell; but when one stands back for a larger view something has failed. Between Percy's main character and his excellent walk-on people there is an unhappy wasteland of secondary

Any 3 Best Sellers for $1 Each With Book Club Membership

LIST
☐ STORY OF O — PAULINE REAGE $ 6.00
☐ ORIGINS: THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF WORDS — ERIC PARTRIDGE 16.00
☐ GAMES PEOPLE PLAY — ERIC BERNE, M.D. 5.00
☐ NEGRO PROTEST THOUGHT IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY — Edited by AUGUST MEIER AND FRANCIS BRODERICK 7.50
☐ THE GINGER MAN — J. P. DONLEAVY 5.75
☐ NEW DEAL THOUGHT — Edited by HOWARD ZINN 7.50
☐ THE DEMONS (2 vols.) — HEIMITO VON DODERER 13.50
☐ UNDERSTANDING MEDIA — MARSHALL McLUHAN 7.50
☐ CRIME AND THE MIND — WALTER BROMBERG, M.D. 9.95
☐ MUSSOLINI: A STUDY IN POWER — IVONE KIRKPATRICK 10.00
☐ ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE GREAT QUOTATIONS — GEORGE SELDES 15.00
☐ LSD: THE CONSCIOUSNESS-EXPANDING DRUG — SOLOMON & LEARY 5.95
☐ GILES GOAT-BOY — JOHN BARTH 6.95
☐ THE DAY OF THE AMERICANS — NERIN E. GUN 6.95
☐ THE AMERICAN WRITER AND THE GREAT DEPRESSION — Edited by HARVEY SWADOS 7.50
☐ THE COMMENTARY READER — NORMAN PODHORETZ, ED. 12.50
☐ NON-VIOLENCE IN AMERICA — Edited by STAUGHTON LYND 7.50
☐ THE MAN WHO LOVED CHILDREN — CHRISTINA STEAD 5.95
☐ AMERICAN MILITARY THOUGHT — Edited by WALTER MILLIS 7.50
☐ MASTER POEMS OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE — OSCAR WILLIAMS, ED. 10.00
☐ THE POLITICAL ECONOMY OF SLAVERY — EUGENE D. GENOVESE 6.95
☐ LBJ — MICHAEL DAVIE 2.95

Check 3 books wanted and mail with your name and address to The Mid-Century Book Society, 5 East 44th Street, N.Y., N.Y. 10017. Only obligation is to buy three additional books in the next 12 months, at reduced member's prices, from the many to be offered. Invoice for $3 plus handling will accompany books. NA-14 characters who just do not work. Percy can handle language as sheer language in a way strictly his own, though at times parodied-Faulkner, but as one starts moving out to larger units like the paragraph and the chapter, something is missing. The crankish and quackish journal of a discredited doctor ("We are doomed to the transcendence of abstraction and I choose the only reentry into the world which remains to us. What is better than the beauty and exaltation of the practice of transcendence . . . and of the delectation of immanence . . . lewd love?") becomes quite important near the end of the novel, but it is to be hoped that Percy is not advancing Dr. Vaught's verbose Lawrentian theology with any more seriousness than he is advancing the novel's other fragmentary concerns.

Theatre: New England

JULIUS NOVICK

The Charles Playhouse in Boston, which will begin its tenth anniversary season in September, is the oldest of the five resident theatres in New England; until about three years ago, it was the only one. Its artistic director, Michael Murray, grew up in Washington and knew the work of the Arena Stage, but when he and Frank Sugrue (a lawyer who is now the theatre's full-time managing director) began their operation in 1957, they were, says Murray, "off-Broadway oriented." At that time there were a few isolated resident theatres here and there across the country, but little or no sense of a "movement"; it was off-Broadway that was going to revitalize the American theatre. (How long ago that seems!)

In the spring of 1963, however, the Ford Foundation sent Murray and Sugrue off to Washington, Houston, San Francisco and Minneapolis to take a look at the Arena, the Alley, the Actor's Workshop and the Guthrie Theatre; it was then that the Playhouse began to bill itself as a resident professional theatre. Recently it has given up casting each production from scratch; it now has a resident company of about twelve Equity and seven non-Equity actors; the latter are used for the high school touring program and the afternoon children's shows, as well as for small parts in the major productions. Even in the old days, of course, the Playhouse used to employ certain performers over and over again; it was founded with a nucleus of actors from Boston University. But now there is much more emphasis on the idea of a company; and the high school and children's programs, both fairly new, indicate that the Playhouse will in future look upon itself, as do most resident theatres, as a wide-ranging community institution.

The Charles presents the solid, standard resident-theatre repertory of plays. The Miser, Anouilh's Poor Bitos, Major Barbara, Brecht's Galileo, The Inspector General and Murray Schisgal's The Tiger and The Typists were this season's productions; next year Murray and Sugrue will take a few more chances, and offer Love for Love, The Balcony, Hamlet, Mother Courage and Oh! What a Lovely War.

In Galileo there were good supporting performances by Edward Zang and Edward Finnegan, Charles Playhouse stalwarts whom I remember from my student days around Boston in the late 1950s. But some of the other performances were hopelessly bad, and Murray's staging took very little advantage of the opportunities for theatrical flamboyance that Brecht provided in this as in so many of his plays.

As an ensemble effort the Boston Galileo was mediocre, but it was redeemed—almost transfigured—by the star performance (in the best sense) of Tony Van Bridge in the title role. Someone in the play says of Galileo: "He has more enjoyment in him than any man I ever saw. He indulges in eating, drinking and thinking to excess." Not many actors could live up to that description, but Mr. Van Bridge gave us a joyously sensual man and a keenly intelligent one, for whom food and wine and science all provided the same kind of deep, visceral delight.

I saw Galileo before embarking on my Western journey; when I returned to Boston, the Playhouse was doing The Tiger and The Typists, Murray Schisgal's pair of short two-character plays, under Michael Murray's direction. They are slight works, and not very entertaining unless the actors come through with zany but accurate caricatures of middle-class urban types—the kind of people one sees on the subways. In Boston, only Lynn Milgrim's typist was extravagant and specific enough. The rest of the acting (even Miss Milgrim's performance in The Tiger) was pleasant and professional, but too bland and general, without the necessary relish for idiom and milieu. Interestingly enough, Galileo and Poor Bitos, two "talky" historical plays, were the box-office hits of the season at the Charles; Schisgal's easy-to-take, close-to-home little plays did less well.

Since July, 1963, when David Wheeler started the Theatre Company of Boston, the Charles has had a rival. The newer company is the smaller (226 seats as against 525; a budget of about $80,000 as opposed to $350,000), and, by deliberate design, the further out. The Charles has done all the conventional avant-garde playwrights — Brecht, Ionesco, Genet, Beckett, Pinter — but the Theatre Company calls itself "the only professional resident theatre company in the United States that is firmly committed to the new and the experimental." It has done its Pinter (I saw a decent production of The Birthday Party there), and its Beckett, just like everybody else, but it has also done a good deal to live up to its claim.

Last year it gave the American première of Live Like Pigs, John Arden's play about a group of Gypsy-like tinkers and their catastrophic impact on a housing development—about, in other words, the wild instinctual life in conflict with the necessary restraints of civilized living. The production did so well in Boston that it was moved to an off-Broadway theatre in New York, where it was again a success; it was also the first presentation of any John Arden play in New York. It was a respectable, but not a good production; the characters tended to come out smaller, tamer, more ordinary and less vivid than Arden had written them.

This spring, with the aid of $10,000 from the Rockefeller Foundation, the Theatre Company presented a "Festival of New Plays": eight plays (mostly one-acts) by nine American authors (one play was a collaboration), grouped into four bills, presented for two weeks each. The playwrights included one from off-Broadway (Adrienne Kennedy); three from off-off-Broadway (Sam Shepard, George Dennison and Rosalyn Drexler); two novelists (Miss Drexler and John Hawkes); one poet (Lawrence Ferlinghetti), and three other writers whose names were previously unknown to me: Geoffrey Bush and Andy and Dave Lewis.

Here we come up against a problem for which I can offer no solution. Clearly the American theatre needs new playwrights; clearly the resident theatres could perform a tremendous service by helping to develop them. Yet people do not want to see new plays: the Theatre Company does close to 50 per cent of capacity (which is its break-even point) when it presents Pinter or Brecht, but only 25 to 30 per cent when it does new plays. Sunday matinees are traditionally ill attended, but at one during the festival there were only twenty-one people in the audience. And after seeing The Wax Museum by Mr. Hawkes and The Investigation by Mrs. Drexler, I could only congratulate those who stayed away.

The Wax Museum is one of those plays in which two characters swap identities; it ends as it began, only with a different girl fondling the wax statue of a Mountie which she calls George. The play was feebly whimsical and feebly nasty; it seemed to need, though not to deserve, a livelier, more imaginative staging than Mr. Wheeler gave it.

In The Investigation, a detective has sex-and-violence fantasies which horrify a young prisoner accused of rape and murder. If only there had been some point to it all, it might perhaps have horrified the spectators, or even amused them. (Mrs. Drexler displayed a pleasantly corny turn of phrase in her musical comedy Home Movies, which was transferred from the Judson Church to a regular off-Broadway house; The Investigation has some of the same quality.) But the play rambled self-indulgently here and there as its author's vagrant fancy took it; nothing seemed to be done for any reason, and very little was good enough to be its own excuse for being. Are plays like these really worth presenting to the public? And if there are better ones, where are they?

The Trinity Square Playhouse in Providence, now preparing for its third season, includes one new play on its regular schedule every year. Otherwise its program is conventional and solid: during the season just past it presented The Crucible, Tartuffe, The Balcony, Twelfth Night, Long Day's Journey and Playboy of the Western World. Except for its Shakespeare matinees, which played to 40,000 high school students in a huge ex-vaudeville house downtown, Trinity Square is a small-scale operation, with a budget of only $125,000 and only 1,865 subscribers for this past season; its regular performances take place in the parish hall of a church.

Playboy in Providence was rather an in-and-out affair. A talented, beautiful girl named Katherine Helmond was spirited and lyrical as Pegeen Mike, who can't find anyone in her little Irish village worth marrying; William Neary, a stocky, curly-haired youth with a nice smile, might someday play the Playboy very well, but was whiney and overcute on this occasion; the supporting cast had its moments, but was on the whole not authoritative. Need I add that the intentions of the men who run Trinity Square are of the best, and that with other productions they may have come far closer to realizing these intentions?

BETWEEN THOREAU AND ME

"We are a race of tit-men," says Thoreau and the titlark

that sings to him
sings to me.
"This is a delicious evening," he says to himself

putting aside his flute
"when the whole body is one sense"— which probably means he desires nothing

but himself—
not even tangerines like those

Walt Whitman breaks his silence with.
"Thoreau," he roars

as the juice of the tangerine glistens in the surf of his beard,
"Thoreau,"

the wave of his hand echoes,
"dying doesn't seem to have hurt him a bit."

Ah!!

SAUL TOUSTER

Before he established the Hartford Stage Company in Hartford, Conn., Jacques Cartier considered five or six cities as possible sites for his theatre. The younger breed of resident-theatre directors have no particular commitment to the cities in which they happen to find themselves; either they have been fished out of the New York talent pool by some board of directors in the hinterlands, or else, like Mr. Cartier, they have calmly chosen a city they considered suitable, and gone to work. (But the old theatres, which were started and which are still run by local zealots, are no more "regional" in their orientation than the new ones.)

Cartier raised $100,000 from private contributions, found a building downtown that he could get for a nominal rental, converted it into a pleasant theatre with a thrust stage, and opened for business in April, 1964. He quickly found his audience; this past season his theatre operated at over 90 per cent of capacity, which means that hundreds were turned away. The problem is that the Hartford Stage Company has almost the smallest auditorium of any resident theatre, seating only 225 people. Even though Cartier's budget this season was just over $200,000 — modest by resident-theatre standards, and by any standards when you consider that he produced eight plays on it — he still ended the season with a $35,000 deficit. But relief is in sight: a 750-seat theatre, costing around $1.5 million will be built for the HSC in a new Community Arts Center.

Cartier's statement of purpose is a very sound but quite general one, to which, I think, most of his colleagues in other cities would subscribe: "I would like to expose people here in Hartford to points of view about life, about people, that they don't find themselves exposed to ordinarily."

This purpose, however, was but indifferently served by the Hartford Stage Company's production last winter of The Importance of Being Earnest (staged by a guest director, Mel Shapiro). The two young heroes, as played by Henry Thomas and Paul Weidner, were exquisitely polished Wildean men about town; the resident theatre needs more of that kind of stylishness. But on this occasion these actors needed less of it; so exquisitely polished were they that they managed to convey a profound lack of interest in anything that was going on—an attitude that is always quick to spread from the stage to the audience. Period style, even for a

I WANT TO KNOW

(How Citizen Exchange Corps Helps Americans Find Out)

IF RUSSIANS HAVE HORNS

Send me Free reprints of N. Y. Times articles and editorials telling about CEC, a non-profit, tax-exempt foundation. Tell me how it brings together Americans and Russians of all ages and occupations to meet their counterparts in both the United States and the Soviet Union . . . and how I can participate in this program, which will lead eventually to exchanges of Americans and Soviets to live and work in each other's country for 6 months to 2 years as a major step toward mutual understanding and survival.

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP ....

Mail to:

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS., Dept. N
550 Fifth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10036

play where languor and detachment are so appropriate, does not necessarily involve such a dampening lack of energy. Twelfth Night at Hartford, on the other hand, had just the consistent professionalism that resident-theatre productions, of period plays especially, tend to lack. In such productions there are frequently several performers in important roles who cause the play to die a little every time they open their mouths; here only a servant or two, seen little and heard less, ever let down the side.

The outstanding talent at Hartford, however, so far as I could see, is the designer John Conklin. The orthodox way to design for a thrust stage is to use just a few carefully chosen, meaningful props or scenic units, and leave the rest to the costuming and the audience's imagination. Conklin creates the kind of elaborately pictorial effects usually associated with the proscenium stage (and often thought outmoded even there), yet his settings are carefully planned with the necessities of the thrust stage in mind, and seem to be perfectly at home on it.

It is still not easy to start a resident theatre, says Zelda Fichandler (the doughty pioneer who founded the Arena Stage in Washington sixteen years ago), but nowadays, she says, "you can skip the first ten years." This has been the experience of the Long Wharf Theatre in New Haven, a flourishing, busy, successful institution, showing every sign of stability and permanence, that celebrated its first birthday this July. Long Wharf is not quite typical of the newer resident theatres—it has come too far too fast for that—but it is a model for the future. It shows how much a couple of assiduous and clever young men can accomplish in a short time in these days of "cultural explosion."

Harlan Kleiman, the executive director of Long Wharf, is a Brooklyn boy with a master's degree in industrial administration from Yale; by special permission, he earned a number of credits toward his degree by taking courses at the Yale Drama School. Jon Jory, the theatre's artistic director, is the son of the actor Victor Jory. The younger Jory began acting in summer stock as a child; after college he spent two years as an actor at the Cleveland Play House, two years in the army directing plays for Special Services and two years studying playwriting at Yale.

They decided to locate their theatre in New Haven by a process of elimination; they thought it had possibilities as a theatre town and, after all, it was where they were. "Then," says Kleiman, "the spieling started." It was the fall of 1964; Jory was 26 and still a graduate student at Yale; Kleiman was 24 and unemployed. They had successfully run a season of summer stock in a small town near New Haven, but neither had any professional reputation and neither had local connections. And they proposed to raise $125,000 in the New Haven area to give the city something called a resident professional theatre.

"At no time during the first four months of this saga," says Kleiman, "did I ever ask anybody for money." Who would trust a couple of kids that nobody had ever heard of? They talked to 250 or 300 people in those early months, telling them about their plans and asking them two questions: "Can we use your name?" and "Will you give us names of other people who might be interested?" One of Kleiman's maxims is "Always use people to get other people."

Meanwhile, after scouring New Haven for a site, they reluctantly decided to locate in the new Long Wharf Terminal Market. It was cut off from the rest of New Haven by the railroad tracks on one side and the Connecticut Turnpike on the other. But there was no alternative, and the partners made up their minds to set up shop in a long, low, unadorned modern building, other sections of which were tenanted by the Ideal Printing Company, the Kahn Meat Company and the Lamberti Sausage Company. It turned out to be an ideal site for the automotive age: plenty of parking and easy access from the Turnpike without fighting city traffic.

Meanwhile the tiring job of raising money went on. The partners made some 700 appearances at parties and club meetings; until the theatre opened, they had never less than two speaking appearances a day between them, and sometimes as many as six. According to Jory, people began to think, "These are interesting and dedicated boys, and they shout and scream so much that they should have a chance to do this."

In late April, work began on turning a slice of the Terminal Market into a theatre with a good-sized 25′ by 28′ thrust stage and 441 seats (picked up cheap from an old New Jersey burlesque house—another Kleiman coup). The first subscription drive began in early May. Four productions were announced for an eight-week summer season: The Crucible, Behan's The Hostage, Little Mary Sunshine, and Peter Shaffer's double bill, The Private Ear and The Public Eye.

The first performance was on July 6, 1965. In ten months, Jory and Kleiman had raised $122,000 (out of the $137,000 they found that they needed for capital expenses) and founded a theatre.

The summer season played to more than 99 per cent of capacity, and broke even. It ended on August 29; on October 22 the eight-play winter season began. It presented works by Sean O'Casey, Ben Jonson, Gilbert and Sullivan, Euripides, Noel Coward, Chekhov, Sheridan and O'Neill. The winter season attracted 84,760 people (over 85 per cent of capacity) and came within an eyelash of breaking even again.

All of which leaves us with the old, nagging question: "Are the productions any good?" and the old, nagging answer: "On the whole, up to now, not very." (My generalizations are based on the eight productions—out of a possible total of thirteen—that I have seen at Long Wharf to date.) It has seemed as if Jory, who has done most of the directing, and David Hager, who has designed most of the sets, have not learned how to use their big stage; several productions have seemed to wander around uncomfortably on it. And while Jory is an inventive director, he has tended to overuse his creative powers, and not trust the playwright.

The best of the Long Wharf productions I saw was The Hostage, held over from last summer. "The action takes place," said the program frankly, "in the Long Wharf Theatre which is got up as an Irish brothel." Before the play began, the actors roamed the theatre, ad-libbing in their own persons. ("I'm the oldest juvenile in the business," one of them assured me.) During the intermissions, rock 'n' roll came over the loud-speakers, and the actors danced with the spectators. The performance was full of bits, improvisations and frank recognition of the audience: every night some member of the public sitting in the first row was

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. N

Buy Your Books
through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Make checks payable to The Nation.

Please address your orders to
THE NATION
Reader's Service Division
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

handed a freshly opened beer by one of the actors. The tenderness in the play, the ripening relationship between the captured British soldier and the Irish servant girl, suffered lamentably, but there were plenty of compensations; this was a play made to be improvised on. But O'Casey's The Plough and the Stars, Coward's Hay Fever and Sheridan's The Rivals were partially disfigured by overelaborate staging and by broad, styleless, sometimes actively annoying acting.

In almost every production, however, there was at least a performance or two worth remembering. In The Plough and the Stars and in The Trojan Women I was greatly impressed by Eda Reiss Merin, a middle-aged lady with a hoarse voice and a dumpy body and tremendous warmth and passion. In The Rivals, the two pairs of young lovers were more or less washouts, but the production was redeemed by the boobs and rubes who surrounded them. Walter Rhodes (who had been well-nigh intolerable in Hay Fever) was wildly hilarious, mugging and gagging and carrying on uncontrollably, taking over the play every time he came on as the rustic suitor Bob Acres.

Most resident theatres operate only from October to April or May; Long Wharf is one of the few to run a full summer season as well. This summer, Jory and Kleiman are producing a "Summer Première Festival": four productions of new plays in eight weeks. All the plays but one are new works from playwrights associated with the theatre: the exception is The Happy Haven by John Arden, which will have its American première at Long Wharf in August.

The summer season opened with a double bill of plays by David Kranes. We might have been spared the first of these, The Loon Hunt, an exercise in portentous whimsy which deals with yet another prosperous suburbanite whose life is a sham because he never finished writing his novel. The whimsy comes in because the hero insists on playing elaborate cute games (no hanky-panky, however) with a fatiguingly ardent and purehearted 16-year-old baby sitter. The second play, I'm Nobody, deals with a girl brought up in isolation and passivity who, on her own for the first time, picks up a young man. It has a number of boggy soft spots, but it also has some good pathetic comedy and some viable straight pathos. Done badly it might be maddening, but at Long Wharf I was gradually but firmly drawn in by Margaret Cowles's grave and beautiful performance. Naive ingénues tend to drive me up the wall, but Miss Cowles captured a very rare quality: absolute candor, absolute innocence, totally without coyness.

The two plays were given excellent productions, with atmospheric and serviceable settings by David Hager, and direction by Jory that strengthened the plays without distracting attention from them. Perhaps director and designer have finally taken the measure both of their stage and of themselves.

For next year, Jory and Kleiman have a $50,000 grant from the National Council of the Arts (which disburses United States Government money) to improve the quality of their productions. Within five years, they hope to move into a new building in—surprise!—a new cultural center in downtown New Haven. It will have a 1,200-seat main auditorium, and an experimental theatre seating 600. Quantitatively, Long Wharf is doing better than well. Qualitatively, there is at least reason to hope.

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

The European double bill, Good Times, Wonderful Times and Joseph Kilian, is probably the most interesting movie fare available in New York these summer weeks; of the two, the latter is the more engrossing. A Czechoslovak production jointly directed by Pavel Juracek and Jan Schmidt, it is a kind of comic Kafka with overtones of Samuel Beckett (for that matter, a good deal of Beckett is comic Kafka). The story concerns a young man who borrows a cat from a cat-lending agency and who discovers, when he comes to return the pet, that the establishment has unaccountably disappeared. The bulk of the film concerns his efforts to break through the indifference of bureaucracy in order to dispose properly of his charge before the fees and penalties for overdue cats wipe out his very small capital. There is said to be a man, Joseph Kilian, who can adjudicate in such cases (he might be a Communist ombudsman), but one always learns where he was to be found yesterday.

The film is played in a wonderfully effective mood of quiet rationality; all the scenes, all the encounters suggest an egg-fragile sanity that never quite cracks (not even when the young man solemnly opens a sardine-can shaped container of cat food and removes by its tail one preserved mouse). One's eyes tell one that everything on the screen is perfectly normal, while one's mind insists that the proceedings are quite mad—and that the madness will spread: as the film ends, another young man is to be seen leaving a café with a cat under his arm.

I cannot imagine how the citizen's encounter with the total state could be more effectively, if cheerfully, lampooned; it speaks well for Czechoslovakia's own bureaucracy that we have been permitted to see the picture.

For Good Times, Wonderful Times Lionel Rogosin has brought together memorable, shocking and for me, at least, entirely new footage from World War I, the Hitler archives and the nuclear bombing of Japan. He interleaves these with conversations picked up by an eavesdropping camera at a London cocktail party attended by physically lardy and intellectually caddish types. A scene is also recorded with a group of Queen's pensioners, withered and palsied old soldiers who recall the "good times, wonderful times," and urge the narrator to put his own son in the army: "It'll make a man of him."

The intention, of course, is to show what wicked nonsense we talk by juxtaposing the overheard remarks with the documentary evidence that relates to them. I salute the intention, but as here phrased it seems to me largely irrelevant. Rogosin's cocktail-drinking stooges utter such extravagantly coarse remarks—war is a way of containing the population explosion; the army offers a man ideals he can define and meet; the power of life you work hard for that dollar

all your life..

make sure you
reap the rewards!

Let us send you information about our exciting retirement plans. Call or write giving us your date of birth and the age at which you want to retire. We'll introduce you to a rather startling concept which may change your attitude about saving for retirement. You'll love the rewards of our retirement plans.

Jafco Life
AGENCY, INC.

INSURANCE SPECIALISTS
431 Fifth Avenue, N.Y., N.Y. 10016
MU 4-5779

and death is exhilarating; war is as inevitable as life itself; peace marchers are exhibitionist, sex starved or both, etc. — that scarcely anyone in the audience will find himself pinned down by the film's line of fire.

Vietnam and the pieties of Mr. Johnson's pacification program are what we face, and this picture would have us admit that the romantic vision of war died at Verdun, that Hitler and Goering were evil men, however much they may have charmed women and children, and that the effects of radiation poisoning surpass previously known forms of physical torment. Is there a hawk who would not enthusiastically agree? I think that Rogosin is arguing his case at too primitive a level—certainly it is too primitive for the audience he is apt to find in a mid-Manhattan art house. The secret of being provocative is finding where the adversary's nerves jump. Still the film is worth seeing for that World War I British recruiting sergeant and to feel once more Hitler's maelstrom pull on crowds so large as almost to pass belief. And the cocktail party, in its own right, is witty surgery.

Directing children is a little like directing Shakespeare—you must trust the material. This Desmond Davis notably failed to do in The Uncle, with the result that the picture is self-conscious, overheated, arbitrary and mawkish. The basic idea is valid enough. Gus, aged 7, has a nephew of almost the same age, and this makes him vulnerable to the taunts of his contemporaries. In part, the jeering arises merely because the boys and girls of the neighborhood, conformists like all children, seize upon the oddity of the relationship; but deeper, too, is their intimation that it was indecent of Gus's parents to produce him at the same time that his sister was producing a son of her own. These hints lead Gus into speculations about adult experience—principally the rites of love and death—that could readily be momentous for a boy of his age.

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 8-8-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

But the situation is almost entirely vitiated by the insensitivity with which the film manipulates its "sensitive" subject matter. The young actors are deployed and set into motion as though by some invisible games mistress; they watch the cues instead of one another, they whoop and pounce with patently insincere enthusiasm and become as boring as children always are when they show off to adults. The picture leans heavily on the standard shots for juvenile drama: children peering through foliage; children running along the skyline; a child in bed overhearing the indiscreet remarks of his elders; a child fleeing hurt to a deserted house where he secretes a pet bird and gazes soulfully at himself in a full-length mirror. The picture is also edited for maximum geographical confusion, but that is only a detail of the lost opportunity.

The Wrong Box continues a tone in "major" British pictures that began, I believe, with Tom Jones and was felt later in The Ipcress File (Michael Caine is also the hero of this new film) and The Loved One. The method is to develop a script of blatant (melodramatic or humorous) theatrical appeal and then to smother the proceedings in a millinery decor and to perform the narrative with an ostentatiously straight face. This approach, which makes clear that the film's proprietors fully appreciate its antique and somewhat preposterous charm, relates to the current preoccupation with Tiffany glass, bentwood chairs and similar art nouveau extravagance. The Wrong Box is thus chic and is being well received, but to my mind it smacks of having your cake and eating it—and rather too much cake at that.

The film is based, however remotely, on a Victorian melodrama involving the kind of lottery known as a tontine (a sum of money is deposited in the name of each of a number of young men, the ultimate survivor taking the pot) for which Robert Louis Stevenson was at least in part responsible. The plot is worked out with the help of lost corpses, mock burials, the murderous money lust of octogenarians and pure young love. The cast—in what must be called a roster of stars—includes Ralph Richardson, John Mills, Peter Cook, Dudley Moore, Peter Sellers, Cecely Courtneidge as well as Caine. These produce some moments of hilarity, but considering the talent involved the fun is surprisingly brief and infrequent. Everyone seems to have been infected with director Bryan Forbes's patronizing view of slapstick (clowning isn't all that easy, as at least Messrs. Richardson and Sellers must know). Too often the cast plays its laughs for laughs, an estranging mannerism which in this case is reinforced by a scent of effeminacy that hangs over the whole picture and works to the particular disadvantage of the females in the company.

THE NIGHT HARBOUR

Standing on Sheila's terrace
During a party
I'm out here alone
Plundering my life—
Lost all evening
In the tides
Of childhood,
Drowning on Riverside Drive
While lights
Blur in salt tears
And tug horns
Sound through
My ears
As all the Boats converge.
Sheila's terrace
Is facing the China Sea
And small hooked lights
Are strung around ships
So we can follow
The dots. From here
I can observe Mountains. Chinese
Islands move
Like overstuffed chairs
Shifting places
In the shadows.
I want to leave this Terrace, sit down,
And weep. Not for
The islands of Asia
That bob up and down
Nor for the boats
That give off a smell of Plunder
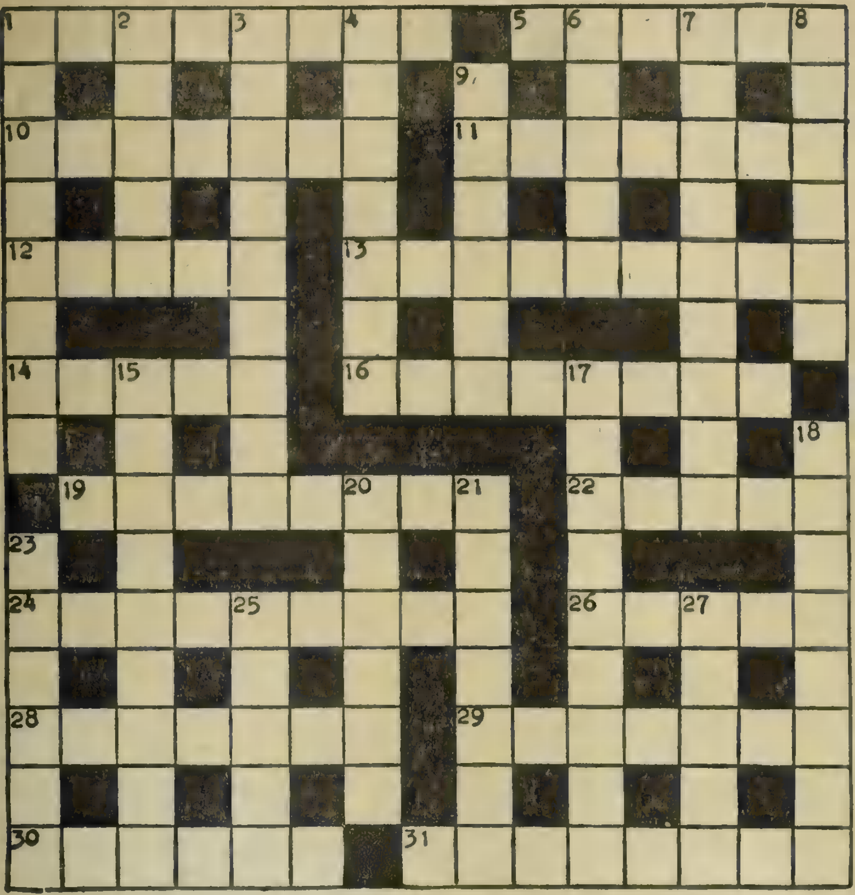
But weep for the sky I am
Under as I stand
In darkness
Towing in my life
From the other side—
The dark side
Of my eye.

SANDRA HOCHMAN

Crossword Puzzle No. 1163

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 What is little Elizabeth about? A broken home, and one might make a big thing out of it. (8)
5 Halls in fantasy of La Boheme, but not Puccini's. (6)
10 Tapers, perhaps. (7)
11 Strange that one so silent and one so busy could be so noisy! (7)
13 Caxton, perhaps, typifies those who expect to make a living off their betters. (9)
14 Clubs that sea-faring men didn't like to find themselves in. (5)
16 Found in other places besides Troy's ruins. (8)
19 Lean animal about, which might be full of spirit. (8)
22 This tries to be big business, but it's only an Indian flower! (5)
24 Typical of those that came after Friday? (9)
26 One that splits 22, for example? (5)
28 Ebbing 26 with a boundary like stone.
29 Think it might be fancy? (7)
30 It might change the course of a plowman. (6)
31 Army food stands for a long time, they should inform you. (8)

DOWN:

1 Throws the family off by appearing in early American costume? (8)
2, 9 and 20 down Mains? (They should be helping.) (5, 6, 3, 3)
3 Elia's name is likely to be associated with such as Oceania. (9)
4 Goldilocks did a number of times, where engineers might find it a trying spot. (4, 3)
6 It might warn a component of the Federal army. (5)
7 and 12 across Sue, if a victim of facial contusions. (5-4, 5)
8 Tree, in all. (6)
9 See 2 down
15 Is everybody in the land alone? (3, 3, 3)
17 Doesn't give a fair trial to public transportation. (9)
18 When those taking too much interest in their work are soft-hearted, they attempt a take-over. (8)
20 See 2 down
21 Concerning the malice caused by delay? (7)
23 Mean to bring something in this way? (6)
25 6 might be set to help you. (5)
27 Implying contention in the Navy, in general. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1162

ACROSS: 1 One Fine Day; 6 Oman; 10 Enclave; 11 Tantrum; 12 Imps; 13 Midlothian; 15 Visages; 16 Truants; 17 Testers; 20 Catalan; 22 Terra firma; 23 Amos; 25 Orville; 26 Addenda; 27 Sole; 28 Advertised. DOWN: 1 Open invitations; 2 Escapes; 3 Ivan; 4 Enemies; 5 Astolot; 7 Martian; 8 No man is an island; 9 Instructs; 14 Agreeable; 18 Shrivel; 19 Stipend; 20 Compare; 21 Laments; 24 Adit.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), [illegible] Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002

HOMOSEXUAL theme fiction, non-fiction listing available free. Trojan Book Service, Box 2121B, Philadelphia, Pa. 19103.

WORLD DEMOCRACY: by Bin Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Avenue, N.Y.C. Bin Dir Woor calls on all monarchs and dictators to abdicate in such a way as to promote Democracy; on all Communists to renounce Atheism, secretly or otherwise; on all Catholics to pray for the election of a Democratic American Pope, pledged to give priests and nuns Human Rights as regards marriage; on the Vatican and World Council of Churches, jointly to promote Religious Liberty, and Christ-Worship for all non-Christians, and on TOTAL HUMANITY to work and pray, both before and after death for WORLD DEMOCRACY.

PERSONALS

"KENNEDY - FULBRIGHT 1968" bumper stickers, 50c each. Citizens for Kennedy-Fulbright, P. O. Box 1503, New Haven, Conn. or P. O. Box 794, El Cerrito, Calif.

Our FAMILY SAFEKEEPER provides a thoughtful inventory of the whereabouts of your valuable papers and important information as to location of your will, insurance, deeds of trust, stocks, valuables. 20 beautifully handlettered pages. 6¼ x 9¼ permanent green or blue vinyl cover. 3-letter gold monogram (add $1.00). Perfect gift. Send $4.00 (ppd) to: SAFEKEEPER, 1800 N. Argyle, Suite 210R, Hollywood, Calif. 90028.

SPACE TO RENT

LARGE OFFICE, loft building, downtown Manhattan, approximately 600 square feet, 6th floor, available August 10th. Phone: CH 2-8400, Ext. 23.

$2.95 each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF THE NATION

- Each file holds a full year's copies.
- Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.
- Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send check or money order.

MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

Printed in the U.S.A. by RCR Publication Printers Corp., N.Y.C.

FREE with every new subscription

THE NATION
EDITED BY HENRY M. CHRISTMAN
INTRODUCTION BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

A View of The Nation

An anthology edited by Henry M. Christman, introduction by Carey McWilliams, 269 pages

This handsome book, published by Grove Press, collects some of the best articles that have appeared in The Nation. Among the thirty-seven contributors: C. Vann Woodward, Kenneth Rexroth, David Cort, Harry Golden, Kenneth Burke, George P. Elliott, Fred J. Cook, Harvey Swados, Dan Wakefield, Eve Merriam, Walter Goodman, Josephine Herbst, J. Bronowski, Walter Millis. Robert Fulford, book editor of the Toronto Daily Star, refers to the contents as "The Nation's fresh voice" and adds: "A View of The Nation serves as a reminder that The Nation, at its best, is a very good magazine indeed."

For your FREE copy of A View of The Nation, fill out the subscription coupon at right, and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion.

THE NATION, 333 6th Avenue, New York 10014

Herewith my order for a new subscription (not a renewal) to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of A View of The Nation.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ Six Months,

☐ Payment Enclosed ☐ Bill Me

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 a year extra)

Name ....

Address ....

City .... State .... Zip No. ....

8-8-66

ALONE ON AN ELEPHANT WILLIAM EASTLAKE

THE NATION

AUGUST 22, 1966 35 cents

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.

AUG 20 1966

Latin America

FIRST OF A SERIES

Revolution Without Revolutionaries / NORMAN GALL

SAVINGS & LOAN

THE EASY LENDERS / MICHAEL HARRIS

SELECTIVE REPRISAL

SNIPING AT DISSENT / MELVIN L. WULF

Akhmatova: Tragic Queen Anna / ALEXANDER WERTH

Sholokhov & the Nobel Prize / EDWARD J. BROWN

Non-Stravinsky at Lincoln Center / BENJAMIN BORETZ

NEWSPAPER

BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

Cook on Cohen

Interlaken, N. J.

Dear Sirs: It is unfortunate that Jacob Cohen did not take the trouble to read with greater care, or to interpret with greater scrupulousness, the account of the Kennedy assassination that I wrote for The Nation [issues of June 20 and July 11]. . . .

Cohen leaps, by a process of logic that baffles me, to the conclusion that I hold the autopsy report in the Kennedy assassination to have been falsified. I have not said so nor am I convinced at this point that it was. There are certainly peculiar circumstances surrounding it—and surrounding the suppression of the missing X-rays and pictorial evidence—and all of this is food for suspicion. That is all I pointed out, and for a very good reason. There may be, in part at least, another explanation—that some of the autopsy work, like much else in the investigation, was bungled.

The testimony in the record describing the autopsy certainly indicates that the pathologists could not get a probe through the back neck wound. In researching my own article, I checked with a doctor friend who had interned and been a resident at Bellevue. He had assisted in autopsies performed by Dr. Milton Helpern, New York's chief medical examiner, and Dr. Gonzalez, the great expert who preceded him. My friend's explanation was this:

When the President was first wounded, he had his hand up waving to the crowds; this meant that the muscles of his back would be drawn up to some degree. In death, with his arms at his sides, these muscles and tissues would fall back into their normal place, closing the path of the wound. Expert criminal pathologists like Dr. Helpern or Dr. Gonzalez, faced with this kind of problem, would work the arm up and down until they had re-created the position of the tissues at the moment of impact—and then a probe would slip through, establishing an exact trajectory. My doctor friend says he has seen this kind of examination performed many times in Bellevue. You can, he says, be an expert pathologist, but criminal pathology is a specialty of its own, and unless you are especially experienced in its techniques, it is easy to be baffled.

What we are left with, then, in the commission report is a trajectory as it has to be estimated from the autopsy findings, which do locate positively the entrance wound in the back and the exit wound in the front. I concentrated on these fixed and established points, the only details that are fixed and established, and again I think Cohen distorts my position when he says I "believe" the first bullet hit too low in the back to have exited from the President's throat and then hit Connally. It is not what I believe that matters, nor did I write for The Nation on the basis of a "belief." It is what the autopsy report specifically shows, and I would like to get that point across to Cohen.

Leaving all drawings and speculations about missing X-rays and photographs aside, Commander Humes's autopsy report specifically locates the wounds. The entrance wound was 14 centimeters, about 5½ inches, directly in from the tip of the shoulder joint; the exact same distance directly down from the tip of the mastoid bone, in the back just to the right of the spinal column. The exit wound in the neck was at the lower edge of the Adam's apple, nicking the necktie knot as the bullet passed. Now these are fixed points. You can measure them fairly closely on any normally constructed man of President Kennedy's approximate height and build; you can get a pretty good idea measuring on yourself. This is virtually a straight line through the body. I've

(Continued on page 156)

EDITORIALS

Deterioration

The American Dilemma is what Gunnar Myrdal called Negro-white relations in our country in 1944. If it posed dreadful problems then, when the Negro was relatively acquiescent in the status to which white America had consigned him, the present situation is truly fearful. If reason has not fled entirely, it seems to be in rapid retreat, with stupidity and violence ready to take its place.

The actions of the Congress are usually a fairly accurate reflection of the temper of the dominant interests in American society; if this is the case now, the outlook is ominous. After twelve days of often bitter debate, the House has passed another civil rights bill, which faces Republican opposition in the Senate and a possible filibuster by Southern Democrats. Those parts of the bill which deal with desegregation of housing and schools have been rendered ineffective. Title VI would have authorized the Attorney General to file school desegregation suits without request by citizens in the districts involved. This has been nullified; to a large extent the open-housing section has received similar treatment.

But if little has been accomplished on the constructive side, the House has prepared a witch's brew to further poison race relations and substitute repression for whatever hopes of conciliation remain. As if existing anti-conspiracy statutes were not enough, the House accepted by voice vote an anti-riot amendment to the civil rights bill which could send to prison anyone who travels interstate or uses any interstate facility—including the mails—for any civil rights action which results in civil commotion. Rep. William F. Ryan protested that the House had lost sight of the purpose of Title V of the civil rights bill, which was designed to broaden federal criminal laws against intimidating or harming persons pursuing their rights under the Constitution. The House has instead legitimized the white backlash in its most fanatical form. It gives Negro leaders the choice between ceasing demonstrations and risking jail if disorder—with or without their sanction—occurs.

A Cuyahoga County grand jury went a step further in a move which may well resuscitate the House Committee on Un-American Activities. It charged that the racial violence in Cleveland during June and July "was organized and exploited" by "trained and disciplined professionals," some of whom are either members or officers in the Communist Party. In the South, of course, the identification of Negro rebellion with communism has long been accepted doctrine, but Northern officials have for the most part steered clear of an accusation so patently spurious. That the Communists would like to organize the Negro masses is obvious but that they have never succeeded in gaining a following is equally obvious. Someone has said that the Negroes who rioted and pillaged in Watts didn't know socialism from rheumatism; it is equally true in Hough. After this attempt to reignite the Red hunt, the grand jury made a passing reference to Negro poverty and frustration but even this was coupled with accusations that it was all set off by agitators.

Subsequently, two Cleveland policemen who are alleged to have infiltrated the Communist Party testified that they had "no personal knowledge" of Communist involvement in the riots, but it remains to be seen how effectively this "inside" report will offset the curious notion that foreign agitation is required to make the Negro dissatisfied with his role in American life.

MAR 4

With the spotlight on the North, Mississippi managed to get back into the act. In Grenada members of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference led local Negroes on a march to protest the use of tear gas by the police the night before at a civil rights rally. "You're going to see a show tonight," the sheriff told reporters, one of whom, Gene Roberts, wrote up the spectacle for The New York Times (August 10). About 100 law-enforcement officers stood by while the demonstrators were showered with bricks, bottles and firecrackers. In Chicago the police protected the demonstrators; Grenada is more permissive.

A situation is developing in which the white backlash is reinforced in the North by white violence in the South, and vice versa. Two decades of systematic Red-hunting will facilitate placing the blame for disorder on the Communists, even if not one remains in the community. The dilemma which Myrdal viewed with sorrow and perplexity is now to be mated with the outstanding American obsession. The offspring is likely to be more monstrous than its parents.

The Johnson Gamble

Mr. Johnson has taken the Vietnamese bull by the horns—not that there was much else he could have done. He purposes to campaign on the issue that all loyal Americans must rally around the flag. There is no longer to be an allowable divergence on the basic issues of the righteousness of the war and the necessity of bringing it to a triumphant conclusion. The time for such indulgence is past, and as the campaign heats up Mr. Johnson will cudgel without mercy any opponents, high or low, who persist in their contumacy.

The progression is a logical one. In the 1964 campaign Mr. Johnson was the man of peace standing between the American people and the firebrand Goldwater. Winning by a landslide, the man of peace became indistinguishable from his adversary, except that he was mealy-mouthed about what he was doing—continually talking about bringing the enemy to the conference table, then committing another division every time there seemed chance of a settlement. Given the ratio between the troops in Vietnam when he took office and the troops there now, Mr. Johnson could scarcely take any stand other than the one he now assumes. And, as every politican knows, the time-honored technique to make people forget that they have been hoodwinked into a war is to keep on enlarging the war and discourage rational discussion.

But even the shrewdest political dodges do not always work, and Mr. Johnson must make this one work not only in 1966 but also in 1968. In escalating the war, he has simultaneously escalated the political stakes. The war is

SUMMER SCHEDULE

The next issue of The Nation will be dated September 5.

IN THIS ISSUE

August 22, 1966

EDITORIALS

138

ARTICLES

142 Russia's Other Peace Movement Albert Parry
145 Latin America. First of a Series: Revolution Without Revolutionaries Norman Gall
149 Selective Reprisal: Sniping at Dissent Melvin L. Wulf
152 Savings and Loan: The Easy Lenders Michael Harris
155 Alone on an Elephant William Eastlake

BOOKS & THE ARTS

157 Akhmatova: Tragic Queen Anna Alexander Werth
160 Sholokhov and the Nobel Prize Edward J. Brown
162 Give Me Peace (poem) Andrei Voznesensky Translated by Max Hayward
164 The Uses of Dostoevsky Simon Karlinsky
165 Music Benjamin Boretz
167 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Editor CAREY McWILLIAMS
Managing Editor ROBERT HATCH
Literary Editor HELEN YGLESIAS
Poetry Editor MICHAEL GOLDMAN
Copy Editor MARION HESS
Advertising Manager MARY SIMON
Washington ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Paris ALEXANDER WERTH
Theatre HAROLD CLURMAN
Art MAX KOZLOFF
Music BENJAMIN BORETZ
Science CARL DREHER

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher
ANNE C. ABRAMOVITZ Assistant

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION Volume 203 No. 5

somewhat like a domestic labor conflict: the longer the strike lasts, the more reluctant the union is to settle for peanuts. When we had 16,000 men in Vietnam and those in the combat areas were fighting only as "advisers," we could have wriggled out without any insuperable loss of prestige. The Republicans would have made day and night hideous with their screams for a while, but no Democrat would have been politically lynched by an enraged populace. As Mr. Johnson has arranged it, the cost is already so high that he must deliver something commensurate in the way of having taught the Vietcong, the North Vietnamese and the Chinese Reds a lesson which they will not soon forget. And for that there is little time—this year's election is less than three months away, and all our bombing intelligence reports indicate that the number of enemy troops in South Vietnam has increased by more than 50,000 since the January 1 estimate.

Between now and 1968, of course, anything can happen, but a sample of the projections which are being made in the Pentagon is the one attributed to Marine Corps sources: to force the war to a "successful conclusion" would require 750,000 men—and eight years. At his August 9 press conference the President disclaimed any knowledge of such a prognosis, but he did not deny that such a study had been made, and he must know that even gloomier forecasts have gone the rounds. If these forecasts are not grossly mistaken, in 1968 the war will be in a most inconclusive state. Our European allies will be even more restive and nervous—Konrad Adenauer's appeal for an end to the American entanglement in Vietnam is premonitory. The American people will be sick of the whole affair. Though they will in large measure have themselves to blame for the apathy that permitted Mr. Johnson to do what he did, there is no scapegoat more suitable than a President who has failed to win a war. About the only happy ending conceivable for Mr. Johnson is that the North Vietnamese and the Vietcong should come with bowed heads to the conference table, and of this there is no sign.

Angled Money

Ever since Chile discovered last year that the professorial character of Operation Camelot, a sociological study operated by American University, camouflaged U.S. Army snooping into the "political instability" of that country, our government has been seeking ways to avoid that kind of embarrassment in the future. Out of this effort have come the hearings being conducted by Senator Harris of Oklahoma, whose own goal is "to see if it would not be better to civilianize such research through a new or existing contract agency." Harris is properly worried because of the $25 million spent overseas last year in contract studies of "social and behavioral" matters, half of which came from the Department of Defense. A comparative pittance, about $200,000, was from the State Department.

Why are the generals suddenly so interested in social science? Critics suggest the brass has found that monkeying with another country's mores is almost as much sport as helping to depose their leaders by armed coups. Other explanations are kinder. Pendleton Herring, president of the Social Science Research Council of New York, told the Harris committee that some hope might even be found in the new military enthusiasm, pointing to a flexibility that the State Department does not have. He accounts for it with the theory that the military is "accustomed to dealing with scientists. They are accustomed to experimentation. They are accustomed to things that don't always pan out, but they are venturesome minded."

On the other hand, Dr. Gabriel Almond, president of the American Political Science Foundation at Stanford University, draws little comfort from the prospect of "venturesome" generals launching professors upon semi-spy jobs that "don't pan out" and only serve to irritate whole countries. He sees a trend in many countries toward nationalism, collective socialism, authoritarianism — making an atmosphere in which American scholarship, sponsored by the world's most rigorously anti-collectivist government, is greeted with deep hostility and suspicion. There must be something to this because government witnesses conceded that no more than 1 per cent of the studies are initiated at the request of the to-be-investigated country.

There is one impeccable solution: learned institutions need only refuse all Pentagon or CIA funds for basic social science research in foreign countries. Some professors hold to this position, but they are probably in the minority. Other professors, rebelling at the social sciences' customary poverty, have told the Harris committee that they are willing to take research money from anybody; that attitude will undoubtedly prevail. Federal research money has for a long while been a barb sunk deep in the soft flesh of the universities, and they no longer struggle.

Proposals for "civilianizing" the research usually follow two lines: setting up a social science foundation through which to channel government funds, similar to the National Science Foundation; or continuing the present method, contrived since Camelot, of having all foreign contract research programs from whatever source—Pentagon, AID, Arms Control, USIA, NASA, or HEW — checked through the Department of State for potentially embarrassing side effects.

Both systems have the fundamental defect that the money is spent ostensibly for the furtherance of truth, but actually in pursuit of an angle. It is almost impossible to get the angle out of money the government spends on science. Tom Hughes, director of the State Department's Bureau of Intelligence, admitted as much when he said that there are ample ways of getting around the process of contract review. For example, he said, while the State Department reviews contracts to individual professors it does not review grants to universities, so when the "problems of auspices and sensitivity and direct public government involvement become controversial," the government will simply go underground—giving grants to universities, which will then be channeled by sympathetic administrators into the prearranged studies, but in a way that will go undetected by the State Department or by others.

The final irony of the contemplated methods for supervising research-spy money, he said, "is that no amount of risk review can guarantee that there will not be another Camelot. The review tends to be a one-shot affair while the risk potential runs the length of the project and does not end with the project's completion. The damage to intergovernment relations can occur without public visibility."

Tantrums

In a letter which we publish this week (page 156) a reader suggests certain tests whereby the concerned citizen may determine whether or not a political leader has lost contact with objective reality ("gone mad with power" is the phrase he uses). Still another symptom of this aberrant state of mind may be that those around the leader shield him from unwelcome expressions of opinion, lest his predictable rage lash out at them as the most available targets.

When Mr. Johnson was in Indianapolis last month, barnstorming for his conduct of the war in Vietnam, a considerable group of anti-war pickets was shunted into streets well out of his line of sight, and only picket signs supporting his position were permitted in the area cordoned off for his address. The obvious assumption was that local authorities, eager to earn the approval of their distinguished visitor, had not been too nice in their regard for the rights of citizens. But perhaps it was not quite like that.

Indianapolis Police Chief Noel A. Jones, who clearly does not enjoy being called names and who admits that he cannot cite the law under which he restricted the activities of the pickets and arrested those who protested the interference, later stated that he acted reluctantly under orders from Secret Service men who conferred with him in advance of the President's arrival. One sympathizes with the federal security officers whose duties bring them in frequent range of Mr. Johnson's notable temper, but if America's cities are now to be tidied up into a series of Potemkin villages to protect the President's sensibilities, the chances of making him respond to anything but his own impulses grow exceedingly slim.

The FBI's Startling Disclosure

Testifying before the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee on the Communist Party's 18th National Convention, held in New York last June, J. Edgar Hoover dropped the following bombshell into the laps of the legislators:

"The 18th National Convention climaxed over six months of intensive party planning. It represented the largest assemblage of Communists in this country since the last convention."

Mr. Hoover may not be irreplaceable, but he would surely be hard to duplicate.

Peace in Outer Space

Ambassador Arthur J. Goldberg had a bit of good news for the press on August 8, after the completion of his first year as U.S. representative to the United Nations. The Legal Subcommittee of the UN Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space, meeting in Geneva, had agreed on thirteen points, contained in nine articles, and Ambassador Goldberg reported a feeling of optimism that a treaty would be concluded. If so, space will offer an environment far more civilized and humane than the earth. Exploration and use of space and celestial bodies, the high contracting parties agree, shall be for the benefit of all mankind. All states shall be on a basis of equality. Claims of sovereignty and national appropriation are barred. No party will place any nuclear or other weapons of mass destruction out there, nor erect fortifications, nor establish bases. Man's activities are to be subject to international law, including the UN Charter. A launching state shall be internationally liable for damages caused by its space vehicles. Astronauts are to be promptly and safely returned if they land elsewhere than planned. Other provisions are on the same plane of amenity.

The prerequisite for this progress is, of course, agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union, since at present these are the only states with capacity for space travel. The General Assembly could not proceed except on the basis of such agreement. But even when a treaty is drawn up and astronauts, as Mr. Goldberg expressed it, are henceforth to be regarded as "envoys of mankind," only a beginning will have been made in keeping out of space the animosities and follies of governments. Both the United States and the Soviet Union maintain huge military establishments, the members of which have no other mission than to defend their respective countries against all enemies, foreign and domestic. "Defense" is the most elastic of terms, and all foreign countries are potential enemies.

In the United States, the Air Force is proceeding with research and development on what is euphemistically called a Manned Orbiting Laboratory (MOL). Its laboratory work will consist in learning how to inspect, disorbit, neutralize and destroy spacecraft of other nations. The Soviets are undoubtedly busy with similar plans. Peace in space is deeply antithetical to the aims of these explorers. The future governments of the two powers will therefore be faced with the task of controlling their spacemen, and this will scarcely be possible unless mass murder is controlled on earth.

The Public Relations of Napalm

The anti-Vietnamese war slogan, "Hey, hey, L.B.J./How many kids did you kill today?" is not entirely fair to Mr. Johnson. As the Pentagon points out, civilians are always the victims of war. When in March, 1945, a single incendiary attack on Tokyo left 84,000 dead, many children must have been consumed in the conflagration.

Yet the present war is different. Neither North nor South Vietnam ever inflicted a Pearl Harbor on us; we crossed the Pacific to inflict our intervention on them. The parents of the dead and injured children of South Vietnam may have been neutral, they may actually have been on our side, but the napalm and TNT we pour on suspected Vietcong positions does not discriminate. What succor do we offer the children who are still alive? The answer is: substantially none. Medical conditions in South Vietnam are horrible; experts say that the hospitals are death houses. In the countryside even this medieval level of medical care is lacking —there are neither hospitals nor doctors.

A Swiss humanitarian organization, Terre des Hommes (World of Mankind), is striving to do something about this. Terre des Hommes describes its work as "the struggle, in the open, against the conspiracy of silence, the martyrdom and liquidation of the weak . . . the spark that fires the conscience of the satisfied and comfortable. . . ." It sent two representatives, one of them a surgeon, to South Vietnam to survey conditions. Their conclusion was that the children suffering from burns and wounds could not be treated in Vietnam, most of which is a combat area. Arrangements were accordingly made for some 400 hospital beds in Switzerland, Germany, Austria, Belgium, Holland, Luxemburg and Denmark, where these mutilated children could receive modern medical care. The government of South Vietnam was willing to cooperate and thirty-two children were flown to Geneva in an airliner chartered by Terre des Hommes: but the cost of air transport—about $1,500 per child—is far beyond the organization's resources. Terre des Hommes therefore appealed to President Johnson for help in transportation. A White House aide replied that the U.S. Government "welcomes all efforts to aid the victims of Communist aggression in South Vietnam," but that U.S. military aircraft could not be provided, nor were funds available in support of the activities of Terre des Hommes in Europe. We might consider extending assistance to "organizations which undertake humanitarian projects for the benefit of needy persons within South Vietnam." (Italics added.)

Terre des Hommes agrees that local hospitalization is preferable wherever it can be organized. "But," it asks, "who would make the plans, draw the blueprints, supervise the construction? When? Where? And how much time would it take? Where are the funds, the supplies, the equipment and the personnel? Where can one find large numbers of available and highly trained specialists [and] nurses?"

Most of these children are the victims of American air action. U Thant's description of the Vietnamese war as one of the most barbaric in history presumably refers mainly to this phase. It is understandable that the U.S. Government does not wish to have the human consequences of its air bombardment policy further emphasized by the presence in Europe of Vietnamese child victims. The White House letter was drafted with such public relations considerations in mind. But what about the Vietnamese whose hearts and minds we say we wish to win? Will the sight of their neglected and suffering children make them love us? Would they not be more appreciative if U.S. aircraft were furnished to fly the children to Europe for treatment, as South Vietnamese combat paraplegics are flown to Veterans Administration hospitals in the United States? As for funds, pictures of a DC-6B airplane recently purchased for Premier Nguyen Cao Ky and equipped with television, stereophonic sound and a built-in bar have appeared in U.S. newspapers. It reportedly cost $500,000. Such contrasts may entail worse publicity than the presence abroad of the victims of U.S. air action.

Russia's Other Peace Movement

ALBERT PARRY

Mr. Parry is professor of Russian Civilization and Language, and chairman of the Department of Russian Studies at Colgate. His latest book is The New Class Divided (Macmillan).

On the evening of April 7 a Soviet citizen walked into a Moscow plaza, doused himself with gasoline and put a match to his clothes. Passers-by rushed over and tried to save him. An ambulance took him to a hospital where three days later he died. Inside Russia the news was hushed. To foreign correspondents the government sorrowfully explained that Nikolai Didyk, age 25, a truck driver from the Ukraine, had burned himself to death in protest against the refusal of the authorities to send him to Vietnam as a volunteer to fight with the Vietcong.

Russian émigrés abroad doubted that such was indeed the reason for Didyk's self-immolation. They noted that he chose to die, not in front of the Ministry of Defense or the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, but right outside the Lubianka Prison. It seemed to them more probable that his protest was directed against the political oppression still symbolized by that prison.

But whatever Didyk's motive, we know that young Russians do try to volunteer for the Vietcong. Some of them may be impelled by their Marxism; others are moved by the lure of dangerous adventure. But many more Russians, young or not, are cynically wary of trumpet calls from Hanoi. Soviet soldiers dislike hearing about Vietnam. In the armed forces daily, Krasnaya Zvezda (February 1), a general in charge of political orientation of the troops in the Leningrad Military District related his talk with a subordinate political officer:

> Lucidly and in great detail he reported to me about many of his unit's everyday problems; he cited figures, percentages [illustrating the unit's political study successes]. . . .
>
> I asked the officer: "And what are the young men really interested in? What questions do they ask in connection with the events in Vietnam?"
>
> An oppressive silence followed.

Nor do they want to talk about any war. The suffering and heroic deeds of their fathers in World War II are for them practically a taboo subject. A woman who served in the war as a Soviet bomber pilot complained in Komsomolskaya Pravda of May 13 that young people nowadays dodge war-memorial celebrations. She lamely coupled this indifference to compulsory attendance: "As is well known, young people usually protest against what is made obligatory for them."

But surely there is more to it than automatic reaction. In front of an audience of 700, a Leningrad student boldly upbraided the propagandists: "Enough of your reminders that you fought for us and defended us. I owe nothing to anybody." (Quoted, indignantly, by a Soviet propaganda official in Sovetskaya Rossiya, November 24, 1965.)

The patriots still rage in Krasnaya Zvezda against Vasily Bykov's novella, The Dead Don't Feel Pain (it ran early this year in Novy Mir), for saying of today's young people that the Second World War "is an abstraction to them, something like Europe's glacial period, or the last phase of the stone age."

One more World War, this time between the Soviet Union and the United States? Not if the new generation can avoid it. A high school senior was chided in Komsomolskaya Pravda of December 13, 1964, for saying in a private letter (intercepted by the authorities): "I know that those jokers in military uniforms, when they speak of foe, mean the 'GI' [the entire letter was in Russian, but 'GI' was written in English]. Well, so be it. It is their job, after all. But I don't want war! I don't want to kill people who have never caused me any harm!"

Patriotic slogans are not working. In another letter, a young Soviet rocket-unit lieutenant announced that he was resigning his commission: "An officer's service had seemed to me different [than it turned out to be], but the reality dispelled all my illusions like so much smoke. . . . Only please don't deliver me any patriotic lectures." (Krasnaya Zvezda, August 13, 1965.)

There is, then, genuine pacifism among at least some young nonconformists in the Soviet Union. For want of a better expression, I would call it non-dove pacifism to distinguish it from the official, Picasso-dove-emblem insistence of the Soviet Government that its every policy is truly peaceful. And yet, some genuine non-dove pacifists among the Soviet populace use the government's peace-loving protestations to justify their own anti-military agitation or action. Last Christmas Day, in Komsomolskaya Pravda, a Soviet officer wrote that he had asked one woman teacher:

"And how goes the military, patriotic education of the young in your school? How do you imbue them with love for the Soviet Army? What military skills are being learned by your students?"

The young lady was amazed: "What are you talking about!" She reminded the officer that the Soviet Union was for peace, so that no military preachment was needed in its schools. It was the officer's turn to exclaim: "Oh, the charming naïveté of that girl!"

Exactly one year earlier, in Komsomolskaya Pravda of December 27, 1964, an official of the Central Committee of the Komsomol (Communist Youth League) had dressed down the members of two "artistic-technical councils," one in Moscow, the other in Kiev, for thwarting production of war toys. These advisers had vetoed the manufacture, in one case, of a war game full of "automatic riflemen, machine gunners and grenade throwers," and, in the other, of "an automatic gun made of plastic." The committee members explained their prohibition by pious reference to official Soviet policy: increased war-toy manufacture, they said, "goes counter to the tasks of bringing up our children in the spirit of the peaceful policy of our state."

The party does not much like such literal-minded application of its slogans. Argued the Komsomol official while reprimanding the anti-war toy advisers: When deprived of manufactured war toys, Soviet children make their own sabers and guns out of whatever material they can find. They play with such makeshift weapons and "do not at all turn into haters of mankind and into cannibals." The official felt that the advisers had been guilty of a wrong kind of pacifism: "Toys that help to foster the feeling of courage, ingenuity and daring are very much needed by the children."

The genuine pacifism of the lower echelons, which thus takes advantage of the party's own protestations of peace, sometimes refers also to the constant propaganda about the party's efforts to improve the living standards of the masses. On October 27, 1964, a special correspondent of Izvestia criticized a young Soviet citizen, a skilled machinist working at auto transport in Central Asia, for saying that Soviet armed forces should be cut so that workingmen's wages could be increased.

Of course, there is in Russia no organized anti-government movement of pacifist committees or clubs such as can be found in the West. The existent "peace" groups of the Soviet Union are formed by the party and the government to denounce the "warmongers" of the West and to laud as genuinely peaceful all policies of the Soviet Government and the Communist Party.

There are, to be sure, some native religious pacifists—Jehovah's Witnesses and other, smaller sects of conscientious objectors—but they are persecuted and prosecuted by the government. Conscientious objection to military duty is not recognized, and men who invoke it are treated as deserters and traitors. The fact that the world headquarters of the Witnesses is in Brooklyn is also no advantage to its Russian communicants.

But such religious nonconformists are neither numerous nor influential; there are two particular reasons why their pacifism makes little dent on the population at large. First, their conviction stems from religion in a country where the younger millions of inhabitants are either atheists or agnostics, and where the older men and women, even if believers, stick with the established orthodox faiths. The second reason is that in Russia Jehovah's Witnesses and sundry pacifist sects are unskilled workers and artisans whose views carry little weight with their countrymen.

The anti-war sentiment of the middle- and upper-class Soviet elite does not seem to be organized, but since it is expressed articulately and from higher on the social scale, it wields considerable influence even on an individual basis. This troubles the party's watchdogs, who try to find at least a hint of deliberate organization in the non-Communist pacifism of the professional elite. On January 9, 1963, writing in Krasnaya Zvezda, a party spokesman accused "certain teachers" in Soviet state art schools of telling the students not to choose "military-patriotic themes" for their final paintings and sculptures (the so-called diploma projects). He declared that such instructors say to the students who do insist on military-glory subjects that "the war ended a long time ago, so why do you want this?" He implied that such remarks were part of an organized effort on the part of the pacifist instructors.

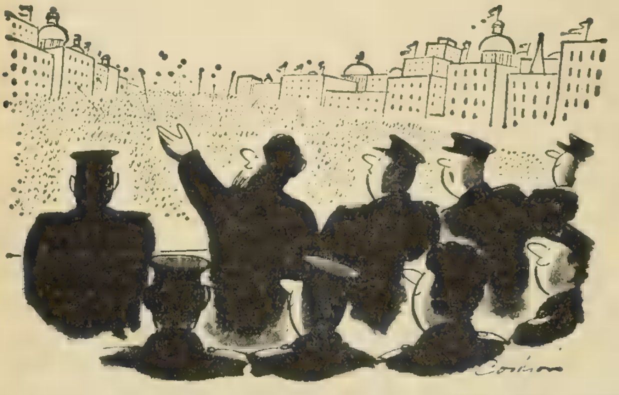
The sharpest suspicions of the party and its military component are directed against writers and film makers. Alleged proof of their concerted opposition to the military is constantly brought out and denounced by those in power. And a campaign is aimed at the writers and stage and film men, who are alternately exhorted and chided. They are urged not to shun the themes of battlefield and barracks, and they are condemned for unorthodox writing and directing when war themes are at length tackled.

The propagandists of the military establishment first stepped out publicly on a grand scale in May, 1955, when a five-day conference of writers was called in Moscow by the Chief Political Office of the armed forces. Lieut. Gen. Sergei S. Shatilov, acting head of the office, in his main speech advised the summoned writers "to create an increasing number of highly ideological and artistic works in praise of the heroism of our people in defense of the Fatherland; to create as many good books as possible about the fighting ways of the army and navy." The writers were to start work at once: the audience was told to report for special data-gathering tours to the barracks and military offices, to meet and chat with the Moscow garrison, and, thus informed and inspired, to plunge into their first chapters of new books in praise of Soviet war glory.

Yet, in the eleven years since that unique conference, hardly any new paeans have been produced. Stage and screen have, indeed, begun to pay some heed to military topics, but in ways hardly pleasing to the party and the military. On July 4, 1961, Marshal Filip I. Golikov, head of the Chief Political Office of the armed forces, denounced Aleksandr Shtein for his play about the Soviet Navy, The Ocean, then running simultaneously in several theatres in Moscow and elsewhere. It applauded, said the Marshal, such "vices" of the Soviet military personnel as refusal to inform on one another. He also criticized a film, Peace to the One Who Enters (about the closing days of World War II and the Soviet troops in Germany), as "excessively" pacifist and "treating our army life incorrectly."

Most notably, from December, 1962 to March, 1963, Nikita Khrushchev himself led a highly emotional onslaught on the Soviet film makers who had just then been completing The Lenin Outpost, wherein young Soviet citizens, both civilian and military, were represented as doubting the moral worth of the Soviet military effort. The Lenin Outpost was banned, and the version which has been shown in the post-Khrushchev period surely lacks its original pacifist force.

In the spring of 1963 the party also waged a determined campaign against At Your Doorstep, a picture about the early phase of Hitler's invasion of Russia. A decorated veteran, acting as the party's mouthpiece in Komsomolskaya Pravda of March 31, attacked the film's "pessimism and despair emanating from the soldiers' each movement and word, as if these were not Soviet men but the heroes of 'the lost generation' entering the film from Remarque's bitter pages." A Red Army soldier in the film was heard saying that war "is an unnatural phenomenon, not inherent in man." The party spokesman was angry: "But there are different kinds of war. Our army conducts a war that is holy and just." This film, too, was first banned, then released after much cutting.



Punch (Ben Roth)

"I Tell You I Distinctly Heard a Note of Mild Dissent!"

On February 7, 1964, the experiment of 1955 was repeated: writers, artists and film makers were summoned by the Ministry of Defense and the chief military propaganda office to a special meeting in a military club, and there read a riot act on their pacifism. The main speaker was Marshal Rodion Malinovsky. "Yes," he admitted, "war is cruel, inhuman, destructive." But—"We do not have a right to transfer Remarque's ideas mechanically to our creative arts and to deprive them of the genuine heroism inherent in our lives."

Nevertheless, Soviet writers have maintained an attitude toward the military that is lackadaisical at best, and more often scarcely conceals their pacifism. In early March, 1965, at a major Moscow conference of writers of the Soviet Federated Socialist Republic, Leonid S. Sobolev lectured his colleagues: "I can't understand how this has come about, but for a long time now we have not seen books about the present-day Soviet Army, about our Navy, about modern Soviet man under arms." He urged fellow writers to tackle this "decisively necessary" task at once—"to penetrate into the most interesting, and, for literature, absolutely new, inner world of the men to whom the Fatherland entrusted our most perfect, most formidable, and technically most complex weapons." Gen. Aleksei A. Yepishev, of the party's military propaganda office, gave official support to Sobolev's views. It was lamentable, said the General, that "our literature with but a few exceptions deals with the army of our days as yet infrequently and, I would say, timidly."

A fortnight later, in an interview in Sovetskaya Rossiya, Gen. Pavel I. Batov, chief of staff of the Soviet armed forces who doubles as chief of staff of all the Warsaw Pact armed forces, called upon Russian writers not to forget the political commissars of the Soviet military establishment. "Remarkable" men they are, he insisted, yet "undeservedly little" is written about them.

The finger shaking has continued into the last few months. "Not so often do our writers turn to the days and deeds of our peaceful army," Krasnaya Zvezda complained on December 11, 1965. "The military theme is largely absent from our literature," it repeated on April 28, 1966. We must catch up with our enemies: Western film makers are so much better at glorifying their past wars, said Krasnaya Zvezda wistfully on February 24.

In contrast to this officially deplored apathy stands the enormous popularity of Bulat Okudzhava's uncontrolled pacifism. Okudzhava, 41-year-old darling of Soviet youth, refuses to write or recite any poems in condemnation of Americans in Vietnam, or, for that matter, any imperialism in the Congo or Latin America. Instead, this World War II veteran has written a number of poems wherein he bluntly rejects and ridicules any kind of war and all the world's armies. Milhajlo Mihajlov, the young Yugoslav literary critic who was recently jailed as he was taking steps to found an opposition magazine, met Okudzhava on his visit to Russia. He wrote in Moscow Summer 1914: "Undoubtedly, Okudzhava's songs alarm all those who love the marching step and military music. 'A lot of fools are still going to enjoy lively soldier songs,' Okudzhava sings. He has written many songs about war and the army. But his attitude toward war must repel overpatriotic spirits. . . ."

Note the words "sings" and "songs." Okudzhava is a minstrel, a balladeer, who accompanies himself on a guitar. The authorities try to discourage his platform performances, and limit or ban his records, but students make tapes of his songs by the thousands, and send them all over the Soviet Union.

Late this spring the Moscow press reported that even if you had a tape recorder you could not use it: there was a sudden shortage of tape. The state's tape-producing factories have either fallen behind the greatly grown demand—or are acting on instructions from above. There are more ways than one to fight the people's non-dove pacifism.

But the people, particularly the intelligentsia, have their ways of counterresistance, too. When on July 24 in Moscow a mass meeting was called by the party to hear Russia's fifteen leading poets recite verse on Vietnam, the hall was only a little more than one-half filled, and the audience applauded Ilya Ehrenburg loudly when he announced: "I have no poems on Vietnam."

LATIN AMERICA: FIRST OF A SERIES

Revolution Without Revolutionaries

NORMAN GALL

Mr. Gall is a correspondent in Latin America for the Toronto Star, The Economist and other United States and European publications. He is planning a book on the Andean Revolution.

". . . the truth is that no one had a true notion of what is a guerrilla war or proper training. The Indian population of the place did not understand us when we spoke of revolution, and showed itself hostile. Four days after entering Guatemalan territory and without executing any action yet, our sentries fell asleep. We awoke on hearing terrible war-cries, finding ourselves surrounded by a mob of hundreds of Indians with machetes, who told us to surrender or be cut in pieces. They were inhabitants of a nearby village, whom the military patrols told we were bandits. We couldn't resist. A little later the army patrol searching for us arrived."

These words, spoken by a Guatemalan guerrilla fighter in 1962, record the kind of experience that has been common since 1960 among Castroite and Communist insurgencies in Venezuela, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, the Dominican Republic and Argentina. Similar descriptions were given five years ago by survivors of the disastrous Venezuelan guerrilla operation in the Bachiller Mountains just outside Caracas; that was before seven guerrilla foci were established elsewhere in the country. The three guerrilla bands which last year tried to operate along the eastern slopes of the Peruvian Andes were knocked out of action within seven months by specially trained Ranger troops of the Peruvian army. In the Dominican Republic in 1963, members of the Castroite June 14 Movement were supplied defective arms from a government munitions factory, then killed in cold blood (seventeen died this way) when they found their weapons useless and surrendered. In Ecuador, some forty students of the Revolutionary Union of Ecuadorean Youth were captured in 1962 by army paratroopers near Santo Domingo de los Colorados, where the Andes slope into the hot jungles fronting the Pacific Ocean, just two days after the youths arrived to set up a guerrilla camp. In the mountains of northern Argentina, the police first infiltrated, then in December, 1964, raided key training camps of the "People's Guerrilla Army," killing six recruits before they could carry out a single action.

These experiences seem to belie the mystique of guerrilla warfare and of Maoism that has been growing in recent years in Latin American university circles, and to which official Communist doctrine and agitation have been increasingly confined. The Communist movements have not only shrunk in recent years; they have also been deeply infiltrated and divided. In Peru, for example, the far Left has split into eight factions: Maoist, Muscovite, Trotskyite, Castroite, "Albanian" (a university group mediating between Moscow and Peking) and splinterings among these groups. Infiltration has been so deep that a Peruvian navy intelligence officer, who had gone to Cuba under a pseudonym to study guerrilla warfare, organized a terrorist bank robbery during last year's guerrilla crisis and then handed his accomplices over to the authorities. A political turning point was reached this year in Venezuela when the Communists, divided among themselves, lost their principal political bastion, the Central University of Caracas, to the Social Christians in an election defeat. The pro-Soviet Partido Communista Venezolano (PCV) and the Maoist Movimiento de la Izquierda Revolucionaria (MIR) had ended their long alliance in a dispute over whether to continue guerrilla activity, which has dropped sharply over the past year under pressure from crack army troops.

Oddly enough, the decline of organized Communist activity in Latin America has come during a period of turmoil and change almost unprecedented in the world's history. There is a population explosion, an education explosion, a massive flood of peasants into the cities, widespread revolts against the agrarian serfdom that has prevailed unquestioned in many areas since the Spanish conquest. In a ten-month journey through the Andean countries to report on these events, I saw new schools, new roads, transistor radios, store-bought clothes, bicycles, shoes, trucks and buses intruding upon the traditional isolation of the mountain haciendas. Roman Catholicism, long plagued by a backward and corrupt clergy, is being rejuvenated under the stimulus of Pope John's encyclicals and Vatican II, and from the example of foreign missionaries—many of them American—who take up their pastorates in remote communities and there preach that attention must be paid to Christianity's historic teachings on social justice and the rights of man. Lay Catholicism has toughened a growing Social Christian movement with a revolutionary ideology that has cut deeply into Marxist influence on youth. Over the past fifteen years, most of Latin America's military dictators —in Argentina, Colombia, Venezuela, Panama, El Salvador, Nicaragua, Guatemala, Haiti, Cuba and the Dominican Republic—have been swept from power, four of them by assassination; these depositions have spurred revolutionary aspirations which found their most rapid and radical expression in small, marginal countries like Guatemala, Cuba, the Dominican Republic and Bolivia. (In some countries dictatorship has been restored, but the general tone of government has become more liberal.)

Throughout the Andean region, elected governments were installed, peasant migrations to the cities have multiplied urban populations, and the explosive growth of free public education has made deep and apparently irreversible changes of structure in old and unjust societies. In Peru between 1960 and 1965 alone, the number of universities grew from nine to thirty-three, secondary schools from 170 to 600. The number of primary schools has risen even more impressively, with Indian communities and urban slum dwellers building their own schools and often paying the teacher as well. In Venezuela, school enrollments have tripled since the fall of dictator Marcos Perez Jimenez in 1958, but school facilities are still straining to keep pace with the increase in population. It is false as well as hackneyed to go on saying that these countries are "ripe for revolution"; the revolution is in full career, the variety of its spontaneous manifestations mocking the doctrinaire context of the cold war.

An instructive example of what has been happening is to be found in Guatemala, where U.S. policy toward Latin America has taken its hardest stand. Between the CIA-assisted overthrow in 1954 of the Communist-supported Arbenz regime and the inauguration this year of a freely elected President, Julio Cesar Mendez Montenegro, Guatemala was ruled by right-wing military dictators. After the 1954 coup, land obtained by the peasants in the chaotic Arbenz agrarian reform was returned to the old landlords. (The Arbenz government had been invested with powers that amounted to confiscation; in practice, seizures went even beyond the law, with agents of the Communist-controlled agrarian reform agency inciting peasants to invade haciendas not affected by the new provisions.) The retrenchment, taking away many thousands of plots seized by Indian and mestizo peasants, has provided the principal rallying point for the Communist guerrillas who over the past four years, despite the initial disasters referred to in the opening paragraph, have become a major political force in Guatemala. They have made travel perilous, especially at night, along the vital road from Puerto Barrios, the principal port, to Guatemala City, the capital. They operate for the most part in the mountains on either side of a long, fertile alluvial valley containing large banana plantations of the United Fruit Company.

This is the only major guerrilla operation in Latin America over the past decade that has not been carried out in a coffee-growing area, though coffee is Guatemala's principal crop. However, the small-scale, subsistence agriculture practiced by the peasants on these mountainsides is at least as unstable and unrewarding as most of Latin America's coffee-growing minifundio. The guerrilla leaders are young former Guatemalan army officers who survived an abortive barracks revolt they staged on November 13, 1960. Some of them were trained at U.S. Army counterinsurgency schools at Fort Gulick in Panama and at Fort Benning, Ga.; a few members of last year's Peruvian guerrillas and some Constitutionalist officers in the 1965 Dominican revolution were similarly schooled. The presence of such men among the insurgent bands, like the decisive action of the Dominican navy frogmen in stopping Loyalist tanks and leading mobs of angry slum dwellers in Santo Domingo last year, may indicate that even elite troops are unreliable in a highly fluid political scramble marked by widespread popular discontent.

The various Communist and guerrilla groups may have their ups and downs; the urge to revolution continues strong, and its spontaneous character is much more impressive than any effort to organize it. Though revolution has been more sudden and explosive in tiny nations like Bolivia and the Dominican Republic, larger countries with a more entrenched and resilient social structure have also been threatened by class conflict. Colombia's new President, Carlos Lleras Restrepo, said in a recent interview: "I believe minifundios (tiny agricultural landholdings) are far more dangerous than latifundios (great estates). These increasingly smaller properties cannot maintain a family, and the minifundio problem is constantly aggravated by the divisions imposed by inheritance laws and by the powerful demographic explosion (doubling Colombia's population every twenty-five years), creating a class of 'proletarian proprietors' with even lower incomes than the miserable sugar cane cutters." Colombia's fiercest social conflict in the bloody decades since 1930 has been over peasant squatters' rights and over the demand of hacienda peons to plant coffee trees on their subsistence plots, these permanent improvements making the tenant farmer legally less exposed to summary eviction. This conflict came to its climax in the violencia, the savage tribal warfare between Colombia's two traditional parties, the Liberals and Conservatives, which cost an estimated 200,000 lives in the decade following the 1948 assassination of the Liberal idol, Jorge Eliecer Gaitan, on a Bogota street. Like most Latin American land reform laws, a 1961 Colombia statute straddles, more than it resolves, the conflict by protecting the squatter against eviction, as well as the landlord against expropriation. (Few important changes in land tenure have been accomplished in Latin America—where 1 per cent of the proprietors own 62 per cent of the farmland—except by illegal invasions and seizures by the peasants themselves.) Meanwhile, an abrupt fall in world coffee prices has cut Colombia's per capita exports since 1964 from $53 to $32, thus inflating the real cost of manufactured imports.

As an area, Latin America has never recovered from the world depression of the late 1920s: Between 1928 and 1932, Latin America's exports dropped by nearly 60 per cent, and the real value of its exports (excluding oil-rich

The Other Continent

Mr. Gall's article is the first of a series The Nation will publish on the broad social and political changes now transforming Latin America.

Venezuela) are now only 32 per cent of what they were in 1928. Food production, moreover, is declining steadily in relation to the exploding population. Economist George Jackson Eder incisively correlates these developments:

> With monetary depreciation came higher prices, which the government blamed on everything but its own ineptitude. With higher prices, came increasing poverty for the urban poor, then price controls on food and prime necessities, which were effective only in still further impoverishing the farm population, and profited only the black marketers and export smugglers. As a consequence of currency debasement, Colombia's rural population is visibly worse off today than 30 or 40 years ago. Small wonder then—what with the economic pressure of price controls on everything the farmer sold, inflationary prices for everything he bought, and above all the reign of terror in the countryside—that 800,000 people have fled from the farms to the already overcrowded cities, 93 per cent of them vowing never to return to the farms, despite the abject misery that faces them in the cities.

Since 1950, the population has at least doubled in each of Colombia's five biggest cities; Cali, a refuge from the violencia in the western departments, has almost tripled. The populations of Lima and Caracas have tripled over the past decade, and since 1936 Venezuela's demographic pattern has shifted from 70 per cent rural to 70 per cent urban. Last year's outburst in Santo Domingo, where the population doubled from 1950 to 1960, was preceded by several months during which a severe drain on purchasing power in the slums was exacerbated by abrupt declines in export prices and production and by wild imports of contraband luxury goods on the part of the military. Nevertheless, anyone visiting the slums of Lima on a Sunday morning is amazed by the sober industry of recent peasant migrants who invest their scant savings from $3-a-day wages in materials to convert straw huts into permanent concrete block homes. Violence comes only with economic dislocation.

The slums are created and enlarged by invasion. At 7 P.M. on the night of October 7, 1963, several hundred men, women and children charged up a rainless, dusty hill overlooking the concrete-block slum in Lima called El Augustino, itself invaded the same way sixteen years earlier. The invaders carried red and white Peruvian flags and, overnight, staked out individual lots and set up tents and temporary straw huts. The squatters placed women and children to the fore and used slingshots with shepherds' accuracy to defend themselves against the helmeted police cavalry which arrived, as expected, the next day to disperse them with tear gas and burn their huts. The pobladores scattered further up the hill and into the settled portions of El Augustino, but within a week they had filtered back with new flags and huts, to wait out the chilly nights for another assault. However, the invasion had been strategically timed to occur just before Lima's bitterly fought municipal elections, the first time in forty years that Peruvians could elect their city governments. Electoral pressure was too much for the police, and the new barriada, "7 de Octubre," was allowed to survive.

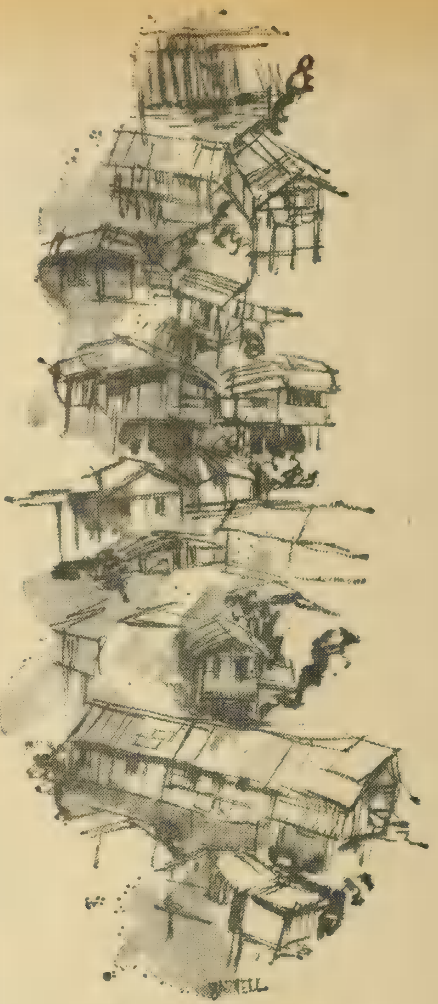
The new slums are part of the "folk-urban continuum" of peasant pressures on traditional society. The flags and the slingshots and the deployment of women and children and the overnight raising of huts are all part of the ritual of peasant invasions of haciendas in the high Andes. In some of the most backward areas of southern Peru, peasant sindicatos have been formed along the lines of the Bolivian peasant leagues which ousted feudal landlords and divided haciendas and farm tools among the Indian serfs after the 1952 revolution in which the Movimiento Nacionalista Revolucionario (MNR) crushed the army in the streets of La Paz and Oruro. Many of the Peruvian land invasions have been Communist inspired, particularly by university students who speak Quechua (the ancient vernacular used by the Incas). Yet their real roots are in the rapid growth of the Indian communities which, given the land scarcity at these altitudes, often limits a family's freehold to a single furrow. The organization of peasant sindicatos in southern Peru's La Convención Valley, where a guerrilla movement failed last year, began eight years ago after local landlords tried to seize the prospering coffee groves of tenant farmers.

The peasants appealed for help to the Communist labor leaders in the old Inca capital of Cuzco. After several student leaders from the Communist-dominated University of Cuzco had been sent to La Convención to preach revolution among the peasantry, the valley's antique feudalism was destroyed by violent convulsions in which armed peasants clashed with police and tenant farmers refused to provide the traditional 120 days free labor as rental for their hillside subsistence plots. In the end, the government legalized the de facto expropriation by granting titles for the hacienda plots the peasants had worked as tenant-serfs, and by allowing those awaiting titles the right to work the land without paying rent. This in turn affected the guerrilla attempt. Said an American sociologist who recently spent nine months in the valley: "The peasants had just gotten some land, and were expecting more from the agrarian reform. This made them much more conservative than they were a year or two before. It was a very bad time to obtain peasant support for a guerrilla movement. However, two-thirds of the families in La Convención don't have enough land to live on, and there is not enough good farm land in the valley to meet their needs. In two or three years a guerrilla uprising could meet with an entirely different response."



The revolutionaries have long been exasperated by the conservatism of the peasantry, once its minimal needs for subsistance freeholds are satisfied. A Communist lawyer of peasant origin, who helped organize the wave of hacienda invasions that swept Peru's central sierra in 1962-63, recalled recently: "Most of us did not realize the class differences and contradictions within an Indian community, how selfish and bourgeois the comuneros can be. When they invaded the big haciendas, the rich members of the community divided the best land among their closest relatives and friends, leaving the worst pasture to the poorest and powerless." Peru is South America's third largest country, yet only four-tenths of an acre per inhabitant is being tilled, a ratio equal to China's and half that of India. This has forced many Indian communities to abandon their dependence on agriculture, to buy trucks and freight potatoes and corn from the sierra to La Parada, Lima's sprawling, swirling marketplace (organized much like Les Halles in Paris) which has become, with its proliferation of cheap manufactured goods and the daily arrival of rickety mountain buses bringing new migrants to the slums, the melting pot for the economic and social transformation of the peasant.

The spread of "Marxism," with all its many variants in this scene of effervescent change seems much more an expression than a cause of the revolutionary process. It is true that nearly all of Peru's universities have gone Communist since the rise of Fidel Castro, that in recent years many Venezuelan high school and university students spend their summer vacations undergoing guerrilla training in the coffee-growing Andean foothills. Yet the theoretical grounding of this "Marxism" is exceedingly weak, being confined usually to Che Guevara's guerrilla handbook and to Mao Tse-Tung's military lectures. (Mao's Confucian-style maxims, extolling the Communist strategy of resistance to the Japanese invasion of China in the 1930s, have strikingly little relevance to the social conflicts which are the great revolutionary issue in Latin America.) Probably much more important than political doctrine to the revolutionary vigor of the universities is the expansion of educational opportunities, which has brought many cholos (Indians converting to Hispanic culture) onto the proliferating campuses.

Many of these Quechua-speaking cholos, like most Westernized Indians since colonial times, show little but repugnance for their peasant origins. Others, however, have plunged into the organization of peasant sindicatos and guerrillas; often they have been trained for the work in Cuba. (Intelligence sources estimate that there are now about 1,200 persons in Peru who have received some kind of training in Communist countries.) The Communist-run student political machine dominates the university, with professors usually subject to dismissal by a majority of their students and obliged to pay bribes in money and grades to student leaders to assure peace in the classroom. Many of the politically reliable students are maintained on $30-a-month "scholarships" that provide rudimentary room and board, while some graduates of this machine become "juridical advisers" to the sindicatos, the kind of parasite lawyers who have exploited the Indians for centuries.

The French Marxist writer Regis Debray, after completing a recent extended tour of South America to analyze possibilities for new Castroite guerrilla insurrection, wrote of Latin American communism's "impotence in associating itself profoundly with national traditions, finding concrete historical roots in each country and giving itself a continental continuity." Fear of communism has been a useful lever in wrenching concessions toward reform from the rulers of unjust societies, but communism itself has blended into the landscape of corruption and cultural poverty. Last year's enthusiasm for Mao has become this year's swing toward the Moscow line. A few months before his disappearance last year, Che Guevara said: "We foresee the organization of an international front against imperialism" manned by "proletarians and peasants" to combat "an organized repression of the peoples of Latin America" being prepared by the United States. The "organized repression" is the recent flourishing of counterinsurgency techniques that have sharply curtailed Communist insurrection. But communism and the guerrilla activity are fluctuating responses to the steady pressures for revolutionary social change. It would be a blessing if we could learn to distinguish between cause and effect in Latin America.

SELECTIVE REPRISAL

SNIPING AT DISSENT

MELVIN L. WULF

Mr. Wulf is legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union.

"In the abstract," said Senator Fulbright in a recent lecture at Johns Hopkins, "we celebrate freedom of opinion as a vital part of our patriotic liturgy. It is only when some Americans exercise that right that other Americans are shocked."

The reactions to recent protests against American policy in Vietnam have indeed demonstrated that the public—and more surprisingly the government—does not practice what it preaches in this area. It is particularly discouraging that the government has not consistently recognized the right of free opinion and speech, because the government, much more than the public at large, has the instruments for retaliating against its critics. And we can say this about events of the last few months: if a government's devotion to civil liberties is measured by the restraint it exercises in punishing its critics, the Johnson Administration has clearly failed the test.

Washington has not taken a great number of reprisals against its critics, but each move seems to have been designed to have the maximum quelling effect on one crucial kind of criticism. The government has been remarkably successful with these actions, and critics of the Vietnamese policy have been effectively deterred.

By initiating action under the discredited Subversive Activities Control Act against the DuBois Clubs, the Administration has removed the sting of one of its principal critics. It has designated the DuBois Clubs as a "Communist front," and with this label attached to them their statements no longer carry weight in the public debate. By initiating this action against the DuBois Clubs, the Administration has also reminded any similar organization with ideas of criticizing official policy that the same thing might happen to them.

This move against the DuBois Clubs was the logical consequence of statements made last October by both Attorney General Katzenbach and President Johnson that organizations behind the anti-draft and anti-Vietnamese movements would be put under investigation. At that time Mr. Katzenbach announced: "There are some Communists involved in it. We may very well have some prosecutions." It was President Johnson's feeling that "even well-meaning demonstrators can become victims of Communist exploitation." And press secretary Bill D. Moyers referred in a statement to the President's surprise "that any one citizen would feel towards his country in a way that is not consistent with the national interest."

Early last January, J. Edgar Hoover predictably announced that the Communist Party had played an "ever-increasing role in generating opposition to the United States position in Vietnam." It is hard to take this statement seriously. The overwhelming majority of the protesters are neither members nor friends of the Communist Party (and those who are surely have every right to march and picket). Mr. Hoover certainly knows this but he seems more interested in intimidating the public than in educating it.

It was learned recently that FBI agents are conducting a national investigation of Students for a Democratic Society. Dean Idzerda of Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., announced in April that FBI agents had asked him for the names of all students who were members of SDS. To his credit, the dean refused to comply. Summing up the total effect of the government investigation, he said: "It's unfortunate that a climate of suspicion can be created by such activity that might lead some students to be more circumspect than the situation requires. Things like this can be a danger to a free and open community, if men changed their behavior because of it."

By revoking the passports of Prof. Staughton Lynd, Tom Hayden and Herbert Aptheker after their return from Hanoi, the government continued its policy of selectively enforcing its ban against travel to Communist Asia. (It simultaneously withdrew the passports of four men who had gone to Hanoi some months earlier.) Though Lynd was later issued a restricted passport to allow him to attend anti-Vietnamese rallies in England and Scandinavia, it is generally agreed that this was less a redemptive act than an effort to counteract the concurrent clamor against the expulsion of Abba Schwartz from the State Department.

Perhaps the most publicized—and therefore the most effective—action taken by the government against students in opposition to America's Vietnamese policy was the reclassification of fifteen University of Michigan students who sat-in at the Ann Arbor draft board office. The men were abruptly deprived of their student deferments and classified 1-A. Though a small number of them have subsequently been reclassified to 2-S, most reclassifications remain unaltered. Appeals are being made for each of them to the Selective Service System and to the federal courts.

The most futile of the measures taken by the government are the prosecutions of several young men who have publicly destroyed their draft cards. Though David O'Brien was sentenced as a juvenile to a maximum term of four years' imprisonment by a Boston federal judge, and Terry Sullivan was given a one-year term in New York, the suspended sentences handed out to several other card burners are a good reflection of the poor view some federal judges take of special "draft card burners" legislation. The judges are balking at the government's assertion of its supreme power to prosecute its critics.

The court-martial of Lieut. Henry Howe for participating in a peaceful anti-Vietnamese demonstration in El Paso, near Fort Bliss where he was stationed, is an example of the Army's inability to tolerate any criticism from within its own ranks. Lieutenant Howe was convicted of using contemptuous words against the President of the United States and of conduct unbecoming an officer. He was dismissed from the service and sentenced to two years' imprisonment. Though his commanding general reduced the sentence to one year, he refused to release Howe while the appeal of the conviction was pending in the military courts. However, litigation through the federal courts, ending up in a bail application to Justice Hugo Black, persuaded the government to release the lieutenant on parole after he had served three months in military prisons. The appeal of Howe's conviction is now before the intermediate military appellate court.

In mid-July, however, the General Counsel of the Department of the Army threatened revocation of Howe's parole if he should continue to speak out publicly against the war, the Army and the President. The ACLU said that the threat against Lieutenant Howe "is a reflection of an incipient tendency toward the suppression of freedom" reminiscent of "the period of McCarthyism."

The Army again displayed its insensitivity to constitutional principle when it peremptorily canceled the leave of three soldiers only hours before they were scheduled to speak at a public meeting to announce their refusal to obey orders to be shipped to Vietnam. Put under arrest by military and civilian police, they were handcuffed and transported to Fort Dix where they were isolated under close guard. Five days later, after refusing a direct order to board a waiting plane headed for Vietnam, they were imprisoned in the post stockade to await court-martial charges.

Directly related to the government's program to stifle criticism of its Vietnamese war was the revelation that Frances Knight of the State Department's Passport Office had requested American embassies abroad to keep Prof. H. Stuart Hughes under surveillance while he was in Europe. Although it is not precisely accurate to blame the action on the Administration, it certainly can be said that it reflected the mood passed from the White House down to the Washington bureaucracy.

A valuable—if unintended—product of government harassment is the October, 1965, publication of the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee, entitled "The Anti-Vietnam Agitation and the Teach-in Movement." Presumably designed to be a searing exposé of Communist infiltration, the study conveniently brings together reprints of articles and statements defining a position against the war in Vietnam. Of particular interest is an article by Michael Munk which takes the reader on an informative excursion through the student Left.

The official acts of the federal government are reflected in retaliatory steps taken by state and local governments and private citizens. DuBois Club headquarters in Berkeley was dynamited, and New York police twiddled their thumbs while a group of DuBois members were attacked, finally stepping in only to arrest the victims. Both of these events occurred the day after the initiation of the government proceedings against the club. In Boston, police preferred to be absent while a small group of protesters was assaulted by a large group of high school students.

In other places around the country the police have taken a more active role. In Durham, N.H., several members of the Committee for Nonviolent Action were arrested for parading without a permit while peacefully demonstrating against the war. Two weeks later the Selectmen of Durham issued a permit for a second demonstration with the proviso that no one ever arrested for a crime, excluding traffic offenses, could participate. Six persons were arrested for violating the proviso, but charges were dropped a few days later. In Albuquerque, outside Kirkland Air Force Base, fourteen persons were arrested during a demonstration against the war in Vietnam. In Seattle, the local police habitually photograph all demonstrators.

In early April, a fund-raising party in New York for the benefit of the Artists and Writers Protest Committee was dispersed by combined forces of the police, fire and buildings departments. On the same night the burning of an American flag on the stage of the Bridge Theatre provoked the city government to start proceedings to suspend the theatre's license.

Two leaders of a rally in Honolulu were arrested in March for displaying a flag on which dollar signs had been substituted for stars.

Several bills now pending in Congress would make flag desecration a federal crime. Under present law the United States Government has jurisdiction over the offense only if it is committed in the District of Columbia. Like most state statutes, the bills would make it a crime to "defy" or "cast contempt, either by word or act" upon any American "flag, standard, colors or ensign."

There have also been reprisals by educational institutions. In January, four members of the Cornell University Young Socialist League were placed on probation for six months for distributing literature favoring the Vietcong. In Houston, a doctor helping to organize a Christmas peace vigil outside the LBJ ranch, changed his mind about attending when he was threatened with the loss of his job at Baylor University. In Williamstown, Mass., the superintendent of schools announced that he would not recommend tenure for Carlo Valone, a history teacher who frequently criticized U.S. policy in Vietnam. High school officials in Los Angeles, Des Moines and Prince George County, Va., suspended students for wearing badges proclaiming their opposition to the Vietnamese war. A teacher in the Las Vegas public schools, active in the protest movement, was expelled from the National Federation of Teachers because he refused once to salute the flag. Though he was also threatened with loss of his job, the school authorities relented in the end, showing better sense than the trade unionists.

The decision of the Georgia legislature to refuse to seat Julian Bond, who was elected by a vast majority of the voters in his district, may well be the most outrageous action taken against a dissenter from official policy. Not only was it a violation of Bond's own right to express his point of view on an issue of consummate political importance; it was also a direct rejection of the will of the several thousands of individuals who voted for Bond as their representative.

It would be too melodramatic to conclude from the accumulation of incidents described here that the nation is in the midst of a crisis of freedom. The 25,000 people who marched down New York's Fifth Avenue in March, the 10,000 who marched in Washington in mid-May, the continuing student agitation against the draft—which represent only part of the protest activity that is carried on in public—testify to our continuing freedom to criticize and denounce government policy.

Nonetheless, the sanctions imposed against a few critics persuade many others to keep their silence. Though the protest against the government's Vietnamese policy is sizable, its extent cannot really be measured because the government's policy of intimidation has discouraged the fainthearted from identifying themselves publicly.

The government has obviously not yet felt the need to exert all the powers of suppression at its disposal. It could, for example, decide to bring prosecutions under the provision of the Selective Service Act which prohibits interference with the draft law. Such actions at law would have to hurdle substantial First Amendment obstacles, but malicious prosecutions could adversely affect the protest movement by tying up personnel and funds, and by intimidating its weaker-willed members.

Though such a move would raise even more difficult problems, the government could also invoke the Espionage Acts which make it a crime, among other things, to impair the discipline of the armed forces or to issue false statements intended to interfere with United States military operations.

If the situation in Vietnam should, in Washington's view, seriously deteriorate, or if government policy should lose its apparent majority support, there is the constant danger that the government will choose to stifle its opponents in order to retrieve at least the appearance of popular support.

SAVINGS AND LOAN

THE EASY LENDERS

MICHAEL HARRIS

Mr. Harris is on the staff of the San Francisco Chronicle.

The savings and loan industry faces perils in the next months that will scarcely be overcome by a cheery smile and a brave heart. Many savings associations appear well equipped to meet the crisis produced by trouble in the money market and depression in the residential building field. But in California, more than one in seven of the savings and loan associations chartered by the state have a disturbingly large share of their assets tied up in "problem" loans.

Savings and loan associations invest almost entirely in real estate mortgages, and it has become apparent that they have not always invested well. In a little more than two years, sour loans in the portfolios of the California associations have increased by more than $400 million.

The totals were frightening enough at the end of 1963, when the associations reported to California state authorities that $472,674,523 of their loans had turned unhealthy. In most cases, the troubled loans were three or more months delinquent or had already been foreclosed. In other cases, the associations had rid themselves of unwanted real estate by making loans to new investors on especially generous terms. By March 31, 1966, the total of such sour loans stood at $864,237,000—or 5.65 per cent of all the money lent by the 204 associations. This percentage is probably twice as high as it should be, and the reports for the third and fourth quarters of 1966 may bring worse news.

The situation cannot be described entirely through statewide averages. Some of the most prudently run associations were cautious in the days when California tract developers seemed able to sell anything they built for remarkable profits. Their officers refused to make the excessively generous loans that shoestring builders wanted, and thus today are not forced to foreclose on overpriced real estate. Some associations, large and small, are carrying delinquencies of less than 1 per cent.

At the other end of the scale are the associations that proved so willing to make inflated loans that their top officers were sent to jail. The first of the sentences for fraud was imposed in 1964 after Robert G. Joseph, former president of a savings and loan association in Sacramento, announced that he had decided not to contest charges of making illegal loans. Deputy State Attorney General Marshall S. Mayer, who had investigated the case for two years, announced that the sentencing—unprecedented in the state's history—should serve "as a warning to the men who run our financial institutions."

Mayer soon proved he meant it. In the last two years the decision-making officers of five more California savings and loan associations have been convicted through Mayer's efforts and through the cooperation of local district attorneys. One man got off with a fine; the rest were sentenced to some months in jail.

But convicting a criminal officer and replacing him with someone more responsible do not in themselves restore a savings association to health. The loan portfolio of West Coast Savings, which Joseph had headed, continued to deteriorate after he departed. Sound builders chose, in many cases, to try other savings and loan associations first when they wanted money, and West Coast found itself getting applications from borrowers its competitors had rejected. Too often, it had no choice but to put its money into less desirable investments. The problem was finally solved when West Coast merged with a much stronger savings and loan association.

Merger is often the only way out, short of the unmentionable alternative of simply closing the doors. Last year, four associations were rescued by involuntary mergers. The healthiest of the four admitted to state authorities that 21.34 per cent of its investment in real estate loans had turned sour by last September 30. The bad loan figures reported by the other three were 28.95 per cent, 29.21 per cent and 30.63 per cent.

These percentages may be startling, but they are far short of the record. When Trans-Bay Federal Savings and Loan Association of San Francisco vanished through a merger last February, about 60 per cent of its loans had gone bad. Precise figures are not available in the case of federally chartered associations; the Federal Home Loan Bank, which regulates the federals, does not have the same public disclosure rules as the California Division of Savings and Loan. In the case of Trans-Bay, however, some details were released. It was disclosed that the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, the government agency that insures association accounts up to a $10,000 limit per depositor, had lent Trans-Bay $18 million. The Federal Home Loan Bank of San Francisco had provided another $1 million. But these advances were not enough to save the $53 million association. Its last chance to survive apparently ended last year with the collapse of the San Francisco National Bank, which held $1 million of Trans-Bay's scarce cash reserves.

The demise of the devil-may-care San Francisco National Bank, whose colorful and hard-gambling president, Don C. Silverthorne, was convicted of looting the institution, had a serious effect on California's savings and loan industry. In addition to Trans-Bay, two other Bay Area savings associations faded away through mergers—one after it failed to recover $1 million in deposits from the bank and the other, a very small institution, after it lost $200,000. In all, San Francisco National held $20 million in savings and loan association money. The big losers, most of them strong Southern California institutions, have offered to take over the bank's losses and liabilities and inject several million dollars of their own in exchange for a federal charter to operate a successor bank.

Mergers have by no means eliminated all the weak savings and loan associations. Even after 1965's consolidations, thirty-one state-chartered associations were still reporting at the end of March that 10 per cent or more of their loans were shaky. The sickest of the thirty-one, Van Nuys Savings and Loan Association, which operates in Los Angeles County, recently announced merger plans; its portfolio at the end of March listed 26.14 per cent of the institution's loans in the "problem" category.

The largest association with a high percentage of "problem" loans is Lytton Savings and Loan Association of Northern California, which reported 10.26 per cent on March 31. On the same date, Lytton's Southern California association reported a percentage of 7.63. Bart Lytton, who controls both, declared optimistically: "We've peaked out," and predicted the figures would improve.

This tells only part of the Lytton story. It is not possible to report, for example, on the state of the securities held by Lytton Financial Corporation, the holding company that controls both associations; its records are confidential. And Lytton has acknowledged that he owes $9 million to Union Bank of Los Angeles, a loan which he said is fully secured.

There are signs of unrest in some institutions whose assets are reported in good shape. Charles A. Wellman, president of two American Savings and Loan Associations—one in San Francisco and the other in Southern California—resigned in February; three other top officers left in April. S. Mark Taper, founder-chairman of the associations, resumed the presidencies and announced that Wellman had left because of "differences on policy matters." The American Savings associations, whose combined assets come to about $2 billion, are controlled by First Charter Financial Corporation, whose stock, like that of other savings and loan holding companies, has declined sharply in recent years. The proportion of sour loans held by the associations is below the state average.

"In line with the Federal Home Loan Bank Board's request, we are not pursuing loans in areas or tracts where the supply of housing is out of line with prevailing demand," Taper said. But that, unfortunately, encompasses a great deal of the state. Though California's population continues to grow rapidly, the inventory of unsold tract houses and unrented apartments remains dangerously high. It has been found that much of the recent growth consists of the very young and the very old. The "depression babies" of the 1930s, today's best prospects in the real estate market, weren't as numerous as the children who preceded them or those who followed.

Permits for new housing units—apartments as well as individual dwellings—totaled 292,000 in California in 1963. Last year the figure dropped to 175,000, representing a cash decline of nearly $1 billion. This year, permits for new housing units are expected to fall 30 to 40 per cent below last year's level in the Bay Area, and the story is similar in the rest of California. The housing market is suffering nearly as much in other parts of the nation. Anthony Ramos, secretary-treasurer of the Carpenters Union State Council, predicted that the number of permits would drop 5 per cent more this year, and there are some who consider Ramos a hopeless optimist. The luxury apartment field has reached such a sad state in San Francisco that repossessions are no longer unusual. Just recently, one Nob Hill building was repossessed before it was completed, and a savings and loan association had to find a new developer to take it over. The real estate market has turned sluggish even in prime suburbs near Los Angeles and San Francisco.

Not only is the supply of housing too big but the number of acceptable buyers keeps declining. Qualifications for credit have become so much stiffer that The Wall Street Journal recently advised (April 13): "If you just barely qualified for a mortgage last year, forget it. You won't qualify now."

The solution that normally suggests itself to a savings and loan official when money is tight and housing demand is weak is to cut the interest rates paid to depositors. But this method of easing the pressure won't work in today's market. The major banks, after years of lagging behind the savings and loan associations in the competition for savings, are now offering 5 per cent to customers who will buy certificates of deposit for fixed-term investments. The savings and loan replied to this challenge by unexpectedly raising their rates to 5.25 per cent on July 1, with an extra bonus of half a per cent for deposits held for three years. This imposes a brutal financial strain on the less prosperous savings and loan associations, and not all of them are expected to survive. More mergers are in prospect.

Heavy amounts of savings and loan deposits have been lost to commercial banks this year. The worst periods came in early April and early July. In July, it appears, the net loss came to about $1 billion, with California and East Coast associations hit with particular force.

Although authorities in both fields say it will be about a month before they can measure the extent of the shift, it does not hurt a healthy savings and loan association to have its growth slowed in a period like the present, but an association cannot afford to lose a high proportion of its deposits. With most of its loans committed in long-term mortgages, an association must still maintain enough cash on hand to pay off depositors when they ask for their money.

There were savings and loan failures in the worst days of the depression, just as there were bank crashes, but it has been many years since depositors were turned away for lack of cash. With accounts insured by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, depositors have become remarkably relaxed; they seem not to worry even when the association holding their money is in trouble. Officers of three Sacramento savings and loan associations have been arrested, convicted and jailed without causing any runs at the cash windows. In fact, one of the great frustrations suffered by the managers of the top-flight savings associations is that the average customer seems uninterested in the quality of the management. His attention centers on two things: getting the highest insured return for his money and making certain that he never has more than the $10,000 insured limit in any one account.

The Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation is modeled closely on the banks' better known, slightly older and much larger Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. Its resources have proved adequate in the past. When an insured savings and loan association is shut down, depositors have the choice between accepting payment directly from the federal corporation or having their accounts transferred to solvent savings and loan associations. The recovery period between shutdown and recovery has, up to now, taken from several days to a week or so.

The real risk is carried by the federal government. Congress would face the political necessity of stepping in to provide additional money if the $1,584,027,752 in the treasury of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation should prove inadequate to cover a series of mammoth savings and loan collapses. The sum represents 1.35 per cent of all savings and loan deposits.

There are no delays when the Federal Home Loan Bank Board decides to take over an insolvent savings and loan association. The board can move without notice, and any hearings are held after the event. Delay appears to be at least theoretically possible in cases involving California's state-chartered associations. Officers of these firms have the right to demand hearings before their associations can be seized, and if such hearings were ordered, repayment to depositors would almost surely be delayed. State authorities have side-stepped the issue by avoiding shutdowns; instead, weak associations are merged into stronger ones.

Meanwhile, thanks in part to the public's lack of concern, unqualified people can play with money in management posts—and "play" may be a mild word to use. I have seen a field covered with nothing but wild grasses that was certified by a savings and loan official to be a cluster of lots with completed houses; I have also seen the certificates the official issued—and the canceled checks cashed by a builder who was paid in full for what the association's directors were assured were houses ready for occupancy. The association was later stuck for the money. Officers of two associations have traded generous (and illegal) loans to each other. In another case, officers of a savings and loan have forced borrowers to take out insurance through them. The commissions from this coercive arrangement were not turned over to the association but were kept by the officers themselves.

Other cases of dishonesty could be reported, but it isn't only dishonesty that can cause trouble. The industry has grown very rapidly in recent years, and there is a shortage of competent management. In one association where builders were able to get improper payments, it was discovered that the disbursing officer was a former hotel clerk with no construction or escrow experience. In another recent case a savings association officer made a home loan to a widow on relief, though she obviously could not meet the payments. But at least that wasn't as bad as the bank loan made to a penniless mental patient out on a weekend pass from a state institution in Northern California.

One obstacle to providing adequate regulation is that savings and loan associations operate in a curious limbo when they deal with the Federal Home Loan Bank Board. Gareth W. Sadler, California's Savings and Loan Commissioner, told the Senate Banking Committee recently that the board's present powers are "too rigid and harsh." It cannot take mild action, Sadler protested, and all too often is left with no useful power except to terminate a firm's deposit insurance—"in effect a death threat to an insured association." Sadler said the Federal Home Loan Bank Board should be able to issue cease-and-desist orders to halt irresponsibile activities. He added the board should also have authority to oust savings and loan officers who persist in disobeying its orders.

Sadler has been able, through skillful use of the forced merger, to keep even the weakest savings and loan associations from the outright collapse suffered by two California banks in recent years—tiny Frontier Bank in Covelo in 1964 and San Francisco National Bank last year. There is no assurance, however, that the merger device would work in case of a really large-scale failure. Figures supplied to the Division of Savings and Loan by the state-chartered institutions do not indicate that any such collapse is imminent, but there are reports that some associations have developed the habit of rewriting or hiding bad loans to keep them from showing up on official reports as delinquent.

For many years, the savings and loan industry has been invaded by amateurs who have been able to get charters through political connections. Regulation has been ticklish in an industry where legislators, Congressmen and party officials may be found on boards of directors of savings associations. In the past, errors of judgment and lapses of good faith have been hidden by the growth of the housing market and the steady climb in real estate prices. Now the days of automatic profits are gone, and the crisis has arrived.

ALONE ON AN ELEPHANT

WILLIAM EASTLAKE

Mr. Eastlake, author among other books of The Bronc People (Harcourt Brace) and Castle Keep (Simon & Schuster), recently spent three months in Southeast Asia.

In Thailand, over station KAW, the king plays the saxophone. Where else can you get fighter planes overhead and the Little King beneath playing the saxophone?

While overhead the bombers drone
Beneath King Phumiphol plays the saxophone.

Some such doggerel as that went through my head to keep me from thinking about my fate. I was lost on an elephant. It started because I was showing off. Each morning Buttercup and I went into the jungle between Chiang Kham and Chiang Rai to check the fauna. Actually it is closer to the Burmese border town of Fang, but because Fang is an incredible name, and being lost on an elephant is incredible enough, I will avoid Fang.

Our jungle was a teak forest and our number one boy was a Meo tribesman. Like their elephants they tend to be curious and small. An Asiatic elephant is small compared to an African elephant, and the Meo people are small compared with the local Thai. Another odd fact that came to mind while lost on an elephant. The elephants of Chiang Rai speak an extinct Cambodian human language called Khmer, which was spoken during the flowering of Angkor Wat and disappeared along with that greatest of all civilizations. How does it happen that the elephants of Chiang Rai understand an extinct human tongue? Simply because ancient elephants were trained in this language and, as elephants live a long time, there is a large overlap into each succeeding generation of elephants, and the elephant trainers, realizing that the younger elephants must speak the same language as the older, continued to teach elephants the extinct human Cambodian language, Khmer.

I got lost on the elephant because I told our number one boy I wanted to try it myself. It was only a short 3-mile distance between the logging area and the base camp at Chiang Rai. For such a short distance we could dispense with the mahout. It was impossible for me to get lost, but I did. The elephant decided to go somewhere else, he didn't tell me where. I didn't speak Khmer. Anyway, getting there he got lost. That's my theory. That I was lost on an elephant is a fact. I realized that when we didn't cross the second river but climbed the green hills and disappeared in a northwesterly direction instead.

More thoughts alone on an elephant. I would keep my head. I would keep my head and not escalate. I would not panic. I would not bomb civilians. America had come to Asia to ride an elephant, the same elephant the French had failed to ride. But watch us. We could do it. It is only a short distance. When the elephant tried to go its own way we did not know the language or the customs. We beat the elephant. When it turned on us we bombed it. When that failed we bombed the elephants in another country saying that after all those elephants were helping these elephants. Finally, when nothing at all worked, we decided to risk a Third World War. Now every decent American knows that those who oppose this next logical step, this unavoidable step, are Nervous Nellies and probably in the pay of elephants. At this point there is no turning back. We must not only risk the final war but stop the blacks at home from attacking our rear, at the same time fighting inflation and getting to the moon. It is important at this time to spend $40 billion getting to the moon before other elephants get there. To hell with science, to hell with international cooperation. Ah comes from Texas and when we sets out to ride a horse we rides it. The same goes for an elephant.

I began by saying the Asiatic elephant spoke a strange language and is small as elephants go, but nevertheless, like the rest of us in the animal family, he has a mind of his own. To accomplish something you work with him, not against him. I knew my elephant was not going my way, but I didn't panic—close to it, but I didn't panic. We went on into the darkness, now ever more weird and strange, ever darker, and then abruptly and at once, and as though at the telescopic end of a long and distant tunnel, there were the lights of Chiang Rai. We got there the long way round, through a mysterious and unknown trail, known only to this elephant. But we got there. We got where we both wanted to go.

LETTERS

(continued from page 138)

checked with several doctors on this, including one expert New York pathologist. They all agree. On the basis of these checkpoints, you simply cannot establish the required downward trajectory were Kennedy hit by a shot fired from Oswald's window. The only way this could have happened, one expert pathologist points out, is if the President had been leaning forward at an angle of about 20 degrees when he was struck. But the Zapruder film shows clearly that he was upright, erect, waving to the crowds.

The schematic drawings by which the commission sought to reconcile the wounds with the projected downward trajectory were definitely falsified, either deliberately or possibly, though this seems difficult to believe, through asinine error. In these drawings the entrance wound was moved from Kennedy's back up onto his neck, as I pointed out in The Nation article, but I intensely dislike being ridiculed by Cohen and challenged to prove other and more extreme positions that I have not taken. Epstein, it is true, does intimate that the autopsy report was falsified, basing his reasoning on FBI reports dated more than a month later that conflict radically with the autopsy details; but, in my own work, I was more interested in trying to show what the evidence is, based on points that seem solidly established. Though I had what seemed to me a logical explanation for the failure to get a probe through the back neck wound, I did not go into this detail at the time because I was more interested in what seemed to me the vital points.

Fred J. Cook

begin at the beginning

Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIRS: . . . Ivan Boldizsar is so wrong* that we would have to go back to the beginnings of time and work our slow way forward for centuries before reaching a single point of agreement. I understand now why the Old Testament begins at the beginning. One could always reason thus with a Believer: "Dummy! it says thus and so about knowledge of good and evil." It was all laid out for one. But Mr. Boldizsar is the wrong sort of Believer.

I didn't attack Intellectuals. I attacked the subculture of literary intellectuals which breaks literature into pieces and appropriates it for its own purposes—ambition, career, exploitation, "theory." Mr. Boldizsar himself appropriated my speech for purposes of his own. . . .

Saul Bellow

---

*Ivan Boldizsar, deputy president of the Hungarian P.E.N. Club ["The View from the East," The Nation, July 11] commented upon Saul Bellow's keynote speech at the P.E.N. Congress: "I had heard the same superiority and irony, sometimes even the same arguments, against intellectuals in my own country in the early fifties."

sanity test

Swarthmore, Pa.

DEAR SIRS: Adolph Hitler was frequently described as "psychopathic" and "power mad." Whatever these terms may mean, there is no disputing that Hitler committed some of the most monstrous crimes in all history. Yet he could not have done so without the tacit acquiescence of the German people. Why did they not protest?

I suggest that the German people realized too late the true character of their leader. . . .When to protest publicly had come to mean not only ostracism but sure death, it was too late.

How can patriotic citizens tell, before it is too late, whether their beloved country is in the hands of a leader gone mad with power? For those citizens who accept the responsibility of "eternal vigilance," I offer some test questions. Is the government prone to undertake ill-justified military adventure? If so, does it engage in a policy of indiscriminate slaughter of the population of an all but helpless tiny nation? Is the government's war policy opposed, or perhaps only halfheartedly supported, by its traditional allies? Is the government steadily escalating the risk of world-wide catastrophe in pursuit of a trivial but tragic "victory" to be used for the leader's political aggrandizement at home? Is the leader usurping powers constitutionally reserved to a separate legislature? Are the leader and his executive apparatus deceiving the press and public? Are they attempting to intimidate critics by equating dissent with disloyalty?

Citizens of any country who do not wish their country to go the way of Germany under Hitler would be wise to ponder these questions before it is too late.

Carl Barus

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Akhmatova: Tragic Queen Anna

ALEXANDER WERTH

I had known Anna Akhmatova nearly all my life, but did not meet her personally until the summer of 1964. I did not simply call on her; I was "received in audience." She was not only a great lady; she was a queen. Though she was now 75, very stout and deformed by illness (her legs were terribly swollen and she had difficulty in walking), she still had a regal presence, with the same aquiline nose and the "haughty lips" described in her early love lyrics, written more than fifty years before. The setting in which she received me was far from palatial. It was summer; she was living in a ramshackle little wooden dacha in the pine wood at Komarovo on the Gulf of Finland, some 25 miles northwest of Leningrad. It was a setting she liked; she was near her beloved St. Petersburg-Leningrad—a theme and inspiration for both her happiest and her most tragic poems.

"Everything here will survive me," she wrote in "Komarovo," one of her late serene poems, "even the flimsy starling boxes, and the spring air blowing from across the sea." And of the pine woods: "And it seems so easy to go along that white road through the amethyst shadows, and leading I know not where. And further on, among the brighter tree trunks, it looks like the alley by the pond at Tsarskoye Selo." Here are intertwined themes of death and youth—the Tsarskoye Selo of her young days, residence of the Tsars, the town of young Pushkin, where in her own lifetime the poet Innokenti Annensky, her "master," taught at the local high school. Even in the tragic Requiem, on the Stalin terror, first published outside Russia in 1963, she contrasts the then with the now:

> Would you like to see, you giggly girl,
> You favorite of all your friends,
> You gay sinner of Tsarskoye Selo,
> What has happened to your life?
> Look at yourself: the three-hundredth > in the queue
> Outside the Kresty prison with your > parcel,
> And your hot tears are burning holes > in the New Year ice . . .
> Not a sound; but inside, behind those > walls,
> Innocent lives are coming to an end.

Of all her bitter experiences since the revolution, the Stalin—or, as she prefers to call it, the Yezhov—terror of the late 1930s, was the hardest to bear, when her only son was arrested and deported to a camp for more than fifteen years. The "new world" had not been kind to her. This is openly admitted in articles written in Soviet journals after her death. More independent-minded writers, among them Paustovsky, Tvardovsky and even Alexei Surkov speak of Akhmatova's "hard, female destiny," which she faced with courage and dignity, and of the "injustice and gross insult to which she was subjected." The reference is, of course, to Zhdanov's attack in 1946. Stalin's "cultural dictator" called her "a mixture of nun and harlot," and along with the satirist, Mikhail Zoshchenko, she was expelled from the Writers' Union. It was during the last years of her life that she was fully "rehabilitated" by the Soviet establishment and was elected to the Presidium of the Russian Writers' Union two years ago. She was allowed to receive belated recognition abroad; last year she was awarded Italy's Etna-Taormina Prize, and given an honorary degree at Oxford. Even the official obituary published by the Writers' Union paid tribute to a "remarkable Soviet poet":

> For more than half a century she devoted herself to the noble service of Russian poetic speech, of the homeland, and of Soviet society building a new world.

Indeed, she became "accepted" to such an extent that the authorities turned a blind eye to the publication abroad of Requiem, "without the author's knowledge or consent," as stated by the Munich publisher. It could, after all, be regarded as an anti-Stalin, rather than an anti-Soviet poem; even so, some of its lines are too strong for publication in the USSR. She speaks of her "tormented mouth, through which a hundred million people cry":

> In those days, happy to be left in > peace,
> Only the dead smiled.
> And like a useless appendix to its > prisons,
> Leningrad swayed in the wind.
> Insane in their torment the regiments > of the condemned marched away,
> And the engines' whistles alone sang > their short farewell song.
> The deadly stars shone above us,
> And innocent Russia writhed in her > agony
> Under the bloodstained policemen's > boots
> And under the tires of the Black > Marias.

Akhmatova was happiest in her youth, before the revolution, and she scarcely ever made any secret of it. She loved Russia, but was always out of step with the Soviet Union except—and the exception is significant—during World War II when "Russia" and the "Soviet Union" became one for her. Blok, Bryusov, Mayakovsky and Pasternak "accepted" the revolution, each in his own way—some, like Pasternak, only halfheartedly; but Akhmatova was never at home with it. In two or three strange little poems written in the early twenties she tried to work up faith and some enthusiasm, but it did not last and the regime gave her no encouragement. But her profound love of Russia continued all her life; in 1917, she wrote a poem in which she squarely rejected the émigré way; and in 1957, she added these lines to Requiem:

> No, I lived not under foreign skies;
> I did not shelter under foreign wings;
> I even then stayed with my people,
> There where, unhappily, my people > lived.

After she was 65, she wrote what will probably rank as her greatest poetry. Unlike her early love lyrics, unlike her tragic, intensely bitter Requiem, unlike her war poems with their exaltation, pathos and infinite human pity—above all, for the martyred children of Leningrad—her last poems are marked by the serenity, wisdom and resignation of old age. They combine a deep love of art, music, nature and, again St. Petersburg-Leningrad and Tsarskoye Selo, the one associated with her whole life, the other with her happy youth. Many of these poems are extremely subtle, using the same play of unexpected associations as does Innokenti Annensky, a name that is frequently recalled and whose influence is even stronger here than in any of her early poems. She also completed "A Poem Without a Hero," which she had begun some twenty years before. She calls its shadowy visions of the past "an infernal harlequinade"; in the introductory part she pokes fun at her Soviet editor:

> And he grumbled: "It's got three sub- > jects,
> And, having read it to the end, I > still can't imagine
> Who's in love with whom, and who > met, and where and why,

Who's alive and who is dead,
Who is author, and who is hero;
And, anyway, who wants today
All these discussions about a poet
And all these swarms of phantoms?"

Parts of this poem were published in the Den' Poezii annual in 1962 and 1963, while the shorter poems, originally published mostly in Zvezda and Novy Mir, have been assembled in the first of two volumes recently published in Munich, and edited by Prof. Gleb Struve and B. Filippov.

Neither the "Poem Without a Hero" nor the short poems of the last ten years are "easy" reading (as Requiem is), and it is difficult to explain to non-Russian readers their verbal beauty, laconic conciseness and frequent "mysteriousness." There is little hope that they can be worthily translated, except by a very great poet. How, indeed, "explain" Akhmatova's own favorite cycle of very short poems, Midnight Verses written in 1963-64, such as "Midnight Visit," beginning:

You will not wait for me long
On asphalt pavements with their autumn leaves.
We shall meet in Vivaldi's Adagio again.
And again the candles will be dimly yellow
And enwrapped in sleep.
But no violin will ask you how you entered
Into my midnight home. . . .

All this was written at the end of a very long literary career, but one marked by tragically long gaps. It must have been in 1914 or 1915, as a youngster, that I first heard of Akhmatova. My uncle, Peter Naumov, was a literary critic and contributor to Apollon, the avant-garde literary and art magazine of the St. Petersburg of those days—a superbly produced monthly with its Dobuzhinsky cover and its color plates of Cézanne, Matisse and Picasso (these were almost unknown names in Russia then), and of modern Russian painters. Apollon also published some of the newest Russian poetry, including that of a poet of genius, Innokenti Annensky, who had died in 1909, and that of his "Acmeist" followers, such as Nikolai Gumilev and his young wife, Anna Akhmatova. My uncle, returning from an Apollon reception, was completely under the spell of this dazzling pair—who had come to be known as Gumi-lev and Gumi-lvitsa—Gumi-lion and Gumi-lioness. "A lioness," he said, "a queen!"

Only 300 copies had been published of Akhmatova's first book of poems, Evening; but her second book, The Rosary, printed in 1914, became immensely popular, especially with women readers who were fascinated by the music of her verse, its epigrammatic conciseness, and by her strangely varying female moods, ranging from feminine humility to haughtiness and feminist arrogance; from timid uncertainty to full self-assurance; from sensuality to a kind of intellectually amorous detachment. Those years of the First World War were the years of Akhmatova's greatest popularity and success.

It was fashionable, in the Stalin days, to recall Maxim Gorki's statement that the last fifteen years before the revolution were the most "shameful" period in Russian literature. It may have suffered from a certain escapism, which was not characteristic of classical Russian 19th-century literature. But the fact remains that with Bryusov, Balmont, Blok, Annensky, Belyi, Sologub, Vyacheslav Ivanov, Gumilev, Akhmatova, the young Mayakovsky and many others, it was one of the most excitingly creative periods, especially in poetry. Russian painting, under French influence, also broke new ground for the first time; while music, after Scriabin, the last of the Romantics, gave way to the vigorous young Stravinsky and Prokofiev. This was the world to which Akhmatova belonged; all her life she continued to think of it with nostalgia.

Like Shakespeare's sonnets, Akhmatova's love lyrics are something of a mystery: to whom are they addressed? Is their hero Gumilev, as is sometimes obvious; or did "the gay sinner of Tsarskoye Selo" have other heroes, as seems equally obvious? Was Blok one of them? People who knew them both have assured me that there never was a Blok-Akhmatova love affair, though the enmity between Gumilev and Blok was notorious. Was the mutual dislike merely literature—the "neoclassicism" of the Acmeists being, at least in part, a reaction against the more nebulous type of symbolist verse so typical of the earlier Blok? But unlike Gumilev, Akhmatova admired Blok, both as a poet and a person.

In her third book of poems, The White Flock, the love lyrics are interspersed with numerous poems on the destiny of Russia and St. Petersburg. The First World War filled her with anxiety and deep misgivings about Russia's future. There are very few references to the revolution in the poems written between 1917 and 1925, except for some significant attempts to "accept" it. On the other hand, there are hints of its evil and destructive nature, such as a description of the 1917 crowds carrying funeral banners "with sinister laughing skulls." But time and time again, there recur in her 1917-25 poems, the themes of Russia and St. Petersburg, the sunny, classical, harmonious St. Petersburg of Pushkin with the ghostly, almost surrealist St. Petersburg of Dostoevsky and the eerie, "condemned" St. Petersburg of Belyi and Annensky. And "condemned" it seemed, for in 1918-22 it was the City of Famine, as it was to become again—though on a much more fearful scale—during World War II.

Discouraged, apparently, by Soviet publishers, Akhmatova wrote very little original verse (she wrote literary studies and translations instead) between 1925 and the end of the 1930s. Subsequently, she produced Requiem, not to be published until 1963. Then came World War II. Like many other Soviet intellectuals, Akhmatova deeply felt the tragedy of Western Europe, and wrote two famous poems, one on the Nazi occupation of Paris, the other on the London blitz. The invasion of Russia called out some of her most moving and deeply inspired poems, such as "Courage," on the Russian people's determination to save their country, their language and their civilization. These war poems are about the bravery and suffering of Russia and her "ordinary" people; there is not a word about rulers. A small volume of her selected poems was published in Tashkent in 1943 and, no doubt with a touch of bitter humor, she had managed to slip into it one poem from Requiem—on the deportation of her son, but, taken out of context, it was unintelligible.

Even so, by the end of the war all seemed well. In 1945, she wrote March of Time, with its amazing opening poem on St. Petersburg and Dostoevsky. It was published that year (with some cuts) in Leningrad; some of it the authorities must have thought impertinent. And then, in September, 1946, there was a Poets' Evening in Moscow, to which I went. The crowds of young people, tired of the "ham" poetry written by the official poets, pointedly ignored these, and staged a tremendous ovation in honor of Pasternak and Akhmatova, both of whom were there. The demonstration did not pass unnoticed ("this will lead to no good," Akhmatova remarked when the evening was over) and shortly afterward Zhdanov got busy on the writers first, then the film directors and, finally, in 1948, the composers. Akhmatova and Zoshchenko were the first victims of that hideous postwar "cultural purge." For several years after, she lived in Leningrad in silence and great poverty. It was not until 1950 that Surkov, then editor of Ogonyok, published a few (admittedly rather conventional) poems of hers on the revival of Leningrad.

She did not, to any great extent, resume writing until 1956-58; and it was during this "second birth," as Professor Struve calls it, that she wrote some of her most remarkable poetry. Ostensibly, she had made her peace with the Soviet world in the more tolerant, more liberal atmosphere of the Khrushchev period. Magazine editors were eager to publish her new works and selections of her earlier poetry were reprinted in many thousands of copies. Her early love lyrics (of which she herself latterly spoke with some disdain) became immensely popular with millions of young Russians.

Though she had made an uneasy peace with the Soviet system I could feel on that day at Komarovo that there was much she could never forgive and forget. Her bitterness was reflected in some unpublished poems she showed me. In one she likened the last fifty years of her life to Kafka's Trial.

When I asked her whether Requiem (which had just appeared abroad) would be published in Russia, she simply said: "What does it matter? Hundreds of thousands of people, most of whom had never even heard of me, have read it in typescript or handwritten copies. There are thousands of copies circulating in Moscow, Leningrad and all over Russia." Of present-day Soviet poetry she did not think much, and was even rather hard on Yevtushenko and Voznesensky. "Good showmen," she said, and envied them their platform effects and their capacity of attracting to their "poetry readings" 10,000 to 15,000 young people. "But great poetry—no. There are some better poets than they in Russia and, above all, many young poets of whom hardly anybody has ever heard since they don't get published." She clearly thought of herself as the last of the great Russian poets, and spoke with strange warmth and affection, using first names, of the last "big three" who had died: Osip, Boris and Marina—that is, Mandelstam, Pasternak and Cvetaeva. Although her marriage to Gumilev had ended in divorce after six years (a few years later, in 1920, Gumilev was to be shot as a counterrevolutionary), she spoke of him with affection and admiration, always referring to him oddly as Nikolai Stepanovich.

Her first posthumous "gesture" was significant: like Pasternak, she had asked to be given an Orthodox Church funeral. Whether she was genuinely religious or not, the Church belonged to that "other," more archaic Russia to which, at heart, she too had always belonged. Not Tsarist Russia (for she never cared about the Tsar), but the Russia that somehow goes on under any government, and from which, unlike her émigré admirers, she refused ever to be separated. This catlike devotion to her "home" is more typically Russian than is often supposed

The book that predicted the Hanoi-Haiphong bombings–and warns of the consequences of escalation

THIS remarkable document—by a former assistant to Presidents Kennedy and Johnson—will please neither professional "hawks" nor militant "doves." It is a book addressed rather to a middle-group of deeply concerned Americans who see their nation moving into ever deeper involvement in a war they cannot understand.

Originally published in a historic issue of The New Yorker, this is a report on the official decisions and private miscalculations that have led to this nation's present dilemma in Vietnam.

TRIUMPH OR TRAGEDY not only reveals the risks involved in continued escalation, including the danger of direct conflict with China. It also gives bold and specific alternatives and recommendations for consideration now.

This book may startle some. It may infuriate others. But, as James A. Wechsler says, "Few documents raise more haunting questions about the Vietnam war." TRIUMPH OR TRAGEDY poses a challenge that must be met by every thoughtful American.

TRIUMPH OR TRAGEDY

By RICHARD N. GOODWIN

Including selections of crucial background material, such as the various proposals made by Washington, Hanoi and the South Vietnamese National Liberation Front, a statement by President Johnson, the text of the SEATO Treaty, and a catalogue of predictions about the war made by French and American officials. Now at your bookstore. Cloth $3.95; Vintage Book paperback $1.45 abroad. There are many other "Akhmatovas," especially among the Russian intellectuals. Thousands went to her funeral; among them were many young Soviet poets, including Andrei Voznesensky. Several of them are studying her superb craftsmanship. But whether her death marks the end of an epoch and a tradition no one can yet say. Even in recent years she was no more than tolerated by the "ideologists," and will no doubt be more frowned upon than ever after the Siniavsky-Daniel trial and the 23rd Congress. It is uncertain whether Requiem and her unpublished poems will see the light of day in any foreseeable future. But who can say what is going on among those "real" young poets whom she mentioned to me and whose names she would not reveal?

RANDOM HOUSE

Sholokhov and the Nobel Prize

EDWARD J. BROWN

Mr. Brown is chairman and professor, Department of Slavic Languages, University of Indiana. His most recent book is Stankevich and His Moscow Circle: 1830-1840 (Stanford University Press).

When the Nobel Prize was awarded recently to Mikhail Sholokhov, a writer was honored who has been an active and loyal member of the Communist Party since 1932. In this role he was always ready to carry out "tasks" in defense or explanation of official policy, able to change his views and emend his literary texts and to be eloquent in castigating heresy and heretics. It would be an absurd mistake to count him among the Soviet liberals, or to suppose that his little village of Veshenskaia in the Don country is a refuge from activity and from metropolitan politics. He has seldom known peace or sought refuge, and the record of his life is one of deliberate engagement, in the Soviet meaning of that term.

Before he was 15, war and revolution had brought his secondary education to an abrupt close; apart from brief attendance at a "workers' school" (rabfak) in Moscow, there is no record that he continued his education. He has not been reluctant, however, to educate others: "When I was fifteen," he wrote in his autobiography, "I taught adults in the program for liquidating illiteracy." At about the same age he volunteered as a member of a "grain detachment" which operated in the Don region, searching out and confiscating hidden food stores in peasant villages. In 1930, he was very responsive to the party's propaganda needs, and interrupted his work on The Quiet Don to write the first part of a long novel on collectivization, Virgin Soil Upturned.

It is true that on a number of occasions Sholokhov intervened vigorously to correct injustices in local Communist administration, and Khrushchev revealed that during the days of the great purge Sholokhov once wrote a frank letter to Stalin protesting events in the south. However, there is no record that he protested when literary comrades met death or banishment during the same period. On the contrary, as one of the distinguished speakers at a Congress of the Communist Party in 1939, he supported the literary terror. "The ranks of Soviet literature," he said, "now purged of enemies, are stronger and healthier."

After the death of Stalin, Sholokhov was again selected to address a Party Congress, the Twentieth or "de-Stalinization" Congress, where his speech was in large part a racily idiomatic attack on Stalinist literary administrators, two of whom, Surkov and Fadeev, he named and covered with contempt. That remarkable speech, along with other statements of a similar nature, seemed to place Sholokhov in the liberal camp during the early years of the "thaw." However, in moments of crisis, in 1957 when Dudintsev and the editors of Literary Moscow were under attack, and in 1958 when Pasternak was in trouble, Sholokhov made no effective use of his name and political power. In April of this year, in a speech delivered at the Twenty-Third Congress of the Communist Party, Sholokhov referred to Siniavsky and Daniel as > . . . writers who write one thing at home and something quite different abroad. They use in both cases the same Russian language, but in the one case they use it to mask themselves, and in the other to blacken that very language because of their malice and their hatred for everything Soviet, for everything that we hold precious and holy. . . .

>
> I am one of those who are proud of being a son of this fine and mighty motherland. . . . How should I react at the behavior of traitors who raise their hand against what is so dear to us?

Sholokhov's behavior has often been repugnant, and we may be certain that liberal Soviet intellectuals felt dismay at the honor paid him by the Swedish Academy. But perhaps we should make an effort to understand him. His commitment to party and government has always translated easily into terms of conventional Russian patriotism, and that patriotism has sometimes been strong enough in him to justify actions that may seem to us reprehensible.

Sholokhov is a prime illustration of an elementary principle in literary criticism: that the man and his work must be judged by very different criteria. The artist is something like a priest of the old dispensation who, even though subject to temptation and sin, still disposed of the sacraments and of divine grace. Sholokhov's rich natural endowment of imagination and linguistic power has enabled him to produce, in The Quiet Don, a work that possesses power, scope and verbal beauty. His rudeness and relative lack of education, his innocence of literary culture, his remoteness from the intellectual life of Paris or London—all of this has been a source of strength to him as an artist. I do not mean to suggest that we should think of him in quasi-Rousseauistic terms as an unspoiled, untutored natural genius who appeared in some happy hinterland. The case is much more subtle and more complex, for Sholokhov is not at all the pure product of nature but of a particular political and literary culture.

As a literary phenomenon he belongs both to the October Revolution and the period of Russian modernism. He cannot be imagined apart from the "proletarian" literary movement of the twenties, and at that time, like many another novus homo produced in the proletarian milieu, he received an ad hoc literary education in the principles of Marxist literary creation and in the "craft" of writing. As a member of the Russian Association of Proletarian Writers he was subjected to reiterated preachment of the so-called "living-man" doctrine, actually a set of precepts for new writers which would enable them, the leaders hoped, to depict the "dialectical" movement of history in the direction of communism, while avoiding propagandist distortion. One requirement of the proletarian school was that since life is a process of "dialectical" development, the writer should discover the conflict of opposites not only in the social group but in individual men. No absolutes in the world of literary characters could be tolerated since all "living men" are mixtures of historically "good" and historically "bad" qualities. Created under the aegis of the "living man," the central character in The Quiet Don, Grigorii Melekhov, exhibits the tragic predicament of an insoluble inner conflict: he joins the Reds, deserts them for the Whites and in the end returns defeated to his home and his village where a colorless but well-organized man who is in step with "history," Mishka Koshevoi, holds the "Soviet" power firmly in his hands.

The concept of the "positive hero," a model of revolutionary virtue who was later to play such a malodorous role in Soviet literature, was not favored in the twenties by the school to which Sholokhov belonged. It was believed, with some justice, that even a proletarian Communist should not be shown as all good, but should exhibit a few traits that are historically backward. And the bourgeois, though a class enemy, should never be portrayed as all bad. "That would not be true to life, comrades," pontificated the youthful theoretician, V. Yermilov. This lesson at least Sholokhov did learn, and because he learned it so well The Quiet Don is a very fine book. We recall the quietly fierce scene in which the Bolshevik leader Podtyolkov commits a massacre of White officers. The sparse, syntactically bare sentences that describe that event seem to pass no judgment upon it but do carry an overtone of aversion:

> Cut the bastards down! All of them! No prisoners! Give it to them right in the guts!
>
> There was a feverish rattling of shots. The officers rushed apart. A second lieutenant with fine feminine eyes, in a scarlet officer's hood, grabbed at his head and ran a few steps. A bullet sent him leaping into the air, like a man jumping over a fence. He fell, and didn't get up. Two men cut down a tall, handsome captain. He reached for the sword blades and blood flowed from his cut palms onto his sleeves. . . .

The Cossack village, the structural center of the novel, forms a knot of conflicting loyalties, ideas and emotions. Sholokhov creates a vivid sense of tangled historical movement: issues are never clear, motives are shifting and uncertain, world politics is experienced in terms of local hatred and fear, and passions spin the plot. The force that drives Sholokhov's hero in The Quiet Don is an overmastering love for his married neighbor, Aksinia, whose passion is at least equal to his. The pain of her love is surprisingly acute in the following passage. She is consulting the village witch in the hope of discovering a spell that will bind Grigorii to her:

> I yearn for him, grandma darling. I can see I'm pining to death. I sew myself a skirt, but it's too small. I get bigger every day. . . . When he passes our yard my heart burns in me. . . . I want to fall down in front of him. I want to kiss the place where he puts his feet. . . . Help me, sweetheart! Help me, darling! I'll pay you anything. I'll give you my best blouse, only help me!

Even the Communist characters are subject to the vagaries of passion. The following passage (which Sholokhov deleted in later editions) reveals the Communist leader Bunchuk's desperate reaction to the news of his beloved Anna's death:

> Like a blind man he ran into the gate, gave a hollow cry, fell down . . . and crawled along the ground on all fours, moving faster and faster, his face almost touching the ground.

The proletarian literary milieu of the twenties tended to be artistically conservative, calling for the revival of realism and a "new Leo Tolstoy." One of the fruits of this search was, in part at least, Sholokhov's The Quiet Don; but the relationship of that novel to Tolstoy's epic of war and peace is complex and curious, and reveals Sholokhov as a somewhat anomalous product of the "modernist" twenties. Sholokhov's wonderful originality results from his having combined, quite innocently, elements from opposed and seemingly incompatible literary schools. Not only did he succeed in answering the demand of his Communist contemporaries for a great realistic epic; he also produced a modern novel whose prose style is marked by highly mannered linguistic devices, echoing nonrealists such as Bely, Zamiatin, Vsevolod Ivanov, Babel and Pilnyak. What gives his book its idiosyncratic character is the symbiosis of two normally distinct literary styles:

> Dunyasha was bouncing along on the buckboard, and her happy eyes surveyed the meadow and the people they passed on the road. Her face, very gay with its sunburn and freckles, seemed to be saying, "I feel so fine and lighthearted because the day, touched with bluing by the cloudless sky, is also fine and lighthearted, and

SELECTED WORKS OF

MAO TSE-TUNG

Volumes I-IV

(ENGLISH EDITION)

Volume I contains 17 of Comrade Mao Tse-tung's writings during the First Revolutionary Civil War Period (1924-1927 and the Second Revolutionary Civil War Period (1927-1937).

Volume II contains 40 of Comrade Mao Tse-tung's writings covering the period from the outbreak of the War of Resistance Against Japan in July 1937 to the repulse of Chian Kai-shek's second anti-Communist onslaught in May 1941.

Volume III contains 31 of Comrade Mao Tse-tung's writings of the period from March 1941 to the victorious conclusion of the War of Resistance Against Japan in August 1945. An appendix contains the Resolution on Certain Questions in the History of Our Party, adopted at the Enlarged Seventh Plenary Session of the Sixth Central Committee of the Communist Party of China.

Volume IV contains 70 of Comrade Mao Tse-tung's writings during the period from August 1945 to September 1949. This is the period of the Chinese People's War of Liberation.

		Cloth	Cardboard
Volume I	348 pages	$4.25	$2.75
Volume II	472 pages	4.25	2.75
Volume III	344 pages	4.25	2.75
Volume IV	460 pages	4.25	2.75

Published by: FOREIGN LANGUAGES PRESS
Peking, China

Order from:

CHINA ARTS & CRAFTS, Ltd.
33 East Hastings Street
VANCOUVER 4, B.C. CANADA

because my own heart is clear and pure. I'm happy and I need nothing else."

There are direct echoes of Tolstoy in such passages as this; more important, Sholokhov is consciously using a characteristic device of the master, one which as far as I recall has not yet been adequately named. This device involves affectation of an authorial omniscience which encompasses not only external and visible actions with their concomitant mental states, and not only the past, present and future of his characters but also their immediate relationship to a moral universe. But the diction is that of a local dialect; one doubts that in the whole of Tolstoy anyone would be found "bouncing along on a buckboard" (the word is gryadushka, not to be found in the standard dictionaries, and quite inadequately translated here as "buckboard"). The central metaphor, "touched with bluing," comes from a poetic universe alien to the style of Tolstoy, in whose very infrequent metaphors the figure usually denigrates rather than enhances its subject. In the battle scenes, Sholokhov often uses the Tolstoyan trick of estrangement to create an impression of violent confusion; he reflects qua author on the meaning of events, though much less systematically than did Tolstoy; he has created a narrative movement which, very much like that in War and Peace, carries the reader back and forth from the "home" of his characters (the Cossack village of Tatarsk) to the battlefields and the capitals.

The Quiet Don abounds with efforts at direct imitation of Tolstoy, and if it is a great book part of the reason may be that sensitive reminiscences of Tolstoy's artistry, quaintly offered in a modern accent, are scattered through its pages. At the same time Sholokhov was undergoing the influence of the formalist critics and theoreticians whose ideas had much to do with the development of prose fiction in the twenties. In 1923, Osip Brik, a formalist who wrote scornful satires of the contemporary epigones of Tolstoy, lectured on the art of writing to Sholokhov and other members of the "Young Guard," a group of Communist and near-Communist writers. One of Sholokhov's comrades recalled that Brik lectured on "plot development" and assigned an exercise in the writing of a story with "reverse effect." According to the memoirist, Sholokhov showed special interest and skill in this project.

Even if no such anecdote existed we could be certain from Sholokhov's work —especially the early stories and the first three of the four volumes which make up The Quiet Don — that he took an eager part in the stylistic experimentation of the twenties. We find numerous passages consisting of rhythmic, emotive or broken sentences, laced with simile and metaphor, some of which might have been written by Babel or Zamiatin. It is interesting to compare a passage from Volume II of The Quiet Don with the opening sentences of Zamiatin's story, Three Days:

> Sholokhov: Nineteen sixteen. October. Night. Rain and wind. Trenches in swampland, overgrown with alders. In the trenches cold, wet mud. A few fires in the dugouts.

> Zamiatin: Sun, sand, swarthy Arabs, sand, camels, palms, sand, cactus. Somewhere else there are not Arabs but Turks.

Zamiatin continues in his story to present fragmented impressionistic pictures, while Sholokhov soon returns to a realistic style; but Sholokhov quite frequently abandons the sober syntax of objective description to offer prose effects intended to elicit an emotional response. His rhythmic, emotional, at times impressionistic, prose is ornamented with striking and elaborate figures. He is close kin to those "ornamentalist" writers of the twenties whose language, like stained glass, may be appreciated for itself rather than for what it tells or reveals: the front in 1916 settles down like a "many-miled, unyielding snake"; the heat-burdened earth is "sown with grains" of rain; the ravaged meadowland "stirs and sighs" under the sickles; the young men of the village in a curious throng surround a platoon of soldiers

GIVE ME PEACE

ANDREI VOZNESENSKY

Give me quietness and peace . . .
My nerves are badly burnt, I guess,
give me peace . . .

Let the pine tree slowly shift its shadow which tickles us as it goes down our backs all the way to our toes with a kind of cooling mischief.
Give us peace . . .

All sounds have ceased.
Why put in words the iridescence of your eyebrows? You nod in silence.
Give us peace.

Sound travels much slower than light: let's give our tongues a rest —in any case, essentials are nameless, better rely on feeling and color.

The skin is also human, dear, with sensations peculiar to it:
a finger's touch is music to it,
like a nightingale's song to the ear.

What's with you windbags back at home?
Still shouting blue murder and fussing?
Still raising hell about nothing?
Leave us alone . . .

. . . we're deep in something else,
immersed in nature's inscrutable ways.
From an acrid smell of smoke we surmise that the shepherds are back from the hills.

It's dusk. They're cooking their suppers and smoking, each as hushed as his shadow, and like flames of cigarette lighters the silent tongues of sheep dogs glow.

Translated by MAX HAYWARD

Reprinted from Antiworlds. Edited by Patricia Blake and Max Hayward. Basic Books. 120 pp. $4.95.

"like a brightly colored belt"; the dawn pecks "star-grain" from the sky; days at the front are "gelded" by boredom; Aksinia's heaving breast is "like a bustard in a net."

It would seem very nearly blasphemous to Soviet critics should we compare Sholokhov to his contemporary Pilnyak, but the comparison is helpful. Like Pilnyak he uses the skaz technique (a story told by one of its characters). Also, like Pilnyak, he variegates his narrative by the inclusion of "documentary" material. He gives us folk songs of the Don region, charms against love, charms to produce love, soldiers' doggerel, letters written by various characters in a great variety of styles, prayers for protection against harm that were written out and carried into battle by Russian soldiers, prayers so ancient that they speak of battle-axes and arrows. He includes a lengthy diary recounting a young soldier-student's unsuccessful love affair, many official orders and directives, revolutionary pamphlets, items from revolutionary newspapers of the period, proclamations of White generals, and a document that purports to be a word-for-word copy of the decision to execute all eighty members of Podtyolkov's detachment, giving the reasons for the decision, the full names of twenty White officers who signed the document along with the names of the eighty Bolsheviks who were executed, the town from which each one came, and the method of execution. These documents take up almost three pages in large format. A similar document, one which carries an equal load of historical pathos, contains a list of people arrested in Tatarsk as enemies of the Soviet regime, with their names, patronymics and family names, and the reason for the arrest of each one. Grigorii Melekhov's name appears on that list, and the reason given for his arrest: "An officer. Against us. Dangerous."

One of the most charming of Sholokhov's devices is the controlled lyrical outburst. Such passages retard the action and provide the reader with a pause for reflective rumination. They stir him to think of the tragic fate of man in war and revolution. They evoke an enigmatic image of nature—injured, passive and indifferent. They attempt to reveal the true character of the folk and reflect upon it. They carry the author's delight in simple goodness and his revulsion at wickedness. Unlike the self-consciously literary lyrical digressions to be found in Pilnyak or Bely, they convey a strong sense of primitive epic art. Sholokhov's art is a complex and curious texture, composed of many and various cultural strands.

His second novel, Virgin Soil Upturned, is an aborted roman à thèse. It seems proper to call the novel "aborted" for a number of reasons. In the first place it does not quite carry out the simple didactic purpose which Sholokhov seems to have imposed upon himself. The "text" upon which the novel was based, Stalin's curiously titled speech, "Dizziness from Success," deplored the resistance to collectivization among the peasants and blamed that resistance on the hasty zeal of individual party members who tried to collectivize all aspects of farming according to a rigidly theoretical plan. Some of the points made in Stalin's speech are faithfully developed in the novel in the form of character and situation, but Sholokhov added the third dimension of peasant life and character. No reader of his novel can miss the point that the chief reason for the failure of collectivization was the peasant's stubborn attachment to "his own" things, however sparse and poor those things might be. One of the loyal members of the collective, Maidannikov, says:

> I'm sick at heart for my bullocks, and I'm sorry for them. . . . They don't get the care they ought to get. And Akim Beskhlebnov chafed my horse's neck with the collar during the harrowing. When I noticed it I couldn't eat all day because of it. Is it right to put a big collar on a small horse? And that's why I can't join. If I still haven't got rid of my desire for my property it means my conscience won't allow me to join the party.

There is an element of tragedy in Virgin Soil Upturned that relates it clearly to The Quiet Don. In the latter, Melekhov is the best and most courageous, the handsomest and freest, perhaps even the most sensitive of the characters we meet. The reader respects him and suffers with him. Yet he is defeated by much lesser men who have cast their lot with the "collective." And similarly in Virgin Soil Upturned the individual farmers who are either dispossessed or turned into enemies are men who had worked hard and well to build their own lives. The histories of Titok and Ostrovnov are portrayed as instances of tragedy: the most determined enemies of the Soviet regime in the countryside, the men "condemned by history," are the best and most dependable workers.

There was a long delay in the publication of the second part of Virgin Soil Upturned (it was not finished until 1959); and Sholokhov experienced difficulty with literary authorities over certain passages. According to some sources, changes were forced upon him, and in its final form his novel—which in its first part had a touch of greatness—degenerates into a stale and depressing yarn about an agricultural anti-

THE CENTENNIAL REVIEW
VOL. X, NO. 3 SUMMER 1966
Urbanism Issue

KENNETH BURKE
As the Curtain Rises

SANFORD S. FARNESS
Modern Man and the Future Environment

GARRETT ECKBO
The Quality of Urbanization

JACK JONES
Depth Conservationism: A Post-Marxist Ideology?

CHARLES W. BARR
Administrative Organization As One of the Important Factors in Regional Development

FREDERICK M. LOGAN
A Mid-West City: Survivor of Growth and Change

JAMES B. MCKEE
Urbanism and the Problem of Social Order

DENNIS MCELRATH
The New Urbanization

• • •

Subscription rates:
$1.00 each for single copies
$3.00 a year (4 issues); $5.00 for two years
Available at bookstores or from 110 Morrill Hall,
Michigan State University,
E. Lansing, Mich. 48823

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. [illegible]

The Best Way To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 8-22-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME ______
ADDRESS ______
CITY ______
STATE ______ ZIP NO. ______

Soviet conspiracy instigated by foreign and domestic enemies. Some say that in his rejected version the Communist hero Davydov, after years of faithful work, was to have faced trial on a false charge in the middle thirties. Whether that story is true or not there is no question that in the second part Sholokhov abandoned tragedy for crude melodrama, and the book is readable only because of Sholokhov's never-failing supply of anecdote and humor.

We may very well ask whether The Quiet Don deserved the Nobel Prize, and how that novel compares to another Prize winner, Pasternak's Doctor Zhivago. Both Sholokhov and Pasternak wrote their novels in Russia at approximately the same time (Zhivago was in large part produced during the thirties), and both wrote about war, the revolution and the Russian civil war; yet the two novels seem to belong to different orders of being. It is not at all surprising that Sholokhov should have referred to Pasternak as a "hermit crab" and it is fairly certain that, had they ever met, they would have found it difficult to communicate. The pluses in Sholokhov's world become minuses in the world of Pasternak. For Sholokhov the firm ground of art is something he calls "the people"—not the vaguely idealized populist generalization of the early Romantics, nor the bearers of revolutionary energy apotheosized by the Narodniks, nor, of course, the humble conservators of a Russian Christ, as Dostoevsky imagined them.

Sholokhov's power arises from the fact that as an artist he abandons generalization and avoids stereotypes. His Cossack "folk" is not in any sense a monolith but is broken up into innumerable, vivid and interesting human likenesses. But there is one kind of human personality almost completely absent from the world Sholokhov portrays, the kind that is central to the world of Pasternak—the intellectual. In The Quiet Don we see intellectuals of a sort, but see them dimly, as though through a veil: Mokhov the merchant ponderously reading the magazine Russkoe Bogatstvo; Stockmann, who is a Bolshevik and with whom we are supposed to sympathize; the young Moscow student whom we meet as a battlefield corpse and whose diary is full of poetic allusions; but not one of them is fully alive as a character.

The exact opposite is true of Doctor Zhivago. The hero is a doctor and a poet, and the novel creates a sense of elation because, in spite of the ugliness of his local reality, the poet has the power to create in his art a pure vision of beauty, distilled in the set of poems with which the novel closes. These are fashioned out of literary, religious and philosophical imagery: Hamlet, Christ in Gethsemane, the fairytale heroes of Western folklore. The Bolsheviks and the "masses" on the other hand are seen "through a glass, darkly." We see them as Pasternak does, occupied with inhuman business of some kind, but blind to the reality so clearly perceived by Zhivago. In the person of Liberius, the partisan leader, with his fund of political clichés, they bore us. And the "mass" is alive and interesting only in the poetic accents of popular speech. It would be hard to imagine a sharper contrast both in idea and in style than that between Doctor Zhivago and The Quiet Don.

As a cultural phenomenon Sholokhov is hardly a distant relative of Pasternak, and as an artist he is grossly inferior to him. And yet The Quiet Don does deserve special recognition for its scope and power, and especially for the author's effort to present fresh and original pictures of the Cossack country and the Cossack milieu. His avoidance of stereotype and of propaganda made it possible for him to create a book which, even though he insists it is "Socialist Realism," is still valid in our terms as art.

The Uses of Dostoevsky

DOSTOEVSKY AND ROMANTIC REALISM: A Study of Dostoevsky in Relation to Balzac, Dickens, and Gogol. By Donald Fanger. Harvard University Press. 302 pp. $7.50.

SIMON KARLINSKY

Associate professor of Slavic languages and literature at the University of California, Mr. Karlinsky is currently a visiting professor at Harvard. His book, Marina Cvetaeva: Her Life and Art, will be published in September by the University of California Press.

Realism can be a terribly empty word when applied to Russian literature. Endlessly reiterated in every imaginable context by native Russian critics for more than a century, the term has rubbed off almost universally and become a sort of meaningless ornamental epithet, invariably encountered on dust jackets and paperback covers of any 19th-century Russian classic in translation. The author of a recent study entitled Introduction to Russian Realism, Ernest J. Simmons, discusses the realism of Pushkin and Gogol, of Chekhov and Sholokhov, without bothering once to define what he means by the term, or to indicate that if the word "realistic" is used to describe the literary method of Gogol, for example, it cannot possibly be meaningfully applied in the same sense to either Chekhov or Sholokhov. Like many a commentator on Russian literature, Professor Simmons simply uses "realistic" as a synonym for "believable" or "successful" or "moving."

It is a great virtue of Donald Fanger's new book that he does define his terms and demonstrates what a valuable concept realism can be after all. The title of the volume, Dostoevsky and Romantic Realism, contains three of the most widely used and misused words in modern criticism. An author who undertakes such a topic is, to borrow a phrase from Harry Levin, "less obliged to expound a thesis than to demonstrate a method." Fanger meets this challenge not only by defining at all times what he means by "romantic" and "realistic" (not such obvious tasks at all, as his book shows) but by defining what he means by "Dostoevsky" as well.

Hardly another writer of fiction, it would seem, attracts so many people who would rather forget that he wrote novels and short stories. Commentators on Dostoevsky use his work as a pretext to discuss his politics, his philosophy, his religious views, his relevance to our present existential situation—in short, to discuss anything but literature. Fanger's refreshingly no-nonsense approach restores some of the perspective. His Dostoevsky is primarily a fiction writer, who worked within certain clear and demonstrable Russian and European literary traditions, a writer with an easily traceable literary pedigree and with obvious affinities to some of his foreign contemporaries. Most important, Dostoevsky is a writer whose earlier production belongs within a definite general trend of 19th-century literature, which Fanger calls Romantic Realism.

The categories of romantic and realistic, which always beg redefinition, were amazingly interchangeable and blurred in the 1820s and 1830s. In Gogol's literary articles, for example, the term "romantic" almost invariably denotes what later came to be called "realistic." In that transitional period, before Flaubert and Tolstoy arrived at their conceptions of realism, three major writers in three different literatures—Balzac, Dickens and Gogol—all independently evolved the method of Romantic Realism, individual in each case but with certain inescapable parallels to one another. All three are enormously relevant to the early work of Dostoevsky. Fanger traces the origins of their Romantic melodrama, and shows the key role played in its formation by the concept of a great city as either a jungle or a living organism (Paris in Balzac, London in Dickens and St. Petersburg in Gogol's urban tales). Certain profoundly romantic traits of Dostoevsky's three predecessors belie the traditional classification of their work as realism tout court, as Fanger well shows in his discussions of Balzac's time structure and reliance on excessive contrasts; of the use of weather, atmosphere and lighting in Dickens and of his diabolical villains, so similar to Dostoevsky's later "personal devils," such as Valkovsky and Svidrigailov; and of grotesque characterizations and verbal exuberance in both Dickens and Gogol.

The Gogol chapter should prove particularly instructive to Dostoevsky's admirers who read no Russian. Dostoevsky's first two novels, Poor Folk and The Double, mimic Gogol stylistically, while conducting an ideological debate against Gogol's treatment of similar themes. No writer is as important for Dostoevsky's literary genesis in terms of language, imagery and subject matter as Gogol, and it is good to have Fanger's persuasive demonstration of this impact (long known in Russian criticism, incidentally), especially because the currently available English translations of both Gogol and early Dostoevsky usually do their best to obliterate all the idiomatic quality and personal flavor that make their affinity so obvious in the original Russian.

The second part of the book ("The Inheritor: Dostoevsky") examines the Romantic Realism of Dostoevsky's earlier novels and stories with urban settings, up to and including Crime and Punishment. The diverse strands, seen in the preceding chapters on Balzac, Dickens and Gogol, are shown to have combined in the first half of Dostoevsky's output to form a unique literary method of depicting 19th-century urban life, a method vastly different from those of a Tolstoy, a Flaubert or a Maupassant, but at times unexpectedly similar to the poetic vision of a Baudelaire. To support his points, Fanger draws on an impressively broad spectrum of Dostoevsky criticism, Russian and foreign, including in particular such Russian émigré critics of the 1930s and 1940s as Alfred Bem and Konstantin Mochulsky, who did some of the finest writing on Dostoevsky in any language.

There are a few omissions in the book that one could point out, such as the failure to give equal space to George Sand, whose influence and example are probably as relevant to Dostoevsky's Romantic Realism as those of Balzac. In the discussion of The Landlady, one misses the reference to Gogol's "The Terrible Vengeance," which was Dostoevsky's model for this novel and which could have enabled Fanger to contrast the treatment of a similar situation in a gothic horror story and in a work of Romantic Realism. But the omissions are minor. Donald Fanger has produced a stimulating and versatile book, versatile not only in terms of its sophisticated comparativist approach to basic literary issues but also in terms of its potential appeal. It is a book that can be enjoyed by both specialist and general reader while, at the same time, making a handy text for a college course on the modern novel.

Second Annual
SOCIALIST SCHOLARS CONFERENCE
Hotel Commodore, New York City
September 9-11, 1966

Last year, at the first annual Socialist Scholars Conference, held at Columbia University, more than 1000 scholars and students participated in discussion of themes of contemporary relevance, examined from a socialist perspective. The program this year will be greatly expanded.

ON SOCIALIST MAN [evening session, Friday, September 9]: Isaac Deutscher, Herbert Marcuse and others.
"LIBERMANISM": ECONOMIC REFORMS IN EASTERN EUROPE AND THE SOVIET UNION: Alexander Ehrlich, Lynn Turgeon, Victor Perlo, Harry Braverman.
CONTEMPORARY REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENTS: ASIA, LATIN-AMERICA, AFRICA: Franz Schurmann, Gordon Lewis, James Petras and others.
REALISM AND LITERATURE: Lee Baxandall, Norman Rudich and others.
POVERTY AND POWERLESSNESS: Richard Cloward, Sherman Barr, Oscar Lewis and others.
BARAN AND SWEEZY'S MONOPOLY CAPITALISM: John Owen, James O'Connor, Karl Niebyl, Russ Nixon, Paul Sweezy.
AMERICAN CORPORATE LIBERALISM: Gabriel Kolko, James Weinstein, Philip Foner, Robert Engler, Ronald Radosh, Martin Sklar
CONTEMPORARY IMPERIALISM: Harry Magdoff, Brijen Gupta, James Becker, Michael A. Lebowitz and others.
LEGACY OF NEGRO SLAVERY: Eugene D. Genovese, C. Vann Woodward, Herbert Aptheker and others.
COMINTERN, FASCISM AND THE POPULAR FRONT: Robert Colodny, John Cammett, Leslie Derfler, Helmut Gruber.

Dinner, Saturday, September 10
Speaker: Conor Cruise O'Brien
Write for further information and applications to

Socialist Scholars Conference
Box 462, Brooklyn, N. Y. 11201
Registration at the Conference as well as by mail.

MUSIC / Benjamin Boretz

The most remarkable aspect of the Stravinsky Festival given by the New York Philharmonic Hall last month (under the artistic direction of Lukas Foss) was how utterly anti-Stravinskian it was in almost every respect. To begin with, it was an extreme example of the cute-encounter programing that has become a persistent corollary of the Festival approach, in which works are conjoined for some piquantly extrinsic association whose ingenuity, being entirely nonmusical, is instantly evident to the general audience. Thus in the Stravinsky Festival the individual concerts were (all but the last, Stravinsky's own) given "Stravinsky and" themes, ranging from the geographical ("S. and American," ". . . and Russian," ". . . and French," ". . . and Italian Music") to the temporal ("S. and the 18th Century," ". . . and Recent Years") to the categorical ("S. and the Dance," ". . . and Song"). But once having devised such curious framework-slogans, the Festival's directors appear to have made no genuine effort to give them an intrinsic justification by including in the programs important music that might reasonably be associated with the "themes." "Stravinsky and American Music," for example (under Leonard Bernstein's direction), contained none of that considerable body of work composed by Stravinsky since he arrived here in the 1930s, aside from his arrangement of the Star-Spangled Banner which opened the concert.

Nor did the American works chosen include any by the group of composers who actually constituted a significant "Stravinsky School" here in the 1930s and '40s. In fact, the Stravinskian associations of the works on the program were so tenuous as to suggest a self-parody of the entire idea: The Capricorn Concerto of Samuel Barber (who would probably be as surprised as Stravinsky by the imputation of any communality) presumably qualified by its "white-note" neutrality and "neoclassic" surface—which would make it equally available for future Hindemith, Bartók or Milhaud festivals; the aboriginally simple-minded ostinatos of Silvestre Revueltas' Sensemaya; and the Aaron Copland Dance Symphony, a very early and obviously premature work that of all possible Copland reflects the least evident awareness of Stravinsky even on its surface. And the Stravinsky work performed as the grand finale to all this Americana was, with inexorable logic, the Sacre du Printemps.

In the same spirit, Kiril Kondrashin's "Stravinsky and Russian Music" combined immature (Fireworks) and overplayed (Petrouchka) Stravinsky with minimal Tchaikovsky (The Tempest) and Rimsky-Korsakov (Piano Concerto); while Ernest Ansermet adduced as Stravinsky's "French-Music" surroundings the utterly alien Poulenc Organ Concerto. And the "Stravinsky and Italian Music" program, while it included Gesualdo madrigals, astonishingly failed to include Stravinsky's two works dedicated to Gesualdo, his realization of the incomplete motet Illumina Nos, and the Monumentum pro Gesualdo, a major "recomposition" in the Pulcinella sense reflecting Stravinsky's most recent compositional preoccupations. The "Italian" Stravinsky on this occasion was, in fact, Oedipus Rex, but none of this work's only possible "Italian" connections—17th-century oratorio and opera—were represented elsewhere on the program.

Perhaps the high point of non-Stravinskianism was Elizabeth Schwartzkopf's ". . . and Song" program, which contained two of the earliest, least consequential Stravinsky works extant as part of a recital consisting otherwise of Mozart, Moussorgsky, Tchaikovsky, Rachmaninoff (presumably included because of Stravinsky's frequent expressions of extreme distaste for his music) and Benjamin Britten, whose "Hölderlin Songs" were as close to grown-up Stravinsky as the program came. More seriously, the significant, and rarely performed, Stravinsky literature for solo voice—including the early Pribouatki, Berceuses du chat, the group of early song-cycles whose accompaniments were so remarkably recomposed for instrumental ensembles in the '50s, the 1952 Cantata, and the 1953 Shakespeare Songs, were totally overlooked. And surely the surroundings of vocal works by those composers who principally shared with him the creation of the 20th-century musical syntax—especially Schoenberg and Webern—would have been far more relevant to Stravinsky, if not Schwartzkopf.

Webern, however, appeared in his turn, characteristically on the program devoted to "recent years," on which were performed two recently published works (whose publication Webern pointedly omitted during his lifetime), a tiny children's piano piece (played by a child pianist) and an unremarkable movement for string trio. Even among the actual "recent years" composers whose names Stravinsky submitted (although the impression given was that he had chosen the works), Varèse was represented by the 1925 Octandre, Elliott Carter not by the Double Concerto that Stravinsky has praised so highly on a number of public occasions but by excerpts from the woodwind Etudes and Fantasy, hardly representative of his "recent" work; and Milton Babbitt by his electronic Ensembles, unperformable inside the hall for lack of adequate equipment or facilities, but played during the intermission in the lobby. Foss' own theatrical-improvisatory Echoi occupied the bulk of the program, and the "recent years" of Stravinsky were represented by his little fanfare for the opening of the New York State Theatre (played by trumpets in the auditorium) and the first New York performance of Introitus, a choral-instrumental work of intense concentration but minimal dimensions.

That this was supposed to constitute adequate representation for the composers involved, or adequate conditions for the presentation of serious composition, seemed wholly characteristic of the spirit of the Festival; for just as the devisers of all the programs revealed thereby the depth of their misunderstanding of Stravinsky—for once by means other than solely their performances of his music—this quick surrender of any pretense of musical responsibility to presentational gimmickry perhaps reveals the ultimate incapacity of the mass-musical world to engage in serious musical activity. It certainly seemed impossible to conclude otherwise during the "Stravinsky and the Dance" program, where all these tendencies reached their absurd extreme: for somehow it had been contrived to construct an all-Stravinsky program (the only one other than Stravinsky's own) containing, except for the final Histoire du Soldat, nothing but ephemera, such minor pièces d'occasion as the violin piano arrangements of excerpts from Le baisée de la fée, the little Piano-Rag Music, and danced (to Balanchine choreography) versions of the solo viola Elégie and the ensemble Ragtime. And Histoire itself (which seems in the theatre version overextended for its compositional content) was played strictly for laughs, with a low-camp English translation of the libretto, the low comedy of John Cage's reading of the part of the Devil, and the sure-fire spectacle of his juxtaposition with Aaron Copland and Elliott Carter as narrator and Soldier.

There were, as well, some moments of high quality and interest during the Festival. The performance of Perséphone under Ansermet was, for example, quite adequate, although the rest of his program was catastrophically ill prepared. And the conducting of Lukas Foss throughout the Festival was far less inadequate and ineffective than some newspaper reports have indicated. In particular, the performance at the last concert of the Symphony in Three Movements under Robert Craft was a stunning reminder that the Philharmonic is still inherently a first-rate orchestra. The Flood, on the same concert, was a valuable first New York concert performance of one of Stravinsky's major works of recent years, and the more welcome—despite some omissions (the entire Comedy and the second tenor solo) and the insecurity of some of the playing—after the total misrepresentation of the television première. Stravinsky's own performance of the Symphony of Psalms was, inevitably, the one moment of this "Festival of Stravinsky" when the equation of the extra-musical with the musical seemed justified. But it must be said that, otherwise, the performance level of the Festival was absurdly low, rarely ranging beyond the routine and frequently bordering on the scandalous, and although the orchestra provided some of the most spectacular instances—the hair-raising Sacre, for example, and the incredible inability to attack simultaneously even in the Star-Spangled Banner—some of the chamber groups, especially the Octandre and Histoire ensembles, and the vocal soloists, most pathetically in the case of Schwartzkopf's attempt to reproduce the Ann Trulove that she is reported to have done so brilliantly at the première, were at least equally incompetent. One would suppose that the minimal pretext for such a Festival would be its preparation of performances on a higher level of adequacy than those ordinarily available under regular commercial and institutional conditions. That this seems not to have especially concerned the directors of this Festival indicates an indifference to the musical object itself that is the most extreme anti-Stravinskianism of all.

PERSONALS

Legalize Abortion

Humanitarians and libertarians desiring to take independent lawful action to quicken legalization of abortion are invited to contact:
LEGALIZE ABORTION
P.O.B. 24163, Los Angeles, Cal. 90024

SPACE TO RENT

LARGE OFFICE, loft building, downtown Manhattan, approximately 600 square feet, 6th floor. Phone: CH 2-8400, Ext. 23.

Buy Your Books

through The Nation

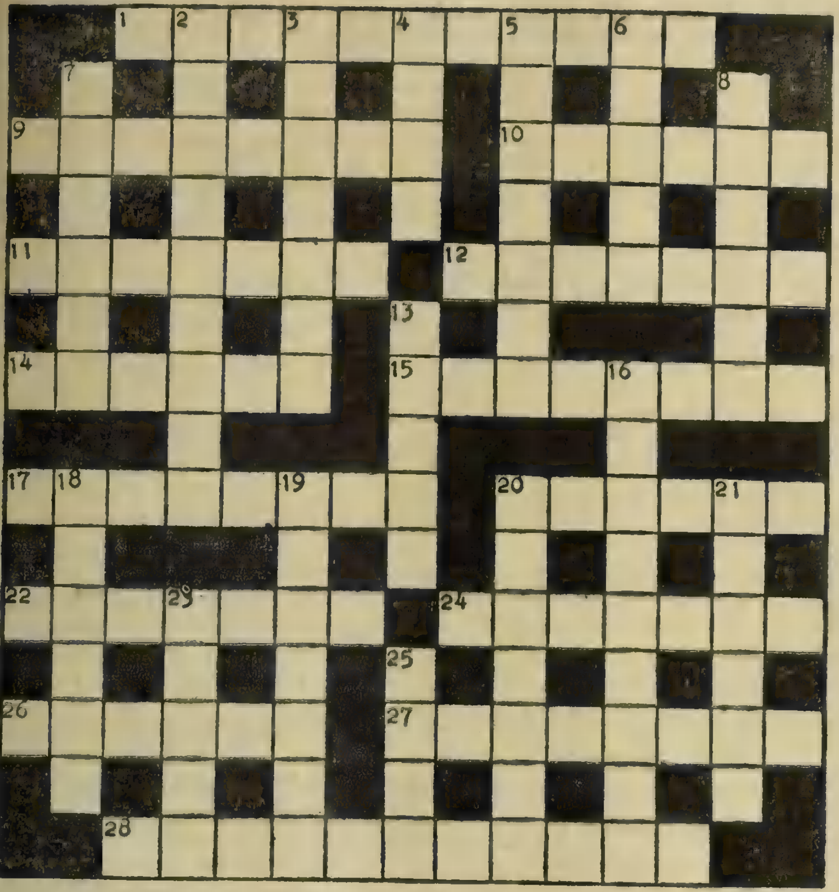
Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to: The Nation, 333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1164

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Pointers for females that are sweet, as a matter of course. (11)
9 Broken ribs? A thing that causes death down under. (8)
10 This is close to a chest, or closer. (6)
11 How the French make remarks? (7)
12 Part of the force of slang is not worth very much. (7)
14 Inclined to be closely followed. (6)
15 Vessels and ships in distress. (8)
17 Is one bound to be a valet for 007? (8)
20 Confused skater, or at least a fast one. (6)
22 With a local disturbance, we objectively become somewhat hardened. (7)
24 The 11 we're inclined to hear with some singing commercials? (7)
26 Is such a story a-foot? (6)
27 Literary end? It's certain to be about a bad case of it. (8)
28 Most programs aren't, surprisingly. (11)

DOWN:

2 Put together a baled mess! (9)
3 Why, by the sound of it, you made money, or at least wanted to. (7)
4 Ingredient of the nicest desserts. (4)
5 They have a certain capacity for putting everything in song arrangements. (7)
6 To sum up, this is how to back a horse. (5)
7 South Americans cheer about this harbor bird. (6)
8 Tailless fish found in Illinois (perhaps associated with some trouble of mine). (6)
13 Proving in Italy the best classes eat well. (5)
16 Continue by stern measures. (9)
18 Made a speech, considered very poor? (6)
19 This cartoonist can certainly be sloppy and sentimental. (7)
20 Poor material used only in pressing circumstances. (7)
21 Help a stupid person? It's wrong. (6)
23 If you so state, you're dead! (3, 2)
25 Is it so uppity to look down on capital? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1163

ACROSS: 1 Behemoth; 5 Marble; 10 Candles; 11 Clamant; 13 Bookmaker; 14 Irons; 16 Destroys; 19 Decanter; 22 Indus; 24 Maneaters; 26 River; 28 Opaline; 29 Imagine; 30 Tiller; 31 Messages. DOWN: 1 Buckskin; 2, 9 and 20 Hands across the sea; 3 Melanesia; 4 Test bed; 6 Alarm; 7 and 12 Black-eyed Susan; [illegible] Entire; 15 One and all; 17 Railroads; 18 Usurpers; 21 Respite; 23 Import; 25 Arise; 27 Vying.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address requests to Puzzle Dept., The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014

PUBLICATIONS

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002

HOMOSEXUAL theme fiction, non-fiction listing available free. Trojan Book Service, Box 2121B, Philadelphia, Pa. 19103.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London. $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner Available in U.S. from the author at 514 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

THE FIRST TIME I LIVE
by Will Slotnikoff
Discursive Introduction by Henry Miller
A romantic book about the writing of a book and the birth of a writer. Includes an exchange of letters with Henry Miller on the Creative Process in Action.
Paperback, $2.25 postpaid, 238 pp.
MANCHESTER LANE EDITIONS
1400 Nicholson St., N. W.
Washington 11, D.C.
Also available through Gotham Book Mart

BIRTH-CONTROL POLICIES AND PRACTICES IN FIFTY-EIGHT CALIFORNIA COUNTY WELFARE DEPARTMENTS, by Carl Reiterman. Planned Parenthood, 482 West MacArthur Blvd., Oakland, California. $4.00.

Read THE TORTURE OF MOTHERS by Truman Nelson. Send $1. to: GARRISON PRESS, 15 Olive Street, Newburyport, Mass.

$2.95 each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF THE NATION

- Each file holds a full year's copies.
- Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.
- Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send check or money order.

MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), [illegible] Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates
CLASSIFIED
74c a line (6 words)
Three-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)
The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

FREE!

With every new subscription to

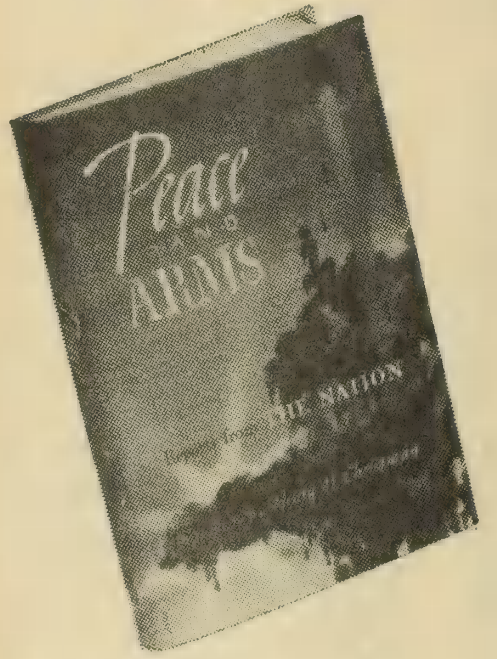
THE NATION



. . . "These essays are stimulating and provocative. But they are rational. They may cause one to disagree—as some points caused me to—but one has to think. That is the important thing."

—Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey

"THE NATION has sought steadily to remind Americans that theirs is the Questioning Society, not the Accepting Society. PEACE AND ARMS illustrates the Questioning Society at its intelligent best."

—W. H. Ferry, Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions

For your FREE copy of PEACE AND ARMS, fill out the coupon and start receiving America's oldest weekly journal of opinion (founded in 1865) — a truly independent, critical weekly that week in, week out, questions the assumptions and analyzes the implications of issues that concern the democratic conscience.

Twenty-seven reports from The Nation on Peace and Arms, a handsome 256 pp. anthology—$4.50—published by Sheed & Ward.

PEACE AND ARMS

Henry M. Christman, Editor

- Economists, publicists, housewives, college students, scientists, technicians; a U.S. Senator (William Proxmire), a Pulitzer Prize-winning historian (Carleton Mabee), a distinguished novelist and playwright (J. B. Priestley), and others, trace the steady growth of the peace movement. Diverse as they are, the contributors have articulated what Pope John XXIII called "the profound longing of the entire human family" for peace.

- "Over the years, The Nation has been among the very few journals to question the assumptions and analyze the implications of our encompassing military milieu. No journal has reported the issues of peace and arms more regularly or more responsibly."

— from the publisher's jacket

THE NATION, 333 6th Avenue, New York 10014

Herewith my order and payment for a NEW subscription to THE NATION. Please send my FREE copy of PEACE AND ARMS.

☐ 1 Year, $10 ☐ 2 Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6

(Foreign and Canadian postage, $1 per year extra)

Name ....

Address ....

City .... State .... Zip No. ....

[illegible]-22-66

SEP 6 1966
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

BARTH: GOAT GAMBIT SHAUN O'CONNELL

THE NATION

SEPTEMBER 5, 1966 35 cents

HUAC FROM PILLORY TO FARCE

FRANK J. DONNER

RUSSIAN SUMMER

The Worried Vacationists

Alexander Werth

Head Start to What?

Ivor Kraft

HOWARD ZINN
Should Harlem 'Secede'?

EUGENE D. GENOVESE
The Radical Racist

BERNARD B. FALL
Messages from Hanoi

R NEWSP
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
BURLINGAME 94010
CALIFORNIA

LETTERS

the faith of LBJ

Chappaqua, N.Y.

DEAR SIRS: Although the confused maneuverings of President Johnson have been intensively scanned by experts, with melancholy consequences for his public standing as shown in the polls, one phase of his activities that has been given little comment is the religious. Yet Mr. Johnson shows a strong predilection for placing himself repeatedly in religious contexts.

Every third or fourth photograph of him, for example, shows him entering, leaving or abiding solemnly in some church, with no particular denomination favored. Again, he has publicly and personally testified to the sustaining power of prayer, and during the campaign of 1964 he called for a joint interdenominational house of prayer to be built in Washington. So eager is he to participate in religious ceremonies that he went far out of his way to travel to Houston, there to hear the Rev. Dr. Billy Graham hold forth on the sanctity of the war in Vietnam.

On the other hand, in the background of the escalation in Vietnam, the Pope has repeatedly called fruitlessly for peace and the World Council of Churches has gone on record against Mr. Johnson's efforts.

A question that raises itself: Is Mr. Johnson by any stretch of definition a religious man and is the Vietnamese struggle a holy war? It is for the theologians obviously a double-barreled question, and it seems to me they would be more fruitfully occupied if they concerned themselves with it rather than with the fanciful issue of whether God is dead or alive. Questions the theologians should be raising, it seems to me, are: Is Mr. Johnson religious? If he is, in what sense is his religious commitment to be understood?

If it should be decided that he is not religious (as compulsive doubters might suspect), are we confronted by still another case of Satan disguising himself as one of the faithful, as Scripture informs us the King of Darkness is likely to do? Ferdinand Lundberg effective protest

New York City

DEAR SIRS: On behalf of the Alexander Defense Committee, I would like to thank you for your protest of the Justice Department order that the ADC register under the Foreign Agents Registration Act [editorial, The Nation, July 25]. We have no doubt that the substantial protest registered by leading organizations and individuals helped to influence the Justice Department in its reconsideration of the order. . . .

We know you share our view that the rescinding of the order represents an important victory for civil liberties generally. It was, of course, essential for the committee's effectiveness in raising funds for the persecuted opponents of apartheid.

Robert H. Langston
Executive Secretary

good and bad Indians

Ottawa, Canada

DEAR SIRS: The road to hell is, more often than not, paved with bad intentions. I think that it's a mistake to believe as John McDermott seems to ["Welfare Imperialism in Vietnam"; The Nation, July 25] that the present war is the result of myopic benevolence. Eisenhower's statement is, I am certain, well known. Let me, in the context of the recent stepped-up bombings of North Vietnam and the newly contrived justifications of them, quote from it. These remarks were made to

(Continued on page 187)

EDITORIALS

The Idiot Logic of Escalation

The war-game theorists who spawned the idea of "escalation" placed a marvelous device in the hands of a strong executive for edging a country into an illimitable war, without the public's fully realizing what is being done to it. The implication of the term is that each step in the intensification of the war is taken deliberately and by calculation —everything is under control. The President periodically assures the country that his objectives are "limited" and pictures himself as a man of peace striving by every means to persuade the enemy to reasonable discussion. This is a sure-fire means of quieting public opinion and keeping the voters on the President's side—for a while at least.

The real mechanics of escalation bears little resemblance to this tranquil picture. Escalation has its own logic, both military and political. Militarily, a positive feedback operates between the two sides; when one escalates the other seeks appropriate means of retaliation. The oscillations thus set up are not completely under the control of either side. Politically, the escalating party must justify the hopes and promises which precede each act of escalation. Earlier this year, when it became obvious that the Ky government would survive for the time being, the President warned that the cost of aggression would be "raised at its source," and began working on Congressmen to support the Haiphong-Hanoi bombing operations which had already been decided on as the next step in escalation. The logic was unanswerable—were the enemy oil depots to remain a privileged sanctuary? By bombing them we could check the infiltration of enemy troops from North Vietnam and relieve the pressure on our protégés in the south. That was in June. Three months later, since that escalation has had no significant effect, another must be put in work. The President is trapped in his own "logic" and must run faster on his own treadmill.

What is the next step to be? New targets can be found in the north, but the history of aerial bombing does not hold out much hope of an end to the war by this means alone. A land invasion of the north which, as Christopher Lasch and Alan B. Spitzer pointed out in The Nation (August 16, 1965) was at that time an "unthinkable target," is now quite thinkable.

Even the most oblivious U.S. citizens must feel a twinge of uneasiness at this prospect, and must ask themselves: where is this LBJ leading us, anyway? But they may be asking too late, and they may be looking in the wrong direction for possible enemy reaction. The Chinese may continue to encourage the North Vietnamese to fight the U.S. imperialists without doing any fighting of their own. What the Chinese would like best of all is to embroil their former Soviet ally with the United States. Nor is this a vain surmise: If the fighting moves into North Vietnam, the Soviet Union might, however reluctantly, be forced to begin a new cycle of escalation. Harold J. Berman, one of our foremost authorities on Russian affairs, recently discussed this danger in a letter to The New York Times. In May, 1965, he was told in Moscow by "prominent Soviet people" that if we send troops into North Vietnam they will be met by Soviet "volunteers," and if we attempt to bring down the North Vietnamese state, Soviet missiles will be launched against our vessels and bases.

The Soviets will have little choice in the matter. President Johnson points out that we have treaties with scores of countries guaranteeing them against a Communist takeover (external or internal, although he does not say it so explicitly). If we fail to protect South Vietnam, how will these other wards evaluate our promises? But the Soviet Union is similarly bound by treaty to defend North Vietnam. A failure to honor its commitment, Berman's informants told him, "would mean a loss of Soviet authority in the entire Communist world . . . since the Soviet Government would be exposed as unwilling to defend a sister Communist government threatened with destruction."

Our armies are already in the demilitarized zone between the two Vietnams. That Washington has been placed on formal notice not once but several times, in Soviet notes which have not been publicized, only underscores the danger of further escalation.

Contempt Breeds Contempt

No level-headed American likes to see a committee of the Congress exposed to rowdyism and disrespect. The right of Congress to investigate is fundamental to the legislative process. But that right is neither absolute nor unlimited and it has been abused by the House Committee on Un-American Activities from its inception. The recent hearings in Washington (see article by Frank J. Donner, p. 174) were a glaring example of what has been increasingly apparent since 1960, namely, that the attitude of the committee toward "unfriendly" witnesses and the very nature of its proceedings, against the background of the Vietnamese war, are bound to lead to contumacious behavior. Either the witnesses swallow their outrage and submit or—especially when they are young—they meet abuse with abuse.

This was true in the historic Berkeley hearings, it was true of the Chicago hearings (see "HUAC in Chicago" by Raymond R. Coffey, The Nation, June 14, 1965) and it was conspicuously true of the latest so-called hearings. Escalation is not confined to war, and the HUAC proceedings show an increasing tendency to inspire violence, verbal on the part of uncooperative witnesses and their sympathizers and physical on the part of the battalion of police officers that are a necessary feature of every public HUAC "investigation."

Congress should take note of the fact—to some extent it has done so—that the contempt which HUAC engenders reflects on the entire Congress. HUAC is not a legislative island; it is a creature of the Congress and a far too conspicuous one whenever it gets into action. HUAC's objectives inevitably infringe on the basic rights of citizens and cannot be carried on with normal parliamentary decorum. Alan Barth summed it up aptly in The Washington Post: ". . . most of the trouble came from the nature of the inquiry. No part of its purpose was to inquire. The subcommittee in no sense seemed to be seeking information. It was seeking simply to punish some extremely obstreperous young men—by placing them in a public pillory."

There is no cure. Even if the manners of the committee were improved, the basic vice would remain. The entire history of HUAC demonstrates that it cannot be reformed.

FEB 19
PR 17
APR 30
MAY 14
JUN 15

IN THIS ISSUE

September 5, 1966

EDITORIALS

170

ARTICLES

174 HUAC: From Pillory to Farce
Frank J. Donner
176 Russian Summer: The Worried Vacationists
Alexander Werth
179 Head Start to What?
Ivor Kraft
182 Latin America II: Search for a Politics
Edgar A. Triveri
185 Letter from Britain
Raymond Williams

BOOKS & THE ARTS

188 Getting the Message from Hanoi
Bernard B. Fall
189 Should Harlem "Secede"?
Howard Zinn
190 Pacifism and Nonviolence (book list)
Henry M. Christman
191 Paradoxical American Radical
Eugene D. Genovese
192 Hatred of Men with Black Hair (poem)
Robert Bly
193 Goat Gambit at the University
Shaun O'Connell
195 Theatre: The Midwest
Julius Novick
199 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

Editor CAREY McWILLIAMS
Managing Editor ROBERT HATCH
Literary Editor HELEN YGLESIAS
Poetry Editor MICHAEL GOLDMAN
Copy Editor MARION HESS
Advertising Manager MARY SIMON
Washington ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Paris ALEXANDER WERTH
Theatre HAROLD CLURMAN
Art MAX KOZLOFF
Music BENJAMIN BORETZ
Science CARL DREHER

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher
ANNE C. ABRAMOVITZ Assistant

The Nation [illegible] published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; [illegible] years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.
Change of Address: Three weeks' notice [illegible] required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address [illegible] the new.

Information [illegible] Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide [illegible] Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index [illegible] the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION
Volume 203
No. 6

It attracts to its roster personalities who, like Rep. Joe R. Pool, caricature Congress in their own persons. "This spectacle can do the Congress no good," Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen commented, and what revolts Senator Dirksen must be hard for the rest of the country to swallow.

It was probably always unrealistic to urge, as The Nation has done times without number, that HUAC and its companion nuisance, the Senate Internal Security Committee, should be abolished. There simply is not that much courage in Congress, nor is there likely to be. But, in self-defense, the Congress should insist that these committees shut up, before things get worse. The general public attitude is no longer as fear-ridden as it was in the fifties, and an increasing body of citizens are bored and annoyed with HUAC and its antics. The committee is now clearly attacking the right to dissent and to criticize foreign policy in an unpopular war. A part of the younger generation will not stand for intimidation when their lives and the honor of the country are at stake. They will be heard. Whatever one may think of their manners, one cannot help admiring their courage. And that their judgment is not altogether bad is shown by the changed attitude of the American Civil Liberties Union, which has heretofore hesitated to challenge HUAC directly. "The ACLU has moved from a defensive position to an offensive position in its dealings with the committee," says John Pemberton, its executive director. The unrespectable have moved the respectable to action.

Vote For Peace!

The Nation has tried consistently to keep the "peace candidacies" in perspective—see, for instance, our editorial of last May 9. Peace sentiment as a political issue has been rising steadily since 1958. This year there have been about fifty such candidacies, and they have not fared badly when one considers the inexperience of most of the aspirants and the obstacles in their way. Arthur Waskow suggests that, overall, they have polled something like 30 per cent of the Democratic vote, which is by no means insignificant. And as the situation worsens, more voters will regard peace as the overriding issue.

They will realize, also, that the only way to change policy in Vietnam is to get Mr. Johnson out of the White House. He has been given every chance to change his position and has shown a resolution which, in another context, would be admirable. No one could pursue past errors with more tenacity. Slowly, almost imperceptibly, a few Republicans are beginning to see where their opportunity lies, but the party is not likely to change its position fast enough.

Three peace candidacies are especially to be watched and supported, with money alone when votes cannot go along with money. All three are involved in primary elections which will be held September 13. One is David Frost, now conducting an energetic campaign for the Democratic Senate nomination in New Jersey. Frost's general program is good; he has hammered away unremittingly on a number of key issues—not peace alone but foreign policy in general, inflation, etc. Another peace candidate who deserves support—and has a chance of success—is Seymour Spelman, a Washington, D. C., labor lawyer who is running in the 8th Congressional District in Maryland, a newly created district. With six candidates for the Democratic nomination, and no incumbent, Spelman just might make it. A third leading candidate is Thomas Boylston Adams, who is running for the Democratic nomination for the Senate in Massachusetts. With his family background, Mr. Adams can hardly be accused of lacking patriotism. His approach to the election likewise befits his ancestry. The issue is not, he says, "between me and two other candidates for the Senate whose names will appear on the ballot. The issue is between the people of Massachusetts and the President of the United States. A vote for Adams on September 13 is a vote of no confidence in the present Administration."

That is nothing if not forthright, and it is the only approach that promises to be effective. It may tap the deep undercurrent of distrust of the President. The hope is that, as the peace movement grows, it will force one or the other of the two major parties to become a genuine peace party, or that a new coalition made up of all elements intent on a change in foreign policy will emerge.

The Point of the Deal

President Johnson has repeatedly proved his capacity to perform acts that are petty and sometimes a bit shady. But to assume that he gave his support to the proposed $20 million continuing appropriation for Mohole—the deep-sea-drilling experiment—only because George Brown of the Houston construction firm of Brown & Root, Inc., and members of his family had contributed $25,000 to the President's campaign kitty misses the whole point of the deal.

George and his brother, the late Herman Brown, have been supporting Lyndon Johnson in politics for a quarter of a century. Except for the oil families, the Richardsons and Murchisons, the Browns have always been his biggest contributors, and must have put millions into his campaigns over the years. They were thick—well, thick as rich and powerful Texans are likely to be; and Johnson has done many favors, both secret and publicized, for them in the past. In 1962, he was widely believed to be part of the "politically powerful" interests alluded to by Senator Kuchel as swinging the Mohole cost-plus contract for Brown & Root, although it was not the low bidder and was, in fact, judged by a panel of National Science Foundation experts as the third choice for the job. The contract (profiting B & R by $1.8 million, plus a running fee) was made secretly, as most things of that kind are. Thus Brown & Root was assured of its profit, even if Mohole went down the rathole.

With that kind of working arrangement between the two of them, George Brown's future hardly hung on his contributing a relative pittance to Johnson's war chest, and the reason for Johnson's interest in perpetuating Mohole must be found elsewhere. It had become quite plain that however much "science" benefited from the experiment in drilling a hole through the crust of the earth's mantle the immediate benefits would go especially to Johnson's old friends and supporters in the oil industry. There is thought to be more oil under the oceans than is still to be found on the continents—waiting out there for the day when suitable platforms are developed and drilling devices are perfected. It would cost many millions of dollars in experiments to come up with the right tools. So although there is no industry better able to pay its own way the oil industry was delighted to let the government foot the bill.

But the Mohole bill was going up too fast. Originally estimated to cost $15 million to $20 million, the latest estimates were more than $100 million. The House killed it because too many members were tired of being told by Johnson to cut back on worthy projects, only to be faced by an old chum's $20 million passion.

The shame of it all is that because Johnson and the National Science Foundation had so mucked up the waters with obvious cost paddings and secret palsmanship the thrust of the project was never given a fair judgment. The NSF was administering the developing of Mohole and obviously doing a poor job of it. Johnson was manipulating the contracts and doing even a worse job of it. Under such circumstances science simply has no chance to survive.

The Herald Tribune

The death of the Herald Tribune, as Senator Gruening, a former managing editor of that paper and of The Nation, pointed out in an eloquent statement in the Congressional Record of August 16, was indeed an American tragedy. The Herald Tribune, as he said, was published in New York, but its influence was national. A complacent public may feel that, with radio and television as supplementary sources, its news needs will be adequately served without the paper. But newspapers that are worth their salt make news as well as report it. They are—if less so than formerly—"movers and shakers." Perhaps in terms of straight news reporting, the paper will not be missed in a city so well served by The New York Times, but its editorial leadership will be sorely missed.

The Herald Tribune was recognized throughout the country as the voice of liberal or moderate Republicanism and the determined foe of the so-called "new conservatives" who mock the principles of a true conservatism. Today the Republican Party is more sharply divided than at any time in recent decades. The paper's demise creates an enormous leadership void in the party at a most critical juncture in its history. It will strengthen the position within the party of the forces that staged the Cow Palace Putsch of 1964. What newspaper, now that the Herald Tribune is no more, will provide national editorial leadership for those who support the historic principles of the Republican Party?

The most likely successor is the Los Angeles Times under the brilliant direction of Otis Chandler. The Times could, if it would, fill at least part of the gap. The test will come between now and the first Tuesday in November. Will the Times support Ronald Reagan as the Republican gubernatorial nominee? Will it remain "neutral"? Or will it denounce Reagan as an interloper who belongs with his friends and backers of the radical Right? Some courage will be needed to buck Reagan: there are more Birchites and kindred souls per square mile in Southern California than in any other region. But the Times would win new and lasting national stature if it declined to assist in the capture of the Republican Party, locally and nationally, by the right wingers who have invaded it with that purpose in mind. If circumstances were reversed, if the Herald Tribune were still alive and being published from First and Broadway in Los Angeles, it would no more support Reagan than it supported William Buckley in last year's mayoralty election.

Propaganda Junkets

The United States Government has been unable to find counterpart funds for transporting war-disfigured Vietnamese children to well-equipped foreign hospitals for treatment (see editorial, "The Public Relations of Napalm," The Nation, August 22) but it somehow was able to scrape together $50,000 in counterpart funds for transporting European and Asian newsmen to Vietnam for a pro-America propaganda visit.

Just how many newsmen took advantage of our generosity Leonard H. Marks, head of the U.S. Information Agency, can't remember exactly. But that isn't the only point on which he appeared regrettably ignorant or forgetful when he appeared before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The USIA has several hundred staff members in Vietnam, so one might expect that Marks would know what was going on over there. But when Senator Gore said he understood 5,000 Vietnamese civilians are being killed each week, and wanted to know if that is accurate, Marks replied, "I have no information on that. I don't know and that's not my department."

Then Senator Aiken took up the useless quest for information, remarking that when he was in Vietnam last year he found that only one serviceman of every four in the hospital was actually a shooting casualty; the other three were victims of accident or disease. "I notice we are getting only reports of combat casualties," he said. "If the situation hasn't changed from last year, shouldn't we multiply the combat casualty figure by four to get the actual number?" Marks said he didn't know.

Although he conceded, under questioning, that it is "quite possible" that Washington protested the kind of coverage Canadian reporters were giving the Vietnamese war, he had "never heard" of the USIA's pressuring for the recall of Canadian newsman Bruce Philips.

But one thing he did "know," one thing he was absolutely confident of—it is a very good thing, a very profitable venture, to subsidize visits to Vietnam by foreign newsmen. "I have confidence in the integrity of all newsmen," he said grandly. "I'm sure no reporter would slant a story because he got a free plane ride." And when Senator Fulbright commented quietly, "I'm sure they wouldn't," there was general laughter from the press section.

But there are signs that the USIA's cleverness may already be boomeranging. Prince Sihanouk of Cambodia, a gentleman our State Department would very much like to soften up, is becoming increasingly firm in his friendship to China in reaction to all the unfavorable stories written about him lately in pro-American newspapers in Asia.

Writing in the Monthly Illustrated Review, published in Cambodia, he ticked off many of the press insults he has been subjected to by what he termed "De-Asianized Asians," and concluded that he would not be harassed into becoming a satellite of the United States, preferring rather "to be thin and poor but free, like the wolf in the fable." The Chinese may have their faults, he said, but "no Chinese soldier occupies any foreign country."

To that kind of talk Marks has a ready response. As he told the Foreign Relations Committee: "There are some governments that are unalterably opposed to our program and do not wish to have the facts."

HUAC: From Pillory To Farce

FRANK J. DONNER

Mr. Donner is a New York attorney who specializes in constitutional law and civil liberties cases. He is the author of The Un-Americans (Ballantine).

For years and years—up until Tuesday morning, August 16—all testimony before the House Committee on Un-American Activities had been divided into two categories: friendly and hostile. This terminology separated the witnesses who pleaded no constitutional amendment, named names and freely discussed their politics from those others who refused to discuss their politics, beliefs or associations, and pleaded as justification for their silence the privilege against self-incrimination together with the First Amendment to the Constitution. Then, too, the friendly witness was encouraged to confirm and ratify the diabolism of the committee's targets and endorse the committee's version of the "Red menace" as chronic, incurable and cumulative. The unfriendly witness tended to be a silent witness, not only about his politics and associations but also about the issues which the committee claimed to be investigating. The hostile witness was usually accompanied by counsel to guide him through the shoals of the privilege against self-incrimination, a precaution which was unnecessary for the friendly witness.

Then on Tuesday, August 16, HUAC opened a four-day hearing on a measure which proposed to amend the Internal Security Act by imposing penalties up to twenty years in jail and a $20,000 fine for giving aid to any hostile foreign power. A separate section would invoke the same penalties for obstructing military personnel or transportation. The bill is aimed at the campus-born movement to resist the war in Vietnam by raising money for medical aid to the Vietnamese, including the National Liberation Front, and at actions to stop troop trains, inspired by Berkeley's Vietnam Day Committee. Those familiar with HUAC's operations quickly saw that the committee hoped, by parading the most militant anti-war groups and leaders and forcing them to plead the privilege against self-incrimination when confronted with the testimony of friendly witnesses, to cast an intimidating net over the burgeoning campus peace movement. The committee hoped to achieve its goal by the time-tested technique of depicting the youthful "hards" (such as the members of the Peking-oriented Progressive Labor Party Youth) as manipulators of the "softs," the unorganized youth who constitute the bulk of the campus peace movement. The hards, the committee hoped, would cringe in silence and sullenly sit for their political portraits; while the softs, unwilling to expose their friends, would also be forced to acquiesce in the role of dupe assigned them by HUAC. More fundamentally, perhaps, the witnesses brought home a truth which HUAC has suppressed for a generation: the hearing system is an integral part of the basic right of petition, a forum in which those adversely affected by proposed legislation can have their say.

But something went wrong. Of the twelve unfriendly witnesses who were subpoenaed, six took the stand, and not one of them followed the script. All freely admitted their political views and affiliations and refused to plead the Fifth Amendment except for the narrow purpose of blocking inquiry into the identity of others. One witness declined even to use the privilege for this limited purpose and told the committee when it begged him to use the Fifth that he refused to name others because it would "nauseate me to do so."

In the past, for the most part, the aim of the unfriendly witness has been to get through his ordeal as quickly as possible. Besides, the committee fought to prevent hostile witnesses from expressing themselves either about the committee itself or about the issues allegedly under investigation. The possibility that any statement the witnesses made would "open the door" to privileged areas made it relatively easy for the committee to gag those whose views it did not wish to hear and insured that the horror stories of the friendly witnesses would dominate the hearing.

But once the keystone of privilege was removed, the entire structure of investigative exposure so carefully erected through the years came tumbling down. The witness was at liberty to dispute and challenge all of the committee's most cherished assumptions, to parry and thrust, to insist upon counterstatements. Since there is nothing in the federal contempt statute that forces a witness to confine his answer to a narrow formula or that bars him from objecting to questions ad nauseam, the witnesses at the hearing, liberated from the Fifth Amendment and its ancillary restraints, made the committee pay an exorbitant price for the answers it received. Overnight a new kind of witness was born: the witness who boils over with talk, who pleads no privilege and fills the record with his views and objections. He is exactly like the old-style friendly witness with one important exception: his testimony attacks the committee, its premises and its claimed legislative subject matter—bitingly, humorously, solemnly and fearlessly.

The emergence of the loquaciously indignant witness has been made possible by a political climate in which dissent moves without the fears and pressures of the past. And this freedom from constraints which formerly forced silence on political dissent is particularly marked among our youth. It is hardly an accident that all of the irrepressibly voluble witnesses were under 30, and most of them students.

It should be clear that this newly emerged witness has no more need of counsel than his "friendly" counterpart. Since he invokes no legal or constitutional protection and since, in any event, the role of counsel before HUAC is highly restricted, the witness can face the committee alone and unafraid. This is hardly a matter for speculation. On the second day of the hearings, the gavel-pounding subcommittee chairman, Joe R. Pool of Texas, ordered the removal of ACLU cooperating attorney, Arthur Kinoy. He was seized by four federal marshals and dragged from the House caucus room, dangling from the encircling arm of a federal marshal as from a noose, face contorted, eyes popping, voice constricted. Five other ACLU attorneys (including the writer) and two privately retained lawyers left the hearing in protest against the treatment of their colleague and refused to return. Their ten clients were given opportunity to find new counsel but refused to do so. Two boycotted the hearings altogether and the committee, clinging desperately to the familiar ritual of hostile witnesses accompanied by counsel, rejected the pleas of two other witnesses that they be permitted to testify without counsel. One of them, Anatol Ben Anton, a Stanford Ph.D. candidate in philosophy, was bitterly disappointed because he could not enter into the record his folio of pictures of maimed and tortured NLF war prisoners. Four witnesses refused to be swerved from their determination to testify, two of them proving so eager that they had to be forcibly removed from the witness stand. The remaining two witnesses were excused without testifying, much to the anguish of one of them, Jerry Rubin of the Vietnam Day Committee, who had waited for three days in his costume of a Revolutionary War soldier, complete with brass buttons and tails, straining to get to the witness stand with a mass of pamphlets and parchment reprints of the Declaration of Independence. His demands to testify became so insistent that he was carted off and arrested for disorderly conduct, surely the strangest development of a proceeding loud with the popping of old precedents and practices.

At the very commencement of the four-day hearing, the committee was confronted with an unprecedented injunction, issued by federal judge Howard Corcoran, restraining the conduct of the inquiry until the constitutionality of HUAC's mandate could be adjudicated by a special three-judge court. When the news of the injunction reached Congress, late Monday afternoon, Congressman Pool announced that he would defy the restraining order, and the House gave him a standing ovation. Speaker McCormack, supporting Pool's stand, told newsmen that the restraint invaded the separation of powers, a principle which in the view of HUAC's critics and a number of Supreme Court justices HUAC has consistently flouted in using its powers to punish witnesses through exposure.

On the following morning the restraint was dissolved after a dramatic night session by a reviewing court, and in the wake of the dissolution the House plunged into a saturnalia of abuse of Judge Corcoran. Southern firebrands such as Abernethy of Mississippi and Dorn and Rivers of South Carolina led the oratorical howls of defiance of the court and called for Judge Corcoran's impeachment. Porter Hardy of Virginia demanded that the judge be punished for contempt of the committee. The chamber echoed with pent-up cries of irrelevant outrage from Southerners and Republicans over the reapportionment decision of the Supreme Court, the Bible-reading case and the multiple marriages of Justice Douglas. Legislation to curb the judiciary suddenly revived in the chamber. The House rallied around Pool who vowed that he would go to jail if necessary to frustrate "the judicial control of our government," a somewhat visionary commitment which he said he owed "to the boys fighting in Vietnam in the foxholes." From the hysterical outpourings one would never have guessed that for more than 150 years federal courts have reviewed acts of Congress or that the committee's mandate raised a profound constitutional issue.

Pool thus opened the hearings on August 16 with the additional and dubious mission of defending the corporate dignity and prerogatives of the House against judicial usurpation. Hearings of the committee in recent years have been nearly calamitous. Beginning with the San Francisco demonstrations in 1960, the committee's key hearings have been marked by a growing resistance. The Women Strike for Peace hearings in 1962; the Cuba hearings in 1963 and the Chicago hearings in 1965 punched large holes in the committee's dignity and popularity. Five successive Supreme Court cases—the most recent in June of this year by a unanimous Court, an unprecedented setback—had rebuked the committee's procedures. Only two weeks earlier, on August 2, the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia had invalidated the contempt conviction of three antiwar figures who had refused to testify before the committee on December 7, 1964.

How was this battered invalid, supported in the House primarily by the Southerners as a means of keeping alive the Red issue, to impress skeptical Americans with the importance of its anti-subversive mission, and at the same time to redeem the dignity of a Congress which felt itself insulted by a judicial intervention in its investigative processes?

The committee's attempts to clothe its inquiry with dignity showed a delightful touch of Gilbert and Sullivan. As the hearing progressed, a score of Congressmen dropped in to show their solidarity. They tripped over one another on the overcrowded dais as the chairman cordially welcomed them to the proceedings. After duly checking in and contemplating the proceedings with the air of a man whose fascination with a steam shovel has delayed his return from lunch, they made way for new arrivals. A strange note was struck by the seating on the dais of whole Congressional families, including kindergartners restlessly squirming in their chairs. Chairman Pool fondly flourished a new gavel ornamented with six different flags including, he explained, "the Texas, Confederate and American" flags.

The hearing was a frail support for the dignity of Congress for other reasons. Even before the hearing had begun, the committee had leaked the names of several subpoenaed witnesses to a favorite journalist. A committee investigator had obtained from Stanford University lists of student members of certain registered campus organizations. It had used its subpoena power to extract from student activity directors at Berkeley and Ann Arbor similar lists of names. These names are furnished to the university administration by the students for the limited purpose of establishing the identity of an organization and a source of responsibility for its activities. Students at the institutions involved are disgusted not only with HUAC but with the spineless willingness of university administrators to collaborate with HUAC in invading the students' freedom of association and academic freedom.

The committee's best hope of justifying its investigation and at the same time redeeming the dignity of the House was to document the gravity of the evil it was purportedly investigating and the importance of the bill under consideration. But neither its friendly witnesses nor its own members made credible its contention that the war was being hampered by student contributions to the International Red Cross, an activity which Sen. Robert F. Kennedy has endorsed. Nor did HUAC explain why existing laws were inadequate to deal with the obstruction of military transportation. And as for the bill itself, it is atrociously drafted and bristles with constitutional threats to dissent, infirmities which led the American Civil Liberties Union to give militant, determined leadership to the resistance to the committee's hearings.

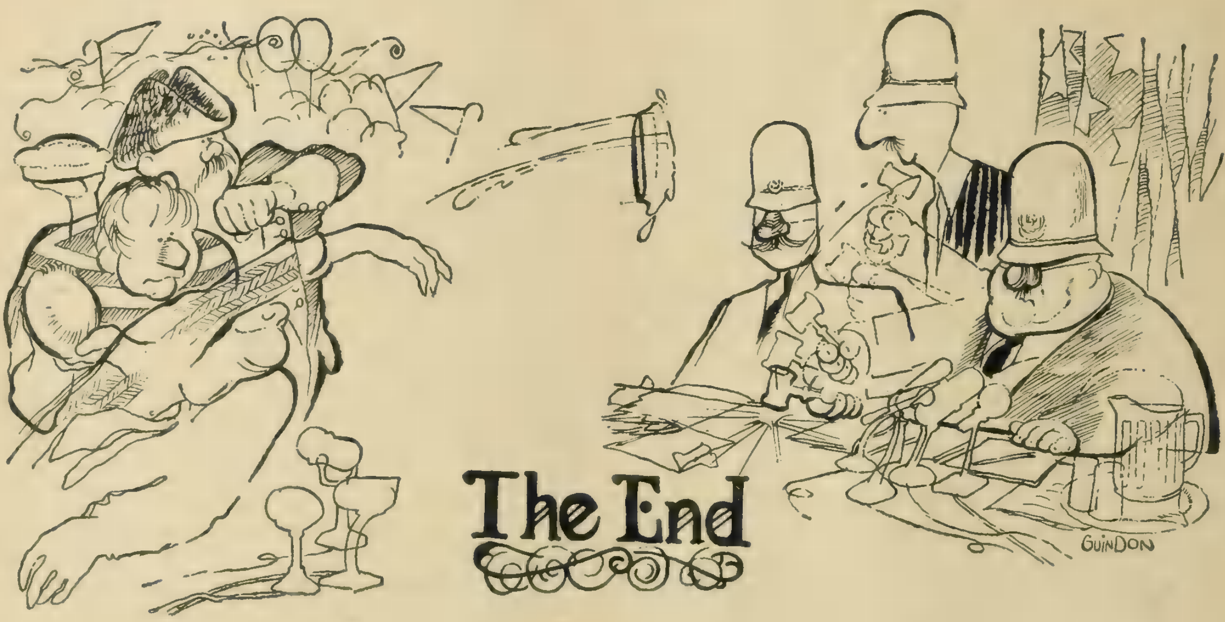
Will the committee persist in conducting its hearings after this most recent circus? Some have claimed that the House will rally around HUAC to give it a new lease on life. But its future looks most unhappy, haunted as it will be by a new breed of fire-breathing witness, clamoring to testify, deaf to the committee's coaxing to plead one of the good old amendments, clinging tenaciously to the witness chair after the chairman has cried, "Hold, enough."

Of course, the committee might avoid this fate by limiting its subpoenas to unfriendly witnesses over 40—if there are any left. Or perhaps now that Sen. Everett Dirksen has added his voice to those who have condemned the committee for its investigative follies and legislative futility, the House may decide to abolish this Congressional posse.



RUSSIAN SUMMER

THE WORRIED VACATIONISTS

ALEXANDER WERTH

Moscow

To sum up in a sentence my impressions of three summer weeks in Russia: "This would be a very happy country—and a freer one—but for the war in Vietnam."

The Russians have never been so prosperous. Their standard of living continues to be lower than that of Western Europe; certain foodstuffs, like butter and sugar, are still three or four times more dear. But conditions are incomparably better than they were two years ago. Food then was very short, and everybody grumbled openly about Khrushchev. Today I talked to a worker at the great ZIL auto plant in Moscow who had just spent his vacation in his native village near Vinnitsa, in one of the richest agricultural areas of the Ukraine. His line was that since the firing of "that parasite Khrushchev" and the famous plenary session of the Central Committee in March, 1965, things had changed drastically for the better in the Russian countryside. Not only were the members of the kolkhoz now free to own privately (without being heavily taxed) any number of cows and pigs and geese and chickens but, more important, they had been given decisive financial inducements to work hard on the "collective" land itself, until recently neglected. Thus, his sister's family had been allocated 6 acres of collective land on which they were to grow sugar beet; and for this work they were paid an additional 120 rubles (roughly $130). Apart from their food deliveries to the state, the farmers could now sell enormous quantities in the kolkhoz markets in nearby towns. Eggs were so plentiful that the villagers ate huge omelets every day, since the state would not buy eggs without limit, and the kolkhoz markets had been saturated. Almost every farm in this kolkhoz now had television; a minimum wage was being introduced among the members of the kolkhoz, and old people in the villages were for the first time receiving pensions.

My Ukrainian acquaintance's story was corroborated by similar ones about conditions on the Don, in the Kuban and other rich parts of Russia. Although central and northern Russia were not quite as prosperous, the general impression that emerged was that, perhaps for the first time since the revolution, there was a remarkable improvement in the agricultural situation, which had always been difficult under Stalin and not much better under Khrushchev. The Russian climate is unreliable and the stability of this prosperity cannot be taken for granted, but all the Russians I talked to felt that the corner had at last been turned. It was expected that the present "competition" between the kolkhoz markets and the state shops would, before long, result in a general lowering of prices. It should be remembered that a few years ago, under Khrushchev, prices in the state shops and, consequently, in the markets were sharply increased.

Great credit for these notable improvements is given to the "collective leadership" now ruling the Soviet Union, and above all perhaps to Prime Minister Kosygin. He is not a "monument" like Stalin, nor a flashy and noisy personality like Khrushchev. Indeed, he is not impressive either as a personality or a speaker, and is said to be suffering from a stomach ulcer. But he is an able economist, the head of a large team of technocrats, who speaks like the chairman of a board of directors. He is brief and concise; he does not boast, but, on the contrary, tends to stress, as he did in his Supreme Soviet speech on August 3, the numerous deficiencies in the Soviet economic system which must still be corrected. He admitted then that there was still a wide gap between industrial and agricultural production, but spoke of the numerous concrete measures that had already been taken and would continue to be taken to narrow it. Kosygin's businesslike and scientific approach to economic problems, so different from Khrushchev's fruitless brain waves and improvisations, has won him great respect, but a respect free of hero worship or "cult." This also is something new in Russia.

August is the peak month for otpuski—summer vacations—and railway stations and airports are thronged with crowds, the immense fleet of commercial planes having made air travel (which is very cheap in Russia) a routine matter for most people. In Moscow and Leningrad one hardly meets a child in August; all have been sent away to holiday camps.

I have started this article with a few references to holidays, growing prosperity and the greatly improved food situation, because these are all relevant to the extremely tense international situation created throughout the world, and not least in the Soviet Union, by the war in Vietnam. Russia today is a flourishing economic concern and, having lost 20 million people in a war that ended only twenty years ago, there is nothing its people hate more than the thought of another which would—to say the least—ruin once again its hard-won prosperity. That is why, even in the holiday atmosphere of August, the war in Vietnam is causing the greatest anxiety. In his speech on August 3, Kosygin was studiously moderate in his treatment of the situation. He stressed once again that "peaceful coexistence" with the capitalist countries was, in present circumstances (that is, with the power of total atomic destruction on both sides) an "objective necessity." He even qualified his condemnation of American policy in Vietnam by expressing the hope that the more sane and reasonable people in America would ultimately gain the upper hand and stop the war. But he made it plain (as he had already made it plain to Mrs. Gandhi and to Harold Wilson) that he could not make any diplomatic moves which might be interpreted as lack of faith in the Vietnamese people's power and determination to resist, or as a disavowal of the conditions laid down by Ho Chi Minh himself. The Soviet Union, he said, would help the people of Vietnam to drive the American aggressors from their land. (Loud applause.)

Beaton, Toronto Star: Ben Roth

"Charlie Is My Darling"

The true complexity of the situation may be seen from a variety of contradictions. The official Russian line extols the "invincibility" of the people of Vietnam; at the same time, every opportunity is taken to characterize the war as murder perpetrated by the entire technical might of the United States. "Genocide" is the term applied by Russians again and again to describe the exploits of the American Air Force, and the parallel they draw is bitter: "What Hitler did with gas chambers President Johnson is doing with napalm, poison gas and other masterpieces of American technology."

Despite the moderation of Kosygin's official speeches, anger against the United States is mounting rapidly. (Armored doors and iron window bars have recently been installed at the U.S. Embassy in Moscow where the staff expects any day an outburst of mass violence.) The entirely genuine popular sympathy for the people of Vietnam was reflected in the declaration in favor of increased aid to Vietnam published by the Supreme Soviet.

Everyone hopes, of course, that Vietnam will resist long enough to make a switch in American opinion inevitable. Once this becomes apparent, Kosygin may even depart from the current hard-and-fast line of sticking to North Vietnam's Four Points and the Vietcong's Five Points, with their demand for total evacuation of U.S. forces. But, for the present, all the Russians can do is supply all possible help to Vietnam—not that there is any great illusion that America's increased air losses (due to Russian aid) will make the Pentagon give up.

The situation is further complicated by China. If there is very strong feeling against the United States in Russia, there is an equally (or almost equally) strong feeling against China. Russians have been reminding me repeatedly that when Kosygin last saw Mao in 1965, the latter said: "It is for small countries like Vietnam to sacrifice themselves for the world revolution." This does not sit at all well with the Russians, but, all the same, they are avoiding an open quarrel with the Chinese on this "world-revolution" issue. Much more significant is the strong Russian suspicion that the Chinese would like to provoke a war between the Soviet Union and the United States. Another common observation in Moscow is that every possible obstacle is being put in the way of shipping Russian equipment to Vietnam via China. The theory is that the Chinese want it taken by sea, so that Soviet ships may be sunk by the American Navy.

In short, the Russians are angry with both America and China because both constitute a danger of war to them. On the other hand, de Gaulle is today their most popular foreign statesman—even though, on the issue of Germany, the French and Russians failed on the face of it to reach agreement. Like the Russians, de Gaulle is acutely conscious of the fearful dangers of the Vietnamese conflict, and is for them "a real man of peace." As for Great Britain, Kosygin declared that there was every reason why relations with that country should be good, but that there was no hope of serious improvement as long as Britain supported the war in Vietnam.

If there is danger that the war may lead to a conflict between Russia and the United States, there is also a danger of a war between the United States and China. This might result from a direct American attack on China, or from China's decision to hit out if it fears that North Vietnam is on the point of cracking up. What would the Russians do then? Here we are in the realm of speculation, but one thing is certain: the theory current in some American quarters that "nothing would suit the Russians better than a Chinese-American war" has no foundation in fact. Bad though their relations are with China at the present time, the Russians know that they could not keep out of such a war.

The war in Vietnam has had some ominous repercussions inside Russia. A cry has gone up for greater "vigilance" (a phenomenon typical of the cold-war years of 1946-53 under Stalin)—vigilance, for instance, with respect to foreigners traveling off the beaten Intourist track; vigilance toward any breaches of discipline; very severe punishment of even "petty hooliganism," and so on.

One effect of the Vietnamese war I found particularly striking and even surprising and shocking. Last winter the two writers, Siniavsky and Daniel, were tried and sentenced to seven and five years' hard labor for publishing abroad "slanderous" and "libelous" books on the Soviet Union. The story told in Moscow now is that a special committee of the Central Committee had to decide whether or not to hold the trial. The minority, including Kosygin and Furtseva (Minister of Culture) were against it; the majority, comprising die-hards like Shelepin and Suslov (with Brezhnev abstaining), were for it. The great majority of Russian intellectuals were genuinely disgusted by the trial, even though some, like Ehrenburg, admitted that its purpose was to discourage widespread cynicism and nihilism among the young.

During my present stay in Moscow I had numerous talks with prominent Russian writers who, I knew, had been very hostile to the Siniavsky-Daniel trial when it was in progress. Their line now had altered sharply. They described the two writers as "unpatriotic," "double-crossing," and only regretted that they had been sent to jail. It would have been better simply to throw them out, as Tarsis had been thrown out, since they made it so clear that they did not like living in the Soviet Union.

When I asked one of my writer friends why he had changed his mind—for he was known to have been strongly opposed to the trial and the verdict—he answered: "Look, I am a liberal, but there are times when such ultra-liberalism as allowing the Siniavskys and Daniels to write whatever they like and hee-haw mercilessly about the Soviet system is excessive. Things have changed since last winter; we are now on the brink of war. This is no time for smart-alecky cynicism. We've got to close our ranks. When the war in Vietnam is over, we can talk again about the merits of Siniavsky and Daniel and write satire about ourselves; now the situation is far, far too serious."

There is no doubt that the war in Vietnam has created a stern anti-liberal mood in Russia. It would be a mistake to speak of a return to Stalinism, but, as the changed attitude to the writers' trial shows, a marked hardening of the regime can be expected, with the introduction of wartime discipline in all fields. If the war in Vietnam continues, the harder line may even meet with broad popular approval.

HEAD START TO WHAT?

IVOR KRAFT

Mr. Kraft is Child Development and Parent Education specialist with the United States Children's Bureau in Washington, D.C. He writes here in his private capacity as an educator; no support or endorsement by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare is intended or should be inferred.

Project Head Start, the program that put more than half a million 4 and 5 year olds in preschools last summer, is by far the most popular piece of the anti-poverty package. To cast aspersions on Head Start, loved by all, is like taking a public stand against mother's home-baked pie. But just how important is formal preschooling for the average human being? The little scientific evidence we have indicates that it is not very important at all. Fewer than 10 per cent of Americans have attended preschool, and there is nothing to show that the other 90 per cent suffer any significant lacks.

Most of us do believe, and with some justification, that the first five or six years of life are highly significant. This is not a new idea. As the late 18th-century poet John Paul Richter put it: "If we regard all life as an educational institution, a circumnavigator of the world is less influenced by all the nations that he has seen than by his nurse." By now we may have carried this idea too far. Common sense dictates that if the first five years of human life are important, there must be at least some point in what occurs during the next sixty-five.

What we do not yet know about human growth and development probably exceeds what we do know. Still, it is not hard to come up with an acceptable recipe for producing that vague if recognizable commodity, a "good human being." Even without knowledge of how the ingredients combine and interact, the recipe goes like this: Take a biologically sound infant, place him in the steady care of reasonably well functioning parents (or parent surrogates), expose him step by step to age-appropriate normative experiences of his small world, protect him from excessive physical and psychological shocks, provide him with suitable vocational outlooks and potentialities and a code of ethics, gradually let go of him as he approaches adulthood.

Note that this is a universal recipe. Depending on geography and culture it will produce a good Kikuyu tribesman, a loyal daughter of Russia, a Saudi Arabian oligarch or a constructive American citizen.

Note also that the formula makes no mention of schooling or education as such, for formal pedagogical influences are derivative to specific cultures. This is not to deny that schooling is essential in some cultures—ours for one—because it may be the chief influence with respect to the part of the recipe that refers to "vocational outlooks and potentialities."

At no time has preschooling been an essential part of this recipe anywhere in the world. Yet nurseries and kindergartens fulfill an important social function in most advanced societies. During the time of their war of liberation Israeli settlers gained a new respect for their group-care methods in infancy and early childhood, and the British learned a similar lesson about nurseries during the desperate time of the Nazi blitz. There are ample reasons why preschools are so popular in the Soviet Union where working mothers are even more numerous than they are in our country, and where private housing conditions are often inferior. And the middle-class American mother, who appreciates a few free hours during the morning or afternoon, would be in a bad fix if all those convenient nursery schools were to shut their doors.

We can summarize with an instructive generalization: preschooling is chiefly a convenience to the individual parent or the community of adults; it is not chiefly a boon to the child. Certainly, this is not to say that preschool is harmful to the child. It merely makes the point that, other things being equal, we have no evidence that preschool contributes anything essential or particularly valuable to the child's development.

But sometimes other things most definitely are not equal. What if the adult caretaker is highly incompetent? What if the surroundings of the child are so cheerless or even damaging that there is no freedom for healthy play? What if the child has special or marked handicaps? Under such circumstances it is at least possible for a good preschool to be a boon to the child as well as a convenience to the parent.

◆

This brings us to the rationale for Project Head Start. It is operated out of the Office of Economic Opportunity as a major plank in the anti-poverty push. But preschooling can never be a major antidote for poverty. It is too far removed from the root causes. The major specific remedies have to do with jobs, income maintenance, housing, racial discrimination, the overall urban environment and the cultural and spiritual upgrading of community life. The last category is foggy but necessary, and preschooling does have something to contribute to it, but very little in comparison with what can be done in the school years beyond nursery and kindergarten.

Well, yes, the Head Start people will admit when pressed, we know we really aren't fighting poverty directly, but we are providing poor people with a good social service and a means for getting their children beyond "cultural deprivation." Education is the key to job preparation and success in life, and poor 4 and 5 year olds just can't cope with school. That is where we come in. We give them a head start—a long-term basic investment, with a pay-off fifteen or twenty years later.

Unfortunately, this is a weak argument. One of the major selling points of a good middle-class three-hour-a-day nursery school is that it gives the mother a chance to be responsibly relieved of the care of her child for a portion of the day, while the child learns how to "live and share in a group." In other words, children learn not only from the teacher but from one another. Presumably some good things rub off, and some bad things get rubbed out. No one pretends that it turns the children into little scholars or that it sets them up for a quick start in life.

But what is being claimed for preschools for the "culturally deprived"? The assumption is that fifteen or so homogeneously "inferior" children will spend a few hours a day in the care of an ordinary or even untrained teacher and that they will be exposed to certain types of intellectual experiences. With respect to group living, what will they learn from one another that they have not already learned from older brothers or sisters, or that they will not unlearn as soon as they return to the predominating environment? (In the good middle-class nursery there is an emphatic continuity of experience between home and school.) With respect to intellectual experiences, what will they learn that is so crucial that it cannot await the first grade? Can we expect to turn them into little scholars when we do not even attempt this with more "advantaged" youngsters? Can we do it on the basis of perhaps fifteen or twenty minutes of deliberately structured intellectual experiences? (Remember, we have to allow for dressing and undressing, juice time, rest time, outdoor play, toileting, transitioning, etc.)

Head Start people are sometimes urged to build their programs with the use of neighborhood facilities, such as church basements or renovated store fronts, and staffed with "indigenous workers"—often a euphemism for high school dropouts and welfare mothers. Perhaps, but it is doubtful that effective childhood education in our society can be operated out of dank church basements under the management of illiterate high school dropouts. It is unrealistic to suppose that adolescents, themselves the products of an inferior education and a neglected upbringing, can be put through six- or eight-week "workshops" and foisted off as "subprofessional aides." We cannot compel one program to succeed at the expense of another. It is not educational innovation to expect unsalvaged 17 or 18 year olds to salvage themselves by becoming the chief caretakers, at $1.25 an hour, of 3 and 4 years olds from the slums. This is garden-variety baby sitting—not early childhood education. Slum children need the best, not the worst.

To date there is practically no sound research evidence to support the expected achievements of Head Start. The most that can be claimed for the program is that it "keeps the children off the streets," submits them to a medical screening, yields a 5-to-10-point gain in IQ, and causes a 6 year old to make a better adjustment to first grade. A 7- or 8-point rise in IQ is not very much. It does not mean that a new fount of intelligence has been tapped in the child's psyche, or that the child has been launched on a promising school career.

Assuming that the tests are well administered, to go from an IQ of 100 to 130, or from 120 to 150, may represent a formidable leap, if this gain proves to be genuine and sustained. But to move from a score of 81 to 88, or from 97 to 105, may mean a gain in "easy" or "cheap" points, a gain in routine practice effects or certain rather low-level manipulative skills. It is one thing to take a child who has never seen a piano and drill him to the point where he can play chopsticks. It is something else to give this child the kind of basic music education that will enable him to play a simple Chopin waltz or Beethoven sonata, and then gradually proceed to advanced stages of musical skill. Almost anyone (including mental retardates) can be drilled to master chopsticks, but many an average music pupil, even under good tutelage, drops by the wayside before mastering elementary Beethoven.

The odd thing about the IQ effect is that almost any kind of preschool offering—eight weeks or one year, enriched or unenriched, taught by highly organized task masters or completely permissive teachers—seems to yield the same 5-to-10-point average IQ gain. This would appear to be additional evidence that these point gains are trivial and not especially revealing. What would we lose by achieving this gain in the child's seventh (first grade) year rather than his fourth to sixth years? Of course, it may be "too late" by the seventh year, although there is no evidence to prove this. At best, schooling and education are slow, cumulative, and for all of life—it is life—and cannot be compared with the 100-yard dash, where a head start of even two seconds may distinguish success from failure.

The obvious effect of preschooling is that the child is trained to the routine of the classroom. He learns to sit in a circle, take turns, mind the teachers, and familiarize himself with the prerogatives and taboos of being an individual in a classroom group. It would be strange indeed if first-grade teachers did not report that Head Start children tend to "make a better adjustment to the classroom setting." Similarly, it would be odd if a troop of adolescents who spent six or eight weeks in the summer hanging around a poolroom did not perform somewhat better at a billiards test when compared with a matched group of teen-agers who had merely spent the summer in remedial reading. But unless a first-grade teacher thinks of herself as a sergeant-at-arms, whose task it is to slap down or evict the unruly, she ought to be able to win over 6 year olds to an enlightened classroom routine even in the absence of prior preschool conditioning.

We need to beware lest Head Start deteriorate into a cheap anti-poverty substitute containing a few hidden snares. Once we provide a convenient dumping ground for children of lower-class mothers, we can tell the mothers to hustle off and get themselves jobs— such as domestics in the homes of nice middle-class ladies who send their own children to quality nurseries or else take good care of them at home. Class and racially segregated preschools—which may become the norm for Head Start centers—can serve to engrave even more deeply the now rampant anti-democratic patterns in our public school systems. In this respect Head Start may merely enroll parents and children as an early acclimatization device to de facto segregation.

Head Start does not belong in a war on poverty and should be removed from the Office of Economic Opportunity. The oversell about a "head start" should be quietly abandoned and instead a plan should be drawn up to give this nation a network of top-quality day care and early childhood centers as a right and entitlement of all parents who choose to use them, regardless of income and residence. At all costs these centers must be integrated with respect to race and class.

The genuine and unpretentious rationale for the early childhood center is not that it replaces the home or compensates for poverty but that it provides a necessary and convenient auxiliary emotional and physical center for young children. It strengthens family life; it dissipates certain tensions and strains in our crowded urban societies; it can be a grass-roots, democratizing social service when it does not practice race and class separatism.

A baby watcher merely polices the children and keeps them out of trouble. She is not required to show imagination or ingenuity or deep understanding in responding to a child's often puzzling and inexplicable behavior. In the course of a few hours with a group of preschoolers a genuine teacher has to handle a constantly unfolding series of creative spurts, moody withdrawals, aggressive acts, obscure questions and comments, appeals for love, flash tantrums, and "please leave me alone" signals from the child. The teacher has to decide instantaneously how and when to get involved, when to stand to one side. He is anything but a passive policeman and watcher. His methods may be elusive and hard to define, but anyone who has observed a really competent and experienced educator of youngsters knows that there is considerable skill involved, based chiefly on psychological techniques of stimulation and control, as well as on deep understanding of creative media and the learning processes in the very young. Many middle-class mothers, but not all, can master these skills in handling one or two children. But it takes an entirely different level of professionalism to manage ten or fifteen children in a group, while exhibiting the same sensitivity and concern as does the gifted mother.

To get beyond custodial care, habit training and the cutting and pasting or formboard kind of busy work—which admittedly may yield that five or ten point increase in IQ scores—requires that young children be cared for by well-trained, responsive and thoroughly competent teachers who couldn't care less about IQ scores and who do not think of themselves as sergeants-at-arms. Middle-aged sentimentalists, old-age termagants or inarticulate adolescents should not work with young children merely because they say they love them and think they can manage them. We want professionally trained teachers with a demonstrated command of skills. For the time being, such teachers are exceedingly hard to find.

Assuming that we want to put 1 million children in early childhood centers—a thoroughly realistic goal and one that is being voiced among Head Start people—what will this require?

We do not have enough experience or sound research data on costs and plans to make exact calculations, but the following round-figure estimates are probably not too far off the mark:

¶ About 70,000 fully trained, competent teachers. This amounts to one for every fifteen children, which must be considered the minimum ratio.

¶ Between 3,500 and 7,000 well-designed, well-equipped centers. The projection is on the basis of one center for between 150 and 300 children, although obviously some communities will require smaller centers, and some of our major cities may want to experiment with even larger campuses, no doubt broken down in sub-schools or small-unit clusters.

¶ About 200,000 aides and auxiliary personnel. These would be at various stages of competence, skill and training, including men as well as women, performing the work of maids, janitorial assistants, et al. The estimate—very rough—is one such person for every five children enrolled in the center (not including the professionally trained teacher).

¶ An annual operating budget of about $2 billion. Again, this is a very rough estimate, based on $2,000 per child. It will probably not be manageable with less than this, if we project the average stay of a child in the center as between six and eight hours. Obviously, some will stay only two and three hours, and a few may actually require being present in the center for as many as twelve hours, although the extended day can be only rarely recommended. We are not going to design and implement this kind of program overnight. But with vigorous, step-by-step planning, we can bring it into being in ten or twelve years.

Project Head Start may be an example of an error fairly common in the history of American social innovation: a potentially good program is oversold for the wrong reasons and gets bungled in the implementation. (Something like this happened with the welfare apparatus of the 1930s; it is now so rotten that it deserves to be entirely junked.)

But it does not have to turn out this way. With a gross national product of almost $750 billion we can easily afford to spend $2 billion a year on a network of quality early childhood centers. (Although it may be cut, Head Start's current budget calls for around $300 million.) Meanwhile, nothing terrible is going to happen to the poverty program or America's children if we take the necessary ten or fifteen years to go about it in the proper way.

If we do not, if we allow Head Start to degenerate into a headlong start and a doubtful finish, we may well end up with the kind of mess that we now have in our inner-city slum schools, one that will take at least a full generation's work to remedy.

There are only two roads which Head Start can follow. The first is a cheap, massive, harum-scarum program buttressed by false claims, publicity stunts, IQ gimmickry, and the pretense of eight-week short courses for 4 year olds as a major means of salvaging Americans from poverty. The second is a step-by-step, carefully planned campaign to give America a network of model preschool and day-care centers manned by excellent teachers and serving "all the children of all the people" as a downward extension of our democratic common school system.

LATIN AMERICA II

SEARCH FOR A POLITICS

EDGAR A. TRIVERI

Mr. Triveri, stationed in Santiago de Chile, is the Latin American editor of Inter Press Service, the Latin American News Agency.

One of the most important facts about politics in Latin America today is that the various sets of guiding ideas which were accepted not long ago as valid beyond question are now discredited. Principles that seemed sufficiently demonstrated a few decades ago are again under skeptical scrutiny and in need of further proof. This applies both to traditional political doctrines and to the more recent dogmas, and is extended even to the motives of those who profess them.

The debate is not so much on the theoretical validity of existing doctrines as on the results they have achieved. It might be argued that it is hardly convincing to evaluate an ideology exclusively on the basis of performance. After all, Latin America is a region so beset by contradictions and problems as to jeopardize the soundest of principles. Also, to take one set of political ideas, Social Democracy has not yet had a full chance, except in Costa Rica and Venezuela; and in fact it can be reasonably contended that many Latin American countries have had no significant political experience aside from an almost unbroken succession of authoritarian governments.

The fact remains, however, that political groups dominated by established ideologies rather than by personalities have been consistently losing ground in the area during the last decades, even though the lack of adequate alternatives tends to cloud the evidence. Elections in Colombia or Uruguay, for instance, may show that voters still support liberals and conservatives under their various labels. But many of these voters register with the established parties and go to the polls in the same spirit that one applies for a job — and often for the same reason. In addition, the numerous splinter groups into which these parties are divided and, in some cases, the efforts made to institutionalize them as the only possible options, are further proof of their decline.

Liberalism, under whose influence most of Latin America moved from anarchy into some sort of organization during the last century, soon became a mere slogan. In practice, liberals were as authoritarian in Latin America as conservatives, and frequently belonged to the same upper class. They were responsible for introducing the abstract ideas of progress and political freedom and did in fact manage to install universal suffrage in some countries, as well as a measure of economic growth. However, liberalism failed to lay a solid foundation for building modern states in Latin America. The creole oligarchies remained indirectly in power, paying willing lip service to radical ideas that did not in practice affect their class interests.

The Spanish system of values, coupled with the lack of meaningful efforts to promote structural changes, worked as a brake on liberalism; the absence of significant middle sectors in the economy doomed it from the outset. The importance of hierarchy, disproportionate wealth based on land or mines and cheap labor, a structural order imposed by the conquistadores, had remained essentially unchanged in Latin America until the early part of this century. The small group that benefited from this situation managed to survive the wars of independence, the period of anarchy and the subsequent reconstruction almost intact. It expressed itself primarily through the conservative parties, which basically were organized to protect the vertical system that made the privilege possible. The upper class was not motivated by any ideology. Its wealth was linked to foreign markets, but it had roots in the land, and paradoxically was looked upon with less suspicion than were the urban liberal "doctors" who, in the eyes of the rural masses, spoke and lived like foreigners.

LIBERACION
VIVA

Conservative Catholicism accepted the Spanish system as natural law. What the conquistador implanted, the cassocks baptized. Thus the vertical social and economic order was legitimized: the authority of the state or of the landowner must be acknowledged; rebellion was contrary to divine precept. The peasants, the mine workers, the exploited classes as a whole could appeal only at a much higher level — and not in this life.

Having failed in the face of this sanctioned tradition to transform Latin America into modern states (Uruguay, Chile and Argentina are to a degree exceptions), abstract liberalism could offer very little. However, most of the region was beginning to experience a slow, organic change. A continuous flow of immigrants began to move into some of the countries. They brought no worldly goods but they did bring an ancestral thirst for land and work. And some of them imported the relatively new ideas of anarchism and Marxism. Soon the first trade unions were established. Socialist parties were founded at the turn of the century in Argentina and Uruguay. When World War I broke out, Latin America was cut off from industrial supplies and consumer goods. A start toward an incipient industrialization was prompted in several countries. Growing demands for administrative machinery, for trade and industry, and for the skills of a civil service broadened the base for a middle class. Students in Argentina rose against their educational system, thus setting in motion a reaction that was to transform education throughout the whole region. The first party to promote a blend of nationalism and mild non-Marxist socialism was founded by Peru's Victor Raúl Haya de la Torre, the American Popular and Revolutionary Alliance (APRA). Trade unions began to grow, and politicians soon took heed of their potentialities. From 1914-18, to the 1929 crisis, to the Second World War, Latin America slowly moved away from pre-capitalism, and the components of more complex societies appeared in varying degrees. The result was more contradictions but also an increased political awareness.

In this period, issues instead of personalities or ideological generalizations became the basis for political debate. Free trade and the doctrine of laissez faire were analyzed in the light of concrete needs such as trade barriers and exchange controls. Debates about foreign investment and state control or ownership of certain basic resources acquired a real importance when the first quarrels over oil and ore deposits broke out in Peru, Argentina, Brazil, Mexico and Bolivia. Nationalism, which had been a state of mind or a latent feeling, turned into economic nationalism. Social welfare, labor legislation and economic planning provided real distinctions among the various groups. But World War II, which acted as a powerful catalyst in Latin America, also turned regional attention away from such problems.

The rise of fascism and Nazism — ideologies which quantitatively had little significance in Latin America — affected the whole area far beyond the economic and strategic impact of the ensuing war. The question of freedom or tyranny became the great issue. An area which had lived for centuries under authoritarian rule took the occasion of a distant international conflagration to condemn dictatorships. The real terms of the problem in its domestic context — backwardness vs. development — were not even mentioned. Latin America sold its raw materials at a low price to "save democracy," and Brazilians died in Monte Cassino. Liberals, conservatives, Socialists, Communists and some nationalists (except those who thought they saw in the eventual overwhelming catastrophe of the Allies an opportunity for greater independence) accepted the conflicts in the terms presented by war propaganda. This led to a new oversimplification: victory over tyranny would automatically produce more democracy. As applied to Latin America it meant that dictatorships would have to be overthrown and elections held in order to start a new era. Little or nothing was said about the pressing social and economic needs. They would solve themselves, it was thought, once representative democracy began to operate. Moreover, the warning that, considering the high illiteracy rates and the deep socio-economic gap, progress in some countries would be less than likely if pursued according to the doctrines of typical Western democracy, was flatly rejected as a Fascist view.

Thus a new abstraction came into being. It did not conform to reality and was interpreted as a mere smoke screen by many Latin Americans once the war was over. The easy appeal of Populism in Brazil, Argentina and Bolivia could be thought to confirm this judgment. Peron and Vargas did not rule exclusively on the basis of their strong personalities or sheer demagogy. Their followers were highly receptive to the new social legislation and working opportunities, and did not seem to care much that elections may have been rigged or that the opposition was gagged. They had suffered the same treatment from some of the democrats who had been less than orthodox when they had been in power a few years before. The fact that a dozen or so traditional dictatorships existed elsewhere in Latin America at the time, thriving on the people's underconsumption imposed by force, did not make things clearer — both the authoritarian governments that favored economic and social progress and the traditional "strong men" were grouped under the same label. They were equally opposed by the liberals, some conservatives and the Left.

The Latin American Marxist Left also opposed without discrimination both types of authoritarian governments. In so doing it reflected the nature of its social components. Socialism and communism are minority groups in the area and enlisted mostly from the professions, white-collar employees, intellectuals, students and smaller segments of the lower working class. Both parties are strictly urban, with no roots whatever in the vast rural areas where more than 60 per cent of Latin Americans live. Socialism has long evolved toward Social Democracy or modified versions of liberalism. One splinter group proclaims the need for Cuban-style revolutions and is equally opposed to the Right and to Communist peaceful coexistence. Communist parties have suffered from the vagaries of Moscow's political leadership. The fact that they see Latin America from a foreign perspective and act on behalf of an extra-continental power (Communists tried hard to convince Latin Americans that a pact with Nazi Germany was vitally needed, as if Hitler were getting ready to invade across the South Atlantic instead of into Soviet Russia), coupled with the lack of an ideological instrument adapted to local conditions, has greatly reduced Communist chances in Latin America. It can no longer be considered a short-range possibility, despite propaganda to the contrary, because its peaceful coexistence policy forces it to compete through elections (Venezuelan communism at war with the government has recently explored the possibilities of a truce). The Peking brand of communism is more of a trend than a party and operates within other groups.

The issue of democracy vs. dictatorships came to a critical point when United States policy ("there are good and bad strong men," Washington was given to say during the cold war) began a slow change. A certain measure of formal liberalization was introduced, and Latin American dictators were no longer made honorary members of American universities. Some of the leaders of the anti-dictatorial drive became chiefs of state and soon were faced with the old problems of socio-economic destitution under the pressure of the "rising expectations." A whole new technological approach to development through planning and reforms was formulated by the UN Economic Committee for Latin America, and was gradually adopted by a growing number of governments and institutions. However, it was the Cuban Revolution that triggered the dramatic transit from postwar formal liberalization to structural reforms. Under this influence the need for change attained respectability. Evolution and revolution became the opposite poles of the new political options.

Five years after the Alliance for Progress was launched at Punta del Este, economic and social development is still too slow to meet the needs arising from annual population growth. Food supply lags behind requirements, slums still mushroom in most Latin American capitals and balance of payment deficiencies continue to jeopardize development. Income distribution still heavily favors a privileged minority, and ten coups d'état in six years suggest that the concept of orderly progress is not faring well. However, the radical formula of the Cubans has lost much of its appeal, even though it may only be dormant and easily awakened if structural changes are not introduced in time.

Latin Americans are under rising pressures to move ahead. The interplay between these pressures and the set of available political options is causing a new polarization of forces in the area. Evolution through reform may still have a chance if it can amount to a virtual revolution in peace. Token changes — mainly to attract Alliance for Progress funds, as in Colombia where the so-called "social agrarian reform" has actually frozen the oligarchic structural system — will not stop the revolutionary tide. Outright opposition to reforms will only cause a deeper radicalization. On the other hand, economic surgery in the name of "monetarist" principles, as in Brazil, has paralyzed economic and social growth without even being able to control inflation.

One thing is certain: whatever the political labels assumed by the emerging groups, they will undoubtedly be influenced by modern nationalism. This may involve a reformulation of ideas to fit different circumstances and environments, the implementation of policies emphasizing mixed or direct state control of some basic resources, economic planning and specific provisions to regulate foreign investment. Beyond that, economic integration will continue to be promoted and may eventually become a regional supranationalism.

New popular dictators or military juntas may rise in Latin America, but they will not shape the future. Two sets of political ideas may grow: Christian Democracy in Chile, Peru, Venezuela, El Salvador and Guatemala, and in Colombia when the present institutional arrangement comes to an end in 1974; Social Democracy, under different labels, in Venezuela, Uruguay, Costa Rica, and perhaps even Argentina in the future. The lesson of the present Christian Democrat government in Chile may be stronger in countries where the socio-economic gap is deeper. Land reform is there being promoted in the name of social justice, moral tradition and even religion—terms that cannot readily be dismissed as "Communist" by the landowners.

If on the other hand progress falls short of expectations, or the dividends of economic growth fall into the hands of the minority groups, guerrilla warfare and banditry could well proliferate. And they would thrive similarly if other Bays of Pigs or Santo Domingos are triggered off by every decision to nationalize a United States company. Latin America is about to end a long "siesta." Once fully awake, it will certainly demand its full share in the Western Hemisphere.

LETTER FROM BRITAIN

RAYMOND WILLIAMS

Mr. Williams is a Fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge. He is the author of Culture and Society, The Long Revolution, and two novels, Border Country and Second Generation.

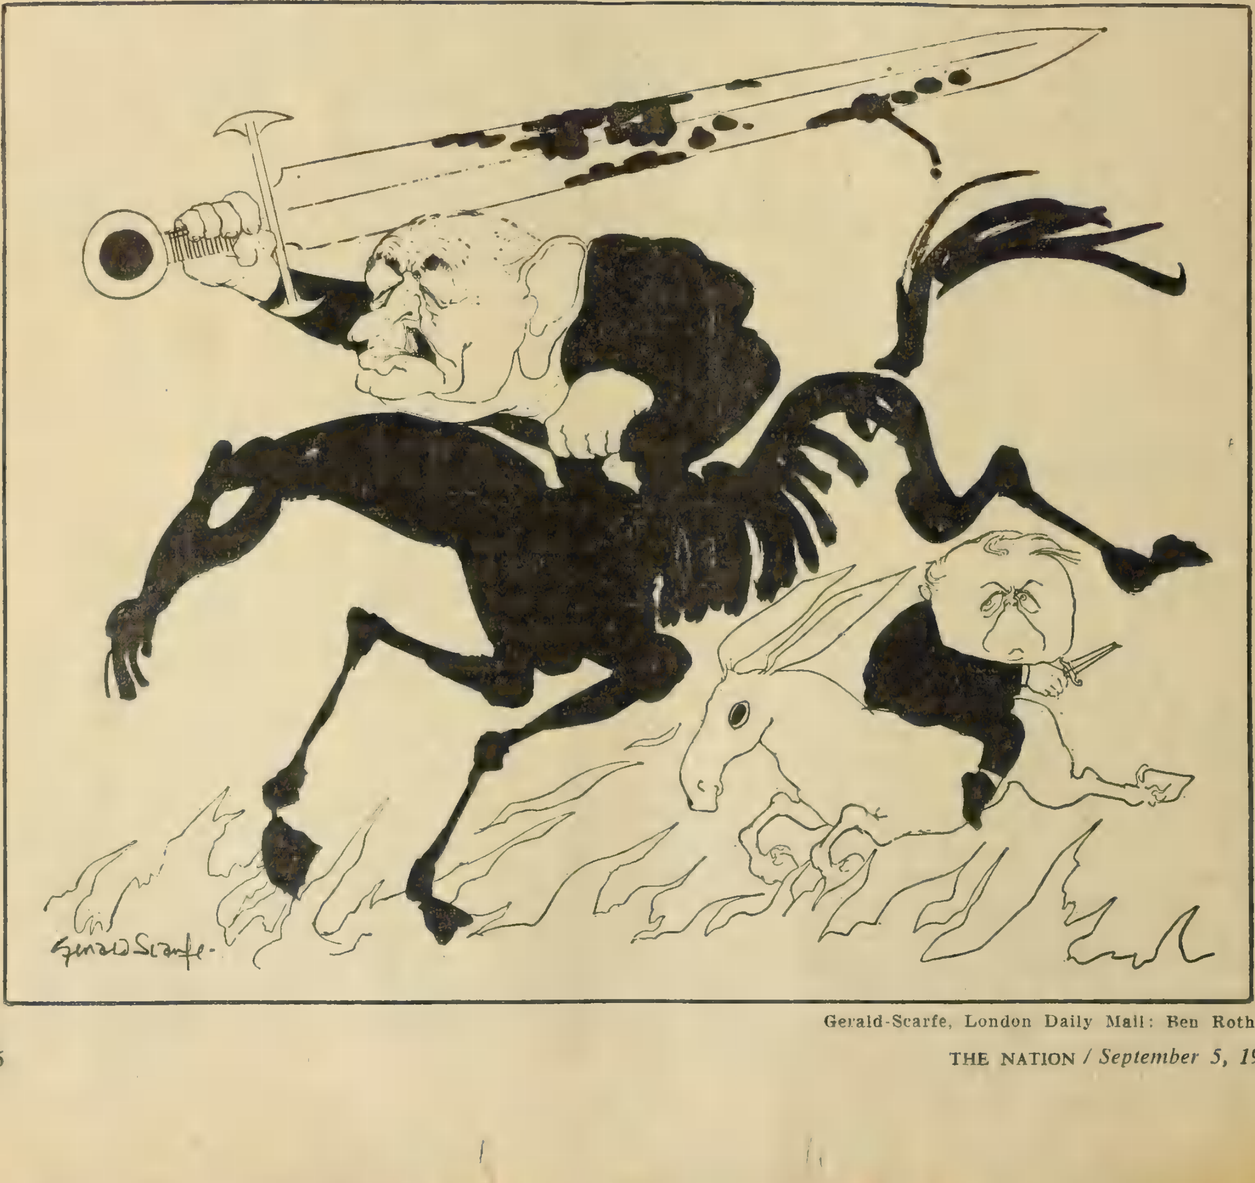
According to reports, July was a bad month for Britain. We had an economic crisis and a political crisis, and on the heels of both a prolonged yapping and snarling, in several languages, about our national degeneracy. Certainly it was hard on the nerves of most of us living here, though there was also a ready-made and pleasant distraction, when England won the world football championship. What I think now needs saying is that the crisis was in many ways welcome: it can never be a wholly bad time for a society when some of its deeper and more dangerous illusions are publicly broken.

The first illusion to go was the Labour government. For a few days it simply fell to pieces, and it can now only wait for the sheer persistence of established power to pick it up again. For many years, in Britain as in most similar societies, there has been an extreme personalization of politics: all attention is concentrated on whether Wilson, or some similar figure, is the man to save us. Another form of this personalization is the character of modern political parties, projecting not so much policies as general characteristics and impressions. The cult of the image, in leaders and parties, has been the most obvious evidence of this. A more precise example is the language now used in political journalism: words like "dynamic," "abrasive," "courageous," "candid" have no discoverable political content, but are part of the process of personalization. Such qualities or their absence, in this man or that party, are supposed to provide the grounds for political decision.

Rational argument has made little headway against this powerful process. But reality has now broken through, just a little. The most evident belief of the Labour leaders, when they took office, was that they were simply better men than the "tired, effete Conservatives." Were they not "young, vigorous, purposive"? Well, they may or may not have been, but it made little difference. Exactly like the Conservatives, and like all orthodox opinion, they failed to understand the actual crisis of the society. All they ever had were "postures": another word which, moving east across the Atlantic, was a consequence of personalization. There was then dramatic justice in what happened to Wilson and the others in July. They produced and must now defend the exact measures (in even more severe forms) which they had built their political careers by attacking. There is no need for anyone on the Left to say what is wrong with the wage freeze, the deliberate stagnation or cutback in production, the willing promotion of unemployment. It was all said, with great eloquence and on many occasions by Wilson himself, in his rise to the Labour leadership. Those dynamic and patriotic attacks on a policy are replaced by dynamic and patriotic defenses of the same policy: in each case, we are assured, Wilson showed his "guts."

Some people have reacted to this spectacle by talking about betrayal, but that is too simple. Certainly we can observe in such a man a remarkable degree of alienation. To be "purposive" about having no steady purpose is an extreme kind of dissociation. Yet the real lesson to be learned from the public collapse of these men cannot be put in personal terms at all. The important lesson is the breaking of a political model. To very many people, the British Labour Party has seemed a model for social democratic change in advanced societies. But we have now seen what happens to even a strong and experienced reformist party, within the pressures of modern imperialism and capitalism. What we might now be able to do is to look at the pressures themselves: that is, to get back to politics, and away from image politics. I think there is a chance of doing this, because one important factor in the recent crisis was the absence of any credible alternative political leaders. The neurotic reaction of turning to other idols to replace those fallen has not occurred. Nobody can say, and nobody is really saying: "If only Dynamic So-and-So were there, or Vigorous What-do-you-call-him, there would be no crisis."

What then is this crisis? Basically, it is a contradiction between the actual size of the British economy and the world-wide imperialist role which, under present circumstances, the British ruling class is still trying to play. It is not, in simple terms, an economic crisis at all. On ordinary trading account, Britain is already paying its way. The repeated deficit in overseas payments arises from expenditure of two kinds: first, military; second, capital investment



Gerald Scarfe.

Gerald-Scarfe, London Daily Mail: Ben Roth abroad. If these two items could be substantially cut back, there would be no economic crisis. But to say that is naive. Each policy follows directly from the present character of British society as a whole. The capital investment abroad and the maintenance of the pound sterling as an international trading currency are in the direct interest of our most powerful commercial and financial groups. The extraordinary structure of debt and credit that has been raised around these interests imprisons any government, whatever its political program. To break free of this structure would be to break free of the central power of modern capitalism. A peripheral measure, like the proposed nationalization of steel, may still just be possible, although even here the pressure of foreign bankers can be mobilized against it. But on the central issues of British economic policy, the power of British financial interests is still decisive, especially when they can act in concert with the international banking world. The sterling crisis of July had no real causes in our general position. It was a turn of the screw, by the British and overseas financial community, to force a Labour government to control the British labor movement. As the labor movement, and especially the trade unions, fight back, the screw will undoubtedly be tightened again.

This sounds a familiar analysis from earlier periods. In all the recent years of phony politics there has been a steady abandonment, even by most Socialists, of what was once the central Socialist case. It is very easy, now, to sneer at "old, outdated Socialist slogans," but that, precisely, is the measure of the victory of capitalist opinion making. Our politics became superficial as a way of confining the democratic process to something like commercial sport or entertainment, with rival stars and teams, and endless nebulous publicity campaigns. That, incidentally, is why our New Left was right, back in the fifties, to identify publicity and opinion forming — the whole world of communications — as our most urgent social issue. Now what could not be finally demonstrated by argument is being demonstrated by public breakdown. We shall have to return to real issues and choices, or we shall destroy ourselves.

Yet this involves more than seeing the power and character of our controlling financial interests. It involves more, even, than trying to break those interests, in order to release the economy to serve our public interest as a whole. For it is perfectly clear that the issue is international. The subordination of Britain to a role in the economic and foreign policies of the United States Government is now pitifully clear. France, in coming to terms with its real post-imperial position, had to break, publicly, with American policy for France. There are many things wrong with contemporary France, but some of us in Britain look at that process with admiration and envy. Vietnam has been one turning point. The Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament —still the most effective single voice of the Left in Britain —has recently issued a policy statement which, beginning from the situation in and toward Vietnam, ends with the strongest call it has yet made for a break from the American alliance, and the withdrawal of American troops and bases from Britain. That is not going to happen for many years. Foreign policy is usually a difficult issue with which to shift British opinion. But the economic crisis is another matter, and its pressures point increasingly in the same direction. It will be a very rough autumn. Large groups of workers, from doctors to busmen and railwaymen, have been angered by the wage freeze, which includes a refusal to pay increases already agreed upon for specific future dates. And tempers are not improved when it is learned from the newspapers that this whole policy was undertaken on American advice. Meanwhile, on a wide front, the trade unions will in practice be fighting the government of the party they themselves created. They cannot be wholly beaten, but neither, with the government under severe international pressure, can they wholly win. Out of that frustration and deadlock a new political realism seems bound to come. The many cults of personality which have masked the crisis will be increasingly rejected. I do not mean that we shall break through in the next few years to a decisively rational politics, and to the necessary reorganization of our political system. That, indeed, will take a very long time. But it is fair to say that the current crisis is an important turning point. The complacent and bureaucratic slogan — "You Know Labour Government Works"—on which Wilson won in March is now just a joke, and nobody seems inclined to substitute any other magic-working phrase. This sort of government, under whatever names and labels, evidently doesn't work. And the beginnings of such an insight among widening groups of people may have made July, 1966, a very good month indeed for Britain.

LETTERS

(continued from page 170)

a Governor's Conference on Aug. 4, 1953, when the French were fighting.

> Now let us assume that we [sic] lost Indo-China. If Indo-China goes, several things happen right away. The peninsula, the last bit of land hanging on down there, would be scarcely defensible. The tin and tungsten that we so greatly value from that area would cease coming. . . . So when the United States votes $400 million to help that war we are not voting a give-away program. We are voting for the cheapest way that we can to prevent the occurrence of something that would be of terrible significance to the United States of America, our security, our power and ability to get certain things we need from the riches of Indo-Chinese territory, and from Southeast Asia.

This is an incredibly blunt statement of American foreign policy, not only in Indo-China but in most of what are euphemistically called the developing countries. Welfare is made of stuff less stern. Jules Henry is quite correct when he says that the root of the war is the desire to extend the frontiers of U.S. investment in Asia, as he put it—Capital's Last Frontier. What is this war if not a frontier war, replete with good Indians and bad, in cosmic conflict? David Levy still breathing

Seattle, Wash.

Dear Sirs: In the essay by Jose Yglesias, "Pablo Neruda: The Poet in New York" [The Nation, July 11] I saw a common but regrettable error. The Industrial Workers of the World are still around. They maintain headquarters in Chicago and issue a monthly paper, the Industrial Worker. The group is small, isolated and probably dying. The "Wobblies" do live, however feebly.

George Arthur

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Getting the Message from Hanoi

HERE IS YOUR ENEMY. By James Cameron. Holt, Rinehart and Winston. 144 pp. $3.95.

MISSION TO HANOI. By Herbert Aptheker. International Publishers. 128 pp. $3.50. $1.25 paper.

BERNARD B. FALL

Mr. Fall is the author of many studies on Indo-China. His most recent book is Vietnam Witness: 1953-66 (Praeger).

Hard and up-to-date news from Hanoi is not easy to come by these days. Hence, one should congratulate both authors and their associates—Aptheker traveled with Prof. Staughton Lynd of Yale and Tom Hayden of SDS; and Cameron traveled with a camera crew—for having made the trip in spite of all the difficulties. But that is where the similarities end: Cameron's book is good. Aptheker's is not.

The two authors' politics have nothing to do with my judgment, for I found Joseph Starobin's 1953 book on the French Indo-China war a valuable contribution to our knowledge of what went on on the "other side," and the same was also true, more recently, of Wilfred Burchett's book on his travels with the NLF. But Aptheker, the dean of American Marxist thinkers, here goes to what may be the next world war's Sarajevo—and what do we get? Some incredible platitudes read a hundred times before in Communist propaganda handouts.

Did Aptheker, as a Marxist theoretician, discuss the Sino-Soviet split with some of his very astute North Vietnamese counterparts? Did he discuss it with Chinese intellectuals on the way to Hanoi, or on the way from it? Did he meet any North Vietnamese "doves," or at least, were there several varieties of "hawks"? As for the rest, Aptheker is simply not a very good reporter. The "Liaison Committee" installed in Mme. Nhu's old villa is not identified further; though it could be either the committee for liaison with the tri-national International Control Commission, or the overt liaison office with the South Vietnamese NLF. The unidentified heroine of the NLF is the well known Mlle. Ta-Thi-Kieu. The wooden piles shown in the Historical Museum in Hanoi did not block Haiphong harbor in 800 A.D., but the Red River in 1287. And if Prime Minister Pham Van Dong's birthplace (it is the imperial capital of Hué, where his father was a senior mandarin) can be described as being "near Pleiku," then Washington could be described as being "near Muncie, Indiana."

A whole chapter is devoted to berating President ("Two-Bomb Harry") Truman, indicating that the author still has not recovered from the emotional scars of the McCarthy era, but it adds nothing to our knowledge of North Vietnam. It is a pity if Aptheker failed as badly in conveying to the North Vietnamese leaders the real mood in the United States as he does here in conveying to Americans the realities of what must be going on in North Vietnam.

The same cannot be said, fortunately, for Cameron. Here is a trained journalist, with a keen eye for the relevant detail and with background experience in North Vietnam during the French debacle (and there is no possibility of understanding Hanoi today unless one can make that comparison).

Cameron openly takes a stand on the war itself. He admits to his "galloping disenchantment with the Labour Party," and defines the "existing American-Vietnamese war [as] both imbecile and brutal, and . . . corrupting both sides." But all the requirements of sound reporting are met: names, places, verbatim quotations, and, above all, questions. Time did a particularly nasty job on Cameron, calling him a "conduit [sic] for North Vietnamese propaganda." While here and there Cameron displays a certain naïveté, that charge can be dismissed. Cameron recognizes the cute staging of a female-crewed antiaircraft battery, dismisses North Vietnamese claims of having shot down close to 1,000 American planes as "uncheckable," questions the standard line that the Hanoi regime had eliminated want and disease; and even tries to warn the North Vietnamese against an exaggerated belief in the power of the American peace wing to sway President Johnson from his charted path.

He eschews simple-minded anti-Americanism as he sympathetically describes an interview with a downed American pilot, and states an explanation of the consequences of American bombing which needs to be quoted in the light of our recent fear that American pilots were to be tried by Hanoi:

> I do not believe that the Americans set out to bomb homes and hospitals; if they had wished to do so it would have been extremely easy to do so. Nevertheless it is a fact that homes and hospitals have been destroyed by their bombs. I do not think the strategic thinkers of the United States Air Force intended to wage war on the peasants of North Vietnam; nevertheless they managed to kill quite a few.

That was a fact six months ago, and is a fact now, of course. In one of the few instances in which Aptheker provides useful information, he confirms from his own observation Cameron's account of the destruction in the large (over 100,000 inhabitants) textile town of Nam-Dinh, and in Thanh-Hoa. The point is not, at this juncture, that such targets should not have been hit at all—but that they were hit, albeit accidentally (if that was the case), and that this is being denied in Washington, at a time when dozens of Westerners have seen this destruction with their own eyes. It greatly adds to the credibility gap surrounding all official announcements connected with the war.

As for the net effect of the bombing raids, Cameron, with his British "blitz" experience, gives what promises to be a correct assessment when he says that North Vietnamese industrialization was not sufficiently advanced to engage more than 5 per cent of the population. Its destruction, therefore, would not affect the country as drastically as similar destructions would in the West, but he does not seem to have taken into consideration the possibility of bombing North Vietnam's major dike systems out of existence. When this was done in part in 1944-45 by the U.S. Air Force to keep the crop from going to the Japanese, 1 million Vietnamese starved to death in the North in the ensuing floods and the drought which followed. On July 11, the pro-American L'Express reported from Paris that between February and June, 1966, close to 500 small dikes allegedly were destroyed by bombings.

One incident in connection with the editing of the American edition of the book (it was originally published in Britain) bears telling. On page 109, Cameron spoke of a fuselage fragment marked "B-50." When I read the book in the British edition, I informed the publisher of the nonexistence of B-50s and suggested a check with the author. Whatever was done merely piled one mistake on top of another: the American version of the book now states "B-52," although no B-52 Stratofortresses have thus far operated that far north or were shot down. But the mystery of the "B-50" was suddenly cleared up for me when The New York Times Magazine of July 11 illustrated an article of mine on North Vietnam with a cover photo purchased from Cameron, which indeed shows a North Vietnamese carrying a plane fragment with the number ". . . 50" on it. The first number, which may have been an 8 or a 3, had broken in half, and Cameron had mistaken the American serial number of the aircraft as a type identification. But this does not absolve the editors for having let the author commit a historical "howler" on page 23, when he asserts that the Vietnamese were fighting the "Empire of Siam" 2,000 years ago: Siam emerged as a state only 700 years ago.

Such small lapses, however, in no way detract from the power of Cameron's personal observations, such as his interview with North Vietnamese Prime Minister Pham Van Dong. When questioned by Cameron on the effect of the bombings, Dong said: "I'm not acting when I say that I am obliged to cry—literally cry—at the suffering and the losses. And they will get worse, make no mistake. . . ."

There are few chiefs of government around these days who have the guts to admit they can still cry.

MAURICE SAMUEL investigates the Beiliss Case

(one of the most bizarre frame-ups in modern history, involving a Jew charged with ritual murder in Czarist Russia, and a homicidal bawd whose partners-in-crime ran a grotesque gamut from underworld killers to detectives, lawyers, the Minister of Justice, and Czar Nicholas II, himself)

Blood Accusation
By MAURICE SAMUEL
$5.95 • now at better bookstores
ALFRED·A·KNOPF

Should Harlem 'Secede'?

FROM RACE RIOT TO SIT-IN: 1919 and the 1960s. By Arthur I. Waskow. Doubleday & Co. 380 pp. $5.95.

HOWARD ZINN

Mr. Zinn is the author of The Southern Mystique (Knopf), SNCC: The New Abolitionists (Beacon), and a forthcoming volume, New Deal Thought (Bobbs-Merrill). He teaches courses in political theory and civil liberties at Boston University.

Never has it been so necessary to penetrate and dissect the hypocrisy of this nation on the question of violence. Witness the alarm on all sides at the suggestion that a Negro under direct attack should defend himself (an idea not even radical enough to merit the term "civil disobedience"). And witness the limp acceptance of the Administration's assertion that dropping bombs on peasant villages and fishing boats on the other side of the world is an act of self-defense.

We need constantly to shuttle from one area of inquiry to another to gain the advantage of perspective. And this is one of the contributions of Arthur Waskow's thoughtful, probing book, From Race Riot to Sit-In, where the riots of 1919 and the demonstrations of the 1960s provide material for examining the larger problem of violence both in race relations and in world affairs.

Arthur Waskow is part of a growing group of young scholars who, refusing to stay in place, embody three qualities: excellence in professional skills (he is a historian); a personal commitment to social justice (Waskow has been in places where it counted); and a willingness to use the first on behalf of the second. His book, A Worried Man's Guide to World Peace, brought these traits to bear on international conflict. Since then, he and his colleagues at the Institute for Policy Studies in Washington have done pioneering work in pointing scholarly research at important political problems.

From Race Riot to Sit-In should be read not as the culmination of Waskow's thinking but as one stage in the development of an important writer's view of social change. The book was written just before the Watts riot of 1965 and just before the rapid escalation of the war in Vietnam; its underlying concern that we need both social change and a minimization of violence is now even more pertinent.

The first part of the book is an account and analysis of the race riots of 1919 (there were twenty-five in that year), focusing on three major ones: in Washington, in Chicago and in rural Arkansas. In a "riot," Negroes respond violently to an immediate hurt or a long-standing one, and there are casualties on both sides. This is different from a "pogrom" (like the New York draft riots of 1863), where there is a one-sided attack by whites upon Negroes. The 1919 riots, coming after a long brutal period of lynching and helplessness (what Rayford Logan calls "the nadir") established, Waskow says, that Negroes would fight back.

He notes two other facts about the 1919 riots: the bias of the police, and the failure of the national government to act. That in 1966 both points remain substantially true stands as an indictment of the American way of life, for this way of life includes what academicians have fondly pointed to as shining medallions of liberal democracy: pluralism and federalism. Pluralism, under the guise of dispersing power, allows power to collect in the hands of multiple private elites, of which General Motors and the White Citizens Council are only two outstanding examples. Federalism, under the guise of "balance," has enabled every genial liberal in the Department of Justice—Robert Kennedy, Nicholas Katzenbach, Burke Marshall, the whole bunch—to stand aside while local police either committed or abetted violence to the point of murder.

There is a long line of legal fallacy and political cowardice, from Theodore Roosevelt (in the anti-Negro outbreaks of Statesboro, Ga., and Atlanta, Ga., 1904 and 1906), Woodrow Wilson (in the East St. Louis massacre of 1917) and Franklin D. Roosevelt (in his failure to push anti-lynch legislation), up to John F. Kennedy and now Lyndon Johnson. In all these cases, "federalism" was the disguise for unconcern. This was dramatized recently by the sight of deputy sheriff Cecil Price, whom the federal government itself accused of complicity in the triple murder of 1964, supervising the Negro march through Neshoba County in accord with Attorney General Katzenbach's faith that local police forces would keep the peace.

Arthur Waskow is interested in substituting violence for other means of effecting social change, and he finds this taking place in the 1960s. At that time, war had once again loosened the social fabric, and the Negro turned to a set of techniques, inaccurately and romantically labeled as "nonviolence," but much better described by Waskow's fine phrase, "creative disorder." I see this not as a "replacement" (for the riots continue) but as part of the Negro's wandering, frantic search for a solution. Clearly, the demonstrations of the 1960s have not been enough: the Negro remains subject to private violence and police brutality while the President looks away; the overwhelming majority of Negroes remain economically desperate and segregated in spite of poverty programs and civil rights laws.

Hence, the search continues. The federal government will probably not begin truly guarding Negroes against violence until they take arms for their own protection. This is the understanding behind the current talk about "self-defense" (which, Waskow reminds us, is a persistent theme in the history of Negro thought). And those drastic solutions which alone can reorganize and redistribute the immense wealth of this country will not emerge from friendly Klatsches at the White House, but in the formation of pockets of pressure outside, nourished by the anger of the dispossessed. The new talk of "black power" is, I think, an imperfect attempt to define this need; the racist implications which some people (on both sides) draw from this will fade only if a genuinely radical political program is clarified.

In the second half of his book, Waskow makes a start toward fulfilling that objective he talks of earlier, "to make the study of past issues illuminate present ones." He devotes brief, stimulating chapters to: various approaches to the double problem of injustice and violence; the role of the police; the demonstrations of the 1960s; the recent Harlem riots; the tactics of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party at the 1964 Democratic Convention. His final chapter, which is only a suggestive beginning, makes the jump to the international scene. There are no ready-made solutions, but he points to the problem: how to change the world without war.

Waskow's call for more thought on the techniques of "creative disorder" should be heeded. It should be evident by now that the normal processes of liberal compromise politics—voting, writing a letter to one's Congressman—are just enough to expiate middle-class guilt, but not nearly enough to change the status of the Negro to the point where he can both be and feel equal. Furthermore, even the demonstrative tactics of the 1960s only brought forth America's historic way of dealing with agitation: belated protestations of good will; a scurrying to pass some laws; a careful raking in of movement leaders by the grand croupier in the White House in order to swell the consensus and leave the malcontents outside.

Those left outside, if they can somehow avoid being crushed or dispersed, will have to go further. It is not simply a matter of increasing the quantity of disorder, because nothing is more disorderly than a riot. Yet its lasting value is small, for it is uncontrolled and has no follow-up; it is a release of fury followed by a calm restoration of the status quo ante. Somehow, the useful elements in "creative disorder" need to be identified, so they can be regrouped in imaginative new combinations.

For instance, demonstrations are most effective when they point silently to specific needs and specific solutions—when, by showing what is needed, they

Pacifism and Nonviolence

THE PACIFIST CONSCIENCE. Edited by Peter Mayer. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. 478 pp. $7.95.

An anthology, world-wide in scope, dealing with the application of traditional nonviolent techniques to contemporary social problems and world peace. Peter Mayer concentrates on classic writings by Lao-tzu, Buddha and the early Christians, as well as historic and contemporary Western commentators from the early Quakers to Camus and Martin Luther King, Jr.

NONVIOLENCE IN AMERICA: A Documentary History. Edited by Staughton Lynd. The Bobbs-Merrill Co. 535 pp. $7.50.

A remarkable collection by Prof. Staughton Lynd, a noted political activist in his own right, which clearly defines both the variety and the continuity of nonviolent idealism in the United States. Asserting that America "has more often been the teacher than the student of the nonviolent idea," he documents his thesis with selections from the Colonial Quakers, the abolitionists, the anarchists of the late 19th century, the pacifist progressives of the early 20th century, the militants of the American labor movement, and contemporary leaders of the modern peace and civil rights movements.

NEGRO PROTEST THOUGHT IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY. Edited by Francis L. Broderick and August Meier. The Bobbs-Merrill Co. 444 pp. $7.50.

A survey of the nonviolent approach to the modern American civil rights movement from Booker T. Washington and W.E.B. DuBois to Martin Luther King, Jr., Bayard Rustin and the "black power" controversy within the civil rights movement.

DOCUMENTS OF UPHEAVAL. Edited by Truman Nelson. Hill & Wang. 294 pp. $5.95.

An anthology from William Lloyd Garrison's The Liberator, illustrating Garrison's deep ethical commitment to abolition within the context of pacifism and the general issues of his time. Truman Nelson points out that "all the great questions of the day found utterance in The Liberator: Transcendentalism, the citizen's relation to the state, the right of resistance, the higher-law thesis, the pleas and reasons for freedom, the problem of individual versus collective action, violence versus nonviolence, women's rights. The genesis of the utopian-communist movement which, in the 1840's, brought to life some sixty or seventy colonies based on communal living is recorded more clearly in The Liberator than in any other source."

PRISON NOTES. By Barbara Deming. Grossman Publishers. 185 pp. $4.95.

Part of the famous Canada-to-Cuba interracial peace march of 1963-64, Barbara Deming and some thirty companions were imprisoned in Albany, Ga., for two months, during which they resisted the rigors of jail by fasting and other nonviolent techniques. The episode made a lasting impact upon the thinking of the Albany Movement and other nonpacifist Negro civil rights groups in the South, and helped to speed the integration of the peace cause into various civil rights programs. A graphic testimonial of the harrowing experiences of idealists in a primitive Southern jail, illustrated with on-the-scene photographs of the participants.

HENRY M. CHRISTMAN

emotionally move both onlookers and participants. The sit-ins and Freedom Rides did this. So did those hungry, homeless Mississippi Negroes who last Christmas occupied empty Air Force buildings in Greenville. If people living in cold cubicles in Harlem would occupy those magnificently warm and clean buildings constructed downtown for advertising offices and insurance companies, if Washington Negroes would "move in" to the new House Office Building, if Roxbury Negroes would take up residence in the lavish and comfortable Prudential Building in Boston—it might point up the absurd expenditure of hundreds of millions for business enterprise and the neglect of human habitation.

Setting up parallels to unsatisfactory official bodies, and new ones where they are needed (right up to Congress, the Supreme Court and an international war crimes tribunal) has infinite possibilities. If Negroes set up their own "police force" in Philadelphia, Miss., the Attorney General might begin to rethink his narrow view of "federalism." If Harlem and Roxbury "seceded" (Warren Miller's book, The Siege of Harlem, should be taken at least half-seriously) and set up their own "government," it might bring worry —and action—in high places. Community-appointed citizens' committees could supervise police, set price controls, and otherwise try to counter the power of corporations and local government.

We need to single out what is potent in the idea of "disorder." It is not the volume of violence, for the history of man shows oceans of blood spilled with the most piteous results: it is the fabrication of situations where decision makers are forced to make difficult choices because power has been skillfully focused, and where they will surrender what is wanted because the alternative is even more undesirable. Such assaults—a kind of political guerrilla warfare—will bring recurring invitations (as now) to join the benign power holders. The problem is to resist being submerged in coalition, to build diverse nuclei of power until such time as the new forces are strong enough to be more than equal in the coalition.

All of this is random and primitive speculation on my part, in line with Arthur Waskow's exhortation to think about the tactics of "creative disorder." We will need far more creativity in the quest for new ways of disturbing the Establishment. And this will require a joint effort of concerned intellectuals and those whose daily lives supply the passion for a new politics of protest.

Paradoxical American Radical

HINTON ROWAN HELPER: Abolitionist-Racist. By Hugh C. Bailey. Southern Historical Publications No. 7. University of Alabama Press. 241 pp. $6.95.

EUGENE D. GENOVESE

Associate professor of history at Rutgers University, Mr. Genovese is the author of The Political Economy of Slavery (Pantheon). He is a member of the editorial boards of Studies on the Left and The Journal of Social History.

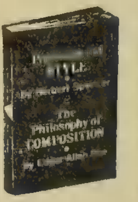
At first glance it seems curious that radical and Left-liberal historians, so many of whom have made a tiresome career out of resurrecting heroes for the Pantheon of the American Opposition, have overlooked Hinton Rowan Helper. Helper (1829-1909) was the antebellum South's most militant anti-slavery radical. Professor Bailey, in this able study of his career —there is not enough material available for a full biography—describes him as "a statistical fanatic, abolitionist, militant racist, Republican propagandist, ardent patriot, international railway projector, and promoter of inter-American co-operation"; he might have added, on the strength of the evidence he has so skillfully organized, "imperialist, religious bigot and American chauvinist." Perhaps the negative side explains the chariness of Left historians in claiming him, but for better or worse he is surely one of their own. These paradoxes may be treated as the attributes of a peculiar individual; to his credit, Bailey properly assigns them no less to Helper's class and regional moorings.

Helper grew up in a yeoman family in the Federalist-Whig small-farm region of North Carolina. He attended elementary school and then went to work for a storekeeper; he was, in short, largely self-educated. In 1850 he left North Carolina for New York, where the acquisitive and Philistine predilections of his lower-middle-class origins were greatly reinforced. To the end of his bustling life he remained a Southern yeoman who had liberated himself from the plantation ideology and thrown himself unreservedly into the virtuous world of bourgeois success and progress.

Helper's fame flows from his book, The Impending Crisis of the South: How to Meet It (1857), which to this day deserves to rank as one of the harshest calls to class war ever written. The burden of its argument lies in its economic indictment of slavery and in its insistence that the non-slaveholding whites were the system's worst victims.

Before writing The Impending Crisis, Helper left New York in quest of California gold. He failed but did get a chance to see something of South and Central America en route to the West Coast. In California, as in Latin America, he judged everything and everyone through shocked puritanical eyes. Confronted with frontier violence, he recoiled at the disorder and, in the best American tradition, soon became a partisan of Judge Lynch and the frontier's own version of the Higher Law. As Bailey trenchantly observes: "None of the disgust he found in the brutality of the bull fight was present when he saw swift justice administered to renegade human beings." (It is remarkable how very much alike Americans of all political persuasions are during such moments—how very American!)

Returning east via Nicaragua, Helper became convinced of the necessity of an isthmian canal and became one of its earliest champions. Back in North Carolina he pursued this interest in national and international economic progress in a book about his California experience, The Land of Gold, Reality versus Fiction. The book was somewhat self-serving and displayed some of the unfairness that was to characterize everything he wrote; it was nonetheless a useful corrective to the absurdly optimistic reports then abounding about California. Two features of the book are of special interest. Helper dismissed the gold boom as a passing affair and linked the state's development to the completion of a transcontinental railway, the development of harbors and the



FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. N

Buy Your Books

through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to: The Nation, 333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014.

HATRED OF MEN WITH BLACK HAIR

I hear voices praising Tsombe, and the Portuguese
In Angola, these are the men who skinned Little Crow!
We are all their sons, skulking
In Back rooms, selling nails with trembling hands!

We distrust every person on earth with black hair;
We have men overturning governments;
We train natives to kill Presidents with blowdarts;
We have men loosening the nails on Noah's ark.

The State Department floats in the heavy jellies near the bottom
Like exhausted crustaceans, like squids who are confused,
Sending out beams of black light to the open sea,
Fighting its fraternal feeling for the great landlords.

We send violet rays that light up the friendly populations;
We are teaching the children of ritual, the forest
Children, to overcome their longing for life, and we send Sparks of black light that fit the holes in the generals' eyes.

Underneath all the cement of the Pentagon
There is a drop of Indian blood preserved in snow:
Preserved from a trail of blood that once led away
From the stockade, over the snow, the trail now lost.

ROBERT BLY

growth of a many-sided commercialism. This concern with steady, diversified industry, rather than money crops, carried over into his indictment of slavery. That indictment made a brief, cautious appearance in the manuscript of The Land of Gold, but was removed in deference to the sensibilities of his Southern publisher. Thus, when The Impending Crisis appeared in 1857, it was a great shock to his Southern friends, who may or may not have known of his anti-slavery bias but who could not have suspected its extremity, much less the sense of bitter personal involvement.

Helper again went north, this time to write The Impending Crisis, which appeared in 1857, was reissued in 1860, and in between (1859) was brought out in a popular abridgment or Compendium. The second edition and the Compendium toned down some of the radicalism of language and content, especially the proposal for taxing slaveholders for each slave instead of compensating them. With this modest concession to the moderates, the book could and did serve as a campaign document for the Republican Party in 1860. Its sponsorship cost Rep. John Sherman of Ohio the speakership in a bitter contest in 1859-60 that greatly inflamed sectional passions. That fight demonstrated Southern alarm over Helper's message, as did the widespread arrests, expulsions and violence committed against Southerners caught reading or distributing the book.

And the message of this dangerous book? The Impending Crisis, as Bailey says, was "both an economic comparison of Northern and Southern society . . . and a militant abolitionist document demanding uncompensated emancipation." It was quite appropriately dedicated to "The Non-Slaveholding Whites of the South." In essence, Helper described the Southern economy as colonial and charged that the mass of the people had slipped into poverty and degradation. The cause he found in slavery, which drove whites off the best land, degraded labor and encouraged idleness, tied up capital in an inefficient labor force, retarded the development of markets, and kept the people in ignorance.

Helper's solution was delightfully straightforward. The slaveholders had robbed the helpless, inferior Negroes for generations and had indirectly exploited the white masses. They richly deserved anything meted out to them in punishment, and he hinted that if "the lords of the lash" resisted, little mercy ought to be shown them. Still, the issue ought to he resolved peacefully if possible. He advocated immediate, uncompensated emancipation, removal of the blacks to Africa or Haiti, and a tax on every slaveholder to pay for the removal. Then the South could be returned to the democratic white masses who, freed from slavery's stifling effects, could develop the economic and social life of the region. The whites had been asleep. Helper's call to class war was meant to rouse them and prepare them for their high destiny: "Where free thought is treason, the masses will not long take the trouble to think at all."

There are two sides to Helper's particular anti-slavery bent. Bailey subtly makes his reader aware of both, but his discussion stops where it might have begun. "Essentially," Bailey writes, "Helper was seeking to stimulate the small farmers and laborers of the South to conduct the type of revolt which the Tillmans, Bleases, and Longs led in later generations." Second, as Bailey demonstrates in his treatment of the postwar years, Helper hoped to raise the South to a major place in an expanding American empire. He thus formed a counterpart to the Sewards, who dreamed of such an empire and saw the slave power as an obstacle to national unity and consolidation. For much of the anti-slavery movement, North and South, the emancipation of the Negro was a necessary prelude to the establishment of American world hegemony. Yet Bailey is not altogether fair in linking Helper to the demagogic leaders of the New South's white Democracy. In their day the power of Northern capital over the South was firm, and they had no answer for it. Their raucous polemics against the Black Belt aristocracy and the money power ended, at best, in paltry reforms bought at the price of discouraging badly needed capital investment. They inherited backwardness and passed it on to their children after first annointing it with Negrophobic holy water and small doses of white welfare. When Helper wrote, Northern capital had not yet swept everything before it; in effect, he hoped the Southern yeomen would carry through a bourgeois revolution sufficiently thorough to allow the South to confront the North as an equal and a partner. He was a true radical. And simultaneously he was a prophet of American imperialism. He was a true liberal democrat. And simultaneously he was a fanatical racist. If these are contradictions, we shall have to make the best of them, for they define Helper and much of the South's yeoman democracy, much as their equivalents define America's ambiguous democratic tradition, which has ever been imperialist, racist and brutal, while it has simultaneously propelled the world to new heights of material progress and personal freedom.

As early as 1861, Helper planned to write a book to persuade Americans to expel Negroes from their national life. While serving as consul at Buenos Aires during the war, he decided that the Anglo-Saxon and Teutonic peoples had to take over Latin America. His stay also convinced him—if he needed further convincing—that Catholicism was a blight on the world and that the spread of Anglo-Saxon power would alone be justified by the attendant spread of Protestantism. By 1867 he was ready with his indictment of the Negro race.

Nojoque, A Question for the Continent presented the case for Negro inferiority and the justification of Negro expulsion. A year later he brought out The Negroes in Negroland, which claimed to prove scientifically the savagery of the Africans. In 1877, Helper stopped in Dakar for six hours and found, during this exhaustive investigation, final proof that Africans were beyond redemption. By this time he was not quite an advocate of genocide; he thought that rigid segregation and the workings of natural laws would lead to the disappearance of this inferior race.

It is worth noting that racist views like those of Helper were harshly denounced by the Southern ruling class before and after the war. The abolitionists, wrote the brilliant pro-slavery theorist, George Fitzhugh, in the 1850s, do not desire the liberation of the Negro but his extermination. How, he asked, do they propose to take care of a people that the country manifestly does not want? How do they propose to have these people survive in a market place for which they are not fitted and in which they are not welcome? (These are still good questions.) Helper's postwar rantings ran into scornful reviews in traditional Southern circles, despite the support they lent the fight against the radical Republicans. No Christian, wrote one distinguished conservative, could tolerate such brutal disregard of a defenseless people. It is, in any case, a depressing fact that the onward march of liberal democracy in the South has been a racist march for as long as we have record. The hands of the upper classes and their conservative spokesmen have been drenched with black blood, but for all that, whatever sense of racial unity the South has, or has ever had (if we exclude a brief moment in the early history of Populism), has formed part of its conservative tradition.

Helper's later career by no means was a simple capitulation to reaction. He insisted on making life hard for us. Thus he attacked the growth of monopoly, advocated civil service reform, and supported the National Labor Union. While engaging in these praiseworthy activities, he found time to continue his Negro baiting and his anti-Catholicism (perhaps to the discomfort of his Argentinian Catholic wife), to call for a grand imperialist program to absorb all North and Central America, and to attempt to win official support for his Three-Americas Railway.

The Three-Americas Railway proved his personal undoing. By 1899 he was virtually bankrupt from having sunk his fortune into attempts to promote the line, which in a sense was an early version of the Pan-American Highway. By then he was almost blind, and his wife and son left him to return to Buenos Aires. Finally, in 1909, alone and forgotten, a tired and clearly paranoid old dreamer, he took his own life. Poor Helper came too soon: American imperialism did not yet need ideologues with radical credentials.

Of his farsighted railway scheme Bailey writes: "To Helper, this was the means to an end—the one way to destroy the inferior, non-Caucasian, Catholic civilization of Latin America and replace it with the sort of people and culture which predominated in the United States." There we have it: Helper by no means proceeded from radicalism to reaction. There was in his earliest and most determined radicalism always a prevailing fascination for the mystique of national expansion and hegemony. Even his acute racism was only one part of a greater white American chauvinism. If we have one "lesson" to draw from the embittered life of this talented, brave, and in his own way principled man, it is the sad awareness of how little modern crusades for reform, or even revolution, are worth when they remain within the grasp of that most alluring, deceptive and sophisticated of whores—The National Interest.

Goat Gambit at the University

GILES GOAT-BOY. By John Barth. Doubleday & Co. 710 pp. $6.95.

SHAUN O'CONNELL

Mr. O'Connell teaches English at the University of Massachusetts.

John Barth's literary stock is currently high. He is getting the full treatment — small-magazine articles, interviews, questionnaires — by the literary/journalistic establishment. To Leslie Fiedler, for example, Barth seems "the best, the most achieved" in the new generation of American novelists. The judgment is based upon the solid achievements of his first three novels, The Floating Opera (1956), The End of the Road (1958) and The Sot-Weed Factor (1960). Barth's new novel, Giles Goat-Boy or, The Revised New Syllabus, is an attempt to extend his vision in a bizarre stylistic construct. This ambitious work again calls into question the high evaluation of his stock. Where it was solid, preferred, it may now seem inflated, overextended.

Barth is a novelist of ideas who has consistently undercut the validity of basing human behavior too closely upon intellectual preconceptions. In Barth's first novel, Todd Andrews decides his life (law) and love (cuckolding) are without meaning. Logically, he decides to commit suicide. However, circumstances teach him that pure logic is deficient; while there is no reason not to kill himself there is, on the other hand, no reason why he should. On this slim thread of paradox he lives. The logical Joe Morgan, of Barth's second novel, is balanced by the near-mad narrator, Jacob Horner. Morgan urges his wife, Rennie, to follow his reasoning and make love to Horner who, in turn, urges on her the wisdom of his heart. Between them she is destroyed. In his third novel Barth breaks from naturalism—The Sot-Weed Factor is a vast, surrealistic reapprehension of historical reality—but not from the thematic concerns of rationalism/irrationalism. Ebenezer Cooke tries to confront the absurdities of 18th-century colonial reality by adhering to an inflexible persona, The Chaste Poet, and finds that he must give up both chastity and poetry before he can win love or art. In each case intellectual preconception gives way under the press of circumstances. Logic yields to paradox.

These areas are extended in Giles Goat-Boy. The setting is not naturalistic; this is another world which reflects, by refraction, our own. The universe is The University in this, the penultimate academic novel. (Those critics who feared that our novelists in residence might suffer from insufficient contact with the "real" world are here told that the central reality of American life is the University, the largest American industry.) After Campus Riots I and II, West Campus and East Campus are locked in a Quiet Riot preserved by a balance of terror between WESCAC (West Campus Automatic Computer) and EASCAC, self-programing machines with the power to EAT the whole University in a computer holocaust. Students talk of Graduation; some believe in it, some don't. Years are semesters, the earth is the campus and the ultimate put-down is "Flunk you!" These are the terms the novel lives in. An engaging young man decides to venture forth from his province, the goat farm where he was raised, and Matriculate. He will be a man, not a goat; he will be a savior, he decides, and descend into the Belly of WESCAC to change its AIM and, thus, free all studentdom for Commencement. "I'm going to be a hero," he says. Like Barth's other heroes he develops an intellectual position to fulfill his role. "I declared that

FREE! With every new subscription to

THE NATION

The FBI Nobody Knows

by Fred J. Cook. 414 pp. Pyramid Books.

A portion of this important book first appeared in The Nation (October 18, 1958), as a special feature and attracted nationwide attention and the highest praise. Now it has been rewritten and enlarged with much new material.

> " . . . an effective and powerful document. . . . "
> —Mark DeWolfe Howe, New York Review of Books

> "Fred Cook must be credited with a courageous as well as an illuminating book. Let those who dispute his charges refute them if they can."
> —Alan Barth, New York Herald Tribune

> "A devastating case against the Federal Bureau of Investigation and its veteran director, J. Edgar Hoover."
> —San Francisco Chronicle

> "J. Edgar Hoover won't like this book . . . well-documented . . . likely to cause plenty of furor."
> —Publisher's Weekly

THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS has the unique distinction of being the central point in the plot of Rex Stout's latest Nero Wolfe who-dun-it, THE DOORBELL RANG.

For your FREE copy of THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS fill out the subscription coupon below, and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ 5 Months, $6
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

CITY .... STATE .... ZIP No. ....

9-5-66

the first reality of life on campus must be the clear distinction between Passage and Failure, the former of which was always and only passèd, the latter flunked." This results in chaos on campus so he develops another stance; he discovers "the only true Passage-Way. Embrace!" Obliterate all distinctions and affirm a "seamless University."

His second idea is not much more successful than the first. Though he descends three times into the Belly of WESCAC, remains unEATen and has disciples who preach his doctrine—The Revised New Syllabus is its testament—his savior role is undercut. The novel ends with the 33-year-old Goat-Boy approaching nihilism. "Cycle on cycles, ever unwinding: like my watch; like the reels of this machine [a tape records and WESCAC compiles the narration of the novel] like the University itself. Unwind, rewind, replay." The Goat-Boy's linear heroic quest of salvation has ended in the ambiguities of circular repetition. Once again the theoretical formulations of potential human heroes are qualified by the irrational realities of circumstances. Ideas can no more contain the University than they could hold the worlds of Barth's early novels.

Giles Goat-Boy echoes analogues from the tradition of epic heroes. Giles (Grand-Tutorial Ideal, Laboratory Eugenical Specimen) redefines the quests of Odysseus, Aeneas, Christ and Dante in his own terms. The central heroic comparison is Oedipus. Giles attends a performance of The Tragedy of Taliped Decanus, which is a witty "imitation" of Oedipus Rex, given in University terms. "Cadmus College has gone to pot"; Taliped is "hung up again with riddles!" Like Oedipus he wonders "who the flunk am I" and learns, at great cost. The chorus underlines the price of heroic endeavor by warning the audience that "every silver lining has a cloud." Like Taliped, Giles wins self-definition but brings new troubles to his land.

To place Barth's effort in quite different terms we could see Giles in relation to the polar definitions of the contemporary American hero in Bellow's Herzog and Mailer's An American Dream. By protracted actions and desperate self-analysis Herzog attains equipoise; by frenetic actions (murder, anal eroticism) and spasmodic reflections Jack "Raw Jock" Rojack creates himself anew. Barth draws a hero who combines painful introspection ("self-knowledge is always bad news," Giles is told) and apocalyptic sex with both goats and girls to penetrate the final reality. As Dante saw God with Beatrice's help, Giles has Anastasia—his Disciple of Innocence—in the Belly of WESCAC and experiences a climactic vision. " 'Wonderful!' I cried. For though the place was lightless. . .

in Anastasia I discovered the University whole and clear."

The novel lives not in just such lofty analogues. Everything is here, high and low—from the Divine Comedy to The Three Billy Goats Gruff—as though Joyce lived again. Lucius Rexford, Chancellor, combines the daily beauty of Kennedy with the pompous moderation of Eisenhower. Peter Greene, who will play Peter to Giles's Christ, is a combination of Huck Finn (sexier than Huck, he makes it with Old Black George's daughter) and Milo Minderbinder, of Catch-22, who makes a buck from war. Ira Hector is another Goldwater: "charity be flunked . . . every man for himself!" Giles first sees Anastasia standing by water, holding up her dress in an echo of Stephen's Portrait epiphany; but Anastasia has it all the way up, escutcheon bared. She is not only Beatrice but Candy too, ready to give it away to make anybody happy. Even her oh-gee diction echoes Candy: "I don't like this Conscious Depravity business. It's been a very upsetting day!" Anastasia says. While Barth has gone to the classical tradition to give substance to his hero's quest, he has not neglected the rutty vernacular and wit which give vitality to American fiction. This background helps set Giles's quest as classically heroic, and black-humored, anti-heroic at the same time. He tries to be another, better Christ (Enos Enoch), while still "a goat, a gimp, Chance's ward and creature."

This, then, is Barth's intention in Giles Goat-Boy, to create a not so brave new world in a witty, grandly imagined construct. Within the limits of The University—"no program in Herohood was listed in the Undergraduate Catalogue"—Giles wins self-definition as a not quite successful savior. Barth's execution of this intention, however, is another matter. He seems so absorbed by the intellectual superstructure of his house of fiction, themes and analogues that he often neglects to create a surface, pleasing in its own right. He insists that we break through surface too quickly. For all the outrageous happenings we are less involved in what occurs—as we are, say, in The Odyssey—than with what it all means—as with The Aeneid. Except for Giles, Barth's characters remain factors in an ideographic pattern. Asceticism balances with Appetitiveness, Depravity with Vulnerable Magnanimity, Scapegoatery with Innocence, and so on. Events in the novel too clearly parallel or exactly contradict Giles's momentary intellectual stance. Barth, like his own heroes, overvalues ideas. If it is an intellectual's sentimentality to think that ideas make things happen, isn't it equally mistaken to tie the novel too tightly to the tail of ideas? Barth's style seems to ignore his own thematic conclusions. Despite his inventiveness he never allows the surface reality of his novel to take off on a life of its own. Because ideas are primary they become tedious, more argument than vision in over 700 weighty pages.

Barth has expressed high praise for Jorgé Luis Borges' Ficciones as "the most memorable" work of the past ten years "because the most technically and metaphysically sympathetic to my own musings." But Borges works in miniatures, embodying metaphysics in brief, biting parables. "Why take five hundred pages," Borges asks, "to develop an idea whose oral demonstration fits into a few minutes?" Giles Goat-Boy would have benefited if Barth had either taken this advice or subsumed his ideas in a more persuasive narrative line.

Despite its problems Giles Goat-Boy remains a vast, rich effort by a major writer. However this work affects his literary stock it should be read by anyone concerned with the wide-ranging scope and vitality of contemporary American fiction. If, in this novel, ideas get the better of Barth he should be judged by the ambitious manliness of his wrestling with a central creative problem as well as by his fall.

Theatre: The Midwest

JULIUS NOVICK

On July 13 of this year, Mayor Daley announced plans for a new resident professional theatre in Chicago, to cost between $5-$10 million, and to be in operation within three years. It's about time. People are accustomed to thinking of Chicago (with its Art Institute, its symphony orchestra, its opera company, its commercial theatres and cabarets) as the cultural and entertainment capital of the Midwest, but several attempts to start a resident professional theatre there have failed. Meanwhile, a resident theatre has turned the flat town of Minneapolis into a cultural center of national importance, and from Cincinnati to Winnipeg resident theatres are becoming fixtures in the lives of small but growing percentages of the local citizenry.

Cincinnati has had its Playhouse in the Park since 1960, when a little pavilion in Eden Park was turned into a neat thrust-stage theatre: an indoor auditorium surrounded by porches and lawns that serve as lobbies. Located on top of a steep hill overlooking the city, the Playhouse is difficult to reach except by car; this tends, of course, to cut it off from poorer Cincinnatians, but nearly all resident theatres, however easy of access, are middle- and upper-class institutions (except for their student programs). And since the Playhouse runs at something better than 95 per cent of capacity, it is reaching all the people it can presently cope with. It will shortly begin a campaign to raise $800,000 for a new 600-seat theatre (the present one seats 227). The projected theatre will not, for a change, be part of a new performing arts center downtown; it will be located in Eden Park, adjacent to the old theatre (which will be kept for small-scale productions).

Since Eden Park is probably the pleasantest place in Cincinnati on a summer evening, the Playhouse season very logically extends from April through August. But Brooks Jones, who runs the theatre, does not consider it his function merely to provide light summer entertainment. This year he opened with Man and Superman, which was followed by a double bill of Benito Cereno, from Robert Lowell's trilogy The Old Glory, and Edward Albee's The American Dream: a witty coupling, since Lowell's play (based on the novella by Herman Melville) is also concerned with the ambiguities of the American Dream. When Charley's Aunt opened in July—as a sort of breather between the American première of Giraudoux's Sodom and Gomorrah, and the American première of Eh? by the British writer Henry Livings—the Playhouse was attacked in a local paper for letting down its standards and allowing frivolity and escapism to creep in. But there are standards in farce as in anything else, and Charley's Aunt, with its combination of sure-fire hilarity and Victorian charm, is one of the best.

The Playhouse gave Charley's Aunt a happy production. True, the juveniles, though pleasant enough, somewhat lacked crispness. True, one of the ingénues seemed to be doing an introverted Method-thing that had a certain hesitant charm, but had nothing to do with this brisk and extrovert play. True, several members of the cast were unable to manage an English accent, though this should be part of the equipment of any well-trained actor. But David Hooks's staging—choreography, really—was beautifully deft, and so was Ed Zang's performance as the Oxford undergraduate who is forced to disguise himself as Charley's aunt.

Until the new theatre opens, the Playhouse must be a small-scale operation. Its budget this season is only about $100,- 000: one of the smallest resident-theatre budgets in the country. (It can expect to take in only about $90,000 at the box office.) But I saw no signs of skimping, except on the men's costumes in Charley's Aunt. The auditorium is pleasant, the stage looked well (thanks to the ingenuity of scenic designer Douglas W. Schmidt) and Mr. Jones has some good actors working for him (though he could use a few more).

Gradually, the Playhouse is expanding its activities. In the fall, if plans work out, a "battle group" of five actors, a director and a designer from the Playhouse will be in residence at the University of Cincinnati; the university in turn will assign four graduate students to work at the Playhouse during the spring. The Rockefeller Foundation may finance this project. Then in the fall of 1968, the Playhouse, in cooperation with the local Board of Education, will present a repertory of three plays in the new theatre for high school students from all over the area. The program is designed, says Brooks Jones, to get the students "as close to theatre as they get to football."

Except for the Alley Theatre in Houston, the Milwaukee Repertory Theatre has a longer history than any resident professional company between Cleveland and the Pacific Coast. Founded in 1954 by a group of Milwaukee citizens, it was originally called the Fred Miller Theatre, after a local civic leader. Until 1961 it presented commercial Broadway plays with visiting stars. Then, says the theatre's publicity handout, "it was decided to convert the Fred Miller into a professional resident theatre, a new and exciting kind of theatre gaining great popularity in several larger cities in the United States." In other words, it had become apparent in Milwaukee that the day of the resident professional theatre, presenting the classics and serious modern plays, had at last arrived.

Nowadays the MRT's audience prefers the standard resident-theatre plays: Uncle Vanya, Six Characters in Search of an Author, Tartuffe, Mother Courage, anything by Shakespeare. Oh Dad, Poor Dad and the musical Once upon a Mattress both did poorly, but so did the American première of Michel de Ghelderode's Pantagleize. This season, in its 346-seat theatre (a converted movie house in a residential district), the MRT played to about 80 per cent of capacity; in 1968, it will move into a new 550-seat theatre in the inevitable center for the performing arts. (As the Mayor said, in proclaiming Milwaukee Repertory Theatre Week: "The Milwaukee Repertory Theatre increases Milwaukee's prestige and competitive stature among other cities which recognize theatre as an important community asset not only for its own citizens but for attracting industry. . . .")

The MRT's productions of Uncle Vanya and Mother Courage have been greatly admired by visiting critics; in the production I saw there of The Glass Menagerie, however, all four parts had been miscast. The Glass Menagerie was directed by John A. McQuiggan, at that time the producer of the MRT. Before rehearsals began, however, it had been announced that he would not renew his contract; he is now with the Trinity Square Theatre in Providence. Tunc Yalman has recently been appointed artistic director of the MRT; presumably he will be making changes.

Winnipeg, Manitoba, is Canada's seventh largest city, with a population of 265,429 at the last census (487,000 in Greater Winnipeg). Located far out on the prairies, it is cut off from the rest of the world by blizzards in the winter, floods in the spring and sheer distance at any time. What is not available there, in the way of culture, is available nowhere for hundreds of miles; by the same token, Winnipeg's cultural institutions must function as a life line to the outside world, alleviating the city's sense of isolation, enlivening the gloom of those long winter nights. It cannot be easy to run a resident professional theatre out there in the middle of nowhere, but such a theatre is in a position to make a greater difference to the life of its community than could a theatre in a city like, say, Philadelphia.

In the summer of 1958, the Winnipeg Little Theatre, an amateur group that had recently acquired an old movie house as a home, and Theatre 77, a fledgling professional group, decided to merge. They called the new organization the Manitoba Theatre Centre: "Centre" because it "was meant to be more than a theatre"; it was to "become a focus for all theatrical energy and resources in our community." The Centre has been true to this purpose. In addition to major productions in the large theatre and experimental productions in a small studio theatre, its activities now include an annual tour, which this year took The Fantasticks to Moose Jaw, Medicine Hat and twelve other towns in the three prairie provinces; another touring company that gave 140 performances at schools in the Winnipeg area; yet another touring company (this one not initiated by the MTC, but merely sponsored by the MTC in Manitoba) that brings French-speaking theatre to English-speaking high schools; a High School Drama Festival that this year included groups speaking English, French, German and Hebrew; the Manitoba Theatre School, which has a program of guidance visits and workshops for high school drama groups, as well as some hundreds of students of its own; a scholarship program to send talented Manitobans to the National Theatre School of Canada to prepare for professional careers; and a children's theatre that has presented half a dozen new plays. All these activities require a budget of $540,000; only about $225,000 comes in from the box office (the 828-seat theatre operates at an average of about 60 per cent of capacity), but government subsidies and private contributions make up the difference.

Unlike nearly all American theatres, the MTC does not cast its productions from the New York talent pool; it relies on Canadian actors. Several leading members of the acting company at the Stratford, Ontario, Shakespeare Festival—as good a company as exists on this continent—spend some part of the winter season at the MTC. This year for the first time the connection became official. The last two plays on the MTC schedule this spring were replaced by Nicholas Romanov, a new work about the Russian Revolution by a young American playwright named William Kinsolving, and The Dance of Death by Strindberg. Nicholas Romanov was directed by Michael Langham and Dance of Death by Jean Gascon, the artistic director and the associate director of the Stratford Festival. The plan was to move both productions to Stratford this summer. Nicholas Romanov, which I saw in Winnipeg, was the most lavish and expensive production in the MTC's history. It looked splendid, albeit a bit cramped, on the MTC's stage, and it was well acted by William Hutt as Czar Nicholas, Frances Hyland as the Empress Alix and Leo Ciceri as Rasputin. (All three are Stratford regulars, but all three had appeared at the MTC previously.) The play was an uninspired but competent chronicle; its central point is that Czar Nicholas was not an evil but a very ordinary man caught in a situation that was too much for him, and the dramatist did not altogether avoid the obvious danger involved in writing a play about a very ordinary man. Nicholas Romanov never got to Stratford; another play about the Russian Revolution was produced there instead.

The formal connection between Winnipeg and Stratford may or may not be resumed; the informal connection will undoubtedly continue. John Hirsch, until last January the MTC's artistic director, has directed at Stratford for the past two seasons, and has been mentioned as a possible successor to Michael Langham as artistic director there. (Mr. Langham has declared his intention of leaving after the 1967 season.) Mr. Hirsch is a remarkable man. He came to Winnipeg from Hungary in 1948, a 17-year-old refugee orphan; ten years later he became one of the founders of the MTC. I shall report in a future issue on his excellent production of Henry VI at Stratford this summer.

In the past, the MTC's choice of repertory has been somewhat timorous; it has produced The Solid Gold Cadillac, The Fourposter, Once More with Feeling and a number of other commercial scripts. But it has also done, in eight seasons, three original Canadian plays and a Canadian revue as regular productions (and several more original plays in its studio theatre); few American theatres have been willing to take even that many chances with new plays. The Winnipeg audience does not seem particularly receptive to pap: the hit of the 1964-65 season was Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? which did 97 per cent of capacity; Mother Courage did a respectable 81 per cent. This past season, the most popular production was The Threepenny Opera; the Canadian première production of Andorra, Max Frisch's play about anti-Semitism, was not far behind. The Importance of Being Earnest and The Tempest also did well; The Private Ear and The Public Eye, the season's only concession to Kitsch, did not.

Edward Gilbert, who took over from Mr. Hirsch as artistic director, proposes "to lead and not follow. . . . I'm being paid, amongst other things," he says, "to offer people experiences which they are unlikely to undergo if I weren't here." So it appears that the MTC will continue to provide its patrons with a meatier diet than it dared to offer them in its earlier years.

It is astonishing, when you come to think of it, that nearly all the resident theatres were founded by people of whom nobody had ever heard, except perhaps in limited local circles. Without the resources of professional prestige, the founders were forced to begin on a very small scale, with small budgets, small, makeshift quarters, small audiences and small companies of obscure actors; most resident theatres remain small-scale operations. The great exception to all this is the Tyrone Guthrie Theatre of Minneapolis.

The co-founder and for three years the artistic director of the Guthrie was Sir Tyrone Guthrie himself. Guthrie had had experience in starting new theatres; in 1953, after decades of success at the Old Vic, at Sadler's Wells, at Covent Garden, at Stratford-on-Avon, at the Edinburgh Festival, in the West End, on Broadway, at the Metropolitan Opera, in Tel Aviv, in Helsinki, and elsewhere, he had helped to found the Shakespearean Festival at Stratford, Ontario, and had made it one of the foremost theatres in the English-speaking world. His partners in the Minneapolis venture were Oliver Rea, a Broadway producer, and Peter Zeisler, a stage manager and theatre technician. All three had been successful in the commercial theatre, and all three had had just about enough of it. They determined to found a resident professional theatre somewhere in America, and invited applications from interested cities.

To bring Guthrie and his partners to Minneapolis, local citizens raised more than $2 million for a 1,437-seat theatre. (This would be the capacity of a large Broadway house; some resident theatres, even today, have less than 250 seats, and none is as large as the Guthrie.) For the first season in 1963, a company of forty-two actors was recruited; at its head were Hume Cronyn, Jessica Tandy, George Grizzard and Rita Gam. Almost 22,000 season tickets were sold before the theatre opened, and the total paid attendance for the first season was 193,344; the operating budget was $715,000. The following year, the attendance passed the quarter-million mark, and in 1965 the theatre had its first million-dollar budget. There is some reason to believe that the Guthrie has helped Minneapolis to think of itself as a metropolis. It may be coincidence, but the presence of the Guthrie seems to have stimulated other theatrical enterprises in the Twin Cities. The Old Log Theatre, which had been producing Broadway scripts with an Equity company for many years, did better business during the Guthrie's first season than it had done in any previous summer. Theatre St. Paul, an amateur company, had been operating since 1956; in the fall of 1964 it moved into an auditorium in the new St. Paul Arts and Sciences Center, and "went Equity." After two seasons, however, Theatre St. Paul ran out of money and folded. Its future is in doubt; it may revert to amateur status, or the Guthrie may take it over.

Another local company, the Firehouse Theatre, is, so far as I know, the only genuine avant-garde house between New York and the West Coast. It is a Midwestern outpost of the network of New York cafés, workshops and church groups that is known as off-off-Broadway. Its artistic director, Sydney Schubert Walter, came from the Open Theatre in New York, and many of its authors—Megan Terry, Jean-Claude van Itallie, Sam Shepard—are prominent on the off-off-Broadway scene. The Firehouse opened with Jack Gelber's The Connection two months after the Guthrie opened with Hamlet. It was an amateur group until last fall, when it began paying very small salaries to six actors who earn their keep by doing administrative and menial jobs around the theatre; paid actors and volunteers work together in the workshop and in the public productions.

Its leaders hope that the Firehouse will some day become an Equity company, but they are up against a problem: neither the stimulation of the Guthrie nor anything else has made the people of the Twin Cities eager to see avant-garde theatre. (This problem is not, of course, unique to the Twin Cities.) The Firehouse budget is only $45,000, but even so it faces an ominous deficit. Its theatre seats 148; only three or four performances are given each week; yet attendance is far from good. Five out of eight productions this past season were new plays, but the plays that drew best were older works by the familiar classic avant-gardists: de Ghelderode, Beckett and Ionesco.

Fortunately for the Firehouse, the Guthrie has shown no disposition to compete with it in the presentation of avant-garde classics. A few workshop productions of new plays have been done at the Guthrie for limited audiences, but the management has been conservative in its choice of plays for public performance. Every season there has been a play by you work hard for that dollar all your life..

make sure you reap the rewards!

Let us send you information about our exciting retirement plans. Call or write giving us your date of birth and the age at which you want to retire. We'll introduce you to a rather startling concept which may change your attitude about saving for retirement. You'll love the rewards of our retirement plans.

Jafco Life AGENCY, INC.

INSURANCE SPECIALISTS
431 Fifth Avenue, N.Y., N.Y. 10016
MU 4-5779

Shakespeare, and always a well-known one; the other Guthrie authors to date have been Molière, Chekhov (two plays), Miller, Shaw, Williams, Ben Jonson, Congreve, Brecht, Wilder and Strindberg; O'Neill and a second Shaw play will be added in September.

The Guthrie is a large house, and the safest way to fill it is to give the people plays, or playwrights at least, that they have heard of before. I see nothing reprehensible in this (though the management has been attacked for it); most of these playwrights may be well known by name, but how many people in the upper Midwest have ever seen their work? Even if the plays were familiar to the audience, would they not be worth seeing again? Furthermore, the Guthrie is not in the habit of mounting its productions in a state of reverent somnambulism, as often happens when a resident theatre is faced with an acknowledged classic. The management always makes a vigorous effort—often too much of an effort—to show that the play is theatrically viable.

This season at the Guthrie is the first under the artistic directorship of the Scottish actor-director Douglas Campbell, who has been with the theatre since its first season and who is Guthrie's chosen successor. Most of the acting is, as usual, admirable; the asymmetrical thrust stage, a peculiarly interesting playing area, is, again, being cleverly used. But my impression is that an excellent company is having an off-year.

Strindberg's The Dance of Death is a rarely done work by one of the seminal modern dramatists, and it is superbly acted, under Mr. Campbell's direction, by Nancy Wickwire and Robert Pastene. But it occurred to me nevertheless that the reason the play is so seldom done is that it is not really very good. The play is about a sick marriage; it appears to be the model for Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? but it seems to me that Mr. Albee has greatly improved upon his predecessor. Strindberg's dialogue (at least in Norman Ginsbury's translation) is colorless in comparison to Albee's. Strindberg's main combatants are not so much fully rounded characters as they are mere vessels of hatred; Albee's characters hate too, but they hate in a richly individual fashion. Most important, Strindberg has his characters tell us about "love-hate" which "comes from the hell inside us," and demonstrates it with a lot of melodramatic plotting, whereas Albee shows us this love-hate with such subtlety and power that he has no need to editorialize.

As You Like It and The Skin of Our Teeth have been produced at the Guthrie with plenty of lively and entertaining theatre magic, but the productions tend to obscure the plays. In both cases the director seems to have had insufficient faith in his material—a common, and crippling, affliction among American directors.

What Campbell can do with a brass band, a crowd of merrymakers at a convention, or a procession of animals on their way to the ark is a pleasure to behold, but the emotional impact of Wilder's play is diffused by all the goings-on. As Mr. and Mrs. Antrobus, Wilder's eternal Adam and Eve, Lee Richardson and Ruth Nelson spend the first act cavorting heavily, like old-fashioned vaudeville comics. They never entirely recover the dignity thus forfeited—dignity that they need if the play is to make its point. The best work of the evening is done by Nancy Wickwire as Sabina, the comic maid, voice of the Philistines, and eternal home wrecker. (When you have seen Miss Wickwire in The Dance of Death at a matinee, giving a formidable performance in the authentic grand manner, and seen her that same evening as Wilder's bird-brained bit of fluff, then you know what versatility is.)

Edward Payson Call, associate artistic director at the Guthrie, has directed As You Like It very cleverly; there are many moments when words and action are most effectively counterpointed. His Rosalind, Ellen Geer, is a bit strident, but Len Cariou is an excellent Orlando: blunt, rustic, high-spirited, good-natured, with an odd capacity for dominating the stage without apparent effort. Ed Flanders as Touchstone substitutes wry detachment for pranks and gambols, and makes even his most trivial quibbles entertaining.

This might have been a very pleasant production if only Mr. Call had known when to stop, but many of his bright ideas are annoying distractions. He has set the play in the American South around the time of the Civil War, an innovation with absolutely nothing to recommend it, unless you subscribe to the theory that poor old Shakespeare has written another bomb and needs all the help a director can provide.

Under Mr. Call's scheme, the melancholy Jaques, whom Shakespeare designed as a bit of a poseur but nevertheless a keen-witted commentator, becomes a cross between Robert E. Lee and Don Quixote, his keenness lost in clouds of fake pathos. Mr. Call needs fake pathos because he does not know where in the play the real pathos is. There is a delicately poignant moment in the script when a time-serving courtier, experiencing a moment of wistful decency, says to Orlando, who is out of favor: "Sir, fare you well. Hereafter, in a better world than this, I shall desire more love and knowledge of you." Mr. Call gets an easy laugh, and obscures the point, by having the courtier played as a screaming fag. (The relation of screaming faggotry to the Civil War is another one of the production's unanswered questions.)

The Guthrie Theatre is, very likely, the best resident professional theatre in the country. Its production of The Cherry Orchard in 1965 was as good as any American resident-theatre production I have ever seen, and as good as any Chekhov production I have ever seen anywhere. While most resident theatres are handicapped by poverty and inexperience, the Guthrie is rich in material and human resources of all kinds. It has plenty of money, an excellent building and a superb company of actors. But unless its talented directors confine their attentions to plays they like and understand, it may be in serious danger.

(This is Mr. Novick's concluding article on the American National Theatre, based on a Ford Foundation Grant study.)

PERSONALS

Legalize Abortion
Humanitarians and libertarians desiring to take independent lawful action to quicken legalization of abortion are invited to contact:
LEGALIZE ABORTION
P.O.B. 24163, Los Angeles, Cal. 90024

HELP LEGALIZE ABORTION. For information call N. Y. Citizens' Committee for a Realistic Abortion Law. Speakers are available for your club. CY 5-2786, between [illegible] and 10 P.M.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON. ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

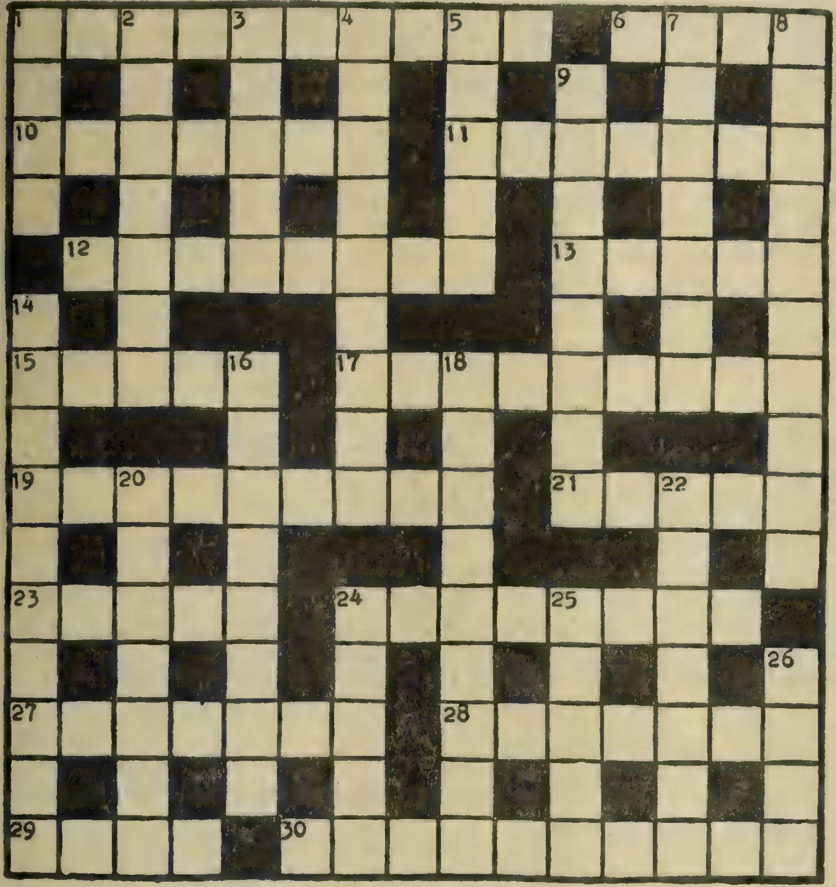
THE NATION 9-5-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME ______
ADDRESS ______
CITY ______
STATE ______ ZIP NO. ______

Crossword Puzzle No. 1165

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Implying a saint is able to obtain order, at any rate (10)
6 See 3 down
10 Rear up to maturity, despite altogether violent behavior. (7)
11 Out loud? Insinuate quite the opposite! (7)
12 When to use emergency measures during arrest? (2, 1, 5)
13 Duck. (5)
15 Socked, perhaps, as some demonstrators have been. (5)
17 Obscure case, but of different possibilities. (9)
19 Reputedly never missed, except in a dry run (4, 5)
21 Lower order of wheel which might initiate a forward movement. (5)
23 Hero of the city circle? (5)
24 Away from the craft center, but a door might lead to it. (8)
27 Property is transferred to one. (7)
28 Certainly not new merchandise brands for the conservative. (3-4)
29 Victor, perhaps, to embrace nothing else? (4)
30 General type of manufacturer in the transportation business. (10)

DOWN:

1 Is one liable to be struck with such a word? (4)
2 As a matter of course, finally, a careless nod belongs in an act of charity. (7)
3 and 6 across In the first place, chew on some particles of it. (9)
4 It has a tough job supporting the rudder. (9)
5 Is the religious group famished and unfed? (5)
7 An island? Look in a war map to find it! (7)
8 All are lost in the shuffle, with an Italian dance. (10)
9 He might find his work taxing. (8)
14 How's the bar doing? (Not for the dry type.) (6, 4)
16 Married up north, for example. (A deposit may be made at it.) (3, 5)
18 Junior, perhaps, fractures the front ribs. (5-4)
20 Halt! There's a small devil fish around! (7)
22 This, of course, is 1 down. (7)
24 Twisting a rope on the stage. (5)
25 Distinguished as a kind disposition? Capital type! (5)
26 A proclivity for being crooked? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1164

ACROSS: 1 Ladyfingers; 9 Brisbane; 10 Locker; 11 Comment; 12 Coppers; 14 Heeled; 15 Dishpans; 17 Bondsman; 20 Streak; 22 Callous; 24 Adverse; 26 Legend; 27 Surcease; 28 Unannounced. DOWN: 2 Assembled; 3 Yearned; 4 Iced; 5 Gallons; 6 Recap; 7 Oriole; 8 Herrin; 13 Udine; 16 Persevere; 18 Orated; 19 Mauldin; 20 Sadiron; 21 Assist; 23 Lie in; 25 Oslo.

$2.95 each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF THE NATION

- Each file holds a full year's copies.
- Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.
- Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send check or money order.

MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London. $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002

HOMOSEXUAL theme fiction, non-fiction listing available free. Trojan Book Service, Box 2121B, Philadelphia, Pa. 19103.

WORLD DEMOCRACY: By Bin Dir Woor, Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Ave., New York City. Bin Dir Woor's mystic name was given to him by a white robed child in a dream. He calls on the World Council of Churches and on the Vatican jointly to sponsor an endless line of Symbolical World Presidents until this bloody star is transformed, and on total humanity to work and pray, both before and after death, for a World Democracy.

FOREIGN PAPERBACKS and Discount Books. Free lists. P. O. Box 767-J, San Leandro, California 94577.

THE FIRST TIME I LIVE
by Will Slotnikoff
Discursive Introduction by Henry Miller
A romantic book about the writing of a book and the birth of a writer. Includes an exchange of letters with Henry Miller on the Creative Process in Action.
Paperback, $2.25 postpaid, 238 pp.
MANCHESTER LANE EDITIONS
1409 Nicholson St., N. W.
Washington 11, D.C.
Also available through Gotham Book Mart

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

Advertising Rates
CLASSIFIED
74c a line (6 words)
Three-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)
The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

HELP END THE WAR IN VIETNAM

DAVID FROST is running hard for U. S. Senator from New Jersey in the Democratic primary election of Sept. 13. He needs your help—as much money as you can spare.

Frost's chances increase day by day. The campaign has attracted nationwide attention through articles in The New York Times and leading magazines. "The Frost campaign is the most important one in the nation this year," according to Fred J. Cook, an active supporter and author of The FBI Nobody Knows.

Frost, a biologist, science writer and university lecturer, is former State Chairman of the New Jersey Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy and an activist who helped organize several months of demonstrations against school segregation in the state.

In a campaign that has reached beyond liberal platitudes, Frost has opposed the Vietnam war by asking basic questions about the course of our foreign policy; he has taken a strong stand to aid Negro self-reliance through a revitalized and democratic anti-poverty program.

The regular machine candidate has encountered grass-roots hostility to his unquestioning all-the-way-with-LBJ stand on the war.

Nonetheless, the bosses have the money. The Frost forces have run up expenses and need money to continue the job.

WON'T YOU HELP THIS VIGOROUS DRIVE
FOR PEACE BY SENDING A CONTRIBUTION?

FROST FOR SENATOR STATE HEADQUARTERS
120 Madison Avenue
Plainfield, N. J. 07060

Yes, I want to help send David Frost to Washington to join in opposition to the Vietnam war and fight poverty. Here's my contribution of $..........

Name ....

Address ....

City .... State .... Zip Code ....

Paid for by Frost For Senate Campaign Committee, J. Robert Hanson, chairman

THE NATION

SEPTEMBER 12, 1966 35 cents

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.

1 0 1966

THE FUTURE OF THE DRAFT

JOHN C. ESTY, JR.

SCHOOLS AND RACE

Integration for Excellence

REGINALD W. MAJOR

BIGOTS' BOOK SHELF

The Campus Scare Campaign

WILLIAM WINGFIELD

NEWSPAV
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

Reviews & Reappraisals

William Faulkner CHARLES THOMAS SAMUELS

H. G. Wells RICHARD HAUER COSTA

Edward Dahlberg FRANK MacSHANE

LETTERS

pity the poor judge

Brooklyn, N.Y.
DEAR SIRS: Pity the poor judge under a legal system which permits capital punishment!

What can a man do after he has had a young couple electrocuted "for giving the atom bomb secret to Russia, thereby being responsible for the war in Korea," and then learns that the testimony on which he based his sentences was entirely false? . . . The United States must learn a lesson from this tragedy, and enact a "Rosenberg law" which outlaws capital punishment.
Aaron Katz

doing something right

Wilmette, Ill.
DEAR SIRS: Free men around the world owe your journal a vote of thanks for your incisive articles on American foreign policy. Michael Kaplan

Vancouver, Wash.
DEAR SIRS: I am impelled to express my admiration for the top-notch article by John McDermott in your July 25 issue: "Welfare Imperialism in Vietnam."
D. F. Fleming

New York City
DEAR SIRS: Paul Good's "A White Look at Black Power" [The Nation, Aug. 8] is the best article yet on this explosive subject. Elias M. Schwarzbart growth and surplus

Hartsdale, N.Y.
DEAR SIRS: In his otherwise excellent review of Baran and Sweezy's Monopoly Capital [The Nation, June 20], James O'Connor commits an error which I think he would want corrected. He writes that Baran's Political Economy of Growth, published in 1957, "introduces us for the first time to the central concept of the volume under review—the idea of economic surplus." This is not so.

Away back in 1904 Thorstein Veblen treated in full the concept of economic surplus and the growing necessity of unproductive and wasteful expenditures to absorb it. . . . At about the time of the publication of the Baran book, Paul Sweezy ran in the Monthly Review an appreciation of Veblen's treatment of the subject. In my book, The Falling Rate of Profit (1957), I introduced the concepts of the social surplus and unproductive ("U") expenditures as they impinged on Marx's law of the falling rate of profit. . . .
Joseph M. Gillman

St. Louis, Mo.
DEAR SIRS: Dr. Gillman is absolutely right. . . . What I should have said was that, so far as I know, the distinction between actual and potential surplus is made for the first time in Political Economy of Growth.
James O'Connor

not true

Riverside, Conn.
DEAR SIRS: In his review of my book, Insuring Full Employment ["The Economics of Optimism," The Nation, June 20], James F. Becker hinges his analysis on the assertion that I advocate pegging consumer spending "as high as possible," and "exorcising" public

(continued on page 219)

EDITORIALS

Who Are the Isolationists?

Santayana's oft-quoted saying that those who do not remember the past are doomed to repeat it needs a corollary: those who misread the past are even more inexorably doomed to reiterate ancient errors. The Johnson Administration's favorite stereotype—the identification of the advocates of de-escalation in Vietnam with the appeasers at Munich in 1938—is an example of how history can be distorted by politicians whose only use for the past is to justify their misdeeds in the present. A related inversion of the truth is lumping current critics of American foreign policy (Senator Fulbright, for instance) with pre-World War II isolationists, some of whom were pro-German, some pro-Fascist or both.

In essential respects it is the Johnson Administration that is isolationist. Its opponents would favor a constructive foreign policy. Their opposition is to a policy of aggression that has alienated allies and hardened the resolution of opponents—policy that, in the view of such an experienced observer as U Thant, carries within it the fulminate of a third World War.

Mr. Johnson and his aides give lip service to the United Nations while undercutting it at every turn. This is de facto isolationism—the sacrifice of international order to domestic political advantage. The reason U Thant is reluctant to accept another term as Secretary-General is the ambivalence which President Johnson, Secretary Rusk and Ambassador Goldberg have exhibited time and again in their relations with him. Why should he remain in an office in which he is powerless to restrain the continuing American probing of supposed Soviet and Chinese impotence to give significant aid to North Vietnam and the National Liberation Front? If it should turn out to be based on a miscalculation, this experimentation threatens to bring on a disastrous showdown—disastrous because the circumstances will permit neither a compromise between the belligerents nor retreat of either from hardened positions.

The headlines show the accelerating progress toward this kind of confrontation, as in "Strategists See Need in Vietnam for 600,000 GIs" (The New York Times, August 29), and in the same issue "Moscow Training Fliers for Hanoi." The correspondent reports on articles in three leading Soviet newspapers, stating that at least one detachment of Vietnamese pilots have completed a combat flying course under the direction of "Soviet battle veterans" and have returned to North Vietnam, while another group is under instruction. Inexperienced Vietnamese pilots in MIG-17s are not much of a menace to American fliers, but now there are suggestions that the Soviet Union may supply MIG-21s or the "all-weather" MIG-23s.

Should the Vietnamese prove unequal to the difficulties of their mission, rather than allow a sister Communist state to be destroyed the Russians may send their own pilots into combat. According to Donald Grant, the staff correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch at the UN, U Thant was told in Moscow recently that Russian pilots would be sent to fly MIG-21s in Vietnam, and Russian crews would man the Russian-built surface-to-air missile sites which, by whomever manned heretofore, have made a dismal showing against U.S. aircraft. Thant is said to have repeated this to Under Secretary of State George Ball and Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, and presumably Secretary Rusk has been informed. But, Grant writes, UN diplomats "see no signs that Thant's view will have any real impact on U.S. policy." A familiar story.

Suppose, however, that the worst does not come to the worst, and a lethal confrontation between the two great powers is providentially avoided. This would not invalidate the predictions of a war lasting a decade or longer which have been coming from both sides. Ten years? One can hardly conceive of Johnson's predatory brand of internationalism surviving for even half that period. Either it will win a speedy victory—a happy ending which few competent observers expect—or he may have difficulty convincing a majority of the voters in 1968, a fact of which Mr. Johnson is keenly aware.

Alastair Buchan's comments on the Johnson gamble in the London Observer are worth noting in this connection. Precisely because our commitments are so far-flung (and, to date, so unsuccessful) while domestic difficulties continue to mount, Buchan sees a coming reversion to those international obligations that the United States could discharge effectively, such as deterrence of nuclear war and economic assistance to countries politically and industrially qualified. That kind of internationalism the critics of the Administration could and would support. It is Johnson's ventures abroad in search of monsters to destroy that the critics condemn and that Johnson himself, were he to reflect, could see leading only to disaster.

After Seventeen Years

Only now is there a prospect that the Rosenberg-Sobell trial, that sorriest of all the hangovers of the McCarthy era, may be reviewed on the merits. Only now may the integrity of American justice be restored—insofar as that is possible after the execution of two people and the imprisonment for the best years of his life of a third.

On September 12, oral argument will be heard in New York Federal Court on whether Morton Sobell should get a hearing on his charge that the government's case was based on false and distorted evidence. However, enough has already been adduced in the affidavits of Dr. Philip Morrison and Dr. Henry Linschitz to show gross chicanery in the conduct of the government's case. Morrison and Linschitz, who were connected with the construction and assembly of the early atomic bombs, now swear that the David Greenglass sketch—the principal piece of evidence on which the Rosenbergs were convicted—could not have helped the Russians make their bomb four years after Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

The jury was led not only to believe that this sketch and Greenglass' accompanying description contained the "secret" of the bomb, but that the authenticity of this material would be vouched for by Dr. Harold C. Urey and J. Robert Oppenheimer, world-renowned scientists whose names were listed as prospective prosecution witnesses and read to the jury by Judge Irving R. Kaufman. Neither was called. Instead, the government produced an obscure electrical engineer, J. H. Derry, who had been a major in the office of Maj. Gen. (later Lieut. Gen.) Leslie R. Groves, who was in administrative charge of the atom bomb project. Derry testified that from the sketch a Soviet scientist could per-

DEC 27

IN THIS ISSUE

September 12, 1966

EDITORIALS

202

ARTICLES

206 Bigots' Book Shelf:
The Campus Scare Campaign
William Wingfield

209 The Future of the Draft
John C. Esty, Jr.

213 Schools and Race:
Integration for Excellence
Reginald W. Major

216 Latin America III:
The Changing Role of the Church
Smith Hempstone

BOOKS & THE ARTS

220 "He Made the Books and He Died"
Charles Thomas Samuels

221 Sweet Talk (poem)
Theodore Weiss

222 Wells and the Cosmic Despair
Richard Hauer Costa

224 The Tall Figures of Giacometti (poem)
May Swenson

225 Dahlberg: Aphorisms & Poetry
Frank MacShane

226 Grierson: A Strange Fish
Harold P. Simonson

226 The Homecoming (poem)
David Ray

227 Taking No Risks
Barbara Raskin

229 Films
Robert Hatch

229 The Game (poem)
Louise Gluck

231 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher
ANNE C. ABRAMOVITZ Assistant

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 203
No. 7

ceive the actual construction of the bomb. Morrison, who is professor of physics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and reputed to be co-holder of the patent on the Nagasaki bomb (the names of the patentees are still classified) says in his affidavit that the Greenglass sketch was a "caricature" of the bomb and that Derry "had neither the scientific background to equip him with knowledge of the design and construction of the atomic bomb, nor was he closely associated with the technical aspects of the project."

Nevertheless, on the basis of such stratagems, the Rosenbergs were convicted and Judge Kaufman, subsequently elevated to the Court of Appeals, accused them of having caused the Korean War and having "undoubtedly altered the course of history to the disadvantage of your country." Sobell was swept along in this McCarthyite hysteria, and was spared the death sentence only because his alleged espionage did not involve the bomb.

Urey's personal connection with the case is revealing. In their petition, Sobell's lawyers state that Urey authorized them to say that he was never asked by the government to testify. If he had been asked, he could have vouched neither for the correctness nor incorrectness of Greenglass' material, since his responsibility, as the discoverer of heavy water and one of America's leading chemists, was separating U-235, the explosive material of the bomb, from the inert U-238, by the gaseous-diffusion method. He never had anything to do with the design and construction of the bomb itself. Nor did he have any particular interest in the Rosenberg-Sobell case until, reading the transcript of the trial record, he came to the conclusion, which he has stated publicly from time to time, that the evidence against the Rosenbergs was dubious and their conviction was probably a miscarriage of justice. If so, Sobell's seventeen years in prison are a corollary miscarriage.

Even assuming that Sobell was involved in espionage, if the government and the court had conducted the case with ordinary lawyerlike decency, Sobell would have served a few years and been released long since, instead of being sentenced to thirty years and refused parole repeatedly. The Rosenbergs are beyond help, but the President could commute Sobell's sentence to time served, or make such amends as lie in his power by pardoning him outright. If the case is reviewed, some very dirty linen is going to be washed in public, and whatever obloquy descends on the participants in the 1951-53 proceedings will be richly deserved.

The View from Abroad

One of the most amazing features of the war in Vietnam continues to be the way in which U.S. correspondents, who depend on Pentagon-type briefings, differ from foreign correspondents in their appraisal of the same events. A perfect illustration is to be seen in the reporting of the recent tactics of the Vietcong and North Vietnamese to break into smaller combat units. While this shift has been going on for some time, only now are U.S. military leaders telling the press what they think it means. The Washington Star's correspondent says they hail it as a "change for the better. . . . The preliminary intelligence analyses suggest that the Communists may have abandoned hope of winning with large attacks on large allied units and are going back to small, hit-and-run operations." He says the U.S. generals view this "with growing hope," predicting that it means "the level of violence of the war will go down, allied casualties will go down and the Communist side will begin to look like a loser even to its own supporters." Well, if the Star says it, that means the Pentagon is saying it.

But the British are saying something else. Frank Robertson of the London Daily Telegraph, discussing the same development three weeks before the American press was alerted to it, reported:

> For political purposes President Johnson has generated a degree of optimism over the war's progress that is far from justified. There are now strong indications that the Vietcong and North Vietnamese are reverting to phase one of their three-phase scheme of operations, breaking up into small units most of the time to wage guerrilla warfare. This applies particularly to the Vietcong, who know the country and its people so much better than the northern invaders. It is a pattern that must be particularly disturbing to General Westmoreland, the American commander, massively equipped to fight a more conventional war. Devastating air power and the ability to air-lift three or more battalions count for little unless large bodies of the enemy can be found.

This, of course, is not only true but has been acknowledged, we thought, by the Pentagon for many months. It will be difficult to sell the American people on the idea that it is great luck for the opposition to break into smaller guerrilla units. With November approaching, the Pentagon hucksters appear ready to seize upon any change as a change for the better. But Robertson supplied one statistic that blanks out all their bubbling optimism: We have, despite a monstrous military build-up, recaptured only 2.4 per cent of the territory held by the Communists a year ago.

Boss Meany

It is a misfortune for the country, as well as for American labor, that the present head of the AFL-CIO is one of the most opinionated and dictatorial leaders that the movement has ever produced. A certain degree of political enlightenment can be expected of the labor movement in a democracy, since it represents masses of ordinary people with no special interest. One would expect this particularly in foreign affairs, where it could neutralize in some measure the predatory instincts of military, industrial and political interests which benefit by war and the threat of war. But no such melioration is in evidence in the U.S., nor ever will be while George Meany remains AFL-CIO president.

The latest proof of Meany's determination to keep his organization reactionary is the statement of policy on Vietnam which the executive council approved in Chicago on August 24. Walter Reuther, president of the United Automobile Workers, was present during a part of this meeting, which commended President Johnson "for demonstrating to the world that our country is neither irresolute politically nor weak militarily, while it is ever ready to negotiate the war's end." This proffer of a blank check to the President was coupled with a sideswipe at dissenters: "While a minority has the right to dissent from the majority, disruption by even a well-meaning minority can only pollute and poison the bloodstream of our democracy." Friends of Reuther were astonished when Meany announced that the statement had been adopted unanimously by the council and that Reuther had voted for it in a meeting of the AFL-CIO international affairs committee which preceded the council meeting.

What had actually happened was made clear by Reuther in Detroit on August 26. He described the council's statement as "intemperate, hysterical, jingoistic and unworthy of a policy statement of a free labor movement." He had "vigorously protested and objected" to the statement as drafted by the international affairs committee and, had he been present when the matter came before the council, would have voted against it. No one in the AFL-CIO, Reuther emphasized, "was authorized to associate me with approval" of the statement. As often before, Meany had pulled a fast one, but he miscalculated: Reuther's dissent was the more energetic, and received more publicity, than if his position had not been misrepresented.

Reuther is not quite alone in his opposition to the reactionary views of Meany and his secretary of state, Jay Lovestone. In the report by Damon Stetson in the August 25 New York Times, two members of the council are quoted as saying that they did not like the emphasis of the statement and particularly the comment on dissent. For obvious reasons, they did not wish to be identified.

Reuther does not cloak his views in anonymity. The AFL-CIO council has agreed to hold a full-scale discussion of foreign policy at its November 14 meeting. As Stetson says, a clash seems inevitable. There is no doubt that Meany has a majority of the council behind him, but at least it will be clear that labor is not unanimous in its support of a policy which with every passing day further discredits the Johnson Administration.

Another Dulles Alumnus

Stale foreign policy making is becoming more entrenched every day. One more alumnus of the John Foster Dulles school is joining President Johnson's circle of advisers. He is Robert R. Bowie, appointed counselor of the Department of State. Bowie, lately director of the Harvard Center for International Affairs, was director of the State Department's policy branch back in the heyday of brinkmanship, 1953-57. He supported $1.5 billion in U.S. aid to French colonialism in Vietnam. Writing in Foreign Affairs, he accused Britain of being a "disruptive factor" and termed de Gaulle a "challenge" to efforts to organize the West; in other words, he is one of those who want Western Europe to integrate along some U.S. plan, whether it wants to or not.

He is not a forthright person. In his nomination hearings before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee he repeatedly ducked pertinent questions, especially those from Sen. Joseph Clark of Pennsylvania. He admitted that he had been in favor of the original commitment of U.S. forces to Vietnam, but he all but refused to discuss his reasoning in public. He said he would do so in secret, and the committee succumbed, although it is highly unlikely that anything which occurred twelve years ago in regard to the much-written-about Vietnamese policy could still be confidential. It is more likely that Professor Bowie is simply of the secretive, hedging sort, who will fit in well with the Dean Rusk bureaucracy.

For example, at one point Senator Clark observed: "Since the assassination of President Kennedy, both the White House and the State Department have increasingly come under the guidance of individuals who . . . tend to give the President advice which . . . indicates a very real skepticism of efforts toward international cooperation across the world, and this point of view could well be epitomized by the views of . . . Mr. Rostow." He then inquired: "Generally speaking, are you sympathetic to the views which Mr. Rostow has quite candidly expressed?"

That is a straightforward question and one which, considering the present crises locations, a foreign-affairs expert should have no difficulty in answering. Nor did Mr. Bowie have any difficulty answering it in just the style that Dean Rusk will admire so much: "I don't know what you have in your mind about what particular views. . . ." Senator Clark never did get his answer.

The Coming Water Crisis

Speaking in June before the Conference on the Fresh Water of New York State, C. C. Furnas remarked, "We do face a very severe problem and not too far down the road, either." Dr. Furnas is the last man in the country to raise a false alarm. He is president of the State University of New York at Buffalo, a former Assistant Secretary of Defense, and one of our most versatile and socially minded engineers.

The figures speak for themselves. Here in the United States we are presently using about 350 billion gallons of water a day. The projection is that in fifteen years we shall need 600 billion a day—more than all currently available stream flow and ground water combined. It follows that not only must additional sources of supply be found but that we cannot continue our profligate practice of using water once and running it through the sewers (some of our sewers are also rivers) into the sea. Water is precious. Much of it will have to be reclaimed and re-used.

In Dr. Furnas' thinking, water scarcity, like other major physical problems of an increasingly urbanized culture, calls for broad, coordinated measures: "(1) Scientific research; (2) engineering research and development; (3) operations research coupled with systems engineering; (4) economic analysis; (5) studies of sociological factors; (6) major financial support; (7) education and training of appropriate professional manpower; (8) effective governmental organization with a minimum of bureaucracy; (9) enforceable and enforced legal regulations." Most of these measures have been taken in the field of water supply, but so far inadequately. We have a way of not taking our basic problems seriously until they reach the crucial stage. By then they are more expensive to solve—and this one will be expensive even under the best circumstances.

The sea, and brackish waters in some places, are obvious sources of fresh water—at a price. There are no less than thirty techniques for deriving fresh water from salt water. Probably the most promising is the dual-purpose nuclear plant for producing electric power and fresh water in a combined operation. Designed on a large enough scale and with a market for the electricity, the cost of water could be brought as low as 20c to 25c per 1,000 gallons, which is competitive with municipal supplies but still about double the economic limit for irrigation. Dr. Furnas suggests that the cost might be further reduced by triple-purpose plants which would also produce such elements as potassium, strontium, boron, molybdenum, copper, tin and uranium—perhaps even gold. Of course magnesium and bromine have been extracted commercially from sea water for years, although the concentration is minute—in the case of bromine, about 65 parts per million. Dr. Furnas has long urged us to try to emulate the oyster, which concentrates copper a thousandfold, or the sea cucumber, which somehow manages to hoard vanadium by a millionfold. If we could learn to apply the techniques of these organisms, fresh water from the sea, with anti-pollution measures and re-use, would relieve us of a major worry.

Since dual- or triple-purpose plants would almost certainly rely on nuclear power for heat, there is the radiation hazard to consider. But, water aside, the present trend in electric power is toward nuclear boilers, to an extent that would have seemed incredible only a few years ago. Both the private and public utilities seem confident that they can operate these plants safely. The dangers in scarcity of an essential commodity like water are not small either, as the current hostilities between Israel and Syria over the Jordan River diversion remind us. In our own country, Dr. Furnas refers to the "more or less legal robbery" which caused the ranchers of the Owens River Valley repeatedly to dynamite the Los Angeles aqueduct in the 1920s, and which still embroils California and Arizona over the waters of the Colorado River.

Image Management

A nurse at the University of Rhode Island has confirmed that she was asked by "a White House man" to camouflage the act of a professor who had announced that he intended to walk out as a protest against the President's visit and American policy in Vietnam. While an honorary degree was being conferred on the President, the professor—Dr. Elton Rayack (incidentally he is a Nation contributor: "AMA: The Restrictive Power," May 3, 1965)—rose from his chair on the platform and left. The nurse, in uniform, walked out with him. To her Rayack said: "Lady I'm not ill. I'm just walking out because I can't stand what's going on on the platform." What we can't stand is this corny attempt to mislead the public by altering the television "image" and thus smearing a public-spirited citizen. The White House owes Dr. Rayack a formal apology, but he will never get it.

BIGOTS' BOOK SHELF

THE CAMPUS SCARE CAMPAIGN

WILLIAM WINGFIELD

Mr. Wingfield is a California free-lance writer whose special field of interest is communications.

Los Angeles

Theodore B. Loeffler, co-founder and secretary-treasurer of Constructive Action, states that he was not interested in politics until 1960, when Nikita Khrushchev appeared at the United Nations and pounded his shoe on the desk. This boorish gesture so outraged Mr. Loeffler that he quit his job with a printing firm and devoted the next eighteen months to reading and studying about communism. Toward the end of this self-administered cram course, Loeffler met Maurice W. Brainard, a wealthy manufacturer of truck refrigeration units, and the two of them decided that what the country needed was Constructive Action. Mr. Brainard is now president of the organization.

Constructive Action's purpose appears to be to scare the wits out of the nation's college students and its legislators in Washington by persuading them that, if communism has not in fact already taken over the federal government, the nation is at least on the verge of an armed Negro revolution inspired and led by the Communists. This it attempts to do by massive, and usually free, distribution of books, in particular these four: Up from Liberalism by William F. Buckley, Jr., Masters of Deceit by J. Edgar Hoover, You Can Trust the Communists—To Be Communists by Dr. Fred Schwarz and It's Very Simple: The True Story of Civil Rights by Alan Stang.

According to a confidential report which Loeffler issued on June 28 to his supporters and backers, Constructive Action has given away 10,000 copies of the Schwarz book at Harvard, 7,400 at Yale, 5,300 at the University of California (Berkeley), 5,000 at the University of Wisconsin and 4,300 at Princeton. At ten other colleges and universities, copies were given to 1,000 students; 500 at Rutgers were so favored.

Loeffler's confidential report notes also that 15,300 copies of It's Very Simple went to University of Florida students and 2,750 to students at the University of Alabama. William F. Buckley's book was given to 10,000 students each at the University of California (Berkeley), the University of Washington and the University of Michigan, and to 1,000 students at Rutgers. "In response to special requests from contributors," from 300 to 4,100 books were given students at twenty-nine other colleges.

"Distribution will go on through the summer months to students attending summer school, and is scheduled many places in conjunction with fall registration. Twelve thousand additional books have been sent into the New England and Middle Atlantic states for this purpose." This fall, Loeffler announced recently, 500,000 copies of The American Cause by Dr. Russell Kirk will also be distributed at colleges.

In distributing their books to college students, Constructive Action works through Young Americans for Freedom, a Birch Society affiliate. At Northern Illinois University a student went through the men's residence hall last October, hanging copies of None Dare Call It Treason on the doorknobs. When called before dean of men Harold Husa for violation of campus regulations, the student, Robert Thomas, a member of the Young Americans for Freedom, explained that he was given 2,000 copies of the book by Constructive Action with directions to distribute them at the school. He said that he had disposed of 1,000 before being apprehended.

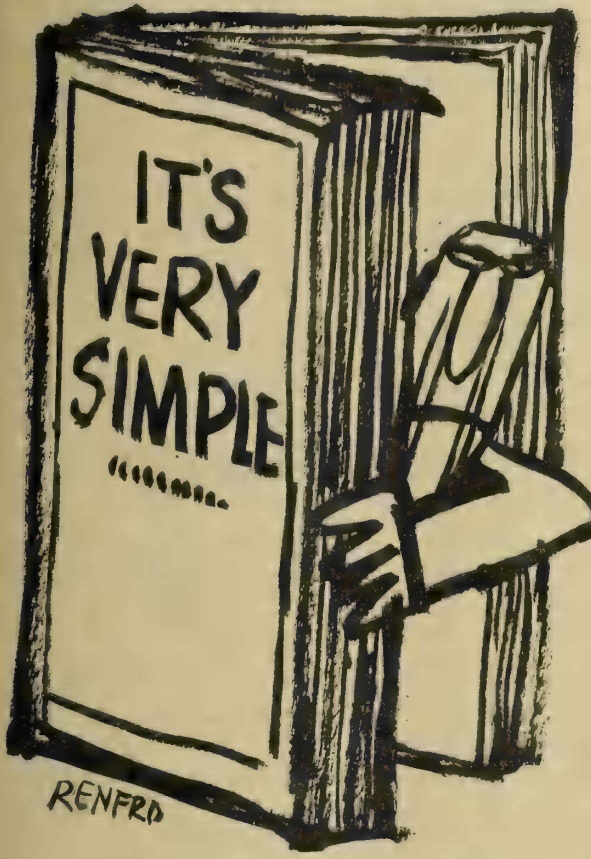
Another of Loeffler's confidential reports says that when Texas Tech at Lubbock "would not allow the book [None Dare Call It Treason] on the campus, a student got them distributed anyway, through the cooperation of three bookstores who gave the books . . . to students who came into the store." Loeffler also boasts that at Western Michigan University, where 4,300 copies were distributed, students defied their "leftist professors" by reading None Dare Call It Treason. This would seem to imply that members of the faculty had attempted to ban the book—odd behavior for professors of whatever orientation.



Ironically, Constructive Action's hated enemies in the Free Speech Movement have made this no difficulty at the University of California at Berkeley. All a member of the Young Americans for Freedom has to do at Cal is to stand at Sather Gate and give a book to anyone who walks by.

To encourage students who received None Dare Call It Treason to read and absorb the work, Constructive Action sponsored an essay contest. The three winners were flown to Los Angeles in April where they were honored at a special banquet and given a tour of Watts, among other places. In all, Constructive Action is supposed to have distributed 480,000 copies of None Dare Call It Treason and 600,000 essay contest folders at nearly 200 campuses in forty-four states last fall. It also gave the students piles of the fantastic dream-fiction of Phyllis Schlafly.

On the internal evidence of her books (such titles as A Choice, Not an Echo; The Gravediggers, or Strike from Space), and if one did not know that she is first vice president of the National Federation of Republican Women, one might take Mrs. Schlafly herself to be an extreme, if somewhat old-fashioned, radical. Endlessly, she repeats the old Bolshevik-sounding phrases about bankers and manufacturers cooking up plots in secret meetings, the press controlled by vast wealth, government officials acting as stooges for big money, the Rockefellers, the Morgans, etc., etc. Mrs. Schlafly is living proof that extremes meet.

While the college students were receiving these gifts from Constructive Action, many people whose names appear on conservative sucker lists received letters appealing for donations to finance the operations. The pitch was that the majority of Senators and Congressmen went to the twenty-five colleges selected for distribution of the books, and things would be different today if they'd received a conservative orientation in school.

The first appeal Loeffler sent out listed It's Very Simple as one of the books for the students. For some reason, a later fund-raising letter from Herbert A. Philbrick, author of I Led Three Lives, pitchman for the Young Americans for Freedom and member of the Constructive Action board of trustees, substituted Reminiscences by General Douglas MacArthur. This is a strange book for a Birch-type group to sponsor; one wonders if its members have ever read it. To be sure, General MacArthur is a conservative hero because he got into a row with President Truman and because he was a general. But Reminiscences gives unstinting and frequent praise to Franklin D. Roosevelt, and for that matter many of MacArthur's reforms in Japan were attacked by the conservatives of the time for out-New Dealing the New Deal. In his last years, MacArthur spoke out against the very practices that the John Birch Society and its allies pursue; his famous speech to the cadets at West Point, "Duty, Honor, Country," warns against such extremists.

Loeffler says of himself: "I'm not one of these people who goes around calling himself a right-wing extremist. I like to think that I represent middle-of-the-road principles and that the country has shifted to left of center.

"I think that there are many threats to our country. One stems from the growing power of the central government. Another stems from the debasement of currency."

Brainard believes, "It is well understood by collectivists that when people lose personal integrity and become unwilling to accept responsibility, they must not only be controlled, but will demand controls. This is one reason why the Communists and all such power seekers first undermine religion, patriotism and family, promote all forms of juvenile and adult delinquency, and advocate broad welfare programs. This pattern shows clearly in the decline of every recorded civilization.

"Thus, a slight undermining of the foundations of morality, aided by broad social welfare activity, slowly weakens general personal integrity. This further undermines morality and increases the demands for more welfare and controls. The process accelerates into a precipitous slide to complete collectivism."

William J. Teague, another of the incorporators, is vice president of Pepperdine College in Los Angeles. He is director of Pepperdine's "citizenship program," which is modeled after the National Education Program at Harding College in Arkansas where Teague once served as a staff member. Harding College is headed by Dr. George S. Benson. Both Teague and Benson spoke at the "Project Alert School of Anti-Communism" in Los Angeles in late 1961 where Cleon Skousen presided and one of the speakers shouted, "I don't want to impeach Earl Warren! I want to lynch Earl Warren!"

Because of the popularity of Knott's Berry Farm (it is a tourist attraction second only to Disneyland), Constructive Action trustee Walter Knott is perhaps the best known right-winger in Southern California. This elderly gentleman is one of the leading financial angels for rightist groups. A personal friend of Robert Welch and John Rousselot, he is treasurer of the Liberty Amendment Committee to repeal the income tax. His latest notion is to cure juvenile delinquency by repealing the child labor laws.

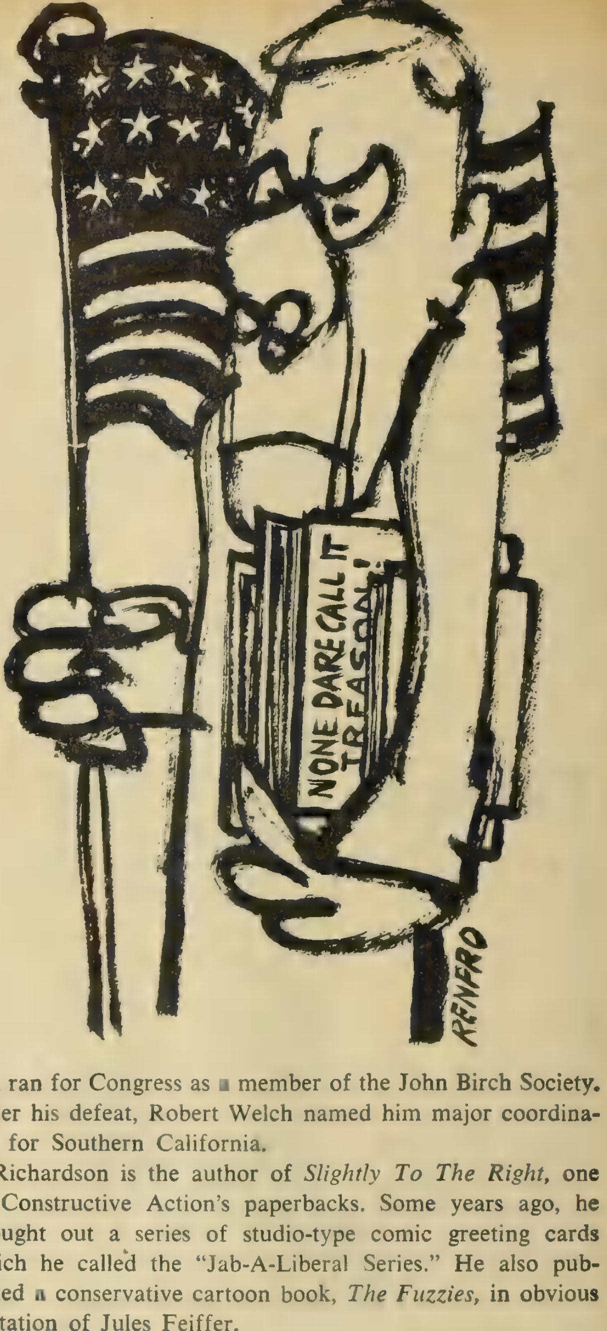
Constructive Action was incorporated on March 1, 1963, and two months later began operations with a project to put conservative books and pamphlets in doctors' waiting rooms in Orange County. Under the guidance of Dr. Frank A. Rogers of Whittier, a promotional arm called Southern California Doctors for Constructive Action expanded this project to other counties. But while the Orange County doctors would have received the propaganda free, Constructive Action now wanted from $120 to $300 per year for a book and periodical assortment including Human Events, Dan Smoot Report, The Freeman, Buckley's National Review and The Manion Forum (Dean Clarence Manion is one of the members of the National Council of the John Birch Society and the National Advisory Board of the Young Americans for Freedom). Seven of fourteen magazines and thirty-seven of the forty-seven supplementary books were recommended by the John Birch Society in its April, 1962, "JBS Bulletin."

At least five of the seventeen doctors whose names appeared on a Doctors for Constructive Action letterhead are known to be members of the John Birch Society.

Along with distributing books printed by others, Constructive Action also prints its own books and pamphlets and produces its own film strips. Its newest paperback, Pa$$ The Poverty Plea$e, by Patty Newman and Joyce Wenger, follows the line taken by the ill-famed Rat Finks of the New Jersey Young Republicans that welfare money is all going to the Negroes. Loeffler says that Constructive Action has sent one copy of this book to every Senator and Congressman and to more than 2,000 members of the press.

A pamphlet, "The Berkeley Revolution," portrays the Nazi-mimicking Hell's Angels motorcycle club as colleagues of the peace marchers and student demonstrators at the University of California. While the Hell's Angels did indeed show up for one of the peace marches, they weren't there to support peace. They attacked the marchers.

One of Constructive Action's chief producers of both books and film strips is H. L. "Bill" Richardson, who is now the Republican nominee for the California State Senate from the San Gabriel Valley area. Four years ago, Richardson ran for Congress as a member of the John Birch Society. After his defeat, Robert Welch named him major coordinator for Southern California.



NONE DARE CALL IT TREASON!
RENFRO

Richardson is the author of Slightly To The Right, one of Constructive Action's paperbacks. Some years ago, he brought out a series of studio-type comic greeting cards which he called the "Jab-A-Liberal Series." He also published a conservative cartoon book, The Fuzzies, in obvious imitation of Jules Feiffer.

After the tragic Watts riots in Los Angeles last summer, Richardson wrote articles on the violence for American Opinion, the John Birch Society magazine. He has now done booklets and film strips for Constructive Action called "Civil Riots USA" and "Civil Rights, The Red Reconstruction."

Both booklets harp on the same theme—that all civil rights movements are a Red plot and the Communists are stirring up the Negroes. In pamphlets and film strips, he puts great emphasis on Dr. Martin Luther King's presence at the Highlander Folk School in Tennessee. He claims that Dr. King is a friend of known Communists and has received money from Communist groups. "Civil Rights, The Red Reconstruction" carries a drawing of an arrow marked "Communist Line." The arrow makes two loops, one encircling the words "Negro Republic," the other "Integrated."

It's Very Simple, the book that Constructive Action now seems reluctant to admit sending to college students, works over this same material at greater length. It also claims that Harlem street gangs are affiliated with Ben Bella's Algerian liberation movement, that the NAACP is "Titoist," and that civil rights supporters themselves blew up the church in Birmingham where the little children were killed. This book is published by Western Islands, one of the presses of the John Birch Society.

On August 17, 1965, while Los Angeles was still gripped with terror and horror from the Watts riots and rumors of atrocity were racing through Southern California, D. Richard Pine and Charles Armour, major coordinators for the John Birch Society, sent out urgent memorandums to all John Birch coordinators, section leaders and chapter leaders ordering them to start immediate distribution of copies of It's Very Simple and other anti-civil rights literature.

Constructive Action's publications, including Richardson's book and booklets, Pa$$ The Poverty Plea$e and The Law by Frederic Bastiat, are sold and distributed through the various Birch Society American Opinion Bookstores along with None Dare Call It Treason, It's Very Simple and Mrs. Schlafly's fantasies.

The film strips are shown by TACT (Truth About Civil Turmoil), a group identified on page 10 of "Report on the John Birch Society" by Benjamin R. Epstein and Arnold Forster of the Anti-Defamation League as a Birch unit. TACT members are currently trying to tell people that Fidel Castro's revolutionaries sang We Shall Overcome.

Despite Richardson, despite TACT, despite It's Very Simple and None Dare Call It Treason, despite Young Americans for Freedom, despite the preponderance of Birch literature that Constructive Action wanted to put in doctors' waiting rooms, despite the Birch doctors on the letterhead, despite the fact that all of Constructive Action's books and materials are sold through Birch bookstores, and despite the group's advice that readers join "study groups" when the only such "study groups" are conducted by the John Birch Society, Loeffler denies that Constructive Action is connected with the Birchers.

He also says that he himself does not belong to the Birch Society. "I've never studied the teachings of the society," Loeffler said. "I'm just not much of a joiner."

THE FUTURE OF THE DRAFT

JOHN C. ESTY, JR.

Mr. Esty, associate dean at Amherst College for ten years, is now headmaster of the Taft School. He is a captain in the Air Force Reserve.

When General Hershey announced last January that college students might have to be drafted, he triggered a reaction on campuses that has resounded all the way to that great bulwark of Selective Service—the House Armed Services Committee. The surprising thing about the current ferment is that the weaknesses of the draft and their possible cures have been quietly evident for the past fifteen years. It has taken the Vietnam build-up to elicit widespread concern and political sensitivity, but at least Selective Service policies are now getting the attention they have long needed. It often happens, however, that concern and political interest are not informed by intelligent understanding, and military manpower policies have a long history of being peculiarly misunderstood.

Nowhere is this better illustrated than on the very campuses where the whole fuss began. The draft has always been a problem for college students: seven years ago I wrote in The Nation ["Draft-Dodger or Patriot: The Dilemma of the College Student," Jan. 10, 1959] that the "corruption of 'universal' service is corrupting their sense of duty, uncertainty is making cynics of them. . . . It is not yet stylish to be unpatriotic, but the college student can't hold out forever." This spring the pressures of Vietnam converged with student activism to force the draft issue. Yet it is amazing how quickly campus debate itself degenerated into side issues. It is ridiculous, for example, for faculties to blame Selective Service for an overemphasis on marks when they themselves have not solved the problem within the university (where preoccupation with grading obscures the issue of good teaching).

When a university refuses to supply information to a student's draft board, it is not protecting him but is quite likely increasing his vulnerability. Student records, along with results of the draft test, are simply additional bits of information—provided at the student's own option—to enable draft boards to keep students in college, according to national policy. The real issue is not which few students should be drafted by what criteria but whether college students should be deferred at all. Unfortunately, moral objections to the war in Vietnam can easily obscure rational debate of the draft.

All this is not to say that the draft functions properly. It doesn't—although, ironically, the manpower needs of Vietnam have led to a more equitable operation in the past year because the greatest inequities occur when eligible manpower outstrips the Defense Department's needs, and increasingly arbitrary reasons are found for deferment. In the past ten years the number of men reaching the age of 18 increased by 50 per cent, while draft calls remained relatively constant—up to last July. The percentage of men reaching age 26 who have served in the armed forces was 70 per cent in 1958, 58 per cent in 1962, and today even with Vietnam it is only 46 per cent. The problem for Selective Service has always been how that relatively low proportion of the eligible males is to be selected, and when.

A few other facts are needed for an understanding of the trouble with Selective Service. One reason for assigning inductees to such nonmilitary duties as bartending and golf caddying is that often they can't do anything more demanding. A modern, efficient army requires competent, highly trained personnel; thus the armed forces have the same unemployment problem as the civilian sector. In addition, it is quite apparent that the major instruments of national policy are not only military but political, economic, agricultural and social. Therefore it makes little sense to define only in military terms the potential usefulness of a young man with a high degree of nonmilitary training. What criteria, then, should establish an appropriate national manpower policy? Two years ago, a group of House Republicans proposed the following set of guides, which are here paraphrased to embody certain new developments:

> (1) National security must be strengthened through an adequate supply of military personnel, but also through recruitment and training of skilled personnel in nonmilitary and support functions.
>
> (2) There must be a minimum disruption of individual careers and education and a maximum degree of free choice and certainty.
>
> (3) An attempt must be made to neutralize the "evasion mentality"—what President Brewster of Yale recently called "a cynical avoidance of service, a corruption of the aims of education, and a tarnishing of national spirit"—by making national service respectable and honorable.
>
> (4) Service—if involuntary—should be on an equitable basis, discounting such factors as economic background, educational level and marital status but heeding such factors of national need as special skills.
>
> (5) To be as economical as possible, the system should encourage re-enlistment of trained personnel and use of civilian contracts where feasible.
>
> (6) The system must be efficient, administratively workable and flexible enough to meet unexpected needs.

These criteria provide a basis for examining the reforms and alternatives to the draft that have been proposed in recent weeks. The advantage of reform is that it need consider only one aspect of the present system; a complete alternative, to be feasible, must cover all aspects in some degree. The two main alternatives are a completely voluntary military establishment and, quite the opposite, an expanded version of national service whereby everyone would have to serve in some capacity.

The "volunteer" concept has finally been thoroughly explored by the Pentagon in a study commissioned two years ago by President Johnson. Having lain under wraps for a year—presumably because it was predicated on the situation before the Vietnam build-up—major conclusions of the study were at last presented by Assistant Secretary of Defense Thomas D. Morris in testimony before the House Armed Services Committee several weeks ago. Although the full report is still not available, the summary seems to find that, even at pre-Vietnam strength levels and even with major career incentives, a volunteer military force is not feasible: it would cost an estimated $17 billion more than does the present establishment, and that figure doesn't allow for Vietnamese-type emergencies.

A New York Times editorial commented that the Morris study did not recognize such intangibles as spirit and a sense of national purpose, but that makes little difference in view of the present eroded national mood. One might wonder whether an extra price tag of $17 billion isn't indeed feasible, in view of the great advantages of a volunteer force. Also, predicating feasibility on military manpower needs of the past could be invalid in the face of technological developments and automation. When it costs something like $18,000 to train a semi-skilled technician who will then soon return to civilian life, it may be false economy to worry so much about the cost and supply of raw, unskilled manpower.

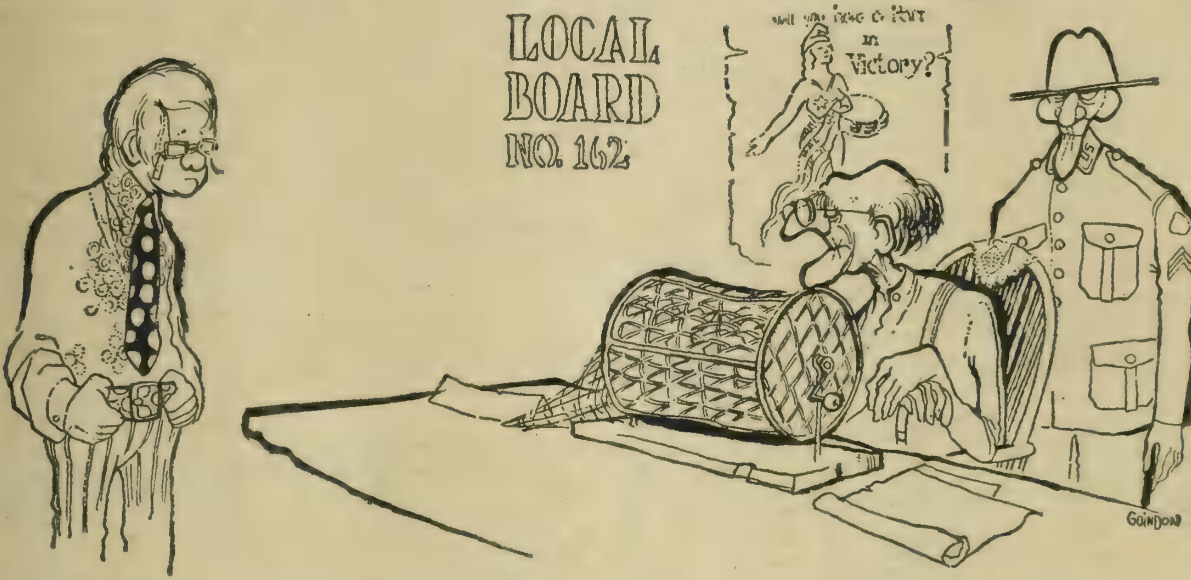
The other major alternative to the present Selective Service System—some sort of national service for everyone —came into the news twice in May. A group of teachers, writers and administrators met in New York on May 7 to lay the groundwork for a full study of alternatives to the draft, including exemptions for Peace Corps and anti-poverty service, and an even broader concept of national service. But the attention of the country was really caught by Defense Secretary McNamara's now famous speech in Montreal on May 18. It is a measure of the new concern about the draft that his few quite general sentences about inequity and every young person serving his country, embedded at the end of an address on world peace and security, got all the publicity. What he said was:

> It seems to me that we could move toward remedying that inequity [where the draft draws on only a minority] by asking every young person in the United States to give one or two years of service to his country—whether in one of the military services, in the Peace Corps or in some other volunteer developmental work at home or abroad. . . . It would underscore what our whole purpose is in Vietnam —and indeed anywhere in the world where coercion, or injustice, or lack of decent opportunity still hold sway.

Although McNamara was accused of bad timing and hasty words, it is perfectly obvious that he was not announcing a new policy, and it should be possible for the Secretary of Defense to muse out loud about some of our problems. The point is—and the pity is—that a reasonable statement of ideals, designed to stimulate thought and possibly rekindle some concern for what a young person can do for his country, somehow served instead to cut off discussion of national service.

Enormous problems are implicit in the idea of service for everyone. Without even touching the dangerous ground of the female side of things, what about service for the 40 or 50 per cent of young men who are ineligible for the draft on mental, physical or moral grounds? General Hershey would like to get hold of this vast category for rehabilitation, his stated belief being that this role can be played better by the armed forces than by any other government agency. Unfortunately, limited experience with Selective Service as a channel for rehabilitation is discouraging. Two years ago President Johnson asked draft boards to test 18 year olds immediately, hoping that local agencies would develop remedial measures for those who failed. Aside from the snag in coordination, the big trouble was the depressing discovery that most people "needing" it didn't want to be rehabilitated. An experiment in remedial English language work with a few illiterates who were allowed to be drafted was highly successful, but there was no provision for expanding the idea. Congressman Bennett of Florida has now introduced a bill authorizing medical and educational treatment for those who cannot pass the armed forces tests.

Possibly an even greater obstacle to universal national service would be finding enough jobs for everyone. About 2 million young men turn 18 each year, and the present enrollment of the Peace Corps, for example, is 14,000. On the other hand, with 900,000 men channeled into remedial programs and 500,000 into the armed forces as first priority, it might be possible to find slots for the remainder, especially if public school teaching after college were one of the options. One may hope that this alternative will receive the same kind of exhaustive study that the Pentagon gave to the "volunteer" alternative before rejecting it.



LOCAL BOARD NO. 162
will you have a part in Victory?
GOINDON

In recent testimony before the House Armed Services Committee Sen. Edward Kennedy put his finger neatly on the two areas of the draft most susceptible to reform. He said the defects of the present system come from the two policies of drafting the oldest first and granting liberal deferments. The problems thus created were long uncertainty in a young man's life, which disrupted educational and career planning, and the bias against those with inadequate intellectual or financial resources. President Brewster suggests that "service to the nation has been mocked" by a policy which tends to draft only those "who cannot hide in the endless catacombs of formal education." To this General Hershey replies that men over 26 should be placed in a higher draftable priority, thus cutting off the Brewster loophole. Hershey also points out that 56 per cent of college graduates enter military service compared to only 46 per cent of non-college graduates. (This statement seems at variance with the Pentagon report, which shows only 40 per cent of college graduates serving, compared to 50 per cent for non-high school graduates, 57 per cent for high school graduates and 60 per cent for college dropouts.)

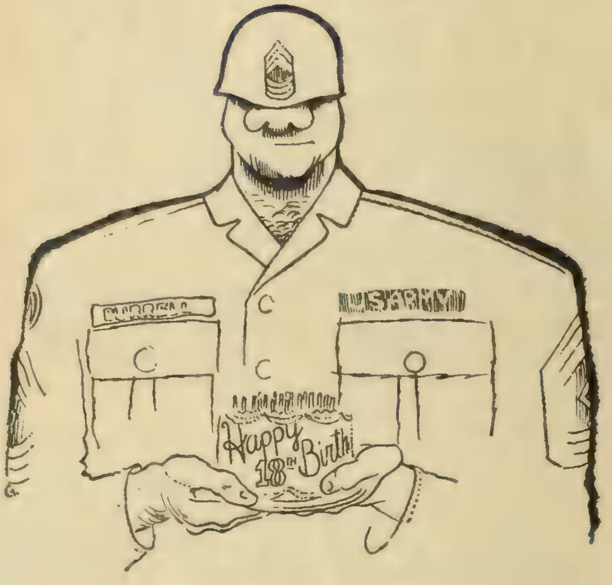
Another inequity mentioned by Senator Kennedy, Congressman Powell and others is the finding that nonwhites and the culturally deprived bear a disproportionate share of military service. Negroes comprise about 12 per cent of the draft-age population, and as of last November the proportion of Negroes in Vietnam was 15 per cent. However, the induction of nonwhites since November has kept roughly in proportion to the nonwhite population. It is true that the re-enlistment rate of Negroes is three times that of white soldiers, but the probable causes for this lie in social factors outside the competence of the Defense Department. If statistics like these represent serious bias, then a real problem lies ahead for the reformers who want remedial measures provided for culturally deprived young men who do not initially pass the mental and physical induction tests.

The office management of Selective Service has been criticized by Senator Kennedy and independently by a group of Republican Congressmen. The Senator raises the possibility of better equalizing state quotas, establishing more uniform national guidelines for local boards, introducing computer techniques and revising mental and physical standards. The Republican Congressmen, led by Robert Ellsworth of Kansas, also point to the need for greater uniformity of policy and use of data-processing equipment. One witness before the House Armed Services Committee complained that draft board clerks were making too many of the important decisions, and another witness seemed especially exercised that Lynda Johnson's friend, George Hamilton, hadn't yet been drafted. The committee hearings generated a lot of reform smoke but also enough fire to give General Hershey a lot to think about.

The most interesting reform, however, and possibly the most promising, is the lottery. Advocated by many Senators, Congressmen and educators, the idea has been worked out in some detail by Senator Kennedy as the answer to the defects of uncertainty and too liberal deferments. He would have all 18 year olds examined for the usual eligibility. In their 19th year they would be ranked for draft priority according to a lottery drawing only, no consideration being given to marital or family status, educational plans, occupation or dependence. The priority list of each board would be drawn from to the extent of the quota of that board; a man with a low priority number could figure he would not be called, and, indeed, after his year of vulnerability he would go to the very bottom of the next year's list.

General Hershey doesn't like the scheme, and calls the notion that it would solve the major problems an "illusion." He is concerned that the chance element would remove the pressure for voluntary enlistments, by which three-quarters of each year's replacement needs are now met. This distinguished public servant, at the age of 72, has run the nation's draft apparatus for twenty-five years. He is a solid and knowledgeable committee witness, for he has heard most questions and objections many times before and has ready answers for them. Some legislators feel that long experience can produce not only wisdom but also stale answers. Yet he seems to me utterly convincing when he says:

> So long as we recognize the wisdom of allocating our manpower resources to support to the greatest possible degree both our armed forces and our national economy, we should also recognize the wisdom of approaching this allocation problem with the best judgment we can muster rather than by chance.



But need we abandon Senator Kennedy's solution entirely? Certainly the idea of just one year of real vulnerability—and that coming at the natural breaking point of age 18 or 19—holds promise of removing the disruptive uncertainty that presently exists for the key eight years of a young man's life. At the opening of the House Armed Services Committee hearings, Chairman Rivers himself suggested that the period of liability might be cut off substantially below the current age level of 26. But the greatest support for the early, short-term vulnerability idea comes from the Pentagon report summarized for Mr. Rivers' committee by Assistant Secretary Morris. He cited a Gallup poll, which showed a vast majority of the country's parents would prefer their sons to serve around age 18, and he reiterated the great preference of military commanders for recruits from the same age bracket. Mr. Morris went on to state that since the median age of induction is now around 20, immediate introduction of the "young age class" system is not required. But the question should really be is it desirable, if it can work both to supply military needs and remedy at least some defects.

At this point an educational consideration might well enter the discussion. From my experience both with college students and with college-preparatory students, I would estimate that between a third and a half of them would benefit greatly from some sort of seasoning and maturing experience between high school and college. That this should take place in the armed forces is by no means certain, but it clearly points to the need for an educational moratorium of some sort, which happens to coincide with the "young age class" idea for the draft. Senators Scott and Clark of Pennsylvania and Miller of Iowa have backed the idea on a recent TV panel discussion, and it should certainly be part of future draft considerations.

Certain conclusions emerge from all the proposals, counterproposals, alternatives and reforms. In summary:

(1) The alternative of a "volunteer" armed forces does not seem feasible—unless the country is willing to increase the Defense Department budget by something like 30 per cent.

(2) Universal national service has great idealistic appeal but would involve an enormous amount of planning, coordination and expense. It would necessitate a major new governmental move in the direction of human and social planning.

(3) There are many internal, administrative defects in the Selective Service System, which can be remedied by forceful and imaginative executive action.

(4) The lottery concept would remove arbitrary inequities and biases, but it would also remove rational control of manpower utilization. But the lottery might be used after the rational processes of local board judgment have been exercised, when the pool of eligible men is larger than the quota requires.

(5) Limiting the time of eligibility to one year beginning at age 18 or 19 would seem to satisfy parents and military commanders. It would eliminate much of the uncertainty that dogs the educational tracks of the college bound and the employment tracks of the non-college bound.

(6) Establishing a national breaking point between age 18 and 19 might stimulate more imaginative development of worth-while programs to interpose between school and college. At this point, wider opportunities for national service might be considered as voluntary substitutes for military service.

The question then remaining is who should consider these conclusions?

It now appears that the House Armed Services Committee will not be the source of new proposals. Chairman Rivers strongly backs General Hershey and the present draft system. He has apparently resisted attempts to establish special Congressional studies of the problem, feeling that this is the purview of his committee. Yet he delayed the hearings promised last January until goaded by public pressure and the McNamara speech in Montreal. The recent hearings did indeed provide a forum both for complaints and constructive suggestions, especially by Congressman Morse and his Republican group, and by Senator Kennedy. They also smoked out the suppressed Pentagon study or at least a summary of it. It soon became evident that dissatisfaction with the draft was deep-seated and widespread and, in addition, that the moral dimension of the Vietnamese war necessitates more than patching up the old apparatus.

For these, as well as obvious political reasons, President

Johnson has now appointed a twenty-man, blue-ribbon citizens' committee to explore the Selective Service System. Headed by former Justice Department official Burke Marshall, it is to make a sweeping study and recommend reforms by January 1, 1967. Two years ago, when Congressman Curtis and others demanded a similar review, President Johnson responded with the million-dollar Pentagon study, which approached only a limited part of the whole problem and was undermined by new developments in Vietnam. It is to be hoped that the new commission will consider all aspects of conscription, as part of what Senator Clark calls the "manpower revolution" in our society generally, and that such anomalous situations as Vietnam will be built into the recommendations. If the commission is to be effective, it must be free of the vested interest of the Pentagon and the inertia which has typified earlier Congressional inquiries.

Although the ferment of this past spring seems to have ceased, many constructive effects remain. For the first time in years a Congressional committee has explored the draft well before the need for what has always been peremptory legislative renewal. Now we are to have a report and recommendations from a special citizens' group six months before expiration of the current draft act on June 30, 1967, so that new legislation can be based on thorough study. In the meantime it is almost certain that Congress will not act on legislative changes and that further hearings will await the new commission study. What administrative changes can be made in the machinery may thus proceed immediately to remove some of the inequities and biases recently brought to light.

Most of all, it is finally apparent that the country feels more deeply about military conscription than had previously been acknowledged. It makes little sense to worry about federal control in such areas as education and civil rights when an unexamined act of Congress governs educational and career plans, employment, marriage and family plans—and now even life itself.

SCHOOLS AND RACE

INTEGRATION FOR EXCELLENCE

REGINALD W. MAJOR

Mr. Major, a free-lance writer, was formerly chairman of the Education Committee of the San Francisco NAACP.

The massive resistance of the South in response to the 1954 Supreme Court school decision has its counterpart in the North, where the more polite concept of cultural deprivation has replaced that of racial inferiority, and protecting the neighborhood school is the regional equivalent of preserving the Southern way of life. In the North as in the South, frenzied attempts to maintain a dual system of education based on racial separation involve a loss of educational values.

Although San Francisco can hardly be considered the whole of the North, it is a typical Northern city in which 10 per cent of the 800,000 population is Negro. While there is some danger in generalizing, the educational problems that San Francisco faces are similar to those of other Northern cities.

The San Francisco School District is one of the richest in California. It operates 103 elementary schools, fifteen junior high schools, seven senior high schools and one junior college. More than 4,000 teachers are concerned with the education of 130,000 students, or more than one-sixth of the total population of the city.

But more than half of the city's school buildings are more than forty years old, with half of these constructed between 1895 and 1915. Sixty of the 103 elementary schools have no lunchrooms, although most children do not go home for lunch. There are only two full-time librarians for the entire elementary school division. Despite higher beginning salaries, San Francisco cannot attract teachers as successfully as do its suburban neighbors.

Academically the district ranks below the state average. Its dropout rate of 35 per cent is the highest of 100 large U.S. cities, 10.65 per cent higher than Los Angeles, the scene of recent racial difficulty.

School officials have explained that the district's relatively poor academic standing is due, in large part, to the students from "culturally deprived" homes whose social problems affect their ability to learn. They do not acknowledge that the school environment might have a negative effect on these students.

Of the thirty-four San Francisco schools more than fifty years old, fourteen are Negro and seven Chinese. All of the Chinese schools were built prior to 1916. Five plywood structures, put up as temporary schools during World War II, house approximately 1,500 students. The enrollment in four of these is entirely Negro.

The average cost per pupil of school buildings erected since 1954 is $1,750 for schools accommodating white students and $1,433 for those accommodating Negroes. School sites average 146,000 square feet for white occupancy and 115,000 square feet for Negro.* Teacher turnover rate in Negro schools is twice that of white schools.

Because blame for the school district's below-average academic standing is placed on the so-called culturally deprived, white parents are led to think that only the children of minority groups fall short of the norm. Actually, at least 60 per cent of students who fail to complete high school in San Francisco are white. Furthermore, by accepting the premise of cultural deprivation, school administrators and school boards delude themselves and the public into believing that special programs designed to compensate for an inadequate home environment are all that is needed. The compensatory education programs which result from this point of view are severely limited. They are usually set up in racially segregated schools, which are as barren and deprived as the homes the students left in the morning, and no systematic attempt is made to attract and hold a stable teaching staff.

---

*These figures are based on the cost of schools proposed since 1954, including those authorized by a bond issue passed in 1964.

Demands for integration are based on the verifiable observation that de facto segregated schools are inferior, coupled with evidence that segregation has deleterious effects on learning. In Chicago and Boston, protests were triggered by the realization that Negro schools were overcrowded at a time when there were empty classrooms in white schools. In San Francisco, demands for integration followed the recognition that in predominantly Negro schools students lagged as much as two to three years in reading. However, school officials and the public have preferred to think of the demands for increased integration as having social rather than educational ends.

To an extent, civil rights organizations have contributed to the misconceptions about the goals of the drive toward integration. There has been a general attempt to avoid accusing school boards and their administrators of making racially weighted decisions. While the poor conditions surrounding the education of Negroes is noted, spokesmen for integration are reluctant to label the all-Negro school educationally inferior. The failure to make such charges is unfortunate, in that much of the debate concerning de facto segregation avoids the main issue. Civil rights advocates have asked boards of education to correct an inequity which they agree the boards have not caused. Boards of education then reply that they do not know how to undo what they have not done. This leaves them free to perpetuate de facto segregation on the ground that what seems to be an increase in segregation is actually only a function of an inherited pattern. For, if it is agreed that schools are as equal as human ingenuity can make them under prevailing social conditions, what is the point of spending a great deal of energy to eliminate de facto segregation?

These weaknesses have been seized upon by opponents of integration, whose major platform is the preservation of standards of educational excellence. They fail to grasp the fact that a school system which can accommodate inadequate education for a sizable minority automatically places a ceiling on the educational attainments of the majority. Those who would block the elimination of de facto segregated schools are not necessarily racists; they are defending a way of life and an assumed social position against all comers.

What seems to be happening is that white parents transfer a belief in white supremacy to a belief in the superiority of the all-white school. They betray their lack of real interest in the educational process by not protesting with comparable vigor evidences of inadequate education not related to race. Every year the University of California finds it necessary to assign more than half of the entering freshmen to a course in high school English. This fact is reported regularly in the papers, and has not yet inspired parents to question the teaching of English in the schools.

It is generally accepted practice to advance a student from one grade to another, even though he has not mastered the subjects. All that is required is that he attend school faithfully and not present school officials with disciplinary problems. As a result, a number of high school graduates are incapable of demonstrating any of the skills which the diploma theoretically represents. And little attention is paid to the fact that, even so, three out of ten of all U.S. students fail to complete a high school education.

As basic an item as school construction has been all but ignored. San Francisco voters recently passed a building construction program which would replace only two of the buildings that are more than fifty years old. The only protests concerning the inadequacy of the program came from civil rights groups, who were criticized for attempting to obstruct progress. Proposals to increase racial integration, ranging from redrawn district lines to busing, have produced an impassioned defense of the neighborhood school. The neighborhood school is a much misunderstood and misapplied concept. The arguments in its favor combine sufficient emotional appeal with fact to make any assault upon its universal applicability prima-facie evidence of deficient patriotism and a hatred of children. And yet, the neighborhood school is little more than a convenient symbol. Although there are decided advantages to having schools located close to home, much of what has been said favoring neighborhood schools borders on fantasy and stems from notions that are hostile to an increasingly democratic society.

We might ask: who are those who send their children to school out of the neighborhood? The answer is simple: those parents who feel that the education available at more distant institutions is sufficiently desirable to merit a little traveling time. Thus, in San Francisco, 21,000, or one-fifth of school-age children, attend parochial schools, most of them out of their neighborhood. The private school is the fastest growing type of school, and the cause of this growth is an increasing dissatisfaction with public school education.

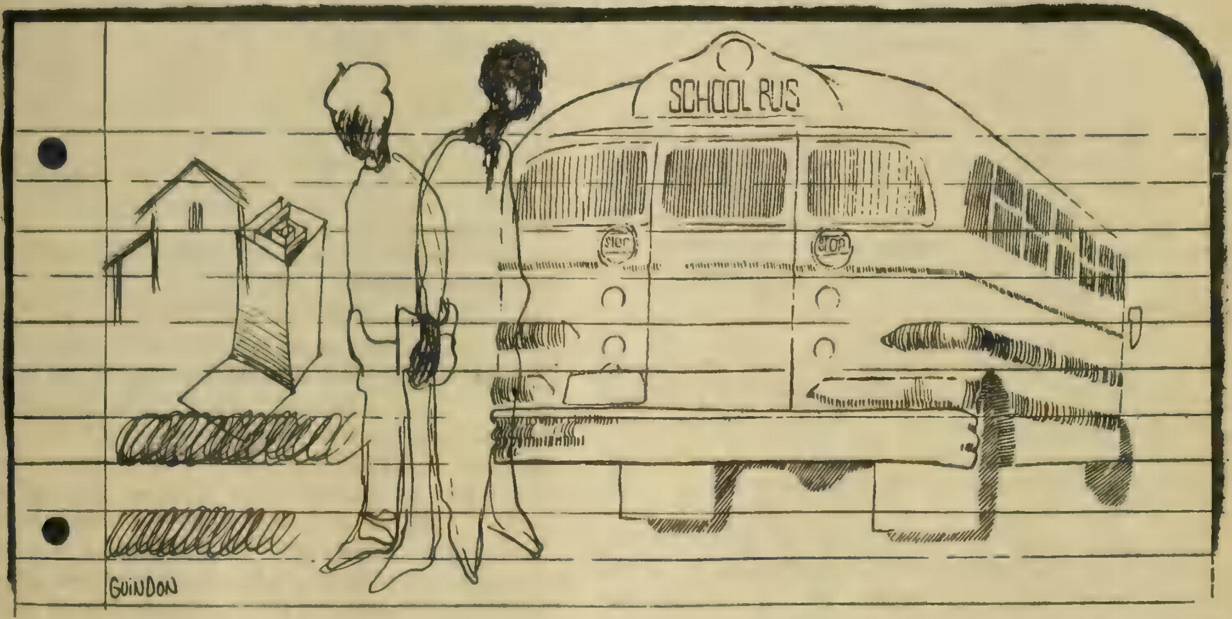
Within the public school system, also, many parents send their children outside the neighborhood. There is no question that some of these decisions are a response to the presence, or the threat, of Negroes in their neighborhood schools. But in the main, increased educational benefits, whether real or imagined, have caused a growing number of people to seek education away from the schools nearest their homes. The final invalidity of the neighborhood-school concept is its application to secondary schools, at which level, even in the most compact of cities, an overwhelming number of students use public transportation. Nevertheless, in San Francisco as in other cities, senior high schools are districted by neighborhoods, and this districting is defended on the ground of the superiority of the neighborhood school. A rigid neighborhood school policy can result only in the staking out of a territory, not the preservation of an educational standard.

The most direct way to increase racial integration is to integrate thinking about the entire educational problems of cities. Education must be geared to the needs of a future society which will be increasingly automated, industrially versatile and multi-racial. The successful school district, therefore, will be shaped to meet this future need. In such perspective, racial integration cannot be a temporary peace-keeping, token approach. It must be a long-term commitment to the future society. On a practical level, the school administration which takes this point of view will proceed to build a school district aimed toward total excellence of education.

The Negro neighborhood should become the focus of the drive for educational excellence, and the building of superior schools should start there. The schools themselves should embody every modern educational technique including team teaching, advanced placement courses, ungraded classes and intensive counseling. Class size should be drastically reduced.

A challenging atmosphere and the stated determination to make particular schools superior will attract teachers who derive maximum satisfaction from doing what they are best fitted for—teaching. They would be in sharp contrast to the present staffs of slum schools, which tend to attract self-denying educational evangelists, or drones who feel they have given their all by merely showing up for work. The very concept of slum school is self-defeating, and no teacher should ever become trapped in a school situation that makes him feel he is patching up society's failures. In a terrible denial of student potential, many teachers go to a particular school to help, rather than to teach.

One of the side effects of a rebuilding program will be immediate increased racial integration, as entire school populations will have to be reassigned during the construction period. Parents who fear that the introduction of non-white children into their schools will lower educational standards will discover that the performance of students in an integrated school will show improvement rather than deterioration. This was demonstrated in Berkeley, Calif., where a positive program to integrate schools stressed educational achievement. Without such an orientation, however, the introduction of Negroes into a school begins the process of neglect and unconcern that ultimately results in another inferior all-Negro school. It must be remembered that most all-Negro schools were at one time integrated.



Public education will never attain the dignity commensurate with its value to our society until schools are totally and completely severed from concepts of class, race or neighborhood. Every public school should be an excellent institution for learning, and we should build toward that goal. The first step is the elimination of the slum school, and the designation of the Negro neighborhood as the center for educational excellence, rather than the place where education is most urgently needed. To those who would call this program discrimination in reverse, the answer should be, yes, with the added observation that it comes not an instant too soon.

But the process of renewing a city's educational institutions should become a unifying factor, making it possible to view racial integration in proper perspective, as only one of the problems of urban education. Those who cling to the idea of the superiority of the neighborhood school, or the educational superiority of the all-white school, would now have to choose between their biases and the chance to benefit from educational excellence.

LATIN AMERICA III

The Changing Role of the Church

SMITH HEMPSTONE

Mr. Hempstone is a foreign correspondent for the Washington Star who is stationed now in Latin America. He has written two books on Africa and a novel, A Tract of Time, about Vietnam (Houghton Mifflin).

One of the causes of social stagnation and political discontent in Latin America has been the weakness of its basic institutions. Political parties, frequently no more than temporary groupings dedicated to the promotion of the political fortunes of a strong man, have been and are lacking in ideology. The labor movement has been and is weak and politically dominated. The universities, hampered by a shortage of funds and bound by a traditionalist educational approach, more nearly resemble extensions of the political parties than institutions of learning. Family life, characterized by free unions and illegitimacy, remains unstable. Socio-economic institutions such as credit unions have until recently been almost unknown.

In the flux of Latin American life, characterized historically by an almost anarchic individualism, one of the few institutions to display continuity, organization and universality has been the Roman Catholic Church. Accordingly, the influence of the Church on Latin American society, for better or for worse, has been profound. And today the Latin American Church, once rocklike in its inflexibility, is undergoing pronounced changes which promise to make it an even more effective instrument in the future.

Columbus carried the Church to the New World in his baggage. When Cortez's conquistadores hacked their way into the valley of Mexico in 1519, the priests who accompanied them smashed the idols of the prostrate Aztecs and "converted" the bewildered Indians by the thousands, a process facilitated by the coincidence that the cross also happened to be the symbol of Tlaloc, the rain god. The process was repeated in Central America, during Pizarro's cataclysmic overthrow of the vast Inca empire, and elsewhere across the length and breadth of Latin America (in Paraguay, the Jesuits created a closed, paternalistic theocracy over the Guarani Indians in which the Church was the state).

Once rooted in Latin America, the Church devoted all its vast prestige and considerable resources to the maintenance of a stranglehold over every aspect of colonial life. There was to be no tolerance of alien forces or liberal ideas. Late in the 16th century, the Dominicans introduced the Inquisition (in Mexico City's first auto-da-fé in 1574, one friar noted with satisfaction that "there perished twenty-one pestilent Lutherans").

Yet the early Church in the Indies was not a totally reactionary institution. Bartholomé de Las Casas, Bishop of Guatemala, made a concerted if unsuccessful attempt to protect the Indians of Mexico and Central America from the rapacity of their conquerors. And Las Casas was far from alone in his crusade.

But as the conquest receded into the past, so too diminished the missionary fervor of the Church. While isolated individual clerics continued to fight for justice and charity, the Church as an institution grew wealthy, degenerate and corrupt. Clerical concubinage became the rule rather than the exception, and the priesthood increasingly came to content itself with the formal ministrations of the sacraments, wringing gold and sweat from those whose welfare it was pledged to protect.

The thousands of priests, friars and nuns scattered across 18th-century Latin America (18,000 were in Mexico alone), many of them enjoying sheltered and unproductive lives in great monasteries supported by the labor of the Indians, lived beyond the law, subject only to the jurisdiction of their own ecclesiastical courts. The Church's wealth, expressed in terms of land, livestock and Indian peones, was immense and tax exempt. In Mexico alone, some historians estimate that the pre-revolutionary Church held title to more than half the nation's productive land.

Although the leaders of 19th-century nationalist revolutions which broke the power of Spain and Portugal in the New World had been strongly influenced by the European Enlightenment and Freemasonry, they were never able to shake the faith of the masses in Catholicism. Today, nearly two out of every five of the world's 580 million Catholics are Latin Americans. The Catholic proportion of the populations of individual Latin American countries ranges from a low of 72 per cent in French-speaking Haiti to a high of 97.7 per cent in tiny El Salvador. For the area as a whole, Catholicism is the faith of approximately 93 per cent of 200 million people.

Yet these statistics obscure a fundamental truth: despite its ubiquitousness and virtually absolute spiritual power in colonial Latin America, the Church failed in its mission to translate European Christianity to the New World. Even had the Church not been worldly and corrupt, the task probably would have been too big for it. Insofar as the Indians were concerned—and they form the common denominator of life in a dozen nations stretching from Mexico to Bolivia—pagan rituals and legends became intertwined in a twisted form of Catholicism which their ancestors had accepted almost in desperation as a last refuge in their destroyed world. It is no coincidence that the shrine of the Dark Virgin of Guadalupe, the patron saint of Mexico, occupies a site once holy to Tonantzin, mother of the gods in the Aztec pantheon.

The problem faced by the modern Church in regard to Latin America's larger and more evolved mestizo (mixed-blood) population, and in regard to the small but politically and economically powerful white group, is similar to that which obtains in some other areas of the world: Catholicism, when not antipathetic, has often seemed at best irrelevant to the lives and problems of the great mass of the people. Most younger Latin American priests are prepared to admit that the segment of the population that can be called Catholic in any meaninfgul sense of the word is not 93 per cent but somewhere between 5 and 10 per cent. While most Latin American children are still baptized (in Bolivia, the death of an unbaptized child is believed to bring crop-killing hail storms, thus exposing the offending parents to serious communal punishment), many do not marry in the Church or partake of the sacraments. There exists, then, a serious spiritual and moral vacuum in Latin American life into which both the Communists and a rejuvenated Church are trying to inject themselves as meaningful forces.

To a degree, the blame for this spiritual barrenness may be placed on the critical shortage of priests which has plagued Latin America since the late colonial era: today, there is only one priest for every 5,000 Catholics, as against a desirable ratio of one to 800 (in Honduras, and in many isolated rural areas, this ratio falls rapidly to one to 18,000). In many areas, the situation is becoming worse rather than better, with the number of seminarians failing to keep pace with Latin America's burgeoning 2.8 per cent rate of annual population increase.

But if priests have been too few, there are those who maintain, with some justification, that they have also been the wrong kind of priests: clerical concubinage, priestly drunkenness, and the charging of fees—small in themselves but desperately high in reference to the peasant's ability to pay—have done little to enhance the reputation of the Church. In addition, the Church's traditional posture as the political ally of the most reactionary elements of Latin American society has gone far to discredit it as a social institution in the period of restive awakening which has followed World War II.

Why was this allowed to happen? Why did the Vatican, with its extensive information-gathering mechanism, allow itself to become politically outflanked by the forces of anticlericalism in Latin America? One liberal priest in Peru, a country dangerously close to social revolution, places the blame on the Vatican's papal nuncios in Latin America: "The vast proportion of the nuncios historically have been Italian traditionalists. They reported no need for change because they were personally incapable of recognizing such a need."

Be that as it may (and the explanation is a little too facile), the Latin American Church, since the papacy of John XXIII and now under Paul VI, has been making vigorous and effective efforts to rehabilitate itself, to make its ministry meaningful to the broad masses caught up in a whirlpool of social, economic and political change. Impetus for this change has come not only from the indigenous priesthood but from an ecclesiastical "Point Four Program" which has resulted in the injection of large numbers of foreign priests into Latin America (Cardinal Ritter of St. Louis, for instance, has promised to send 10 per cent of his diocesan priests to help out). The consequences of such a development cannot fail to be profound. In Bolivia, as an example, only six of twenty bishops and 200 of 800 priests are Bolivians.

The foreign clergy in Bolivia is by no means uniformly liberal or reformist: in addition to a substantial number of American, Canadian, Dutch and German priests, there also are large numbers of Spanish, Italian, French, Maltese and Mexican clerics, many of them conservatives. But the basic point is that the contemporary Bolivian Church (and the same is true of the institution in every other Latin American nation) is no longer a closed, isolated organization: it is constantly exposed to a variety of ideas and influences from every quarter. In such a situation, inflexibility and stagnation are not only unthinkable but impossible.

Some critics, both within and without the Church, feel that the concept of regenerating Latin American Catholicism through the agency of foreign priests is ill conceived, that to be meaningful and lasting such reform must come solely and exclusively from the Latin hierarchies. But most observers maintain that this objection overlooks the fact that important elements of the indigenous clergy have demonstrated their desire for reform but lack the numbers or the technical skill to realize new goals without assistance.

The existence of such liberal Latin American priests is a matter of record. The Church in Chile, under the leadership of Raul Cardinal Silva Henriquez, has been in the vanguard of social change, voluntarily distributing its rich estates to landless peasants, associating itself with the Christian Democratic policies of President Eduardo Frei, injecting itself vigorously into such traditionally temporal matters as trade unionism. In Brazil, Archbishop Helder Camara of Recife, often only half jokingly referred to by Catholic laymen as a possible Presidential candidate, has awakened the depressed northeastern region of the country by encouraging reformist lay organizations, working among explosive leftist student groups, and instituting literacy courses for slum dwellers. Some of his priests have followed the Archbishop's lead with sufficient vigor to cause conservative President Humbert Castelo Branco to jail a number of them. In Central America, still a stronghold of clerical backwardness, Bishop Marcus McGrath of Panama, the son of a gringo father and a Latin American mother, is playing a major role in promoting social reform in an area long a battleground between communism and reaction.

While the pace of Catholic renovation has been too fast for many clerics, change has come far too slowly for others. Camilo Torres was one of these. Torres, a blue-blooded playboy who found a vocation in the priesthood and an ideal in violent social action, fought long and bitterly for reform of the Colombian hierarchy headed by Luis Cardinal Concha, a traditionalist cleric of the old school. Already inclined toward Marxism ("I am a revolutionary because I am a priest and a Catholic," he told his superiors), Torres was packed off to Belgium for a period of reflection.

Returning unconvinced and unrepentant, Torres taught sociology and served as chaplain at Bogotá's National University, where he became the darling of leftist students. Despairing of peaceful change in the Colombian social order and stripped of his ecclesiastical duties, Torres late last year took to the hills as a guerrilla leader with the Castro-backed Army of National Liberation. Three months later, the handsome, 37-year-old priest died as he had elected to live, gunned down by an army patrol in a brief, bloody skirmish. His body lies in an unmarked grave near the Venezuelan border, but his name has become a slogan in the circles of Latin American communism.

But while the lives and deaths of priests like Camilo Torres dramatically point up the social inequities of Latin America and the failure of some Church hierarchies to combat them, they are personal tragedies rather than institutional ones. For the experience of such men as Father Torres is outside the mainstream of contemporary Church action. The young priest's death would have universal significance and value only if the Church had shown itself to be unwilling or incapable of renovation. Neither circumstance happens to be the case.

"The basic problems of renovation," asserts Monsignor Andrew Kennedy of St. Louis, assistant to the archbishop of La Paz, "has been and is to get the priest out of the sacristy into the daily lives of the people." Just this is happening all over Latin America today.

Church-run radio schools designed to eradicate illiteracy have mushroomed all over the continent, and now number more than 60,000. The credit union and home loan cooperative movements, triggered by the so-called "capitalist priest," Father Dan McLellan in Peru, have had equal success. Priests have assisted behind the scenes in the development of the Christian Trade Union Movement (CLASC) and in the formation of small but vigorous Christian Democratic political parties dedicated to social reform in a dozen Latin American countries.

Under the informal aegis of the Church, national unions of Christian businessmen (USEC in Chile, ACDE in Argentina) have been formed in an attempt to ameliorate some of the more rapacious aspects of Latin capitalism. Organizations such as Techo (Roof) in Chile have been created to help workers trapped by their own poverty to develop new skills and entrepreneurial habits.

The same Dominicans who introduced the Inquisition have helped to create the Bolivian Institute of Social Study and Action (IBEAS), an organization which challenges doctors, lawyers and peasants to create a new and less inequitable social order. Priests of various orders have come into the universities, begun a dialogue among students of all political persuasions, and encouraged the formation of leftist but non-Communist students' associations.

Priests everywhere are getting their hands dirty. They are to be found in the middle of leftist political demonstrations, out in the fields showing campesinos how to improve their crop yields, holding open-air services in the Red barrios, doffing their cassocks to join in a game of soccer, something unthinkable a decade ago in class-conscious Latin society.

The use of the vernacular in the mass now is widespread (many clerics maintain, however, that this has served to increase the fervor of the faithful, rather than to win new converts for Catholicism), and the churches, most observers agree, are much fuller today, even in traditionally anti-clerical countries such as Mexico, than they were ten years ago. But the process of renovation, often speeded by the increased tempo of Protestant evangelism, is by no means constant, steady or universal. With a few exceptions, the Catholic hierarchies of Mexico, Central America, Peru, Colombia and Ecuador remain fundamentally conservative and resistant to change.

In Argentina and Uruguay, renovation is taking place but the process is slow and hesitant. In Venezuela, the Church under Archbishop Arias Blanco is progressive but wields little influence in that oil-rich and most materialistic of all Latin American nations. In Brazil, the most populous Catholic country in the world, and in Chile, the Church is keeping pace with and frequently taking a lead in social and political developments. In Cuba, a nervous Fidel Castro has whittled down the number of priests in the country to 220, a backhanded compliment to the resiliency of Cuban Catholicism.

Many problems remain, one of the greatest of them being the lack of vocations among young Latin Americans: enrollment in major seminaries in Bolivia, for instance, fell from 204 in 1950 to 163 in 1964. If God can be dead in the United States, he also can die there, even if the Church does become a more popular and liberal institution. Despite the vigorous rear-guard action of clerical traditionalists, most liberal priests feel that the battle for reform and renovation is won, that the passage of time will deal with the problem of elderly priests and bishops unable or unwilling to conform to the wind of change blowing from Vatican II. In this the progressives, who hold the initiative, probably are correct. But time is short and of the essence.

Social and political tensions in countries such as Guatemala, Colombia, Peru, Brazil and Bolivia are building up every day. From the Andean altiplano to the jungles of Central America, men have heard enough promises. It is action they now want and action they mean to have. A Church not in tune with the times, not in the vanguard of change, could be swept away with other institutions in coming explosions.

The fact remains, however, that the Latin American Catholic Church, neither as monolithic nor as all-powerful as it may on the surface appear to be, is both experiencing renovation and promoting social change of far-reaching significance. A rebuilt and inspirationally recharged Catholic Church is likely to remain one of the keystones of Latin American society in the transition from an old and tired social order to that of an uncertain tomorrow, the dimensions of which can be seen only faintly today.

LETTERS (continued from page 202)

works and services so that they are to be used merely as one compensatory device after private consumers (together with investors and foreign purchasers) have finished "gorging" and "have had their fill, or their swill."

This is simply not true. My text is studded with statements to the contrary:

"I strongly recommend in this book a policy of doing justice to our needs in those [education, health, urban redevelopment, and other public-service] fields. Apart from the intrinsic merit of that policy, which is the real point, it would also provide additional employment. But it would not, by itself, give us insured full employment.

"The government may—I hope will—expand its public-services programs.

"A considerable permanent expansion of public services and public works is much to be desired as a matter of achieving a better balance in our economy and society. Personally I think that this should be obvious to anyone who looks about him to see where it is that our progress has been lagging." (At this point I devote several pages to illustrating the thesis.)

I don't think this is the place to do more than just highlight the basic misinterpretation of what my book proposes. . . . But perhaps I could give one more quotation to put matters a little more positively. On page 33 I again refer to "the too-low levels on which many of our public services are now functioning," and to the fact that any liberal administration could be expected to urge increases; I then go on to say that my proposed Presidentially recommended level of consumer spending would have to be raised if Congress failed to accept all those recommended increases in public works and services, and end up by summarizing my proposal in this regard as follows:

"In other words, the President would give Congress a choice of proportions between government spending and private spending, but not of over-all levels of demand and activity in our economy.

"There could be more government spending and less private consumer spending, or less government spending and more private-consumer spending. The President's own preference on this, in the given circumstances, would be made clear. But an inadequate total for the two combined would not be one of the alternatives presented." John H. G. Pierson

BOOKS & THE ARTS

'He Made the Books and He Died'

THE FAULKNER-COWLEY FILE: Letters and Memories, 1944-1962. By Malcolm Cowley. The Viking Press. 184 pp. $5.

THE ACHIEVEMENT OF WILLIAM FAULKNER. By Michael Millgate. Random House. 344 pp. $6.

CHARLES T. SAMUELS

Mr. Samuels teaches English at Williams College. He has written for The Kenyon Review, The Yale Review, Commonweal and other magazines.

The literary world's recognition of Faulkner's genius was both shamefully slow and spotty. Perhaps that is why so many Faulkner studies strike one as penitential or, like Malcolm Cowley's pleasant but unilluminating correspondence, faintly elegiac. Nothing in Cowley's file adds much to our knowledge; the Millgate book, issued earlier, alludes to all the letters which are memorable.

That Cowley permitted Millgate to quote so extensively from private documents he was about to publish is only one sign of an endearing generosity. Cowley's file may tell us little about the great writer, but it casts a soft glow on him. Not that this was calculated; when we recall how crucial the Viking Portable was for Faulkner's reputation, the wonder is that Cowley can be so self-effacing. His brief account of the anthology's inception has a geniality which, under the circumstances, can only strike one as wonderful. When he first made the proposal, it "elicited some interest, but no enthusiasm." Faulkner was too lost a cause to seem worthy of such sumptuous commemoration: if only he were better known. Disappointed but undaunted by his publisher's response, Cowley took a friend's advice, divided the critical essay he had prepared for the volume, and issued the pieces in various magazines. Cowley tells us:

> Then suddenly, I had a call from the managing editor of the Viking Press. "It seems to us," he said, "that Faulkner is receiving a great deal of attention in the magazines." I modestly agreed.

The rest is history.

Cowley's geniality and Faulkner's cussedness make the file a couple of hours' tangy reminiscence. Millgate's book takes longer to read and gives rather less, but both volumes raise the same question. Isn't it too soon to turn Faulkner into a cultural monument?

In his commentary on the file, Cowley acknowledges that the Viking Portable introduction was only one crucial moment in the Faulkner revival. Though appreciative of Cowley's effort, Robert Penn Warren, reviewing Cowley's book for The New Republic, moved beyond its insights. Pointing out that Cowley's interpretation was a bit overly schematic, a bit literal-minded in its emphasis on Faulkner as Southern bard, Warren composed a list of topics for studying the master's fiction that has all but sustained Faulkner criticism for twenty years.

As Warren asserted, when Cowley published his collection the widespread view of Faulkner was of "a combination of Thomas Nelson Page, a fascist, and a psychopath gnawing his nails." Cowley altered this to a combination of Balzac, Hawthorne, and a rural fabulist, and Warren immensely sophisticated the valid, brilliantly timed, but slightly superficial rehabilitation which Cowley performed. Subsequent critics have behaved as if Faulkner did seamlessly join the 19th-century novel and American romance in the whole cloth of myth. They have analyzed, celebrated and genealogized his fiction as if the world he created were some vast synthetic vision with Biblical authority and few lapses from artistic grace.

In the last twenty years Faulkner has displaced Melville and James among American novelists as the main occasion for displays of critical ingenuity. Yet in the whole vast rite only two critics, Hyatt Waggoner and Walter Slatoff, have tried to understand Faulkner's fiction rather than merely explain or canonize it. Waggoner's book, the most large-minded of the general studies, is inconclusive and unassured, as one might expect in a period when most critics were losing their minds to atone for the bad old days of Faulkner's eclipse. Slatoff, more specialized in his approach, studies the rhetorical and thematic means by which Faulkner sought contradiction, but his findings too often reveal his own confusion.

For all their shortcomings, these writers should have pointed the direction to other critics, but a work like Millgate's shows how entrenched the complacency has become. The Achievement of William Faulkner is the sort of book one is always recommending as an introduction. It treats the work in chronological order, it provides scholarly background (comparison with manuscripts, source study, biography) without the thoroughness or method which might alienate the general reader, and it is both timid and conventional in its critical judgments. At this date, an introduction to Faulkner is more a venture in publishing than in intellection.

Both books are relaxed, accurate, thoroughly unoriginal, and designed for people who have entered the action where it is least dramatic. While critics and garrulous friends of Faulkner have been reducing him for twenty years into a known quantity—a boozy teller of tall tales and civic-minded tragedian—the main force of his work, with its roots in a tangle of perplexity and conviction that feeds every strong artist, has been ignored. What we need with Faulkner is not adulation, not even explication, but reconstruction: we need, by analyzing his texts, to reimagine the sensibility which created them. With temerity acknowledged, I want to indicate just a few areas in which his mind may be explored.

The Sound and the Fury, Faulkner's undoubted masterpiece, is nearly a perfect book. Only James's The Ambassadors can challenge its claim to supremacy among American novels in this century. But for all its complex scope, the commentators have served it well. As I Lay Dying remains to be fully explicated, yet it too keeps few essential mysteries. Critics of Faulkner, seeking to trace his inner dialectics, should start with those excellent novels of his second range: Light in August, Absalom, Absalom! and, in parts, the Snopes trilogy.

In these books one finds the anxieties, dilemmas and contradictions which the two supreme novels enshroud in the perfections of art. The most important passage in the Cowley correspondence comes as no surprise, but its implications remain to be fully grasped:

> I am telling the same story over and over, which is myself and the world. Tom Wolfe was trying to say everything, the world plus "I" or filtered through "I" or the effort of "I" to embrace the world in which he was born and walked a little while and then lay down again, into one volume. I am trying to go a step further. This I think accounts for > what people call the obscurity, the involved formless "style," endless sentences. I'm trying to say it all in one sentence, between one Cap and one period. I'm still trying to put it all, if possible, on one pinhead.

For twenty years now we have had critics discovering Faulkner's simultaneous time, or "frozen moments," or present pastness, as if Faulkner himself had not been thoroughly aware of the phenomenon, had not indeed made it his main expressive device. Artists are least aware of ambiguities in their favorite methods. This axiom is no less true of Faulkner because his device expressed a vision so commanding.

The past's vitality in the present always threatens in Faulkner to become sentimental nostalgia (recalling the decline in the work of his greatest contemporary, T. S. Eliot). The depiction of simultaneous time can involve a deficient sense of causality, can indeed condemn the writer to makeshift, mechanical notions of causality such as the reliance in Light in August on a narrow behaviorism which detracts from Christmas' tragic stature. "Frozen moments" can become lifeless friezes, activated only by an external and progressively nagging rhetoric, as in the portentous stylizations of Requiem for a Nun.

These deficiencies in Faulkner's presentation of time parallel deficiencies in his presentation of selfhood. Any of Faulkner's serious readers knows both Judith Sutpen's comparison of life to a set of interlocked people trying to weave a rug and Faulkner's great portrayals of people destroying one another (through pride, as in The Sound and the Fury, or ideology, as in Light in August) when each attempts to weave his own pattern. Few writers have conveyed so devastating a sense of the ruthlessness in our inevitable quest for self-knowledge. Yet in a novel like Absalom, Absalom! this major Faulknerian theme seriously counters another.

To establish the epistemological warfare behind Judith's tangle of egos, Faulkner creates for each of his narrators a point of view both partial in its accuracy and exemplary in its distortions: from Rosa's self-exonerating melodrama to Mr. Compson's self-serving cynicism. But the novel also wants to create a Southern myth, a synthetic vision of the ritualistic essence of Sutpen's tragedy. To create that myth in a world blandly relativistic and impervious to agony, Faulkner pitches his novel in a nearly hysterical key. Every detail is turned through incantatory repetition and oratorical volume into a supreme instance, a symbol of all life. Finally, the two themes threaten to neutralize each other. To sustain the narrative passion, Faulkner makes each of his speakers a vessel for his own anguished scream, so that gradually we lose that sense of separate egos which made the scream a fit response. Just as Faulkner sometimes cannot separate any moment from the flux of time in order to fix its causal place, so he blends each person into one great synthetic sufferer and we lose the particulars of anguish.

Triumph in Faulkner is a victory over logical comprehension. When Quentin and Shreve, in Absalom, Absalom! vanquish human distance, merge with Charles and Henry, their victorious understanding is a mystic affair of the heart. But the glamour in this triumph should not efface its clue to deep-set divisions in Faulkner's mind. Over and over in his work, one comes upon a distrust of language, from the strained satire of high-class blather in Mosquitoes to Addie Bundren's superb tirade in As I Lay Dying in which she compares action to the earth and words to an evanescence which vanishes in the air. Faulkner's style is an attempt at rendering simultaneity and mystic perception, but the normal mind and the syntax through which it expresses its thoughts are characteristically temporal and fixated on discreteness. The fundamental fact about Faulkner's sensibility is that it hates its own vocabulary. His involved sentences and incantatory rhythms are a war against language, in which every victory—and some are stunning—must retain some element of the Pyrrhic.

Of all modern American novelists, Faulkner is at once the most philosophical and the most antipathetic to logical discourse. This accounts, I think, for those strikingly ambivalent depictions in his books of all characters who might be called thinkers. Hightower is notoriously

SWEET TALK

One language surely lets us, more than another, get at the thing itself, each other. Attic Greek maybe, the undraped Sapphic say, or Provençal like honey shining on a rosy lip when men in speaking felt, so came, much closer.
Karl von Frisch,
after some forty-five assiduous years of "work in the field," assures us that, did German bees and English happen on each other, putting up in the same hive (Germans have ever been notorious travelers), if one of the Germans found a horde of nectar, as it communicated this to its countrymen, the native English would appreciate at once the treasure's whereabouts. But would the taste itself, the pollen,
pleasure,
cling to that fat fellow's buzzings,
in its setting Vermeer-mellow? Might it not resent betraying its lush secret?
Also, would one nation gladly share the wealth or readily forsake it to the other?
But I've allowed the slightest, academic hint of honey to divert me. Language, its capacity, had been what I was after. So I ask,
Are languages meant for meaning, some more acquiescent to the will,
the feelings,
and the senses?
Or are they, roughly, equal ways of signaling? Certainly old lovers, having tasted all the sweet and moved on to the sting beneath, can quarrel more precisely than mere foreigners.
Wars civil must be the most telling.
Take an artist working many years on one small painting or, dissatisfied, a crowded series. Is it that he means to be devoted to his primal vision, unrelenting often as he wearies, no sleuth hotter
on the scent?
Or is he bent on a mystery he cannot know until the last stroke, like a sudden period, locks it in? Or is he desperately responsive to the moment, inside and out, submitting to it
while he woos
and thereby hoping, should he think of it at all, that the completed work will somehow, even as it resembles nothing but itself, be a reality to the degree that it resembles nothing but itself?
Each sunset,
we are led to believe, the day's last utterance, as well as the peculiar colloquy of its moment's clouds, winds, smog (and all the sunsets gone before?), is unique—recognizable, believable, because unique.

Perhaps
speech's primary function is to speak.

THEODORE WEISS

the great hole in Light in August, but he is just as clearly Faulkner's spokesman. For all its power, the book is intellectually confused, and Hightower is the emblem of that confusion. At no point in Light in August can we assert that a way of life was solely responsible for the crucifixion of Joe Christmas; his tragedy is also self-inflicted. Yet the dominant subject of the novel is a way of life for which Joe's death must serve as judgment. The Christ parallel in its very incompleteness highlights the troubled sense of causality and significance at the heart of Light in August, for Christ's passion points to a sin more metaphysical than any mores can embody. The atmospheric "Dry September," with its vague last scene, prefigures the novel's mixture of a social causation personified in the evil Percy Grimm, and a cosmic destroyer at which his namesake McLendon ultimately peers. But atmosphere alone cannot clarify the issues in a novel, and Light in August remains indistinct.

Just as it shuttles distractedly between word and that which no word can capture, Faulkner's mind swings agitatedly between mere fact and universals. What is inferentially linked in Light in August and passionately invoked in Absalom, Absalom! became for Faulkner more and more a matter of rhetoric. In his later work, Faulkner declines into portent and thence into rant. Actions once portrayed in language, with some urgency beyond language, now become stylized gesture, wish fulfillment, outrageous stage managing. The point about such failures as Intruder in the Dust is not that they are propaganda, half-baked sermons but that their action is false and dreamlike. Old Southern ladies and boys turn detective to protect a Negro's life, Mink Snopes becomes a crypto-revolutionary, killing Flem in behalf of human dignity, and Eula becomes a suburban housewife anxious to maintain her family's name. Tragedy itself becomes domesticated.

However, these well-known failures are not simply signs of debility or old age. From the start, Faulkner's soul is torn between a poised desire to render life's "frantic steeplechase toward nothing" and a need to offer solutions. The Sound and the Fury wears the stone face of a mourning statue, but Light in August pulsates with what reviewers call "social conscience." That is why one of the last judgments over Joe Christmas is spoken by Gavin Stevens. This account of Joe's life in terms of the propulsive force of white and black blood seems to be talking of whiteness and Negroness, but if read in such a fashion is shockingly racist. One realizes that Faulkner is thinking of black and white as Hawthorne might think of it, as a Manichean romancer, and suddenly the division in Light in August splits wide. As we all know, Faulkner was a romancer as well as a novelist, but we have resisted knowing how unstable was the combination.

When a problem has been admitted, too often critics have been casual in examining it. Almost all of Faulkner's books are unsteady mixtures of variously revised stories, yet few critics have tested the implications of indecision or disorder in this famous fact. Since Cowley's emphasis on the coherence of Faulkner's Golden Book, we have treated it like some large Jackson Pollock made coherent through technical distinctiveness. But both Faulkner and Pollock sold their canvas in chunks. The one-and-the-many problem in Faulkner, which I have sketched for his handling of time and personality, makes itself felt first as a question of artistic form.

When face to face with Faulkner's notoriously imperial disdain for inconsistencies in the Yoknapatawpha saga, Cowley berates himself as a fool for questioning the great man, but these inconsistencies are notable precisely because Faulkner did not always refuse to deal with them. One can't, in advance, be certain what would turn up, but some critic needs to compare the instances of revision with those occasions when Faulkner effectively hid behind his plow.

Though Faulkner appreciated Cowley's efforts for him, he feared the project as an invasion of privacy. For an epitaph, he desired the words: "He made the books and he died." Of all modern writers, Faulkner was supremely certain that his writing was his self. What we want to do is search out that self, but in a mood of rigorous criticism and not belletristic geniality.

Wells and the Cosmic Despair

RICHARD HAUER COSTA

Mr. Costa's critical biography of H.G. Wells will be published by Twayne this November. He is currently on leave from Utica College of Syracuse University as a David Ross Fellow at Purdue University where he is a reviewer on the staff of Modern Fiction Studies. He is now writing a book on the late Malcolm Lowry.

H.G. Wells died in his 80th year twenty years ago. To an older generation of science-fiction readers, the photographs of astronauts astride the universe in a kind of cosmic sleep-walk may seem, in some curious way, familiar, recalling imagery from The First Men in the Moon, written by Wells in 1901. And who can say that the reports of UFO sightings are not a response to the human urge for wonderment in an age of computers; an urge to return to anything-is-possible times like 1898, when Martians invaded London in The War of the Worlds, or, again in 1938, when Martians landed in Grover Mill, N. J., via Orson Welles's radio program? Martian invasions on the Wellesian model quickly became the archetypes for all those B-grade films which present giant other-worldly creatures armed with death-ray guns threatening earth's comfortable inertia.

Travel into past and future time, secrets of invisibility and interplanetary warfare did not originate with Wells, but his name is attached, more than any other, to the mythical expression he gave to such subjects. The Argentinian poet-novelist Jorge Luis Borges goes so far as to say that narratives like The Time Machine, The Island of Dr. Moreau and The Invisible Man, which he describes as the first books he ever read, "will be incorporated, like the fables of Theseus or Ahasuerus, into the general memory of the species and even transcend the fame of their creator or the extinction of the language in which they were written."

This is high praise, coming as it does from a major contemporary artist, but it is largely lost today in a general disregard of H. G. Wells. For more than a generation it has been fashionable for critics to accept Wells wholly on his own terms; to take to heart his last words to Henry James about his preference for being journalist over artist; and to remember only the image presented by the last thirty years of his life. That picture of a world-state trumpeter invoking God and men to follow his lead toward a promised land drew the scoffings of literati of existential bent who were coming of age even as the aging prophet still tried to hard-sell the world a hope which his earliest and best books could not support.

Lately, after decades of neglect, a small coterie of critics—Bernard Bergonzi and Colin Wilson in England; Anthony West, Mark Hillegas and Robert P. Weeks in the United States—has been reassessing the earlier works of Wells, especially the scientific romances, and finding that at their core they imaginatively project a deep cosmic pessimism. These critics dismiss the tons of public journalism—nearly all the lesser books churned out after 1915—and, along with the late George Orwell, evaluate his 1895-1910 production as among the richest of the Edwardian period.

It is easy for critics who have read Eliot, Kafka and Sartre to misread Wells. Actually, though garnished by story-telling virtuosity, Wells's best books are grave warnings to mankind. The major works form a catalogue of forebodings: the end of intellectual life in The Time Machine; the resort to something very like brainwashing in the short story, "The Country of the Blind"; the catastrophe of uncontrolled experimentation in The Invisible Man and The Island of Dr. Moreau; the charlatanry of modern advertising and the unchecked horror of publicity in Wells's finest novel, Tono-Bungay; the development of intelligence at the expense of human sympathy in The War of the Worlds; the destructive consequences of irrationality in The New Machiavelli, an early (1910) forecast of political scandal à la Profumo.

If Wells had written no more than The Time Machine, Dr. Moreau, The Invisible Man and The War of the Worlds, he, rather than Aldous Huxley or Eugene Zamiatin, would have been accorded the distinction of being the father of the inverted utopia. Writing at Wells's death, and at a time when he himself was planning 1984, Orwell called When the Sleeper Wakes, written by Wells in 1899, a forecast of a highly organized totalitarian society based on slave labor, a work which "comes extremely close to what is happening now (1946). . . in the modern world . . . and is an astonishing feat of detailed imaginative construction. . . . The extent to which it anticipates Aldous Huxley's Brave New World and other pessimistic Utopia books has not been generally recognized." Wells has been frequently charged with wearing rose-colored spectacles, but he saw the failure of the human spirit to rebel forty years before Huxley and fifty before Orwell, and had sounded his warnings, sometimes using the same symbols they later employed.

In contrast to the tidy utopias created by the aging Wells, the early fictional landscape is a canvas by Bruegel. One glimpses, along with the first sight of the spearhead ship from Mars, a group of village urchins tossing stones at the cylinder that has fallen from the sky. One hears the bark of a cart driver as he pulls up at Iping Village with the luggage of the Invisible Man. One follows Mr. Polly into a roomful of similarly dispossessed tradesmen after his "bit of arson" has destroyed the Fishbourne Hotel but also made a lion of him for rescuing his landlord's mother-in-law. It is a landscape of disorder. Almost a casualty of the Victorian Establishment himself, Wells understood from first hand the private ordeals inherent in social struggle and extolled that struggle with a gusto second only to Dickens.

But the Bruegel landscape gradually blurs until by 1916, with Mr. Britling Sees It Through, a wartime bestseller in the United States, the setting has dwindled to a conference room. Mr. Britling, essentially a document, albeit an invaluable one to students of the Great War, sounded the theme for Wells's future work: fewer and fewer Mr. Pollys and Artie Kippses, more and more theories. This was the H. G. Wells who for the final three decades of his career would write tracts disguised as fiction, in pursuit of an equilibrium, a world order, which the humanist in him knew was unattainable.

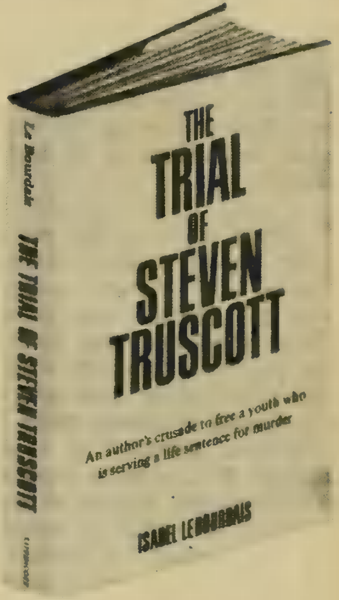
Thus Wells essayed the impossible: a leap over his shadow. For half his life the man he was conflicted with the man he thought he ought to be. The only value of his later idea-novels, of those symposiums where the main character is always on a platform, is to prove that to the day of his death H. G. Wells was never able to resolve the embattled claims of what Jung calls personae, those most cherished and private conceptions a man has of himself. Wells ushered in the century with an air of anything is possible. For a time his blueprints for new worlds, his heralding of a time when men's intellects would liberate them from the bondage of hereditary misery and the inertia of inherited comfort, caught the imagination of countless thinking men. "Later," Van Wyck Brooks sadly related in his memoirs, "the teaching of H. G. Wells lent itself to the saturnine jeers of an age that had lost all belief in the will and in progress."

By 1939, with the world on the brink of catastrophe, Wells roused himself for a last crusading voyage to the United States. Though Americans were disappointed in Wells's cockney squeak, his pleas for a world state were heard by thousands with the respect due an old man bearing a still famous name. Somerset Maugham recalled the twilight phase in a kindly memoir which concludes: "(Wells) was mortified that people looked upon him as a has-been. . . . When they listened it was . . . with the indulgence you accord to an old man who has outlived his interest."

So, almost concurrently with Hitler's invasion of Poland, Wells returned to London, his writing desk and his despair. In his late 70s, during World War II, Wells remained in the center of London, refusing to leave his home in Hanover Terrace. The world press' last pictures

Why has the case of Steven Truscott (convicted at 14 of rape-murder) caused international concern?

Read the book that "touched the conscience of a nation and stimulated a country-wide movement for a reopening of the case." —THE NATION



LeBourdais
THE TRIAL OF STEVEN TRUSCOTT
Lippincott
THE TRIAL OF STEVEN TRUSCOTT
An author's crusade to free a youth who is serving a life sentence for murder
ISABEL LEBOURDAIS

In 1959, in a small Ontario town not far from Detroit, 14-year-old Steven Truscott was charged with the rape-murder of a 12-year-old classmate. Sentenced to hang, he ultimately won a commutation to life imprisonment. Isabel LeBourdais is convinced that the case was a miscarriage of justice — and her carefully researched and documented book, in which she gives the reasons for her conclusion, has led the Canadian Government to reopen the case. A new hearing is set for autumn.

"It is to be hoped that this book will be given the attention it deserves . . ." — ERLE STANLEY GARDNER

"Steven Truscott will haunt every parent, and every human being who calls himself civilized."—HARPER LEE

At all bookstores • $4.95

Lippincott

of him were those of an adamant Briton shaking his fist at the invading planes. The novelist Elizabeth Bowen tells of calling on him late at night at the height of the bombings. A trembling Wells came to the door. "But you shouldn't be frightened at all this," Miss Bowen remarked. "After all you invented it." Wells looked at her and said: "It's not the bombs, it's the dark. I've been afraid of darkness all my life."

Wells suffered a physical breakdown in 1942, from which he never recovered. Although he continued to write, he appeared, after Hiroshima, to lose faith. In his 79th year he published a curious, misanthropic and disorganized little book which, in its 37-page course, seemed to repudiate all he had ever stood for as a writer. In The Outsider, Colin Wilson places this valedictory pamphlet, Mind at the End of Its Tether, beside T. S. Eliot's Hollow Men as "the most pessimistic single utterance in modern literature."

Thus, a close reading, not only of his last book but of nearly all the novels of his last fifteen years, serves as a preparation for Wells's return to spiritual country he had never left. Their heroes, each bearing a replica of Wells's own moral history, either contemplate suicide, as in Apropos of Dolores (1938), or bow to "incessant anxieties," as in Brynhild (1937). By 1932, when he began to write his autobiography, life was so oppressive that it was impossible "to assemble my forces to confront this problem which paralyzes the proper use of myself."

One of his most significant, though little known, jobs of writing in his final phase was to revise for a limited edition the ending of his most famous story, "The Country of the Blind." More effective than any other works, except certain scientific romances and the last pages of Tono-Bungay, this story blends the riches of the humanist storyteller and the mystic visionary. To the myth maker at the heart of Wells, no imagery proved more obsessive than in this story. From his student days under Huxley, to his deathbed conviction that mankind had played itself out, Wells envisioned mankind as a giant struggling in an evolutionary whirl to achieve a millennium of happiness and beauty, but always forced back into some sealed-off country of the blind.

Essentially "The Country of the Blind," written in 1904, is a pessimistic restatement of Plato's allegory of the cave. A mountaineer named Nuñez comes unawares on a fastness deep in the Andes, where for centuries the inhabitants have been sightless and where all knowledge of sight has disappeared. At first, Nuñez brazenly assumes the truth of the proverb, "In the country of the blind, the one-eyed man is king," and confidently expects he will become master. However, he finds that the blind inhabitants have developed other faculties; that in a land where no one sees, the sighted are the handicapped ones. Eventually Nuñez is forced to submit, and his submission includes giving up his eyes, seen by the blind as grievous and useless appendages. Nuñez rebels and endeavors to escape over the mountains, obliged to leave the woman, Medina-saroté, he has come to love. He dies, a worthless outcast, and the blind world goes on, self-satisfied.

Wells makes no major revisions until the final page when Nuñez, having made his escape, sees a fresh scar along the vast mountain. As certain of the impending collapse of the mountains as his creator was of the disaster the world was courting in 1939, Nuñez risks his life to rescue Medina-saroté from the valley of the blind. In a tacked-on epilogue, Wells reveals that the lovers escaped just before the mountain cracked. They live to tell their tale—among Nuñez's people. Then Wells, inexplicably, switches focus to Medina-saroté, now a mother of four. Her life saved by her husband's vision, she expresses no desire to see. Her last words are: "The loveliness of your world is a complicated and fearful loveliness and mine is simple and near. . . . It may be beautiful . . . but it must be terrible to see."

Wells appears to be saying that blindness is the only bearable antidote to the coming catastrophe. He has reversed Plato's allegory by letting one of the prisoners of the cave (or valley of the blind) return from the light—unchanged. Although Medina-saroté knows that sight saved her life, she still prefers the illusions of the cave: blindness.

The contrast between the versions of his best-known short story reveals more about the fatal ambivalence in Wells than can be learned from the millions of words of hack journalism that occupied him during the fallow half of his literary life. That Wells at the end of life should go back to one of the acknowledged classics of his golden period and rewrite it to conform to a growing misanthropy is one more index to the truth that he failed to resolve the conflicting claims of the artist and the public educator. Although he flawed his imperishable story, he also provided undeniable evidence at the eleventh hour that his dark concept of the world—the concept that pervaded The Time Machine and The Island of Dr. Moreau —could no longer be held at bay by the optimism of his journalism and would, in the end, overwhelm him.

THE TALL FIGURES OF GIACOMETTI

We move by means of our mud bumps.
We bubble as do the dead but more slowly.

The products of excruciating purges we are squeezed out thin hard and dry.

If we exude a stench it is petrified sainthood.
Our feet are large crude fused together solid like anvils. Ugly as truth is ugly we are meant to stand upright a long time and to shudder without motion under the scintillating pins of light that dart between our bodies of pimpled mud and your eyes.

MAY SWENSON

Commentary

COMMENTARY
WORLD'S BEST MAGAZINE?

SEE FOR YOURSELF
☐ 7 Mo. Trial $4.79
☐ 12 Mo. $800

COMMENTARY, NA
165 East 56 St., NY, NY
☐ Bill me.
☐ Check enclosed.
Name..................
Address...............
Zip...................
Outside USA + $1/yr.

BUY YOUR BOOKS
through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to: The Nation, 333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014.

Dahlberg: Aphorisms & Poetry

REASONS OF THE HEART. By Edward Dahlberg. Horizon Press. 159 pp. $5.

CIPANGO'S HINDER DOOR. By Edward Dahlberg. University of Texas Press. 67 pp. $3.75.

FRANK MacSHANE

A graduate of Harvard and Oxford Universities, Mr. MacShane is the author, among other books, of The Life and Work of Ford Madox Ford (Horizon).

Edward Dahlberg is distinguished among contemporary American writers for the orderliness of his intellectual and literary development. Where so many poets and novelists have repeated themselves or become flaccid in their mature years, Dahlberg has become increasingly firm and impressive, both in quality and range. He early abandoned the naturalistic novel with which he began his career because he wanted to pare away from his work everything that was trivial or secondary. His object has been to render his vision of life in an increasingly distilled and enriched manner. The process has been painstaking, involving a thorough consideration of the American literary heritage, a study which produced such books of criticism as Can These Bones Live and Alms for Oblivion.

The publication two years ago of his autobiography, Because I Was Flesh, revealed what Dahlberg had accomplished in his long period of relative quietude. The account of his childhood is an authentic contribution to American literature. Because he was impoverished and orphaned, Dahlberg could not look back with eyes half-closed in sentiment to a Tom Sawyer America of elm-lined streets, frame houses and home cooking; rather he realized that his experiences contained the realities of an epic. He saw his own story in terms of ancient legends and myths—like the centuries-old adventures of poor boys in Bagdad and Jerusalem, Athens and Alexandria—and thus attained an intensity that few personal narratives achieve.

In moving away from naturalistic writing, Dahlberg was following a definite aesthetic principle. He had become bored with books concerned primarily with external phenomena, and suspicious of their value. "We have had many subhuman journalistic novels acclaimed because they are true 'facts,'" he has written, "although they are without moral reflection, learning or compassion." Words for Dahlberg are not merely tools for information and sensation: "A word that arouses some sort of contemplative or physical activity is good, and one that does not is base."

This attitude may appear conservative and liable to lead to excessive didacticism, as though Dahlberg looked upon himself primarily as prophet or seer. The publication of Reasons of the Heart, which is a book of aphorisms, tends to support this supposition. No other writer today displays similar interest in following the path of Hippocrates, Heraclitus, Pascal and La Rochefoucauld, and books of maxims have not been in prominent circulation since the end of the 18th century. The aphorism itself, a pithy or gnomic utterance of a generalized truth, belongs to a more ordered and structured age than our own.

Although Dahlberg would therefore seem to be taking a considerable risk in publishing a book of this kind today, it is his great triumph that in Reasons of the Heart he is neither old-fashioned nor tediously moralistic. His maxims are not warmed-over versions of La Bruyère or Sir Thomas Browne; rather they are distinct personal statements. Pushing beyond the stage reached in Because I Was Flesh, he has stripped away the anecdotal and circumstantial from his language without, however, losing his individual voice. This is an extraordinary achievement and is due to Dahlberg's skill in handling words. His nouns confront his verbs in a fresh manner, and his adjectives and adverbs are true modifiers: "He who claims to be just has a granite bosom." "Morality is the convenience of the rich and the misery of the poor." "Could I understand my dreams no tomb could shriek my horror."

Not all of the maxims in Reasons of the Heart crackle with pithiness, however. Some of the best are relaxed and humorous, such as: "The easiest way to seduce another man's wife is to praise her husband after which she will find your character very attractive." Dahlberg ranges over a wide variety of topics, from literature to food, from futility to lust, from solitude to sloth. His purpose is to deal with man's physical, emotional and intellectual concerns in an illuminating and orderly fashion, though the prevailing tone is stricken and bleak.

That a number of the poems in Dahlberg's new book of verse, Cipango's Hinder Door, are also aphoristic is only natural for, as Allen Tate observes in his admirable introduction, all of Dahlberg's writing is the product of a "unified intelligence."

The first part of the volume deals with the history of America—the Cipango (or Japan) that Marco Polo heard of in his travels, and to which Columbus thought he was sailing. But the America Dahlberg presents is not the glorious and hopeful new world celebrated by Whitman; it is a land marred and spoiled by the encounter of old and new. Instead of a new Atlantisian race, there grew up the race of Cain, a lonely, isolated and rationalistic people. America is not the continent of the whole man but of the shattered and disjointed individual—a creature of constant movement, haphazardly influenced by his multiple heritage from Greece and Judea, Mexico and Peru. The poems in which Dahlberg presents this vision combine narra-

Any 3 Best Sellers for $1 Each
With Book Club Membership

	LIST
☐ GILES GOAT-BOY — JOHN BARTH	6.95
☐ RUSH TO JUDGMENT — MARK LANE	5.95
☐ ORIGINS: THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF WORDS — ERIC PARTRIDGE	16.00
☐ ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE GREAT QUOTATIONS — GEORGE SELDES	15.00
☐ GAMES PEOPLE PLAY — ERIC BERNE, M.D.	5.00
☐ NOVA EXPRESS — WILLIAM S. BURROUGHS	5.00
☐ UNDERSTANDING MEDIA — MARSHALL McLUHAN	7.50
☐ NON-VIOLENCE IN AMERICA — Edited by STAUGHTON LYND	7.50
☐ THE GINGER MAN — J. P. DONLEAVY	5.75
☐ LSD: THE CONSCIOUSNESS-EXPANDING DRUG — SOLOMON & LEARY	5.95
☐ MUSSOLINI: A STUDY IN POWER — IVONE KIRKPATRICK	10.00
☐ THE DEMONS (2 vols.) — HEIMITO VON DODERER	13.50
☐ LBJ — MICHAEL DAVIE	2.95
☐ MASTER POEMS OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE — OSCAR WILLIAMS, Ed	10.00
☐ THE OLYMPIA READER — MAURICE GIRODIAS, Ed.	12.50
☐ THE COMMENTARY READER — NORMAN PODHORETZ, Ed.	12.50
☐ GOING TO MEET THE MAN — JAMES BALDWIN	4.95
☐ UNDER THE VOLCANO — MALCOLM LOWRY	5.95
☐ THE POLITICAL ECONOMY OF SLAVERY — EUGENE D. GENOVESE	6.95
☐ THE AMERICAN WRITER AND THE GREAT DEPRESSION — Edited by HARVEY SWADOS	7.50
☐ 1 in 7: DRUGS ON CAMPUS — RICHARD GOLDSTEIN	4.95
☐ NEGRO PROTEST THOUGHT IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY — Edited by AUGUST MEIER AND FRANCIS BRODERICK	7.50

Check [illegible] books wanted and mail with your name and address to The Mid-Century Book Society, [illegible] East 44th Street, N.Y., N.Y. 10017. Only obligation is to buy three additional books in the next 12 months, at reduced member's prices, from the many to be offered. Invoice for $3 plus handling will accompany books. NA-15 tive with an evocative commentary which draws upon mythology, literature and natural history. The prophetic nature of the poems is emphasized by the employment of Old Testament rhythms and images.

Dahlberg's gifts as a lyric poet are most evident in the second part of the volume. Here the individuality of the poet's voice is more marked as it animates and unifies the material. The subjects, too, are more immediate and derive from felt experience. One poem opens:

> I am sixty-three;
> I go slow,
> The bitter waters of dotage in my > veins.
> I have died a little in your company,
> But so have you.

Another begins with these lines:

> I am galled and stung and wonder
> why.
> I am genial by accident,
> Gray and hulled as the sea at noon,
> And by evening rueful as a ditch
> With no twilight to salve my bruised > gorge.

Here language and form memorialize the experience and emotions. The poem becomes literature as it naturally incorporates extra-personal overtones and suggestions.

Together, Reasons of the Heart and Cipango's Hinder Door contain the distillation of a lifetime's experience. In technique, they reveal Dahlberg at a new level of artistic precision; in subject matter they show him still as alone and bitter as D. H. Lawrence told him to be—a prophet whom it is our folly to ignore.

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 9-12-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

Grierson: A Strange Fish

THE VALLEY OF SHADOWS. The Coming of the Civil War in Lincoln's Midwest: A Contemporary Account. By Francis Grierson. Harper & Row. 277 pp. $1.95 paper.

HAROLD P. SIMONSON

Department chairman and professor of English at the University of Puget Sound, Mr. Simonson has published a critical biography of Francis Grierson (Twayne). He is the author of Zona Gale (Twayne) and of two textbooks, most recent of which is Writing Essays (Harper & Row). He has contributed articles to Antioch Review, American Quarterly and other journals.

First published in 1909, Francis Grierson's The Valley of Shadows never really caught the wide attention one might expect of a book so thoroughly American in its subject. All the more is it reason now to applaud Harper & Row's decision to reissue the book. For Grierson's The Valley of Shadows superbly re-creates the psychological atmosphere presaging America's "irrepressible conflict." It is an atmosphere unique to the Illinois prairie and to the rustic seers and prophets living on it, which in strangely mystical ways testifies to the apocalyptic dimension of both the Civil War and Abraham Lincoln, the Moses-like savior of the people.

Clearly the book has an important place in the Lincoln legend. In his introduction to an earlier edition (1948) Prof. Theodore Spencer called it "a minor classic"; Bernard De Voto, in his Editor's Note to the same edition, stated that he preferred to delete Spencer's adjective. In the same year (the hundreth anniversary of Grierson's birthday) Edmund Wilson wrote in a lengthy review that the book must "be taken seriously as literature." And Lloyd Lewis, in still another review, asserted that "this haunting book deserved revival long ago."

Grierson wrote the book in London many years after he had left the Middle West of his youth. Earlier, when he was less than a year old, his English parents had emigrated to the United States and had settled in the heart of Abraham Lincoln country—Sangamon County, Ill. It was living in a log house, playing freely on the prairies, awakening to the religious and political excitement of the times, hearing the final Lincoln-Douglas debate in Alton, knowing his family's house was a station on the Underground Railway, witnessing torchlight parades in St. Louis on the eve of the November election in 1860, serving as a page to Gen. John C. Frémont—these were the experiences nothing could efface in Grierson's memories and which later shaped The Valley of Shadows.

Yet it is curious that he waited so long to write this book, unquestionably his best. From 1869, when he first went to Paris (he was 21) to the end of the century he seemed to have irrevocably put these memories aside. Instead he hobnobbed with Europe's royal families, playing weirdly beautiful piano improvisations in their palaces and salons. He made friends with literary and musical celebrities including Mallarmé, Verlaine, Arnold Bennett, John Lane, François Auber and Samuel David. He conducted séances with General Jourafsky in St. Petersburg, with Madame Blavatsky in Chittendon, Vt., and with the spiritualists in both Chicago and San Diego. He wrote essays—fragile, impressionistic, resembling classical French pensées—for California's The Golden Era and for his own subsequent volumes bearing such wispy titles as Essays and Pen-Pictures, Pensées et Essais, Modern Mysticism and The Celtic Temperament.

But at the age of 61 Grierson imaginatively returned to the American frontier to write his chef-d'oeuvre. According to Van Wyck Brooks, who saw him occasionally in London at that time, Grierson was "solitary, poor and all but forgotten." Brooks called him a "strange fish"—a tall man "with his worn old tweeds, his drooping moustache, pink cheeks, and crimson

THE HOMECOMING

Now it is time to be cut out of the wolf's belly.

It is time to come back home with what one has brought

For those who were neither charming nor caring.

It is time to tell all the tales to a better night

And to thank especially the extra-human, the birds along the way,

The dove that led through the forest,
the duck that let first your sister

And then you ride across the dangerous river. It is time

For reunions that are themselves compromises. In the firelight

You see the jewels you brought gleam on the dead as they go on talking.

DAVID RAY

necktie. The moustache was evidently dyed and he rouged his cheeks, and that he wore a wig was also apparent from the white hairs that straggled out over his ears; and later when he was caught by the rain and obliged to stay in my house I was sorry that I could not help him in the matter of cosmetics."

A strange fish indeed, and a strange book too. In it Grierson sought to depict the "silences" belonging to the prairies, and "the voices of preacher and prophet and a host of workers and heroes in the great War of Secession." In a series of scenes and incidents which, according to Grierson himself, "nothing but the term 'mystical' will fittingly describe," he attempts to imbue history and specifically mid-19th-century American history with supra-phenomenal meaning. Presentiments like a prairie fire and Donati's comet warn of strange powers moving over the land, of oncoming war, and of one (Lincoln) who will come to lead his people through the valley of shadows. Grierson saw Sangamon County as an Edenic garden, its inhabitants as heroic pioneers who, because of their mystic relationship to the land, endure this time of testing.

Grierson's literary success is not only in sensitive lyricism and use of symbol. There is also accurate detail. Grierson's ear for frontier dialect rivals that of Mark Twain. His characterizations of Kezia Jordan, Elihu Gest, Minerva Wagner and preacher Azariah James depict the rough-chiseled but indomitable pioneer of both fact and legend. Such richly evocative scenes as "The Flight," "The Camp-Meeting," "Abraham Lincoln" (a chapter Carl Sandburg quoted from at length in his Abraham Lincoln: The Prairie Years) and "The Torch-Light Procession" are indigenous Americana.

Grierson went on to write other books consisting largely of essays. They carry the same Victorian gentility, idealism and belated romanticism as before, but with a new tone of desperateness. Grierson now dared to envision what lay ahead in the new century. He saw the coming conflict as between not only ignorant armies but two ways of looking at life—the scientific and the metaphysical. And what he saw ahead was a civilization given over to a wholly scientific and mechanistic world view. Hearing the rumblings of war, he returned in 1913 to the U.S. In 1920, he moved to Los Angeles where, amid orange blossoms and occultists, he spent his last seven years and wrote a bizarre little book called Psycho-Phone Messages.

Francis Grierson will never be more than a minor figure in American literary history. Nevertheless, there is a place for him that no one else can fill. The same must be said for The Valley of Shadows.

Taking No Risks

TENANTS OF THE HOUSE. By Heather Ross Miller. Harcourt, Brace & World. 119 pp. $3.75.

BARBARA RASKIN

Mrs. Raskin is a professor of world literature at American University. Her special interest is in the contemporary American novel.

Although Heather Ross Miller's first novel achieved critical acclaim, her second, Tenants of the House, is a striking example of the bad fiction currently being produced by educated writers for a "trained audience." Equipped with the necessary Freudian presumptions and literary experience, this audience transcribes fictional shorthand into fully developed statements about contemporary life. Responsive to all the stylistic devices of modern novels, the readers collaborate with the author in assigning meanings, where none exist, to murky symbols and stereotyped characterizations.

According to a now well-established formula, Mrs. Miller selects her title from a poem by T. S. Eliot, an unmistakable emblem of her seriousness; raises an epigraph (from "Gerontion") as a key to be used in translation and composes a small Southern town (Johnsboro, N. C.) as an indicator of her wave length. Sleepy little Johnsboro, invaded by a large aluminum company from Illinois, is an instant-symbol of social conflict. The reader, well versed in the current tradition, immediately recognizes the pervasive threat of industrialism and, without being shown, knows that the smelting plant both supports the townspeople and smothers them with "dust." "You brush it away, but it comes right back with the next wind."

Mrs. Miller collects a conventional array of characters, each of whom receives "equal time." The narrator moves in like a helicopter to give aerial glimpses of

THE NATION SAYS:

"THE EUROPEAN BILL, 'GOOD TIMES, WONDERFUL TIMES' AND 'JOSEPH KILIAN', IS PROBABLY THE MOST INTERESTING MOVIE FARE AVAILABLE IN NEW YORK THESE SUMMER WEEKS."

GOOD TIMES, WONDERFUL TIMES

Produced and Directed by LIONEL ROGOSIN

NEWSWEEK SAYS:

"'GOOD TIMES, WONDERFUL TIMES' IS AN INDICTMENT OF HUMAN INDIFFERENCE TO INHUMAN DESTRUCTION, A CALL TO ACTION, A WARNING AND A PUNCH IN THE SOFT UNDERBELLY OF SOCIETY. IT SHOULD BE SEEN!"

CUE SAYS:

"'GOOD TIMES, WONDERFUL TIMES'... YOU OWE IT TO YOURSELF TO EXPERIENCE THIS SARDONIC, POWERFULLY CONCEIVED FILM."

and Joseph Kilian

"Striking & Notable" Crowther, N.Y. Times

CARNEGIE HALL CINEMA

7th Ave. and 56 St. PL 7-2131 12:10, 2:40, 4:30, 6:20, 8:10, 9:20

FREE! With every new subscription to

THE NATION

RUSSIA AT WAR

by Alexander Werth. 1,100 pp. Avon Publications.
Paperback Edition, list price $1.65

A classic of war reporting by the distinguished European correspondent of The Nation which was on the bestseller list for weeks on first publication.

> " . . . no nation in the history of battle ever suffered more than the Russians suffered in the course of the Second World War. At least 20 million lost their lives. . . . A third of the nation's territory, including nearly two-thirds of its industrial base, was turned into a wasteland—a loss equivalent to the devastation of all this country east of Chicago. . . ."
> —President John F. Kennedy, June 10, 1963

> " . . . an extraordinary book, one of the most important books yet written about World War II and certainly the most important yet written about the Russian-German War."
> —Orville Prescott, New York Times

> "There is no book in any language with which to compare Alexander Werth's monumental but exceedingly readable and controversial history of the Nazi-Soviet war, that four-year struggle in the East which, in the words of Churchill, 'tore the guts out of the German Army.' "
> —Joseph Barnes, Life

> "The best book we probably shall ever have in English on Russia at war."
> —William L. Shirer

For your FREE copy of RUSSIA AT WAR, fill out the subscription coupon below and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of RUSSIA AT WAR.

☐ One year, $10 ☐ Two years, $18 ☐ 6 months, $6
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

CITY .... STATE .... ZIP No. ....

9-12-66

familiar scenes. Following the route of the town's newspaper boy, we "fade in" on Linda Earl, a young housewife lying on the couch dreaming about her wedding day while the kitchen sink fills up with dirty dishes. Because Peyton Place provided detailed instructions on how to interpret and understand Linda's problems, it is no longer necessary to waste time proving a case about Linda's neuroses. Mrs. Miller simply presents the situation and subsequently moves on to Christa Kulp.

Christa, "ten-going-on-eleven," watches life from her window, romantically stimulated by some dark mysticism brought into her house by a fat Negro maid. Poor Christa, verging on womanhood, must remain forever underdeveloped because literary clues rather than blood course through her veins. Delivered with all the proper baggage of beloved goldfish and moody daydreams, Christa is a frozen allusion to someone like Frankie, in Carson McCullers' A Member of the Wedding.

Beatrice, the Kulp's maid, predictably snitches swigs of Mr. Kulp's bourbon while ironing Christa's dancing costume of "thin green gauze with a girdle of paper roses." Bea is depicted exclusively by such stereotyped details, while Mrs. Miller depends on the reader to know (from Faulkner) that ladies like Beatrice "mean" something. Bea, of course, has a 99-year-old mother named Jancy, who drops dead at the end of the book. She also has a niece, Sunday Jo, who sometimes plays with Christa Kulp and talks about spooks, ghosts, graveyards and other favorite Negro subjects that affect sensitive little white children.

Also resurrected from literature is a 17-year-old boy, Gene Boyette, who is "wilting" sexually (like the African violets that rot in his kitchen) due to a long and close association with his asthmatic mother, Elizabeth. (Everyone is expected to know about asthma.) "Elizabeth could not turn pale because she was always pale; even in her healthiest moments she was of a pallor, not ivory or porcelain, but of the death-white satin that lines a coffin." Elizabeth, naturally, takes her pills with water from a long-stemmed crystal goblet kept on her bedside table. We need only a few such stenographic symbols to discover the proper Capote archetype. Indeed, Mrs. Miller shows great skill in manipulating Wolfean-rich types with Fitzgeraldean restraint and control. Why not?

Aside from the fact that not one but two sets of twins appear in 119 pages, there are no surprises in Tenants in the House. Everything has been "done" before. It is not that previous treatment disqualifies a subject from further comment, but it is necessary that new insight be appended to existing constructs, if they must be used. Mrs. Miller's novel is a commonplace response of someone intimidated and inspired by the "contemporary tradition."

She has looked at reality through a screen of novels and paid her tribute to the masters by imitating their techniques. But the reproduction of a style that was successfully used in defining the American scene does not automatically produce a meaningful theme. Mrs. Miller's ambition to "equal" the major novelists caused her only to "echo" earlier achievements; she took her dictation from literature rather than from life.

Part of the responsibility for this kind of failure rests with the reader who is eager to contribute his skill decoding and deciphering standard literary shorthand. As long as we respond, with Pavlovean promptness, to the slightest suspicion of an ill-defined symbol, to any unformed character modeled after an awesome figure of universal significance, and to other fashionable "winning forms," young authors will never feel forced toward a truly personal stretch of imagination. Mrs. Miller was obviously sensitive enough to produce the skeletal outline for a panorama of life. She should be encouraged to take a few risks and let her stories be born.

THE GAME

And yet I've lived like this for years.
All since he quit me — caught the moon as round as aspirin
While, across the hall, the heartfelt murmurs of the queers . . . I see my punishment revolving in its den:

Around. Around. There should have been
A lesson somewhere. In Geneva, the ferocious local whore
Lay peeled for absolution with a tricot membrane
Sticking to her skin. I don't remember

How it happened that I saw. The place was filthy. She would sit
And pick her feet until they knocked. Like Customs. She'd just wait.

LOUISE GLUCK

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

The continuing screen vogue for portraits of heels very likely stems from a desire to capitalize on the notion of the anti-hero. If so, the film proprietors misunderstand the expression, as similarly they give us scenes of senseless violence under the impression that these are displays of the gratuitous act. An anti-hero is not a dreadful fellow in the role of protagonist; he is a mirror image of a hero, a man who confronts the overwhelming meanness of existence with the weapons of impotence. His is an elemental struggle in a drop of drain water and, as Kafka and Beckett have shown most memorably, he sets vibrating the nerves of our own experience.

The parade of egomaniac bastards who have recently been dominating the "serious" cinema have no such dramatic force. They appear in films of varying quality, but in every case that I can recall they induce fidgets from about the midpoint because they are too uncomplicated, too arbitrary, too predictable. In an opening scene or two you learn what vice this chap personifies—customarily it is lust or greed—and from then on you can confidently anticipate how every encounter will develop down to the final ironic comeuppance.

Alfie, directed by Lewis Gilbert and starring the standing-room-only attraction, Michael Caine (The Ipcress File and The Wrong Box), tries to make a virtue out of the moral flatness of this genre by instructing the protagonist to address the audience directly at every turn of the action. The effect here of this resurrected mannerism is as abashing as a temperance-society lecture on the horrors of drink, and if you don't happen to be burdened with Alfie's weakness—which is to seduce, exploit and degrade every woman who comes within arm's length—the sleazy record of his career is painfully banal. Such gents certainly exist, but dramatically speaking, who cares? An obsessive womanizer is no more rewarding in the theatre than an obsessive knuckle cracker. Scripts that employ tics as subject matter are doomed to futility.

The makers of Alfie have tried hard to overcome its essential triviality. For one thing the dialogue is energetically colorful and at times downright poetic, the result being that Alfie's IQ seems to fluctuate like the fever chart of a malaria victim. Then, too, some suspense is fabricated by giving Alfie "soft" moments, as when he shows affection for the child he has fathered on one of his "birds." But these moments are frustrating because they are merely grafted onto his callousness and fall off without effect. Symbolism is attempted, for example, at the beginning and end of the picture when we are shown a mutt whose main characteristics are a pleasing wiggle and an industrious lust—but the main effort is directed toward making plausible Alfie's mesmeric effect on the opposite sex. Women in the audience may feel the excitement, but it seemed to me that Caine lacked the charm of subtlety and was sweating rather freely. Fortunately for him, perhaps, only Shelley Winters among his ladies has any sense of humor and she, by exception, knows precisely what Alfie is good for. The picture comes to comic life when Caine and Miss Winters share the screen—two meat eaters prowling the same cage—but her participation is minor. For the remainder of its two hours, Alfie is sentimental, repetitious and for all its color and animation simpleminded.

Another heel's chronicle is The Idol, starring Jennifer Jones and Michael Parks, but I fled from that after an hour. It is a case of anti-acting by performers uttering anti-speech; running your fingernails down a blackboard would be enticing by contrast.

WORLD'S BEST?
TRY IT AND SEE
☐ 7-month subscription —$4.79 (reg. $8 per year)
☐ Commentary Card catalog—10¢ (handsome reproductions of historic Jewish art)
COMMENTARY NA
165 East 56th Street
New York, N.Y. 10022
Name
Address
City State Zip

$2.95 each
SAVE YOUR COPIES OF THE NATION
• Each file holds a full year's copies.
• Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.
• Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.
Satisfaction guaranteed
Attractive and practical for your home or office
3 for $8.25
ORDER NOW — send check or money order.
MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.
FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

THOMAS ADAMS FOR THE SENATE

On August 18 there appeared in The New York Times a full page ad, which stated in part:

> "Voters in most states are denied the opportunity to express their views on the Vietnam war. Candidates of both parties are committed to a policy of war, escalation, and possibly destruction. We do not believe these views reflect the sentiments of the American people.
>
> In Massachusetts, one candidate for the Democratic nomination for the United States Senate is bringing a choice to the electorate. He is Thomas Boylston Adams, a direct descendant of two United States presidents, who is speaking out vigorously against President Johnson's war.
>
> Tom Adams speaks for Americans throughout the nation who believe that the Asian war degrades the ideals of our great Democracy.
>
> . . . 'The issue is between the people of Massachusetts and the President of the United States. A vote for Adams is a vote of no confidence in the present administration. A vote for Adams is a vote for Democracy and a return to the rule of law and the balance of powers set up by the founders of our nation to protect it against tyranny.
>
> By guile and by subterfuge the President has carried the nation into war without consent of Congress or debate in the Senate.
>
> The purpose of the war is now made clear. It is to establish American power permanently on the Asian mainland.
>
> There is a crisis of confidence in the United States. When John Kennedy lived, we lived in an era of hope. When a mistake was made, it was admitted. Now when a mistake is made, another is made to blot out the memory of the previous blunder.' "

On July 28, Walter Lippmann wrote to Tom Adams in these terms:

> Dear Tom: Your statement . . . tells the truth, but it tells it without weasling and hedging and fudging. I am astounded. Do you mean to say that you think that the voters of Massachusetts are capable of listening to the unvarnished truth, that their stomachs are strong enough and their hearts are stout enough to accept, even to like, being talked to by their politicians as honest men talk privately to honest men? What a Commonwealth, that it can produce men who act like free men, that is to say, are unafraid . . .

What Tom Adams says in Massachusetts applies as well to every Congressional district, to every state in the nation. His voice deserves to be heard beyond his own state. On the Vietnam issue, this country is like one precinct. Consequently even though I live in New York, I have taken the initiative to place this ad in behalf of Tom Adams. Let other citizens take similar initiatives, to give fresh meaning to our democracy and to our politics. If you don't have a peace candidate to support in your district or your state, join with others to have Tom Adams' statement reprinted in your local newspaper, and send it to your Representative and Senator.

Serge Lang

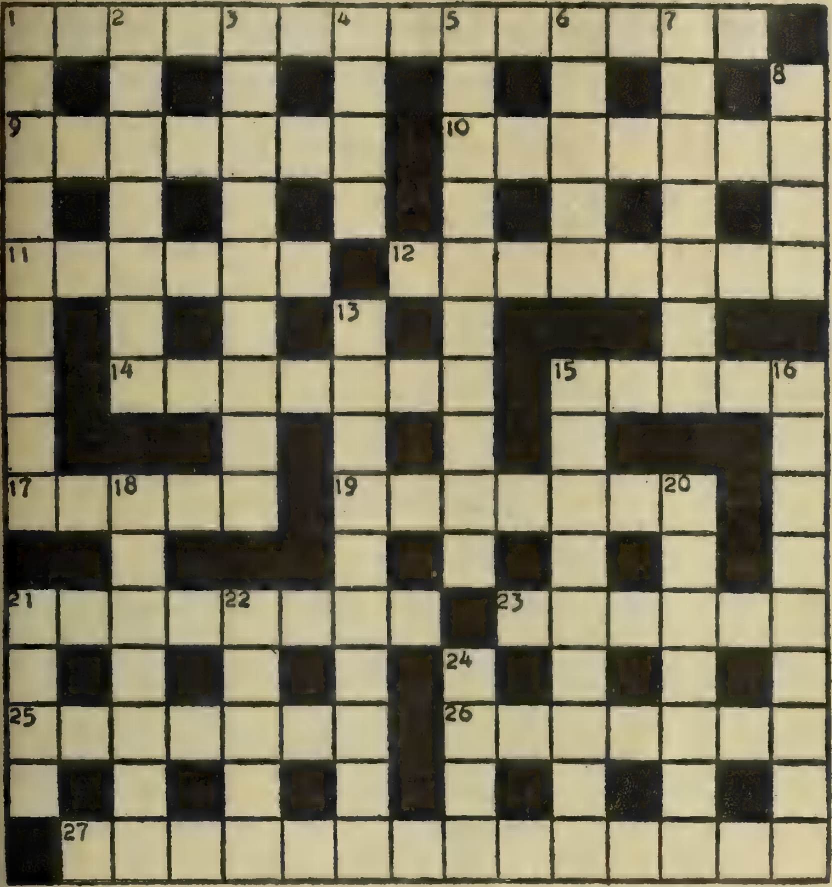
You can get copies of the full statement, and also send contributions and make checks payable to:

ADAMS FOR THE U. S. SENATE

387 Washington Street, Boston, Mass. 02108 Telephone: 617-482-2025

Crossword Puzzle No. 1166

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 A writer might refer to it as water, in the spring. (6, 8)
9 Eggs, scrambled, since it so appears. (7)
10 Is it quite bright to rave about the backward help? (7)
11 and 17 Tidies up the nest when the beaver is gone? (5-6)
12 Handsome cape, considering the proportion of gold. (8)
14 Might be tending to hurry back and confess. (7)
15 Possibly unlit up to now. (5)
17 See 11 across
19 It's elementary for one reputedly good with the hammer. (7)
21 Where the film might be shown secretly. (2, 6)
23 Hold out your arms, by the sound of it, for the Japanese boss. (6)
25 Somehow it cries for the controversial. (7)
26 See 13 down
27 No matter how well written, a eulogy could hardly qualify. (9, 5)

DOWN:

1 This local disturbance would certainly not be immaterial. (9)
2 Uncle Andrew dragged away from it? It's not very nice! (7)
3 Snub someone and manage to get away with it? (3, 3, 3)
4 Ought to be new wine. (4)
5 Black ruler, not in the uprising associated with Booth. (10)
6 Part of the bird is missing a crest. (5)
7 Is "giddy-up" suggested, by foot? (7)
8 To get up is patriotic, if American. (4)
13 and 26 across Currently speaking of the past, French tennis balls for Henry? (10, 7)
15 Did he act as though he might inherit the earth? (5, 4)
16 Long-handled glasses? (9)
18 It might be a trailer about the brief account of a preventative. (7)
20 Rough game, not for one that should have spark. (7)
21 Composer? Inventor? Lithographer? (4)
22 Music to bring up in the old opera house? (5)
24 Copies of 7, but not the socially organized type. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1165

ACROSS: 1 Franciscan; 10 Rampage; 11 Instill; 12 In a pinch; 13 Evade; 15 Hosed; 17 Obfuscate; 19 Well water; 21 Rowel; 23 Romeo; 24 Outboard; 27 Alienee; 28 Oldline; 29 Hugo; 30 Wainwright. DOWN: 1 Fore; 2 Almonds; 3 and 6 Champions; 4 Sternpost; 5 Amish; 7 Okinawa; 8 Saltarello; 9 Assessor; 14 Shower bath; 16 Dew point; 18 First-born; 20 Limping; 22 Warning; 24 Opera; 25 Order; 26 Bent.

ART

Sept. 11-Oct. 2

Social Paintings of Our Times

by

R. FASANELLA

HUDSON RIVER MUSEUM
511 Warburton Ave., Yonkers, N.Y.
Tues.-Sat. 10-5 Sun. 2-5

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), [illegible] Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London, $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002

HOMOSEXUAL theme fiction, non-fiction listing available free. Trojan Book Service, Box 2121B, Philadelphia, Pa. 19103.

BERKELEY is where the ACTION is! The Scheer Campaign has transmuted itself into the Community for New Politics. Keep up with the heart of the protest movement! Subscribe to the Communique for New Politics. Send $2.50 to CNP, 2214 Grove Street, Berkeley, California for a year's subscription.

Antidote to Capote
History in the Open

Why fester in quicklime morbidness with his Dust-Bowl ghouls in locale of sodden dreariness when just beyond loom Rockies tops lit up gloriously (p. 85-87). Other episodes galore, all U.S. annals. PANORAMAS, concise text, unique insights. A real book innovation, its super-graphic pages absorbed at a glance.

$2 postpd., 200 pp., cloth
B. F. JOHNSON
Box 2306, San Diego, Calif. 92112

PERSONALS

Legalize Abortion

Humanitarians and libertarians desiring to take independent lawful action to quicken legalization of abortion are invited to contact:
LEGALIZE ABORTION
P.O.B. 24163, Los Angeles, Cal. 90024

SERVICES

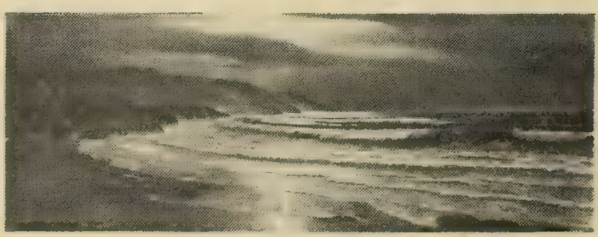
MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates
CLASSIFIED
74c a line (6 words)
Three-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)
The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

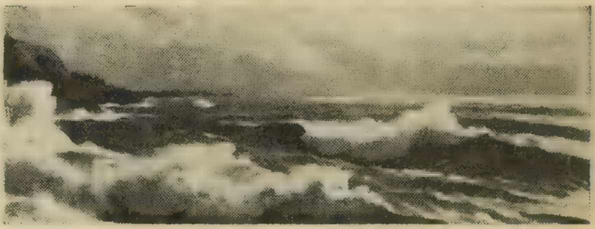
Now Available for the First Time!

Splendors of the Sea

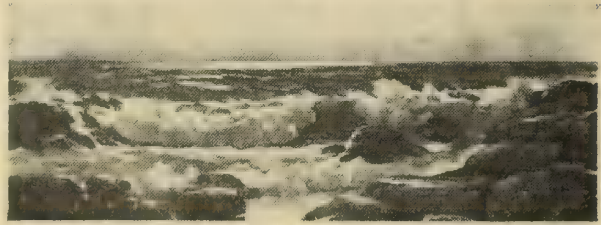
At Last! 4 Famous Artists' Greatest Triumphs! The Brilliant Climax of Lifetimes Dedicated To Painting the Natural Splendor of the Sea.



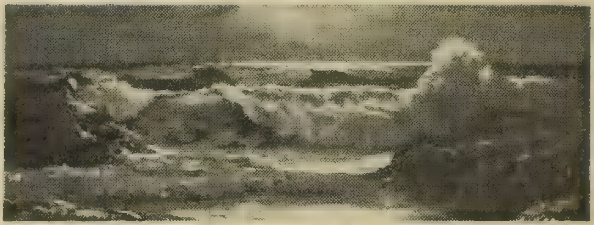
"Evening Tide," Maurice Myers



"Rockbound Surf," W. Westal



"The Sea in Sunset," Robert Wood



"The Golden Sea," Philip Shumaker

Fabulously Beautiful Original Oil Paintings Now Yours as Full Color Murals. All 4 for ONLY $3.

NEVER before in the history of art have 4 famous artists so successfully captured the exquisite beauty and grandeur of the swift-changing moods of the sea.

Robert Wood, America's most famous seascape painter, magically shows how a setting sun turns the whole sea copper. Prize-winning artist Philip Shumaker paints the rugged New England coast so faithfully you can almost hear the crash of wave on rock. Westal's and Myer's expert marine studies, too, are treasured by art collectors and home decorators. But the small black and white illustrations here cannot show you the beauty and enchantment of the sea captured by the artists. Only when you see the exquisite changing colors in large full-scale can you appreciate the beauty and color they will bring to your home. These are the artists' greatest achievements — the exciting climax of 4 lifetimes dedicated to painting the natural splendors of the Sea. We are privileged to offer these magnificent reproductions to you.

OFFER WILL NOT BE REPEATED

Act now. Take advantage of this Special offer by ordering your full color reproductions now while the supply lasts.

We will rush all 4 to you for $3. postpaid. Each Giant Mural is a full 13" x 31" and you will be thrilled with the fresh color and beauty they will add to your home or office.

HOME DECORATOR SERVICES
COLLECTOR'S ITEMS Studio 912 N
54 Church Lane, Westport, Conn.

Please send me the 4 full-color "Splendor of the Sea" prints for only $3.00 postpaid on full money back guarantee if I am not delighted.

Enclosed is $

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY ZONE STATE

SAVE! SPECIAL OFFER: Order 2 sets of all 4 prints for only $5.00 on same Money Back Guarantee. (You save $1.00) Extra sets make perfect gifts.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame Calif.

SEP 19 1966

FOOD: THE SICK INDUSTRY JENNIFER CROSS

THE NATION

SEPTEMBER 19, 1966 35 cents

CHICAGO SUMMER

BOSSISM RACISM & DR. KING

PAUL GOOD

THE GOOF-BALL SET

Addiction in the Suburbs

MARTIN SCHRAM

OUT BEYOND BROADWAY

Requiem for the Workshop / FREDERICK H. GARDNER

Art and Cant at Karamu / BENNETT KREMEN

Stratford and Ypsilanti / JULIUS NOVICK

Livings in Cincinnati / ROBERT PASOLLI

PER NEWSPA

BURLINGAME CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

subversive neutral

Toronto, Ont.

Dear Sirs: In "Sniping at Dissent" [The Nation, Aug. 22] Melvin Wulf gives copious examples of interference with expression on the Vietnamese fiasco. I fear the sniping is more pervasive than he imagines.

In spite of the fact that Canada is supposedly neutral and thus without a view one way or the other on the Vietnamese situation, the police in Toronto regularly photograph all demonstrators. I had the fortune to be photographed, at which point I recognized the police officer behind the 35 mm. camera as a member of the morality squad for whom I was handling a legal matter.

A newspaper columnist inquired into the incident and was informed by the chairman of the police commission that:

> The taking of photographs of crowds or groups is not necessarily an indication that any criminal offense has been committed by those in the assemblage, but for purposes of:
>
> (1) Training procedures at the Police College.
> (2) A record of gatherings.
> (3) Identifying subversives.

(Take the first two "reasons" as you will.)

On being questioned on TV, the commissioner stated that the photos are supplied to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, but he "did not know" whether or not they filtered through to the FBI or CIA.

Imagine being a subversive in a country which diplomatically has no views either one way or the other. We have moved beyond public sentiment against dissenters to police action, a very nice state of affairs for those who favor non-persons, non-countries, non-events and non-freedom.

John Sewell

virtue of consistency

Rochester, Mich.

Dear Sirs: From the editorials, essays and letters from readers, one gets the clear impression that The Nation does not appreciate President Johnson's real virtues, but sees only his vices. A recent letter, for instance, compared Johnson with Hitler.

The fact is—we should be greatly thankful for Mr. Johnson's extraordinary virtue of absolute consistency in lying. If Mr. Johnson were not a totally dependable liar, we could not be certain of anything we read in the newspapers. But as things are, one can be absolutely sure of all foreign policy positions of the Great Society (if you'll pardon the expression) by reading all statements negatively. If one reads Monday's New York Times, for example, in this manner, Wednesday's Times is sure to follow up with a total corroboration.

Only a few weeks ago, Cambodia complained that we bombed one of its villages. With customary Great Society seriousness, without even a giggle, we told Cambodia that they were quite wrong—the village was in Vietnam. . . . Only the other day, the Times informed us that the Great Society had announced that the bombed village "may have been" in Cambodia after all. . . .

The total absence of humor which also characterizes the Great Society is wondrously illustrated by its claim that the village "may have been" in Cambodia. Only in the Great Society are matters of fact abstruse metaphysical questions. Of course, it is always within the realm of the possible that Cambodia does not know its own villages. After all, the Great Society is never quite sure whether it is bombing peasants or Vietcong. . . .

Harold Fromm

EDITORIALS

On Timetables

General de Gaulle's proposal that we should indicate a timetable for the withdrawal of our troops from Vietnam has had as little success as previous attempts of his to mediate informally in the war. Some commentators thought that this approach offered hope for a positive response from the American side. It did open such a possibility, but the opportunity has gone unheeded and, in the light of American policy in Southeast Asia, no one should be surprised.

All that de Gaulle's initiative produced was a deepening conviction in Washington that he is America's enemy. The moral plea contained in his discourse is found especially objectionable. De Gaulle argued that we, a great power at war with a small country, could afford a measure of magnanimity. "Giving up an expedition in a faraway land," he said, "when it appears to have no profit and no justification, would in no way injure their [the United States'] pride, thwart their ideas or jeopardize their interests, if an international agreement for restoring peace and developing an important part of the world could be worked out."

Such a lecture, delivered in a forum openly sympathetic to the Vietcong-North Vietnam side, could only raise the hackles on Mr. Johnson's neck—a reflex to which he is prone on much lesser occasions. The United States, he said, has every justification — indeed obligation — and that unless it takes a firm stand in Vietnam the world will regard it as a country unable or unwilling to keep its solemn commitments. He told de Gaulle to speak to Hanoi.

The language in which the reply was couched precluded negotiation, however tentative. Vital treaties had been broken (by Hanoi). Men and arms had been moved illegally across an international boundary to conquer a small nation (by Hanoi). The aggressor had been chastised (by Washington). "Those troops will come home, those bases will be turned over or reconstructed for peacetime purposes," Mr. Johnson concluded, "as soon as that vicious aggression stops." Then, and only then, would he lay on the table the schedule for withdrawal.

But North and South Vietnam are parts of the same country. If we would settle for a unified, neutralized Vietnam, with all foreign troops removed, and its neutrality guaranteed as part of a general settlement for Southeast Asia, we could so state and couple this statement with some hint of a timetable. If, on the contrary, the Administration's intention is clear victory over North Vietnam and the Vietcong, then the rejection of de Gaulle's initiative is quite logical.

If any doubt remained on this point, it was dispelled by Assistant Secretary of State William P. Bundy. The first move for troop withdrawal was up to Hanoi, Mr. Bundy emphasized. Then he went on to discuss Thailand. We did have 25,000 troops in Thailand, he said—the first admission by an American official that we had any forces in that country—but all they were there for was to train the Thais to resist a threat of insurgency. He said nothing about the use of bases in Thailand for air attacks on North Vietnam, although all the world knows that this is going on. Reporting on Bundy's remarks in The New York Times, Richard Eder said that he "left open the inference, perhaps inadvertently, that the 25,000 United States military personnel were engaged in training a Thai military establishment that numbers about 125,000." Mr. Eder was being polite. Mr. Bundy was simply distorting the facts in Thailand in the same fashion as they have been distorted in Vietnam.

Between them, U Thant (whose replacement as UN Secretary-General is not desired by the United States) and de Gaulle may eventually succeed in prying open a way to peace. But the time is not yet.

The Falsification of History

Buried in the back pages of the Sunday New York Times of August 28 was a story which detailed the discrepancies between an official account, published recently by the State Department, and an unpublished account, prepared earlier for intra-departmental use, of the progressive erosion of Franco-American relations between 1958 and 1964. The two versions reached diametrically opposite conclusions about who was to blame for the estrangement.

The official account came as something of a surprise to students of the period because it seemed to demonstrate that General de Gaulle, while pretending to seek a reform of the Atlantic Alliance, had behaved in reality as if his motives all the time were to wreck NATO. Most students had believed, on the basis of the facts then available, that de Gaulle withdrew from the military structure only after his proposals for greater decision-making powers had been rejected. From the State Department account, it seemed obvious that this interpretation would have to be revised.

But the Times story shows that the State Department's official account was something close to a lie. What the account did was to omit conveniently all reference to meetings and letters that put any of the onus for the break on the United States Government. For example, the official account says that de Gaulle failed to respond to a specific proposal in 1961, but it neglects to mention that he soon thereafter sent two letters to President Kennedy raising broader issues. President Kennedy answered neither letter. The assertion made in the official account that the United States tried "to go as far as possible to meet the French request" for a greater role in NATO is thus patently false.

The question at issue here is not whether the United States should or should not have yielded to France's greater prominence in the decision-making process. Honorable men can have differences of opinion on that matter. The question at issue here is the lie.

There was a dispute during the Cuban crisis, when nuclear war seemed to hang in the balance, over whether official lying ought ever to be condoned. Since that time, falsehood has become a regular part of the government's information policy, particularly in Vietnam. So suspect have statements of the Johnson Administration become that the condition has even acquired a name: the "credibility gap." But the Times story, by its very academic quality, suggests quite clearly that the "credibility gap" has now assumed a new dimension.

It is one thing to lie about current policy, reprehensible though such lying certainly is; it is another to falsify the past. The "discrepancies" that the Times found in the State

DATE DUE
DEC 14
GAYLORD
PRINTED IN U.S.A.

IN

EDITO

234

ARTIC

237 Chic
Boss

242 The Addi

245 Repc
Pres

248 Lati
Labc

BOOK

252 The

254 Com

254 By

256 The

257 Art and Argot at Karamu
Bennett Kremen

259 Stratford and Ypsilanti
Julius Novick

260 At 35 (poem)
Barry Spacks

262 Blowup in Cincinnati
Robert Pasolli

263 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher
ANNE C. ABRAMOVITZ Assistant

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION Volume 203
No. 8

Department's official account of the Franco-American rift constitute a rewriting of history—a practice for which we have scorned the Stalinists. The act could scarcely have been committed without some sort of sanction from the top. If the President or Secretary of State did not approve the text, one of them must nonetheless take responsibility for the atmosphere out of which these stupid obfuscations emerge. Falsifying history is everyday stuff in 1984. Is the Johnson government rushing headlong to make Orwell's dateline?

Who's McGinty?

The truth, apparently, is not in Assistant Secretary of Defense Arthur Sylvester, who on other occasions has said the government has "the right to lie" and that he expects reporters in Vietnam to be "handmaidens" of the Defense Department.

Recently Sylvester went before Senator Fulbright's Foreign Relations Committee to deny having ever made either remark. He denied that he attempted to manage news out of the battle front. He denied many things. He also denied having anything to do with the transfer back to the United States of Col. William J. McGinty, former Air Force Information Chief who, in the words of William Tuohy of the Los Angeles Times, "ran afoul of the military high command information office in Saigon—where frankness and efficiency are in chronically short supply."

Under questioning by Senator Fulbright, Sylvester pooh-poohed the whole idea. He didn't know anything about the transfer of McGinty, and he left the impression very strongly that he didn't even know McGinty. In Sylvester's words, taken from the record, "I am not aware of what the case of the Colonel's—Colonel McGinty, is it?"

He might have gotten away with this latest duplicity except for a follow-up by William Hines of the Washington Star, who reported that it was well known among reporters who cover the Pentagon that McGinty had had "close and frequent" contact with Sylvester for several years, but especially during publicity duties relating to the controversial TFX fighter plane. After running through a history of their relationship, Hines concluded: "News of Sylvester's denial of acquaintance with McGinty was greeted with shock and incredulity" among Air Force officers.

Failure of a Mission

Eric Goldman, after a term as "intellectual-in-residence" at the White House, charged with promoting better relations between intellectuals and the President, has confessed the failure of his mission, surrendered the seals of office, and returned to Princeton University to write "the first critical appraisal of the Johnson Administration." This study may prove to be the one good thing that this misbegotten enterprise produced.

One gathers that, as an intellectual, Mr. Goldman left the White House with rather less admiration and affection for the President than he had on entering it. The President, Mr. Goldman reports, is suspicious of artists and scholars, "particularly in the East." Whether or not Mr. Goldman so advised the President, the fact is that intellectuals generally do not criticize Mr. Johnson because he lacks the style of President Kennedy or because he did not attend an Ivy League college. Almost all of them voted for him in 1964, largely in response to his repeated assurances that he would not escalate the war in Vietnam. More perhaps than other people, intellectuals are trained to compare script with performance; more perhaps than others, they resent deception.

Despite the disappointing experience with Dr. Goldman, Mr. Johnson has not given up; he is determined to embrace the intellectuals in a Texas hug of manly affection. To this end he has appointed John P. Roche, of Brandeis University, as Dr. Goldman's successor. Mr. Roche is a vigorous supporter of the Administration's policies in Vietnam, and should have little difficulty rallying to the Administration those elements of the intellectual community who approve of the war. The President will thus be spared the unpleasantness of having to listen to those who disagree with him. If that is what he means by cooperation, Mr. Roche can secure it for him. This summer the President dispatched three of his aides out across the country, charged with the task of putting certain questions to as many intellectuals as they could find. The first question was: "Where is the Great Society and where should it go?" The answer is that what was to have been the Great Society program is mired down in the muck of the war in Vietnam. It is a waste of time to talk about a Great Society as long as that war continues.

The pity is that the GOP does not attempt to win over the disaffected intellectuals, as well it might if it gave more weight to the thinking of Mark Hatfield, Charles Percy, John Lindsay and the other bright stars of the party. Recently Governor Scranton called a conference which sought to explore the possibilities of better relations between intellectuals and the GOP, but nothing much came of it. For the moment, the disaffected intellectuals are partyless but still not without influence. If they were without influence, the President would not worry about them.

The Painless War

Except for the radio and the newspaper headlines, no one could possibly guess that the United States is a country at war. "The affluence," writes the Washington correspondent for the Times of London, "at least for those with memories of Britain in the last war, is almost obscene." The Americans, as seen through his British eyes, are on a sybaritic hunt for every imaginable variety of pleasure and luxury. It is not sufficient to have a television receiver, or two of them; to be in the swim one must have color TV. It is not sufficient to have a late-model car, or more than one; cars must now be air-conditioned or the family is disgraced. A boat is de rigueur for the well-to-do family, whether they know how to sail or not; the result is that the Coast Guard can hardly keep up with weekend distress calls, and waters that were once swimmable are now full of garbage thrown overboard by happy sailors. As for eating, one has only to walk through the nearest supermarket, and the liquor stores tell the same story. "Live it up!" is the American motto of the sixties, supplanting all earlier injunctions to be wise or virtuous.

And yet the country is at war. An average of a hundred Americans a week are dying in Vietnam, accompanied by about a thousand Vietcong and North Vietnamese, and some $24 billion a year is being spent to bring about this result. In addition, an unknown number of South Vietnamese civilians are killed, burned and crippled. None of this slackens the pace of the pleasure hunt at home. A thrill of horror went through TV viewers when, a few weeks ago, a number of American soldiers were incinerated in one of those unhappy accidents of war that will occur despite all precautions. It was as if American flesh and blood were not the same as Asian. But this sensibility was as transitory as the broadcast, and attention turned again to the length of skirts and the newest fashion in drinks.

Statistically, of course, there is no reason for excitement. Suppose we do lose 5,000 men a year in Vietnam—it is still only a tenth of the deaths on the highways. Suppose we do spend $24 billion a year to make South Vietnam safe for free enterprise—it is only about 3 per cent of the Gross National Product. The representative American believes what the President tells him: that these expenditures of life and treasure are necessary to preserve the nation from the sacrifices a really big war would entail. Thus Vietnam is a sound investment; or you can look on it as an insurance premium. And the soldiers themselves, if we are to believe the news reports, see it the same way. The only ones they are angry at are the draft-card burners.

There is another possible reason for the good-time-Charlie attitude which the American people have largely adopted. They sense that the Vietnamese war is indeed a good investment in the literal sense. American prosperity since the end of World War II—in fact, since the thirties—has been sustained by war and preparation for war. Without the cold war, thoroughgoing revisions of the American way would have been necessary. It was much easier to slide into a twenty-year cold war, with options to renew it as long as necessary. And of course a nation committed to a cold war cannot object to a little bloodshed now and then. Only "peaceniks" protest, and a few voices from the pulpit or the academy. Obviously there is something wrong with these dissenters, or they would be flocking to the discotheques or the beaches. Although in the aggregate there may be several million of these spoilsports, statistically, again, they are hardly more significant than the casualties in Vietnam, and their warnings of the wrath to come are drowned out by the rock 'n' roll from a hundred million loud-speakers.

Dick's in the Act

Across the Atlantic comes word that a tribunal in Geneva has issued un mandat d'arrêt international against "Ramfis" Trujillo, the eldest son of the late Dominican dictator. It will be recalled that while El Benefactor was raking in the swag and garroting anyone who asked questions, Ramfis, then a student at the U.S. Army Command and Staff School, was refused a diploma because he had spent more time in dalliance than at his books. "Papa" was furious, not at Ramfis but at the stupid Americans. Now Papa has gone to his rest, but his issue, which contains a large percentage of by-blows, lives after him. Some of these enfants adultérins (mère inconnue), residing in Miami, complain that Ramfis and other accredited heirs have deprived them of their rightful share. Four times Ramfis was summoned, and four times he failed to respond, finally exhausting the patience of the court. But now the silver, indeed golden lining of the cloud is emerging. Among the eminent Swiss and American counsel in the case is Richard Nixon. The presence of the noted jurist and television personality insures that legitimate and illegitimate alike will get all that is coming to them — and the lawyers likewise.

CHICAGO SUMMER

BOSSISM, RACISM AND DR. KING

PAUL GOOD

Mr. Good is a free-lance writer who specializes in reporting the progress of the civil rights movement.

Chicago

A Nobel Peace Prize winner pits his strength against a political boss and in a test between old and new sources of American power, the boss gives ground. A band of Negroes split off from the main civil rights leadership marches into the sinister suburb of Cicero and predictions of another Balaklava prove somewhat exaggerated. It has been quite a summer in Chicago.

August produced a comprehensive fair-housing agreement between the forces of Dr. Martin Luther King and the power blocs of the community. But accord came only after the threat of violence had produced intolerable tensions; there was no assurance that it would prove workable as internal pressures on black and white mounted even in the moment of agreement. Friday, August 26, may prove a date of historic racial progress in Chicago, or it could mark an unsuccessful effort when there is no time left for failure. On that Friday, Mayor Richard J. Daley, whose Democratic machine was already shaken by weeks of white attack on civil rights demonstrators and by two racial riots, saw Armageddon looming. Dr. King planned to take 3,000 followers into Cicero, a bleached community of 70,000 that in 1951 had violently expelled a Negro couple who tried to move there. Influential white Chicagoans, trying to live down a civic reputation for thuggery and political skulduggery, demanded action.

A conference of white and black leaders, called by the Chicago Conference on Religion and Race, produced an agreement which permitted Dr. King to defer his march. The Mayor hailed the moment as a "great day in the history of the city"—an odd appraisal from the man who had fought for months against making any concessions to the Negroes.

That wasn't the only odd thing about the Chicago situation. Dr. King was extravagant in his praise of the settlement. "The total eradication of housing discrimination has been made possible," he said. "Never before has such a far-reaching move been made." But Black Power advocates and some grass-roots leaders who took it upon themselves to speak for the city's most abject black people cried sellout. Their threat to go it alone had a built-in potency because about the only place they had to go was toward violence.

Other contradictions abounded. Catholic Archbishop Cody, with a billion-dollar temporal property under his jurisdiction and a spiritual treasury of 2.5 million souls, stoutly pledged his support of the pact. Yet white mobs who had been attacking Negro demonstrators were predominantly Catholic and some members of the archbishop's flock carried signs vilifying "Archbishop Cody and his Commie coons." The Chicago Real Estate Board pledged itself to the principle of open housing. In the same breath, it announced that it would continue its legal attack on Illinois Governor Otto Kerner's state executive order banning discrimination in real estate listings.

Caught in these cross fires were the future of Daley's political machine and the future of a million Negroes, a third of the city's population. Almost all of them live in ghettos that range from handsome middle-class dwellings to impoverished horrors where the infant mortality rate is even higher than in black Mississippi and unemployment runs to 25 per cent. Almost solid Negro backing elected Daley to a third term, but now rebellion was stirring.

Clearly, nothing about Chicago was clear—particularly the agreement of August 26. The conferees were not simply a grab-bag collection of dedicated but ineffective men of good will. Across from Dr. King and other substantial Negro leaders were powerful white men like Thomas G. Ayers, head of the Chicago Association of Commerce and Industry, and Ben W. Heineman, chairman of the Chicago and North Western Railway, who served as moderator. And supporting them were bankers, realtors and religious leaders who could exert meaningful influence, if they wanted to. The document they produced had its good points. It ranged beyond open real estate listings to put the Chicago Housing Authority on record against building any more high-rise, vertical ghettos. CHA was also committed to lease the best housing available for welfare cases without regard to race and to homely touches like limiting project housing for families with children to the first two floors. ("No more," said a speaker, "will your children have to pee on the elevator.")

Chicago mortgage and lending associations said it was their continuing policy to lend money without racial restriction for home purchases anywhere in the metropolitan area. This brought some black smiles of incredulity. The U.S. Community Relations Service boldly vowed to inquire into support by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation of institutions that practice discrimination. Unfortunately, CRS has no muscle. Last month, it stood by helplessly in Grenada, Miss., when two white men who had tried to machine gun its representative there got off scot-free.

The Chicago Human Relations Commission, which has a do-nothing reputation among Negro house hunters, promised to beef up its staff and begin initiating complaints against realtors guilty of discrimination. Negroes like Marion Montgomery who this year went to thirty-three white brokers and fruitlessly protested to the commission when he was turned away wondered why any promise was needed to enforce an existing law.

But the behavior of the Chicago Real Estate Board aroused gravest suspicions among critics of the agreement. Its promise to ". . . withdraw all opposition to the philosophy of open-occupancy legislation at the state level" carried the proviso that it be "applicable to owners as well as to brokers. . . ." Everyone agreed that a state law with teeth was vital, but the board was saying that the state legislature —which had failed consistently to pass any kind of occupancy bill—would have to do better than the federal Congress to merit its cooperation. The pending Washington bill excluded home owners and with them 60 per cent of available housing. "The Real Estate Board is a prisoner of prejudice," said veteran Chicago newsman Len O'Connor, now at WMAQ-TV. "Its major source of supply and demand is prejudiced. So this compromise is spurious."

The good intentions of white men in a generally permissive agreement were critical. Chester Robinson who runs the West Side Organization was unconvinced and angry. Three hundred thousand persons are jammed into 800 square blocks in his area just east of Cicero. The majority are Southern migrants making their first—and sometimes last—stop in the North. The West Siders, their lives circumscribed by ghetto boundaries, their hours idled away in chronic joblessness, the very air they breathe stale with historic black failure, rioted in mid-July. It had cost the Illinois National Guard $100,000 a day to put the violence down; it had cost the ghetto heavy property damage and two dead. Now Robinson said:

> This agreement is a lot of words that give us nothing specific we can understand. We want it to say: apartments should be painted once a year. Community people should have jobs in their community. There's a Poverty Program training people to be punch-press operators and the presses are all getting automated. The situation is just pathetic. We're sick and tired of middle-class people telling us what we want. And we're gonna march in Cicero on Sunday. We have the right.

Robinson was backed by two Black Power organizations —SNCC and CORE—both small, relatively ineffective and alienated from the Coordinating Council of Community Organizations (CCCO), the omnibus civil rights group working with Dr. King.

Despite such dissatisfactions, the King and CCCO forces called a "Victory Rally" in a Baptist Church on the West Side. Just two short blocks away on Roosevelt Avenue, dozens of store fronts were blanked with boarding, the glass from windows smashed in the riots still glittering on the sidewalks. From a crowded bar of the defeated, a juke box blasted a new hymn to despair—"Let's Go Get Stoned." It did not refer to parading in white neighborhoods.

In the church, people were singing, "This Little Light of Mine, I'm Gonna Let it Shine." A white minister began his invocation: "Where there is hatred, let me sow love. Where there is injury, let me sow pardon. Where there is sadness. . . ." To a writer who had covered much of the early Southern movement, the atmosphere was heavy with those simpler days when the thrust of spirit had seemed enough and the complexities thrown up by unyielding white power had not betrayed black trust and divided the movement. But now it was a different and complex day, and most Negroes were interested in reaping an overdue harvest.

Speakers gave pep talks on the agreement. They stressed that rent strikes already under way and involving 1,000 Negroes would expand. They said that nothing in the agreement could curtail protests against inferior schooling or stop boycotts already successful in opening jobs for Negroes. But there was the impression of something forced, like a cheer leader managing only a half leap off the ground.

Then Dr. King appeared; he looked imperturbable. His basic role is that of a prophetic leader, but here he was also a practical politician struggling for the survival of himself and his philosophy.

"Some people tried to frighten me," he said. "They said nonviolence couldn't work in the North. They said you can't fight city hall; you better go back down South. But if you look at what happened here it tells you, nonviolence can work. . . . But if these agreements aren't carried out, Chicago hasn't seen a demonstration."

Dr. King and allies like Bayard Rustin are presently intent on crushing the Black Power concept without emasculating black militantism or alienating Negroes for whom Black Power has deep appeal. It's a tricky line. King said:

> The white man who threw a brick at my head the other day had to face the fact there was a white man marching right beside me. I'm not going to subscribe to the theory that every white man is a devil. We've got some black devils too.

But in the next breath he said that if there were those who felt they had to march to Cicero, they went "with my prayers and high hopes." And toward the close, he offered some hardheaded appraisals of the future which were free of his customary and sometimes extortionate emotionalism:

"Let's face the fact: Most of us are going to be living in the ghetto five, ten years from now. But we've got to get some things straightened out right away. I'm not going to wait a month to get the rats and roaches out of my house." The audience cheered the defiant tone, but he concluded soberly: "Morally, we ought to have what we say in the slogan, Freedom Now. But it all doesn't come now. That's a sad fact of life you have to live with."

This admission that there are limits to moral power in a material society is a key to understanding what happened when Dr. King went to Chicago after deciding to broaden his Southern base more than a year ago. Awaiting him was Mayor Daley, the very model of big-city bossism. Daley had never encountered anything like Dr. King.

"The city hall attitude," said one long-time Chicago observer, "was that he was just a little nuisance. They couldn't comprehend that he couldn't be bought off. . . ."

By the same token, Dr. King had never run into anything like Chicago and Daley. The city itself is a nest of paradoxes—dynamic, static, ugly, beautiful, outgoing and inbred. The Daley administration had efficiently, even boldly, helped engineer a transportation, building and utilities renascence. But the underpinnings remained squalid. Virtually everyone you talk to acknowledges that Chicago remains the crookedest city in the country. The stench rising from hoodlumism permeates vast areas of politics, labor and industry, and fosters a cynicism about anything (a civil rights movement, for example) that does not depend on pull, pay-offs or raw muscle to achieve its ends.

Where else in America would someone try to blow up a sewer chief? It happened during the climactic week of the civil rights negotiations, and the story illustrates the political atmosphere that Dr. King had wandered into.

Vinton Bacon, superintendent of the Metro Sanitary District, stopped in a gas station on August 22 and an attendant found under the hood four sticks of dynamite that had failed to explode. Bacon's department is the largest of its kind in the world and and harbors, as former Chicago American reporter Ted Smart puts it, "de Mille-like fraud." Relatives of mobsters appear on its payrolls and depredations running into the millions turn up in contracts. Fraud flourishes whether its board of trustees is Democratic or Republican. It was Democratic when the American and the Tribune broke a series of scandal stories. Mayor Daley promptly appointed Bacon, an honest man, to restore public confidence, and Bacon was investigating rigged civil service exams when someone tried to rub him out.

Daley's responsiveness to public outrage over the sewers is typical of his "enlightened" bossism. It is in the erratic style of a man guided not by principles but by expediency, the threatened loss of votes and power. Daley had kept his eye trained on renewal of the Lake Michigan shore front, overlooking backwaters of despair in the ghettos. While need grew, particularly among underemployed Negroes, his Welfare Department was the only major one in the country to reduce its rolls. Critics charged that the ignorant poor were bamboozled.

For the fact is that Daley, through his Negro lieutenant, Rep. William Dawson, had 90 per cent of the Negro vote in his pocket, ghetto wards accounting for his entire 1963 plurality. Why respond to a few black critics when you owned the majority of blacks? Dawson was mum during the summer, but his Negro Republican opponent this fall, David Reed, who is outspoken on civil rights, has no chance. The GOP is torn between its traditional conservatism and the new look of a leader like U.S. Senate candidate Charles Percy, who defends the Negro right to demonstrate and condemns the white mobs. As for the Democrats, about the time that Dr. King first arrived in the city some rebellion became manifest, and loose bolts began rattling around in the Daley machine during last spring's Democratic state Senate primary. Two Negroes—running as independent Democrats —beat machine-backed candidates (one white, one black).

Dr. King was confronted with these complicated facts of political life when he reached Chicago—a metropolis that has usually shrugged off demands for white or black reform, an unresponsive Democratic machine, and Republicans of dubious value as allies. His past record for rousing the nation to demand federal legislation against racial injustice was magnificent, but he has always been able to motivate better than he could consolidate. City after city that had given him stirring national victories—Birmingham, St. Augustine and to a lesser extent Selma—were substantially unchanged in basic areas like jobs and housing after he left them. The truth was, he had small talent for organizing outside or inside his own group. Now, with growing white national reaction pressing him from one side and Black Power from the other, he could not afford a failure.

Chicago had the framework for his talents—the Coordinating Council of Community Organizations. It embraced forty-odd groups, including NAACP, the Cook County Bar Association, American Jewish Congress, Catholic Interracial Council, and one of the best Urban League branches in the country. CCCO director was Al Raby, a young Chicago schoolteacher, who had been trying hard to chip concessions off the Daley monolith.

"We don't want to wreck the machine," he said. "We want it to be responsive. I think those two independent victories for state Senate might help shake up things. The aldermanic (city council) elections are next February and the fact they won opened up a wound and guys are smelling blood. They won't be so easy to control. The problem is, we're not organized politically and we don't have tangible rewards to offer. Most aldermen get a rake-off for favors but I can't offer anything to replace that."

Dr. King and Raby were natural partners in the creation of a new kind of Chicago power, but they spent many months vainly looking for a catalyst to set the retort bubbling. In April, Daley had responded to King's amorphous demands for racial justice by making an absurd and callous promise to end slums by 1967. Dr. King and Raby kept plodding, building strength through churches and beginning Operation Breadbasket, a program to force the hiring of Negroes through persuasion or boycott that produced about 400 jobs worth more than $2 million.

Daley used federal poverty funds to kill ghetto rats and roaches, boasting the best extermination program in the country. On July 10, Dr. King—emulating his namesake—affixed a 12-page list of explicit demands to the door of City Hall. It skillfully covered housing, education, jobs and welfare. The Mayor ignored it, but he could not ignore the West Side riots which came a few days later, only a month after ghettoized Puerto Ricans had hit the streets. Dr. King, pleading for concessions to end violence, appeared outmaneuvered again as Daley attempted to buy peace for the price of one portable swimming pool and ten hydrant sprinklers. West Side kids had been complaining over lack of recreation facilities and Daley probably thought that improvised water sports would cool it. He is said to be shrewd, but his shrewdness is narrowed to the breadth of his prior political experience. The Negro mood went deeper than he could probe. And King, in the meantime had found his catalyst.

It was housing. Except for the area around Chicago University, only the Oak Park community was integrated —with nine Negro families out of 64,000 persons. So immediately after the riots, the King-Raby team began marches into the white middle-class communities that boxed Negroes into their decaying enclaves. Gage Park, Bogan, Belmont-Cragin, South Deering, Marquette Park, all greeted the marchers with stones, firecrackers and insults. The flotsam of professional haters—Klansmen and the American Nazi Party—drifted in. But most of the abuse came from plain folks in their boxy frame and brick houses with mini-lawns and a good car out front.

"Wallace for God!" cried a man in Bogan.

"Hate, hate, hate!" chanted a group of teen-agers.

These people, depending on the section, were first- and second-generation Polish, Irish, Italians and East Europeans. They had fled their old South and West Side neighborhoods when Negroes started moving in years ago. They felt that the blacks had chased them once and vowed they would not retreat again. The ghost of Studs Lonigan with his family moving off Prairie Avenue was among them. Poor, frustrated Studs. Had he lived, he would have been watching, bleary-eyed and pot-bellied, while his sons, perhaps a grandson, threw rocks at the marchers.

The main argument of these white Chicagoans was remarkably similar to what people of the same class had said in Brooklyn or Los Angeles. We made it where we are on our own hook and now the Negroes want everything handed to them. Chicagoans were only acting out what many of their white countrymen felt. Their public (or parochial) education had not prepared them to deal with anything so complex as race. Cheated of history, strangers to logic, they honestly could not see that Negro denial had been different from theirs, infinitely more rigid, and so each march was a coercive attempt of black to force its inadequacies on white. Was there something in the process of bourgeois success, in the grubbing fight for security, that brutalized the human response? We made it on our own hook. . . . Even if this self-glorifying appraisal were wholly true, what they had become in the process argued that it might be wise to consider some alternate way to the good middle-class life.

During those crazed July and August days, the bone of Northern racial attitudes was laid bare and it was understandable that the South relished the spectacle—all the bitter things it had said about Northern hypocrisy when it was under attack in the fifties and early sixties was now publicly confirmed. Except in St. Augustine, there had been no public violence in the South to equal Chicago's. Otherwise, the Northern accent marvelously mirrored the Southern clichés. The New York Times quoted a lady hardware clerk:

> No one was prejudiced against the Northern niggers. It's the Southern ones. The Northern niggers were satisfied until that Luther King brought in his troublemakers from the South.

After a slow start, Chicago police did a professional job, wading into rock throwers with clubs flailing. White signs appeared saying: Don't Vote for the Democrats. An alarmed Daley ordered precinct leaders to head off the violent white reactions that made the cops swing the clubs that jeopardized the votes. Belatedly, he sought to come to grips with the new variety of power.

An aide to Dr. King has a letter that a City Hall intermediary allegedly brought in early in August. The concessions it offers in exchange for ending the demonstrations have the ring of the ward heeler's art. Three hundred quick jobs would be created by hiring housing-project guards from among the tenants. A few hundred new ghetto units would be built. There was even an inadvertent pun: "A Negro journeyman glazier should be hired by the Housing Authority. (This will be the first break in the glazier's union.)" The letter even included pre-packaged quotes that Dr. King was supposed to sign. One began, "Today, Mayor Daley has again demonstrated his leadership. . . ."

Only the threat of the Cicero march eventually brought realistic bargaining and the final agreement. Moderator Heineman conceded that some Negroes would feel the words were fine but only more white words. "My own view is," he said, "that we have been too far committed by the leadership of the entire community not to have moved. . . ."

Al Raby added a cautious second: "You ask at a point of strength for what you can get. I honestly feel there is some concern that didn't exist before. But I'm still ready to go back to the streets and it may well be necessary."

Chester Robinson was dissuaded by Dr. King from marching his West Siders into Cicero on the promise that a standing committee created by the agreement would take up his specific recommendations. But Robert Lucas, CORE chairman, seized the moment. He denounced the agreement as just another in the line of promises "Negroes have received since Emancipation."

On Sunday, September 4, he led 200 marchers into the lion's den. Two thousand National Guardsmen were mobilized. Roving white mob reaction was brisk, but Cicero and state police kept things under control until almost the end, when a black-white clash seemed imminent. Then the Guardsmen responded with a bayonet advance that nicked a few rioters and dissuaded the rest. For the first time, Negroes had marched into Cicero and marched out again.

But the end of the Labor Day weekend found Chicago ridden with anxieties. The power represented by Dr. King's "coalition of conscience" had demonstrated that it could move machine power in a test of strength. But the problems of Dr. King and Daley, unlikely as this might seem, had become curiously intermingled.

The civil rights leader had neither inclination nor ability to get rid of the boss. Dr. King needed continuing victories to maintain his position and Daley's help was needed to get them. King had disengaged short of Cicero for reasons he believed valid, but Negroes were aware that Lucas and Black Power had risked the fearful step. Should the agreement prove a deception, Black Power would be the gainer.

For Daley's part, white resentment over the city's role has hurt him politically; the November elections and the aldermanic contests in February will indicate how much. His machine is tough and resilient, but one constant it requires is black support. So Daley must keep responding—unless he still misreads the basic Negro mood and believes he can coast for a time.

The danger is that even with cooperation by all concerned, Chicago still cannot achieve significant, meaningful change in the lives of lower-class Negroes. Operation Breadbasket, laudable though it is, is also Operation Drop-in-the-Bucket. The monumental job of repairing the neglect of half a century in employment, housing and education is beyond the resources of Chicago or of any other major Northern city. It is tiresome to reiterate that the federal government must do it, and frightening to think it may not. Opposition is growing to the kind of commitment needed. Ten billion, 15 billion a year, who knows? The Neanderthal Chicago Tribune, even as settlement was reached, editorialized against aid for cities under the headline: Beggars in Search of Billions.

THE GOOF-BALL SET

ADDICTION IN THE SUBURBS

MARTIN SCHRAM

Mr. Schram is a reporter for Newsday. His series on addiction, written with Robert Greene, won the James Wright Brown Memorial Award (1965-66), presented by the New York chapter of Sigma Delta Chi for the outstanding public service by a newspaper in the Metropolitan New York area.

The problem of addiction has crept out of the city slums and into the split-level world of suburbia. Well-fed youths from respectable homes are now trying drugs for kicks in alarming, ever increasing numbers. In a sense, the suburbs have lent gentility to addiction. Now it is more than just a malady of the deprived and moneyless; it has become a middle- and upper-middle-class affliction, as well. Suburban youth—the high schooler, the collegian, the dropout, the pushout—these have all grown up on the fringes of big-city junkie empires, yet the syringe and bent spoon equipment of the heroin addict is unfamiliar to most. Instead, these kids get their kicks from drugstore drugs: modern formulas designed to stop coughs, ease tensions or trim unsightly fat.

Today's suburban addiction usually begins with a cheap, dime-store high—on habit-forming, non-prescription codeine cough medicine. Two ounces of these powerful syrups have the belt of a half-fifth of whiskey. Next come the pills. In the pharmaceutical trade, these are useful compounds called barbiturates (sedatives), amphetamines (stimulants and diet pills) and tranquilizers. But on street corners and in parked cars and drive-ins and behind shopping centers, they're known variously as goof balls, red birds, yellow jackets, blue heavens, bennies, pep pills, co-pilots, hearts and footballs.

Lately the incidence of teen-age drug abuse has been rising in suburban communities coast to coast. But nowhere, perhaps, is the problem more evident than on Long Island, a thin spit of land whose 2-million-plus population makes it America's largest suburb. Last November, Robert Greene and I began investigating for Newsday the scope of the drug problem there, following the unrelated overdose deaths of three youths within a month.

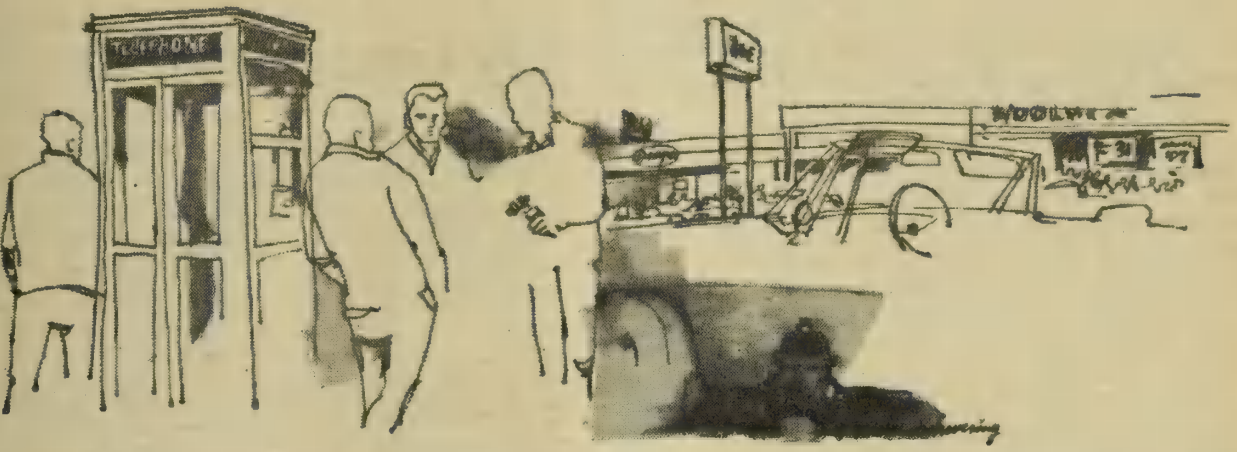
Five addicted Long Island youths took mortal doses of drugs in 1965, and another died a few days after the New Year. Many more, found slumped unconscious in parked cars and on residential streets, were revived by police, rescue squads or hospital emergency-room teams. One of the certified overdose deaths, incidentally, was attributed merely to too much codeine-based cough medicine. Some authorities now call such addiction the deadliest of habits, even worse than heroin. Sudden withdrawal can cause the barbiturate addict, for example, to go into convulsions, delirium, and eventually, death. Quick heroin withdrawal results in the unpleasant runny nose, fever and shakes; but eventually they will pass, leaving the addict sick, weak, but nevertheless alive.

During the course of the newspaper research, Greene and I interviewed pushers, addicts, law enforcers and law breakers; young people who are hooked and others who are clean. Posing as an addict, I attached myself to a group of pill pushers in their late teens and early 20s; I was accepted as an in-man only after several toughs had slammed me against a wall and frisked me to make sure I was not a cop. Later, Greene was beaten and stomped by this same pack when he attempted to buy some of their illegal pills.

These were the hard-core tough guys of the suburban pills-for-kicks movement. They peddled pills at the standard black market price of 50c apiece. For every one of them, however, suburban Long Island has many more who are just average, middle-class kids: would-be mystics seeking some euphoric truth; would-be wild ones who must get their courage from capsules; and the just plain bored.

Often, the toughs supply the clean-cut types. In one Long Island neighborhood, the pill merchants had an organization that was complete right down to a mimeographed chart of the pack hierarchy—for pill distribution purposes. It listed about thirty names and was in pyramid form, with the number-one kid securing the pills and doling them out to his two lieutenants, who would then pass them on to their own subordinates, and so on down the line.

U.S. Food and Drug Administration officials estimate that about half the barbiturates and amphetamines produced in America are siphoned off into the underworld. Long Island authorities estimate that 80 per cent of the pills used by suburban youth are supplied from illegal sources in the city—in Harlem, the Bronx and Brooklyn. The remaining 20 per cent come from the addicts' own schemes. Drugstore burglaries have increased markedly in recent years, and in most of these the cash register was untouched, while the rear prescription drug shelves were rifled. Thefts from doctors' offices are also rising—often only the prescription pads are taken. The thief forges the doctor's name and cashes his slip at the local drugstore.



Police, commenting "for the record," have long insisted that Long Island has no major drug problem. But in Nassau County alone, the narcotics squad that started with two men in 1962 now employs as many as forty, who divide their time between undercover work and public lecturing on the dangers of drugs. One experienced Long Island police official has said privately that he estimates one out of every ten suburban teen-agers is an occasional or frequent user of marijuana, capsule drugs or codeine cough mixtures. A probation case worker assigned specifically to narcotics problems believes that 40 per cent of the youth between 15 and 25 has experimented at least once with marijuana or drugs.

Long Island's drug abusers are for the most part white, not Negro; from good backgrounds, not the cliché "broken homes." Most switch indiscriminately from the calming, drunklike high of the barbiturate to the amphetamines, which produce a false sense of elation, power and unending stamina. One 17-year-old Long Island addict described the addiction cycle like this: "You start with cough syrup and you get high. So you keep it up. Pretty soon, you don't get the same feeling, so you try mixing it with pills. Then more pills—as much as it's safe to take without killing yourself. But eventually even that doesn't give you the same high. So you take the hard stuff—heroin. You just can't seem to stop."

The teen-aged addicts are not a particular group. They take their highs wherever they can—wherever adults aren't. Parked cars; drive-in movies; behind shopping centers; but best of all, in someone's home when the parents are away. "The parties in the houses were the best," recalled a Northport, L. I., youth who escaped being nabbed in a recent dope crackdown there. "You had more room, more privacy. You could let your hair down and stay a couple of days. Usually, we'd start off listening to folk music and then we'd turn on. Later, we'd get to talking about personal philosophies and hang-ups."

For the brave, tough or foolhardy, there was still another place to turn on. One teen-aged addict said: "It's being taken in [school] bathrooms and in the backs of classrooms when teachers turn their backs. And sometimes, right in front of their eyes. . . . Girls are even bringing pills in for their boy friends right in their brassieres—who's gonna search a girl's bra?" And New York State Sen. Bernard Smith, who until last year was Suffolk County's district attorney, said his investigations led him to believe there is as much drug abuse in school as out.

Yet officials from most of Long Island's more than 100 school districts told reporters they had no knowledge of drugs being taken in their schools. Finally, however, one school superintendent agreed to talk on the condition that his identity be withheld:

> I'm sick and tired of people in government and school administration saying there is no drug problem. We have a problem and the schools are not doing their jobs. . . . School districts find it easier to look the other way because it's a tough problem to face. They think that if they admit they have a drug problem, the good teachers won't come to their district.

Of his 5,000 junior and senior high students, he said, his administration knows of about 100 who are using drugs —"and you can double that, maybe triple it, to find the number who aren't known."

College officials on Long Island were also reluctant to discuss pills. "We have our reputations to think about," said one college dean. However, Randall Hoffmann, dean of students at Hofstra University, talked frankly about the problem at his institution. "I'm sure some experimentation takes place among our students with marijuana, LSD, pep pills and that sort of thing," he said. "We have about 5,000 full-time day students, and I'd guess that 6 or 7 per cent of them (300-350) experiment. I doubt we have any addicts per se. But it's very easy here to get marijuana and pills on the black market. It's a word-of-mouth sort of thing. One friend tells another." Hofstra is by no means Long Island's most infected campus, police say, and the Hofstra situation is typical of many American universities. Moreover, Dean Hoffmann is to be commended for not sweeping the problem under the ivy. (He has since left Hofstra to become assistant to the provost at Long Island's C. W. Post College.)

With all the talk about the frequency of drug abuse among suburban youth, the question naturally arises: Pills for kicks—why? Why should suburban children from allegedly happy homes turn to a senseless menace like drugs? The answer, most psychologists agree, lies in their very contentment. "Most of today's suburban youths have never wanted for anything," said one expert. "These are fairly well-to-do kids. They've already had everything and experienced everything—liquor, cars, sex—by the time they are teens. This is what's left: drugs for kicks."

The dreamy, detached sensation given by today's drugs has also been interpreted as merely an extension of the entire contemporary teen-age pattern of values. It is ecstasy by yourself, just like dance by yourself and (at a Beatle concert) shriek by yourself. Everyone's doing it, but each is doing his own, individual thing.

School officials, moreover, notice a strange phenomenon about drug abuse. Unlike other forms of juvenile delinquency, pill popping seems to have the tacit approval of even the well-behaved student leaders. Those who have come out in open criticism of contemporaries who steal hub caps or vandalize property have remained quiet about drugs and marijuana.

Many of the users get almost as big a charge out of outsmarting cops as they do out of pills. It was this way with Little Marco, 21-year-old leader of a Plainview, L. I., pills-for-kicks gang that used a luncheonette in the Great Midway shopping center as its meeting place. After several days of hanging around, looking like a user in need of drugs, I had been tipped that Marco was the man to see. And Marco didn't like that one bit.

"I wanna know who fingered me for you," he said, watching as two members of his pack gave me the rough frisk treatment. "I don't like my guys fingering me as a pusher to everyone they meet. You could be Uncle" [slang for undercover agent, taken from TV's Man From U.N.C.L.E.].

Eventually, Marco and his boys believed I was what my credentials said—an overage, out-of-state college student. I was in, and Marco even apologized: "You gotta understand why we're jumpy. Man, I run things in this town and these guys know it. Dozens of guys know it. If you play ball, I can get you at least 400 pills at a nickel apiece. You buy 400 and give us half." (He later said he meant 50c each, not a nickel.)

It seems I'd caught the gang a little short of pills that night, so they agreed instead to take me around to the "soft-touch" drugstores, where one after another we could buy codeine cough medicine, presumably without the owners' getting suspicious. State law required that every person buying cough medicine sign his name and address in a register book. These stores, the gang said, never checked identification. "Give them any name," they said. They were right. And we all bought our first bottles of 4-ounce Robitussin A-C codeine cough mixture.

"If you're really People, buddy, and you ain't no Uncle, you swig first," said Marco. And gesturing with his finger he added: "Down to here." Well, being People is good, being Uncle is bad, and when you're outnumbered four to one, being chicken is downright unhealthy. So I swigged big. Marco, with a flair for the extravagant, emptied his bottle and crashed it to the ground outside the car window. "No fingerprints," he said. And we all thought that was pretty smart.

PRESCRIPTIONS

Later, when Marco offered me a barbiturate capsule, I put it under my tongue, pretended to swallow, and later spat it out. Meanwhile, my pill-popping companions that night burst into a medley of hit rock 'n' roll songs. And Marco continued to brag: "We've got guys in seven precincts who let us know what to expect from the other cops. They'll get us for fighting, but not for pushing." Within several weeks after the Newsday series ran, however, Marco and seven of his followers had been arrested separately for having as many as 800 barbiturates on their persons at one time. We had identified Marco only as Joe, but one detective said, "There wasn't a guy in the station house who didn't know who Joe really was."

There is also hard stuff in the suburbs. The heroin business in suburbia is better than ever, according to one of the Island's top pushers. We located a suburban junkie and, on the promise that he would remain anonymous, persuaded him to talk. Suffolk police have never been able to obtain evidence against him, yet they too describe him as one of the major pushers on Long Island. Said the pusher:

> I've been operating in different parts of . . . town over the past couple of years. But business has gotten so big that I rented a room for an office so that people wouldn't bother me at home. I got about 100 customers, sometimes more, sometimes less. There are about nine other > pushers in town that big. Between us we got 300-350 customers. They bounce back and forth.

>
> My customers are all kinds, man. I got women in furs, square guys with neckties and all that, bums, kids, all kinds. They're all hooked. . . . I never hooked anyone in my life and I don't have to. The customers are already there, more than you can handle. Set up in business, make one sale, and the junkie grapevine is really working. Next thing you know, they're knocking you down in a rush.

The pusher said some weeks he makes as much as $700, tax free of course. Asked if he deals in cough medicine or pills, he said crisply: "I don't touch it. That's for kids. All over the place the kids are talking about it. I'll get a few of them later."

As in most vices, addiction can in part be measured in terms of dollars and cents. All told, Long Island taxpayers spend more than $1 million a year to fight addiction with police, probationers, medical care and counseling. At the same time, a veteran Long Island narcotics detective says: "One-third of all our crime stems from narcotics and drugs. This is not sex crime, it's mainly petty stuff. Most of it is boosting [shoplifting] because it's usually the easiest to pull off."

The average Long Island addict needs between $15 and $25 a day to feed his habit, the detective said. Thus even the working addict often must steal on the side. For the kids, pills are not usually that expensive, but then most have little or no income. So many of them steal. "We've had cases where addicts have actually been taking orders from their own neighbors for toasters, records, cigarettes and even TV sets," the detective said. "Then the addicts would go out and boost the items and sell them to their neighbors at the lowest prices you ever heard of."

Society also bears the indirect costs of drug abuse. Nassau Medical Examiner Dr. Leslie Lukash explained it this way: "When these kids are on drugs they lose their reflexes and have no sense of danger. They become reckless. Many get behind the wheel of a car and get into accidents, maiming innocent people. We'll never know how many such accidents were caused by kids high on drugs, because most policemen can't tell a drug high from accident shock."

State and national legislators have been struggling to keep abreast of the quiet spread of addiction. New federal and New York State laws that went into effect this year require all manufacturers, retailers and middlemen to keep a record of every pill that crosses their counters. Another state measure requires prescriptions for all persons under 21 who buy codeine cough medicines. And the legislature recently passed Governor Rockefeller's bill calling for compulsory treatment of all narcotic addicts.

And while all the costs of addiction are tabulated, there is one other that knows no dollar value. Emotional suffering, anguish, helplessness. One young Long Island housewife recently recalled how her brother climbed the ladder from cough syrup to pills to heroin: "I tried to stop him and get him help, but he wouldn't help himself and no one would help him. Then he married a girl; she was hooked too. Now they spend a wretched life. She walks the streets of Greenwich Village, prostituting to get them both money for heroin.

"It tears you up, but what can you do?"

REPORT ON FOOD

Prescription for a Sick Industry

JENNIFER CROSS

Miss Cross is a British free-lance journalist now living in Berkeley, Calif.

On June 27, the report of the National Commission on Food Marketing went to Congress, after two years of diligent study on every major facet of the food industry. It had been rather like the rigorous medical examination of a patient who believed he was healthy, but whose doctor thought he detected dangerous symptoms. Is America's largest industry as well as it claims to be, or is it malfunctioning, and if so, where, and what can be done about it? Predictably, the 113-page diagnosis (plus ten separate studies) has a lot to say for both sides. The patient is in pretty good shape, but there are no grounds for complacency: enough is wrong to warrant a good deal of concern, some government action and a lot more investigation.

The maladies, says the report, are nobody's fault, and are certainly not caused by attempts of manufacturers and retailers to bilk either the farmers or the public. Rather, they stem from new facts of economic life of the last twenty years: the swing from a production to a marketing orientation, the startling technological changes in agriculture and food processing, the population growth and the emergence of a new, wealthy consumer who uses food not merely as something to eat but as an outlet for affluence.

The first result has been to threaten the traditional balance of competition within the industry. The commission reported an increased concentration in retailing and manufacturing, shown in and aggravated by the extinction of 133,000 small-to-medium-sized stores during the period 1948-63, and by the rising number of horizontal and vertical mergers. Large firms have been gobbling up small or medium ones; retailers have been moving into food processing, processors into food production, and all at an accelerated rate since 1954. Today, concentration is most extreme among retail and wholesale food buyers, and manufacturers of baby food, soap, coffee, cake mixes, shortening, crackers and cookies, where 50 per cent or more of the market is held by the four largest firms. Some of the biggest companies, especially among retailers, have grown beyond the size needed for maximum efficiency. Medium-sized firms are just as competent to process and distribute, and the only edge held by the giants is in advertising, promotion and sales, where their superior resources affect competition, placing the smaller retailer or manufacturer in an increasingly poor bargaining position.

While the industry is regarded as generally efficient, there is considerable room for improvement, notably in retailing. Gross margins—the spread between what the farmer gets and what the consumer pays—have gone up from 15 to 17 per cent of sales in 1954 to 19 to 22 per cent ten years later. This is partly due to inflation but also to higher operating costs. The main items in this overhead are advertising and promotion, including trading stamps, labor, the cost of owning or renting store facilities, plus services (check cashing, parking space, etc.). And, unlike similar costs in many other industries, they are not being offset by a comparable boom in productivity.

Drawing the line between legitimate effort and extravagance is not easy, but the commission has left little doubt that it would place a good deal of advertising and promotion in the latter category. To put it bluntly, the high cost of selling is being passed on to the consumer, with no equivalent enhanced value in return. Food manufacturers' advertising, now running at $2.2 billion, wastes too much money simply urging housewives to buy brand A instead of brand B. New products, notoriously difficult to launch, often cost 57 per cent of their first year's sales in advertising, without guarantee of a long or successful life. While the manufacturers absorb the cost, they can do so only at the ultimate expense of other products, so one way or the other the public pays. The public also pays for the privilege of saving trading stamps, almost unknown in 1955, but now distributed by 47 per cent of all food stores. This gimmick adds an annual $680 million to the national food bill.

Apart from these little extras, which he may or may not be delighted to pay for, the consumer gets a good deal for his money. A note of cautious praise runs through the whole diagnosis, though the report soft-pedals the industry's boasts about being the envy of the world, and squashes the idea that the declining percentage of the family budget being spent on food is necessarily a sign of industry efficiency. The only other major consumer gripe is packaging—the report endorses the evidence of Sen. Philip A. Hart's Truth in Packaging hearings that the consumer is frequently confused, sometimes misled, and generally hindered from getting the best value for his money. (See Jennifer Cross: "Truth in Packaging, The Supermarket Caper," The Nation, February 21.) Also, the low-income shopper does not fare well. A special price survey done by the Bureau of Labor Statistics in six major cities proves that in certain circumstances the poor do pay more. Owing to the scarcity of supermarkets, they patronize "mom and pop" stores, where prices average 2.8 per cent higher, and, lacking cash, buy smaller, more expensive quantities.

The farmer, however, is unequivocally in a worse position than formerly. With retailers pooling their buying, and with their entry into food processing, plus the expansion of some food manufacturers into cattle feeding and egg production, the grower's bargaining power is substantially weakened. Terminal markets are declining, buyers are becoming fewer in number and powerful enough to get away with sloppy, informal and sometimes unfair bargaining. This, combined with lack of reliable and up-to-date information about price futures and market conditions, is eroding the whole idea of price as the basis for negotiation, besides leaving farmers at the mercy of the spasmodic overproduction fostered by today's agricultural technology.

The remedy for these various ailments is some fairly harsh medicine, at least for the manufacturers, retailers and advertisers, who traditionally detest any extension of federal authority ("interference") unless it is for their benefit. The report makes it clear that traditional legislation and the limited powers of regulatory agencies are inadequate to meet the new situation. Therefore, the growing degree of concentration, particularly mergers not in the public interest, should be met by legislation requiring compulsory pre-merger notification; temporary cease and desist powers for the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice to enable them to halt mergers pending legal investigation; and firmer guidelines for the more effective enforcement of the antitrust laws.

For consumers, the report suggests a special agency in the Executive branch of the government to take over the protective functions now exercised by existing federal agencies, represent the consumer at law, and attempt the vital but herculean task of teaching him to be a more intelligent buyer. The FTC and the Food & Drug Administration should make a more determined effort to prevent deceptive labeling and packaging, aided by legislation if necessary. Finally, consumer grades and standards of identity should be established for, and appear on, all foods where feasible.

Government help is recommended to improve farmers' bargaining power by creating agricultural marketing boards, strengthening farmers' cooperatives, and authorizing federal marketing agreements and orders. Better current and future price reporting should be carried out by the Department of Agriculture, with the authority to extract the necessary information from buyers and growers, along with timely market reports of selected perishable farm products. The department should also develop a model code for the licensing and operation of local livestock markets, and study the effects of transportation costs and of trade barriers affecting agriculture.

The main weakness of the conclusions is that the fifteen commission members fell out among themselves, so that the report presents the views of the majority of nine, followed by separate statements of the six dissenters. The split occurred not along party lines but roughly between liberals and conservatives, with the liberals (chairman Phil S. Gibson, former California Chief Justice; Fred J. Marshall, farmer and former Congressman from Minnesota; Elmer R. Kiehl, dean of the University of Missouri College of Agriculture; Senators Warren G. Magnuson, Gale W. McGee and Philip A. Hart; Congressmen Leonor K. Sullivan, Glenn C. Cunningham and Benjamin S. Rosenthal) in the lead. Still more unfortunately, the dissenting minority (William M. Batten, chairman of the J. C. Penney Co.; Albert K. Mitchell, New Mexico rancher; Senators Thruston B. Morton and Roman L. Hruska; Congressmen Graham Purcell and Catherine May) disagreed with practically all the majority proposals, accusing their colleagues of arriving at their verdict before all the technical evidence was in, and of exceeding Congress' brief by recommending changes in government and legislative policy.

Obviously, many of the majority conclusions are open to challenge, especially the recommendations about food-industry concentration and the wisdom of establishing a department of consumers—about which even a handful of the President's Committee on Consumer Interests lately could not agree. However, the accusations of jumping the gun on the evidence have been publicly denied by Dr. George E. Brandow, NCFM executive director, while the commission brief, as set out in public law 88-354, specifically asked for findings and conclusions on legislation and public policy. Otherwise, the minority statements contain suspicious echoes of the food-industry line as laid down by retailers, manufacturers and trade associations . . . the industry is fine, let it alone; government intervention stifles initiative and flexibility; consumers are sovereign, rational and efficient, they don't need protection.

Profiting by the doctor's dilemma, the patient has loudly expressed his dislike of any advice which strikes him as misplaced or unpalatable. Ever since the end of March, when the draft report was mysteriously leaked to Advertising Age, it was clear that the industry was going to clobber it. While some, particularly food chains, have wisely refused to comment until they have thoroughly digested the evidence, others have expressed their shock, disappointment and disapproval of the main conclusions, taking their stand on the minority tribute to the status quo. All these views have subsequently made headlines in the advertising and food trade press, and been given a comprehensive roundup in Progressive Grocer. The only dissenting voice has been that of the National Farmers Union, which was relieved and gratified to find many of its views confirmed, especially the need to protect farmers from marketing abuses.

That the report's recommendations will be carried out is, to say the least, uncertain. Industry critics plainly hope and expect the whole thing to fade away and die. "Indications are," said Supermarket News, that "it may stay in the 'fuzzy' realm for years without having a direct or significant effect on federal legislation affecting industry." The press consensus was that the President's reception of the report was distinctly chilly, though his remarks could better be interpreted as noncommittal rather than hostile. It should also be noted that the press was given, if not its orders, at least a very strong hint by the president of General Foods, who urged the National Editorial Association two years ago to identify "the fiction that comes out of Washington," and use their "critical editorial judgment" on the report, in the interest of truth, of course, and to prevent the innocent public from getting the gripes.

The chance of legislative action this session is almost nil, since the report is currently being studied by the Bureau of the Budget; as for the future, the fate of the recommendations depends on how the Administration views the wisdom of backing the considerable extension of federal power that will be involved. Undoubtedly a good deal of political capital will be made out of it during the Congressional elections. However, the report will fare better in the long run if its suggestions are carried out piecemeal by the appropriate agencies. Already the FTC and the Department of Justice are taking a more active interest in mergers which might violate the antitrust laws (e.g., in the dairy industry) and the possibility of strengthening Title 7 of the Clayton Act is currently being discussed in Washington. The report will certainly give a boost to pending consumer legislation, particularly Truth in Packaging, which may pass the House this session, and a bill (HR 7179) proposed by NCFM member Rep. Benjamin S. Rosenthal (D., N.Y.) to create a department of consumers.

Another side effect may well be the incentive to certain sections of the food industry to plug the gaps in their performance, if only to forestall government action. The issues were squarely put in a speech in May to the Magazine Promotion Group by Edward L. Bond, Jr., president of Young & Rubicam. "You and I know that not everything is right in the market place—or in advertising, either. And the problems that exist are creating increasing demands for government attention. The question, however, is whether we are going to sit back and abdicate to the government—or whether we're going to face up to our problems, where they exist, and engage in more self-regulation and self-policing. . . ." Packaging already engages industry attention. Consumer education may be the next—though, as industry people rightly complain, consumers make exceedingly poor use of what is available. Trading stamps, now regarded as a mixed blessing, will probably get yet another critical look. Last year some 800 supermarkets, mostly chains, stopped giving stamps; others, like Safeway, dislike them but bow to consumer demand.

Even the vexed question of how to increase the number of supermarkets in low-income areas may be reconsidered. Mrs. Esther Peterson, special assistant to the President for consumer affairs, has issued a personal appeal to food chains to "immediately re-examine their expansion plans," while Dr. Brandow tossed in the suggestion that they might operate a "no frills" service in poor areas under a different name. The main obstacles, according to Clarence G. Adamy, National Association of Food Chains president, are technical: local tax laws make property improvements in low-income areas financially unattractive, while many chains have encountered enormous problems in clearing title to sufficient land to hold a store large enough to generate the volume necessary for low-margin selling. But, he added, the interest is there.

While the food industry ponders the NCFM prescription —which, with the technical data, will become the standard textbook in marketing, agricultural and university circles for some time to come—consumers would do well to consider some of the points that have been raised. The housewife pays for a lot of incomestibles along with the family food: packaging, processing, advertising, trading stamps, bonus bingo, larger, enticing stores with ancillary services. Most women, if they think about it at all, regard this as money well spent. But the minority who want to buy only the best food at the lowest price, or are on a tight budget —and this includes some middle-class intellectuals, some young marrieds and many of the poor—will be interested to know that alternatives are available. Scattered about the report is material which could be turned into excellent shopping advice; for example, avoid trading stamps, buy store "specials" and retailers' own brands instead of nationally advertised products.

Most of it, alas, will probably fall on deaf ears, since the average woman is a sloppy shopper and appears to like it that way. Consumer education is still in its infancy, at least compared to commercially financed techniques of persuasion like advertising and public relations, but the situation is changing. Spreading out from Washington is an upsurge of interest in teaching the public how to be more discriminating consumers. This type of education is becoming an integral part of the anti-poverty program, and if Esther Peterson has her way it will be extended to the high school. Here, the NCFM report will be of value—a timely contribution to the complex art of consumership which is our best defense against drowning in our affluent society.

LATIN AMERICA IV

Labor Between Bread and Revolution

SIDNEY LENS

As a writer for many publications and newspapers Mr. Lens has visited eighty-one countries. His most recent book is Radicalism in America, published last May by Thomas Y. Crowell.

The problem confronting Latin American labor can be defined in one estimate and one fact. The estimate is that by the year 2000 the population of this area will be 600 million, two and a half times the present figure. The fact is that the grain situation is today drastically worse than it was in the 1930s. Thirty years ago, the twenty nations of Latin America exported more grain than any other area in the world; today they are net importers and their per capita output has declined by 16 per cent.

Therefore, no matter how quiescent the area may appear to be from time to time, explosions are inevitable; artful maneuvers and military suppression can cap the pressure just so long. Thus the decision confronting each Latin American union is how much energy it should apply to bread-and-butter issues and how much to social revolution. If the workers concentrate primarily on winning higher wages and allied benefits, will they eventually whittle the power of the oligarchies and achieve an adequate way of life; or, while continuing to fight for wage gains, must they determine to destroy the oligarchic structure itself?

Favoring the first course are those unions comprising ORIT (Inter-American Regional Labor Organization) which are linked to and guided by the AFL-CIO. Favoring the second course are the Communist unions, and more recently the nationalist, neutralist organizations grouped in CLASC (Latin American Confederation of Christian Trade Unions). The story of labor in this area is told in the churning conflict of these strategies.

There are 90 million to 95 million urban and rural toilers in the nineteen republics south of the Rio Grande (leaving out Cuba), of whom 15 per cent or 13 million carry union cards. The proportion varies widely from country to country. In Bolivia, where a social revolution took place in 1952, almost the whole working class is organized. In Paraguay, Brazil, Ecuador, Haiti and most of the Central American nations, the ratio is under 5 per cent or 10 per cent, and most of these are only nominal unionists, since they cannot engage in strikes or true collective bargaining. In Peru, 400,000 are organized out of a labor force of 5 million, and in Chile, where labor does have a degree of power, only 10 per cent of a potential 2.5 million are enrolled. Argentina, whose unions were built artificially by Peron, has a considerable movement. So does Mexico, which still benefits from the legacy of Cárdenas in the 1930s.

But size is of secondary significance, for power rests not in picket-line effectiveness or real bargaining but in politics. One can say that unions exist in Haiti, Nicaragua, Brazil, Honduras or Paraguay, but in fact they are impotent under the prevailing dictatorial governments. After the overthrow of Jacobo Arbenz, Guatemalan unions went a decade without a single general wage increase. The unions in Brazil, despite glowing reports by the AFL-CIO, were emasculated by the military coup d'état of two years ago, when hundreds of unions were placed under trusteeship by Castelo Branco in order to remove the influence of former President Goulart and the Communists. The same thing happened in Ecuador during the military regime that was recently overthrown.

The Confederation of Mexican Workers (CTM) claims 1.25 million members and functions in a more stable milieu that may be called—stretching things a bit—a "democracy," but it is not really an independent organization. As part of the ruling party (PRI), which has been assured of electoral victory for more than three decades, CTM controls labor rather than represents it. Its leaders are in the legislature or in fat government jobs, and though they do win some gains for the workingman, they are far more servile to the government than the union leaders to whom we are accustomed. What there is of an independent force in Mexico functions outside the CTM framework and is small and fragmented.

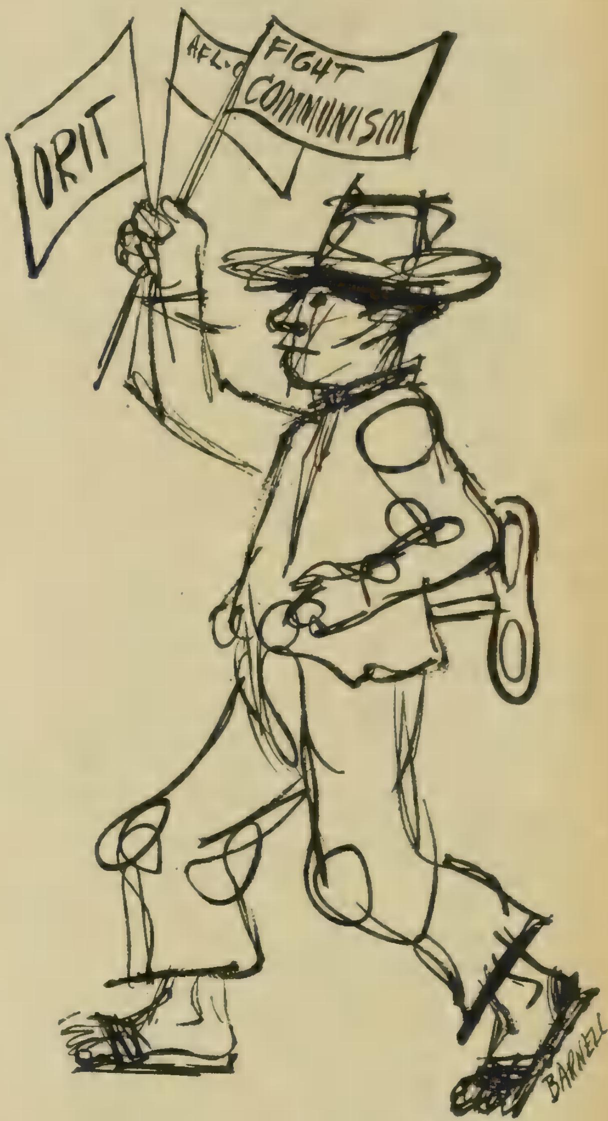
The situation in Venezuela is somewhat more fluid, but there too the movement relies heavily on the approval of the reigning party. More closely approximating the trade unions we know are the labor organizations of Chile and Uruguay, where there is political democracy, and those of Argentina which Peron shrewdly fostered as a counterforce to his political enemies.

It is thus exceedingly difficult to generalize about Latin American labor—as one might, for instance, about British or German or American labor. What traits they have in common are negative. Almost without exception, they are weak in the rural areas where a majority of the laborers and campesinos desperately need organization. They struggle defensively to preserve what they have, rather than take the offensive to improve standards. Brazilian labor, for instance, confronted with inflation of 40 per cent to 80 per cent a year, fights constantly to keep wages abreast of prices.

Collective bargaining is limited. Argentine labor has won nation-wide agreements that deal not only with wages but with grievance machinery and similar facets of traditional unionism. Similar agreements exist in Mexico and to a limited extent in Chile, where national bargaining has been in operation with the copper companies since 1956. But most Latin American legislatures have passed labor codes that restrict collective bargaining. These deal with minimum wages (which all too often become maximum wages for the majority), overtime, housing, union security and such items as "seven days' pay for six days' work" which was enacted some years ago in Chile. In Brazil, where the labor law of the old Vargas regime has never been formally dismantled, there is some collective bargaining in the big cities, but many of the wage rates are set by labor courts rather than in free talks between labor and management.

The overriding fact about Latin American unions is that they are shaped more by the fortunes of politics than by their own economic action. Each change of government means a change in the leadership, character and strategy of the labor federations. When dictator Odria left the Presidency of Peru in 1956, union leaders were released from jail and the movement was able to hold its first convention in a decade. Conversely, when General Aramburu took the helm in Argentina he appointed overseers, at first mostly military men, to run the unions. When constitutionalist soldiers took to the barricades in the Dominican Republic on April 24-28, 1965, in an effort to restore democratic government, they were joined by leaders and rank and file, both of the Bosch unions and, above all, of the Left-Catholic CLASC. The U.S.-dominated CONATRAL, on the other hand, stood sullenly on the sidelines and later refused to participate in the general strike protesting military brutality. Each group was seeking a government under which it could function best—or function at all.

The story of Latin American labor must therefore be written in a political perspective. It is not so much what unionists have already accomplished—admittedly, that is all too little—but what they hope to do in the future, and how they hope to do it. In terms of the area as a whole, there are the three distinct tendencies mentioned briefly at the beginning of this survey: the pro-American and violently anti-Communist ORIT, the nationalist, neutralist Christian federation, CLASC, and the Communist groupings, both pro-Moscow and pro-China.



ORIT claims 28 million members, half of whom are in the AFL-CIO. It is affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, but because it is so inextricably bound into the George Meany machine of the AFL-CIO (with Jay Lovestone guiding the international strategy), it is, like its mentors, often at odds with the international body. At a young workers' seminar in Mexico last October, European union leaders burst out in protest when ORIT's general secretary, Arturo Jauregui, introduced a Cuban speaker who had been a government minister under Batista. In the strategy of ORIT and the AFL-CIO the focal point of union behavior is anti-communism.

There is also some uneasiness, both in Europe and in the Walter Reuther wing of the AFL-CIO, because ORIT collaborates so closely with the U.S. State Department. The American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD), established by the AFL-CIO and American business leaders, is financed to the extent of tens of millions of dollars by Washington's AID. Its money is spent on social programs and education to buttress "anti-Communist" unions friendly to ORIT, and personnel sometimes moves back and forth between ORIT and AIFLD. Morris Paladino, for instance, became assistant administrator for AIFLD after serving as assistant secretary for ORIT. In the minds of many labor leaders there is no difference between ORIT, Jay Lovestone and the U.S. labor attachés in the embassies of South America.

This does not mean that all the affiliates of ORIT are in Lovestone's pocket. Many of the metal workers' unions are closer to Walter Reuther than to the Meany-Lovestone entourage. The Venezuelan unions refused to endorse ORIT's resolution on the Dominican Republic. Last May, Mexico's CTM issued a statement decrying aid from AIFLD and seeking to dissociate itself from "foreign" interference.

Despite such scattered signs of independence, however, the thrust of the ORIT-AIFLD-Lovestone combine is toward simple unionism on the one hand, and anti-Communist politics on the other. Again and again, this force calls on its people to be "apolitical," which means in effect to support the U.S. status quo. The Alliance for Progress is endorsed with little criticism. Every victory "against communism" is hailed as if it were the millennium, and every "Communist," "neo-Communist," and neutralist success is decried in shrill headlines. "Communists Capture Labor Arm of Juan Bosch's Dominican Party," is the main headline of the February, 1966, Inter-American Labor Bulletin, the monthly publication of ORIT. The May issue announces in strident tones that Uruguay's central labor federation, 220,000 strong, has been captured by the Communists, but reminds its readers that there are still fifty "free" unions with 64,000 members.

In the same issue, William C. Doherty, Jr., AIFLD administrator, offers the opinion, in which ORIT evidently concurs, that had the "revolution" (that is, the military coup) of March 31, 1964, not occurred in Brazil, the "free" labor movement there would have been dominated by the Communists. To counteract the Havana tri-continental Congress held earlier this year, ORIT called a special conference in Miami at which all and sundry were urged to "face up to the emergency affecting the American continent, in view of the new threat posed by Castro's totalitarianism."

A "political fever chart" in the February, 1966, issue of ORIT's paper lists "Communist terrorist activity" in Bolivia, Colombia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Guatemala, Haiti, Panama, Paraguay, Peru and Venezuela. It also lists countries where there are "labor unrest," "repression of free labor," "threat of military coups," and notes three others that are under "threat of leftist take-over." Reading the Inter-American Labor Bulletin, it would be easy to assume that Latin American labor's most urgent task is to repel a Communist seizure of the whole area. There seems to be no menace from any other quarter: oligarchy, military or U.S. domination. The paper offers almost no information about genuine labor struggles such as strikes—perhaps because there are so few.

ORIT schools conducted along these negative anti-Communist lines have trained 30,000 unionists since 1960, and AIFLD has added tens of thousands more—including 400 or 500 brought to Washington for advanced courses. Three thousand Brazilians had been "educated" by AIFLD as of the end of 1965. Carefully discouraged are such militant elements as those among the Bolivian miners, some of whom are Communists and Trotskyites.

On the economic front ORIT seeks to confine activity to simple union objectives such as wages, hours and grievance machinery—a carbon copy of North American union objectives. But since the right to strike is severely curtailed in so many Latin American countries, and bargaining must take place under the watchful eye of the Minister of Labor, this is not too impressive an activity. There is no question that the AFL-CIO wants its ORIT affiliates to gain higher wages and shorter hours, and is willing to spend money for that purpose. But present conditions in Latin America do not lend themselves to any massive campaign in that direction, and the result—as Joseph J. Palisi, a former staffer of AIFLD points out—is that ORIT "has tended to serve the needs of worker 'aristocracy' within Latin American labor." Understandably, it also has a "weak 'revolutionary' image," which under present circumstances "is an important deficiency."

The Communist-led unions, of course, search for a more militant role in economic affairs and stand—at least abstractly—for a revolutionary reconstruction of society. In Chile and Uruguay, Communist leadership is predominant. In Argentina and Bolivia, though excluded from top leadership in the unions, the Communists are a formidable bloc. But communism is no longer as formidable as in the days when the Mexican, Lombardo Toledano, headed the Confederacion de Trabajadores de America Latina (CTAL). Lombardo has become more moderate, and many of the pro-Communist affiliates have either changed leadership or lost interest. CTAL has been in limbo for almost a decade and a half. After Castro merged with the Communists he sought to rebuild a leftist international federation, together with unions in Venezuela, Bolivia and the Peronista faction in Argentina, but the effort was abortive.

Today, communism is fragmented. The pro-Chinese elements prefer to spend their energies organizing in the rural areas, and the pro-Moscow and pro-Fidel segments have lost much of their aggressiveness. The pro-Moscow wing, in particular, is weakened by the fact that some of its comrades served in dictatorial governments such as those of Batista. For the most part it, like ORIT, lacks the "revolutionary" image (see "Revolution Without Revolutionaries" by Norman Gall, The Nation, August 22).

The new force that seems to be on the upgrade in Latin America is CLASC, which has international headquarters in Santiago de Chile. Formed a decade ago and still the smallest of the three forces in Latin American labor, CLASC seems certain to become a formidable challenge to ORIT and the AFL-CIO, even though it is excoriated by some right-wing priests as too radical, and two or three Christian union centers have as yet refused to join it. Its affiliate in Chile enjoys the friendship of President Eduardo Frei, and in the Dominican Republic it has recruited 60 per cent of the currently organized unionists. Like ORIT, CLASC gets outside financial help (though it is very little by comparison). The money comes from the Christian Democrats of West Germany and the international Christian union body.

More significant than its size is the fact that CLASC enters the arena as a revolutionary force which is neutralist, and offers a "third way" that is neither pro-Communist nor pro-American. It insists that Latin American unions coordinate their economic activity with the movement for fundamental social change. For this it has won the unyielding hostility of the AFL-CIO's Lovestone group and ORIT.

"Influenced by United States labor leaders," says Emilio Maspero, CLASC's secretary-general, "various Latin American trade unions appear to operate on the belief that by negotiating collectively agreed upon contracts . . . they can achieve a higher standard of living for the laboring masses and effect meaningful reform. There is no basis in reality to justify this assumption. The only feasible goal for labor in Latin America is to organize the working forces in a decisive manner as an instrument for affecting social revolution."

Maspero derides both U.S. unionists who preach "the advantages of free enterprise and popular capitalism" and the Communists who "have always preferred to penetrate, infiltrate and dominate the existing trade unions." (CLASC, however, has warmer feelings toward Walter Reuther and his brother Victor.) Maspero, heading an organization of only a few million members, points out that "there are more than 80 million peasants and workers who are not organized," and makes it clear to ORIT that he does not intend to "steal" their members, but to organize that 80 million. Whether he and his associates can do it remains to be seen, but there is no doubt that they offer an attractive nationalist and neutralist alternative to the two forces that have hitherto been in the saddle. By condemning U.S. intervention in the Dominican Republic, U.S. control of the Organization of American States, and its support of militarist regimes, CLASC is creating a strong undergirding of popular support. If it can make headway in the rural areas, currently its first priority, it will become formidable.

An intelligent United States policy would embrace this "third force." It is the only one that offers any hope because, whatever its weaknesses, it at least points the way to what Latin America—with its ballooning population and its relative decline in food production—desperately needs. If this opportunity is thrust aside (as France and the United States spurned a similar one in Vietnam) the people of the nineteen republics will have little choice but to align themselves with Peking-minded guerrilla movements.

Here, alas, the AFL-CIO and the State Department have been until now maddeningly shortsighted. They prefer a futile crusade against communism to support of the nationalist-neutralist forces that offer Latin American toilers an opening into the future.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Third World In The Real World

THREE WORLDS OF DEVELOPMENT: The Theory and Practice of International Stratification. By Irving Louis Horowitz. Oxford University Press. 475 pp. $8.50.

JOHN GERASSI

Mr. Gerassi is the author of The Great Fear in Latin America (Collier) and a sociological study, The Boys of Boise, which Macmillan will publish in October.

Usually, the first problem tackled in freshman philosophy class is the relationship between the individual and society, the One and the Many. If it is honestly stated, the problem remains unsolved, for how can the One ever retain its individuality if it is combined into the Many, and how can the Many survive if the One remains unique. Ah, but there is the glory of philosophy: it does not have to furnish solutions, only the right questions.

In the harsh, cruel world of reality, however, speculation is a luxury, and experts are expected to come up with quick answers. Thus some claim that the One must be preserved at all costs, others that it is the Many who count. The result is a clash between egoism and altruism, between liberty and equality, or, in political-economic terms, between capitalism and socialism.

The Socialists view capitalism as a phase in the historical economic process. The capitalists scoff at socialism as an excuse for elitist authoritarianism. Both admit that "compromise" is possible, but they look upon it as an unnatural offspring—a mixed economy. And since every nation—including Soviet Russia—wants to "catch up" to the United States, there is an underlying assumption (which, of course, is highly stressed in the West) that everyone ultimately respects American values the most.

Sociologist Irving Horowitz agrees with neither the choice, nor the analysis nor the assumption. He knows full well, of course, that every country strives for development, envies the United States and lusts for its affluence. But in this brilliant study of the Three Worlds of Development, he explains that equal goals do not necessarily mean equal values, and that to seek someone else's technological advancement is not inevitably to seek his ideology. By treating development as a sociological problem, which involves not only economics and politics but also geography, history, religion and psychology, and by approaching the Third World —the underdeveloped nations of Asia, Africa and Latin America—from its own context, he shows that the "system of false alternatives with respect to the 'East-West conflict' " leads only to inadequate "oversimplified ideologies" and inapplicable "over-complicated models."

Undoubtedly, the East-West conflict did focus attention on the problem of development in the Third World. When everyone in an isolated sector is both poor and without hope, or as Horowitz puts it, when "there is a relative balance between life expectations and life-styles," the status quo is not threatened. But once comparisons become possible and once promises are made, hope for a better future is generated. That hope unleashes the pressure for change. Nevertheless, Horowitz insists, it is wrong to deduce that because two antagonistic sides are making the promises and are stimulating the hope, the newly awakened poor will therefore opt for one or the other. What guides them, he says, is neither propaganda nor ideological reasoning, but their own needs, their own history and their own conditions.

The Third World's history is neither Russian nor American, neither libertarian nor equalitarian. Its various nations were either primitive or isolated, then, either economic or political colonies. Because Soviet Russia is a 20th-century state which managed to skip various stages of development to reach in a few decades its current status as the world's second power, the Third World cannot hide feeling a certain kinship for it. But that admiration is not obedience, just as the Third World's craving for American affluence is not envy for its voting booths. The Third World doesn't know very much about liberty—or equality. It wants to consume like Americans and like Russians, and it wants to be able to do so fast—as the Russians did. Thus the choice facing the Third World is "not simply between freedom and slavery, as free enterprise apologists maintain," says Horowitz, but between speed and status quo, that is, between some form of socialism and colonialism. He adds:

> To expect any more is simply asking for utopia. The Cuban Revolution of 1959 did not "crush" democracy, as there was precious little of it to crush. The Algerian Revolution did not abolish personal freedom; under the French colonialists there was none to guarantee. The Egyptian Revolution did not deprive the bourgeoisie of the free trade it did not possess.

But the Socialists are wrong if they think that the Third World chooses its structure out of ideological sympathy. What motivates its choice is its desire to catch up to the rich. It is aware that the gap between the poor and the rich nations is increasing every year, that the rich keep getting richer because they sell manufactured goods, and that the poor keep getting poorer (comparatively) because they sell primary goods at prices set by the rich. To break the cycle, the poor have to industrialize. But that takes capital, which means savings. And the United States, which controls the money market, "is able to raise interest charges at will; and even when it does not do so, its credit position provides it with a constant economic edge, since, given the unequal starting point of the Third World, its member nations can barely repay the interest, let alone the principal on loans issued." Besides, American aid is to a great extent military; of the rest, most is in the form of credit for specific goods purchased from American companies and repayable in dollars, or in the form of surplus commodities (Food for Peace) "which would otherwise remain idle and be subject to storage costs or deterioration."

The only other way to accumulate capital is through taxation and/or expropriation. But to be meaningful, both of these measures must hit hardest the big property owners and the big investors who are either Western capitalists or members of the traditional elite, who do not want to upset the status quo. The underdeveloped country bent on industrializing is therefore forced to use coercion against the private sector, which defines it as anti-capitalist. The irony is that this is due mostly to the absurdly rigid pro-capitalist policies of the United States, which was strikingly demonstrated to all at the 1964 United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, when the United States consistently voted against every proposal meant to help stimulate the development of the underdeveloped world.

But the Third World also seems anti-

Western in that it is generally anti-parliamentarian. Horowitz explains that:

> The consciousness of impoverishment gives an aura of frenzied immediacy to the process of social change. To catch up with the "fully developed" societies becomes a definition of national purpose. To introduce doubt as to the value of this contest becomes a form of intolerable subversion. This is one primary reason why pluralistic and parliamentary politics have become increasingly scant in Third World nations. Controversy has itself come to be viewed as a luxury which only advanced nations can afford.

And so, the Third World ends up with a de facto Socialist structure (or, at least, it is heading toward it). But the rationale is not Socialist. What the Third World wants is "the commodities which result from development rather than a part in the ownership of these products." It wants capitalist affluence, which it knows it can achieve only through a Socialist developmental process. It is in this sense that there can be talk of "mixed" economies. Contrary to most analyses of the elites of the Third World, Horowitz documents the fact that these elites are not dogmatic copyists but pragmatic leaders whose most vivid characteristic is impatience. They are neither anti-American nor anti-Russian, but simply non-capitalist and non-Communist. Their sympathies and jealousies are determined by the examples of these two developed worlds, but their choice of which to follow is determined by these worlds' policies.

Horowitz scrutinizes not only these policies but the examples themselves. He shows that there are stunning similarities between the development of the First World—the capitalist West headed by the United States—and of the Second World—the Socialist East led by Soviet Russia. Both launched their modernization and industrialization processes after civil wars, the United States in 1865, Russia in 1922. Both relied on cheap labor for their success: "Russian conscript labor may be considered a substitute for the immigrant labor flow in 19th-century America."

But there the similarities end. The United States developed "in a military atmosphere relatively free from foreign pressures toward conquest." Soviet Russia, born in war and always in danger—from the "imperialist cordon sanitaire" of 1920 to the "ring of bases" which Stalin saw in 1950—developed "with the fact as well as the psychology of being surrounded by hostile military forces." The resulting laissez-faire economy of the United States was understandable; the rigid planning of Soviet Russia was necessary. Today, the Third World does not have the time or the isolation to follow America's path. Nor is it continuously threatened by armed invasion to justify the degree of coercion used by Soviet planners. (Horowitz readily admits, however, that the Third World does feel threatened by the United States: "For Latin America the main fears tend to be economic encroachment; in Africa, political encroachment; in Asia, direct military encroachment.")

Crammed with information, daringly fresh in outlook, Professor Horowitz's book is a crucial work of sociology. Believing that social science must be an applied science, it offers a practical theory of development, a "model of models," based on the interplay of "social order and social change," on the interrelation of process and structure. Thus its subtitle: The Theory and Practice of International Stratification.

In order to posit such a theory, Horowitz has to cope with the various theories advanced by his contemporaries. With incisiveness and consistency, he dissects them and discards them, including Walt Rostow's capitalist utopianism, John Kenneth Galbraith's salvation-through-knowledge sentimentalism, and John J. Johnson's reverse Marxism where class elitism is heralded through the bourgeoisie or the military or both. Horowitz explains that these theorists are insensitive to the fact

DOUBLEDAY ANCHOR BOOKS

THE FIRST NAME IN QUALITY PAPERBACK PUBLISHING

A NEW HISTORY OF THE COLD WAR
Third Edition, Expanded, of A HISTORY OF THE COLD WAR
John A. Lukacs
For this revised and expanded edition of his widely-praised history, Professor Lukacs has added three completely new chapters in which he examines the Cuban crisis and American policy toward Russia under Lyndon Johnson. He also presents his basic thesis: that the Cold War, between Russia and the United States, with its major center of activity always in Europe, is now at an end. $1.75

THE GOOD SAMARITAN AND THE LAW
Edited by James M. Ratcliffe
A symposium on the law and morality of giving aid in perilous situations. Probing causes for apathy among witnesses to acts of violence, and discussing the legal and moral implications that follow, these 16 essays, many written for a University of Chicago Law School conference, comprise the only comprehensive book to date on this subject.
An Anchor Original. $1.45

CRISIS AND COMPROMISE
Politics in the Fourth Republic
Philip M. Williams
A definitive study of the structure and working of the French political system set up in 1945 that broke down during the Algerian crisis to be replaced by Gaullism. "Must rank as one of the classics of modern political science."—DAVID CAUTE, The Oxford Magazine. $2.45

SOCIALIST HUMANISM
An International Symposium
Edited by Erich Fromm
A striking collection of essays by philosophers and political scientists on both sides of the Iron Curtain. Among the contributors are Eugene Kamenka, Irving Fetscher, Adam Schaff, T. B. Bottomore, Danilo Dolci, Herbert Marcuse. $1.75

A Doubleday Hardbound Book of Special Interest . . .

THE SOCIAL CONSTRUCTION OF REALITY
A Treatise in the Sociology of Knowledge
Peter L. Berger and Thomas Luckmann
This book re-defines the sociology of knowledge as the study of "everything that passes for knowledge in society," particularly "common-sense knowledge" that constitutes the reality of everyday life for the ordinary member of society — a definition whose implications extend far beyond sociology. $5.95

DOUBLEDAY & COMPANY, INC.
Garden City, New York
Our Laidlaw division, River Forest, Illinois, serves the textbook needs of today's schools.

that the underdeveloped condition of the Third World "results from structural deformities and not simply from a historical lag or backwardness."

These theorists, he concludes, are unwilling or unable to understand that "the Third World's position is that the anachronisms of capitalism offer no real option to the aberrations of socialism. If they have not yet arrived at any unified formula, it is not because these nations do not know where they are going so much as they are worried about how long it will take to get 'there,' and at what price. The essential pragmatism of Third World spokesmen lies in their capacity to define goals heuristically rather than hysterically."

Common-Sense Communism

THE COMMUNISTIC SOCIETIES OF THE UNITED STATES. By Charles Nordhoff. Schocken Books. 439 pp. $7.50. Paper $2.

GEORGE KATEB

Mr. Kateb is author of Utopia and Its Enemies (Free Press). He teaches political science at Amherst College.

To read today Charles Nordhoff's account of his travels in 1874 is to renew acquaintance with the Communist ideal. The more we hear the word "communism," the less sense we make of it. Except maybe for the poor Chinese, most everybody has forgotten or never understood what communism meant to its founders. This is not necessarily to praise the Chinese; it is only to say they alone still seem in touch with the notion. When one considers the hopes of simple people and zealous intellectuals in England, France, Germany and America, in the first part of the 19th century, one easily sees that not only Red-baiting and Soviet apologetics but also neo-Marxist humanism are all far away. Neither propagandist crudity nor philosophical refinement bears much relation to original communism. And as time goes on, the ideal will grow more spectral. The irrepressible increase of knowledge and technique will render communism increasingly archaic, and make of it something amusing, fit only to entertain jaded sensibilities, part of the record of pastoral, as distant from reality as the old stories of the Golden Age. Modernity has killed the idea; wealth and power have killed the idea; rationalism has killed the idea. Is there any reason for regret? There is little in Nordhoff's book—or in other descriptions of American Communist societies—that would lead one to think so.

America, itself supposedly utopia, became the haven for nearly a hundred literal utopian efforts in the 19th century. Altogether a few thousand people took part. The sources of inspiration were German piety, Anglo-American evangelism, Owenite and Fourierist socialism, and transcendentalist idealism—an incredible mixture of impulses, occasionally in conflict with one another. Some utopian communities were made up of native Americans, some of recent immigrants (mostly Germans). Some were enthusiastically religious, some wanly philosophical. Some were ascetic in their style of life, some ventured to permit the senses a fuller indulgence. Some sought to move from poverty to sufficiency, some sought to escape from the prevailing materialism. All were built in defiance of selfishness, self-seeking, self-assertion—almost in defiance of the very self. It is precisely the assault on individuality, healthy and diseased, that defines communism and that establishes its remoteness from most later humanism, and most later practice and desire in the advanced social systems.

In 1874, Nordhoff, a New Yorker, visited the "communes" of eight of the main kinds of surviving American communism, and tried to see what these curiosities contained. He went, he says, ". . . to see if their experience offers any useful hints toward the solution of the labor question." Nordhoff was appalled by the growth of trade unions and "International Societies," because they sought "to eliminate from the thoughts of their adherents the hope or expectation of independence," and threatened to disrupt and depress the entire economic organization of capitalist society. Out of a passionate regard for the viability of capitalism, and of the capitalist principle, Nordhoff took his tour, hoping to find some alternative to unions, some substitute for the frontier as a safety valve "for the enterprise and discontent of our non-capitalist population." Though the communities were not as numerous or well populated as they had once been, Nordhoff thought that they still stood for something important. To be sure, Brook Farm and many of the Fourierist phalanxes—the communities with the most imagination—were no longer in existence. But from the point of view of a man like Nordhoff that was all to the good. Most of those who had abandoned communism had been playing at it only neurotically. What was wanted was something down to earth, something that worked, and worked to the same end as society at large, whatever the eccentricity of the means. Nordhoff was not searching for crystallized expressions of radical social criticism. He wanted serviceable utopias. And he found them. The oddness of utopianism in the land of plenty was offset by the Americanization of utopia.

By a rich fast moving stream
I saw
the dragonfly become a dragon and then a poem about a dragonfly becoming a dangerous reader in fast pursuit of summer transformations.

JOHN TAGLIABUE

Nordhoff spent most of his time with those communities that derived from Christianity—Protestant, simple, severe and full of the spirit of mutual aid. The fact that his book is continually depressing is accounted for by his omission of the intellectualist communities—except for Oneida, on which he is unfortunately quite brief. Dutifully, he makes much of the longevity of the Communists: where else should a realistic observer begin but at the unusual accumulation of years that most of the inhabitants had managed? And the years had certainly not been wasted. Nordhoff records that the typical commune had, in fact, made a tidy profit, had worked its land well, had engaged in small industries. It is marvelous to hear Mr. Worldly Wiseman pass such favorable judgment on Mount Zion:

> It is probably a low estimate of the wealth of the seventy-two communes to place it at twelve millions of dollars . . . if it were [equally divided], the members would be worth over two thousand dollars per head, counting men, women, and children. . . . I am satisfied that during its accumulation the Communists enjoyed a greater amount of comfort, and vastly greater security against want and demoralization, than were attained by their neighbours or the surrounding population.

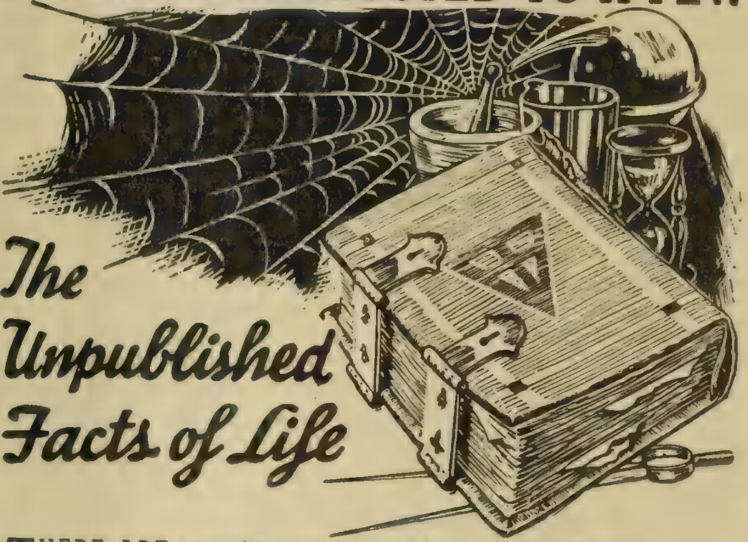
Totally without competitiveness, they had passed the capitalist test of survival. The Communists were also superior in their general cleanliness.

Nordhoff makes it quite clear that all the Communists rejected the life of unlimited acquisition. Though they were more than able to earn their way, they contented themselves with sufficiency; they did not aspire to a compulsive addition of wealth. They did not practice worldly asceticism, in Max Weber's sense: they knew the meaning of enough. The image which emerges from Nordhoff's book is that of Protestant monasticism—not so much an order as a fraternity or extended family, in which both sexes had a place; the world in perfected miniature, rather than an agency of the spiritual rulers of the world.

Nordhoff is interested in demonstrating the plausibility of communism; he hopes the examples he selects will prove sufficiently contagious to diminish the insurgent threats to the capitalist system. The absurdity of his task becomes apparent as he describes the radical aspects of the communal life. Many of the Communists he visited were celibate on religious grounds. Nordhoff tries hard to treat celibacy as if it were one more, though doubtlessly significant, custom. In addition, so eager is Nordhoff to show the common sense of communism that he takes issue with those who had maintained that without a fanatical attachment to religion no Communist society could hold together. Nordhoff is convinced that some religion is necessary; provided all the membership of the commune share it, its specific content does not matter. For Nordhoff, the really major precondition of utopian success is the prior experience of terrible deprivation: the memory of suffering is the sustaining emotion. (Nordhoff is harsh toward the comfortable transcendentalists, who did not know the meaning of work or the connection between working and having enough to eat.) But suffering and any kind of religion did not lead to communism. The nature of the religion was decisive. Not all the Christian Communists carried their fanaticism to the point of insisting on celibacy; but common to all of them was an intensity of religious commitment that a conventionally Christian society found simply unacceptable. In turn, the religious commitment was made possible by a primitivity of understanding, an immaturity of mind, that the rest of society was drawing away from. Of course, the communities made up of "philosophers" were short lived: Hawthorne's The Blithedale Romance is eloquent on the incompatibility of communitarianism with everything that permits and accompanies sophistication, with study, solitude, sensitive nerves. Nordhoff himself laments the lack of intellectuality in all but the Oneida community.

The sad truth is that once the intended beneficiaries of communism pass beyond their initial low level of human development, the Communist ideal ceases to have any relevance. Their suffering may still vaguely incline them in a Communist direction; communism may even provide them a temporary solace from their suffering. But the communism of the early 19th century checked energy, retarded self-realization, killed mind. By praising communism and advocating its increase, Nordhoff was condemning the lower classes to an inhuman though well-fed existence. And by not realizing the dependence of communism on fanaticism, he was indulging his fancy. Communism is dead in the West; the family cannot be the paradigm of extended social relationships; talk about solidarity or fraternity or community is just that—talk. Communism may live in China, as long as fanaticism and poverty survive. Once they go, communism must go. Marx himself, in his early Paris manuscripts, had already reached beyond the movement that emerged in his name. He said: "Communism is the necessary form and the dynamic principle of the immediate future, but communism is not itself the goal of human development—the form of human society." It is the real merit of Nordhoff's old book unwittingly to make these considerations vivid.

SECRETS ENTRUSTED TO A FEW



The Unpublished Facts of Life

THERE ARE some things that can not be generally told—things you ought to know. Great truths are dangerous to some—but factors for personal power and accomplishment in the hands of those who understand them. Behind the tales of the miracles and mysteries of the ancients, lie centuries of their secret probing into nature's laws—their amazing discoveries of the hidden processes of man's mind, and the mastery of life's problems. Once shrouded in mystery to avoid their destruction by mass fear and ignorance, these facts remain a useful heritage for the thousands of men and women who privately use them in their homes today.

THIS FREE BOOK

The Rosicrucians (not a religious organization), an age-old brotherhood of learning, have preserved this secret wisdom in their archives for centuries. They now invite you to share the practical helpfulness of their teachings. Write today for a free copy of the book, "The Mastery of Life." Within its pages may lie a new life of opportunity for you. Address: Scribe B.B.M.

The ROSICRUCIANS
(AMORC) • SAN JOSE • CALIFORNIA 95114 U.S.A.

Scribe: B.B.M.
The Rosicrucians (AMORC)
San Jose, California 95114, U.S.A.

Please send copy of free booklet, "The Mastery of Life," which I shall read as directed.

Name ____________________

Address ____________________

City ____________ Zip Code ________
Please Include Your Zip Code

The Actor's Workshop Is Dead

FREDERICK H. GARDNER

Mr. Gardner is a free-lance writer based in San Francisco.

The Actor's Workshop lies dead in a pool of red ink. For years The Chronicle, San Francisco's pro-enlightenment paper, warned that the demise of the Workshop would mean "a loss of cultural face." The head of the city's Arts Commission said "it would place us on a cultural par with Salinas." (The Mayor of Salinas, a nearby town, demanded an apology and got it.) When the final curtain fell on July 23, a Chamber of Commerce spokesman announced: "We've still got the ballet, the opera and the symphony. Our image is O.K."

The image may well be O.K., but the reality has driven creative people in San Francisco to form an Artists' Liberation Front. One revolutionary aim of the ALF is to help artists help themselves instead of begging the city and the local gentry to subsidize their performances and exhibitions. Another is to lead the fight against censorship, the banning of shows from the parks and the closing of clubs under all the pretexts known to the police.

Prime movers in the new group include Tillie Olsen, the skillful short-story writer; Ron Davis, head of the San Francisco Mime Troupe; Bill Graham, a folk-rock impresario; and Alan Meyerson, director of the cabaret called The Committee. These artists see in the rise and fall of the Workshop a parable that illustrates the hazards of establishment patronage.

Herbert Blau and Jules Irving founded the Workshop in 1952 and were thanked by official and semi-official San Francisco for doing so. In 1954 a Chronicle critic wrote that the local production of Death of a Salesman proved that "we can produce, right here in the Bay Area, shows as well-acted and well-directed, if not quite so plushly mounted, as those on Broadway at their best." Four years later, when the State Department asked the group to do Waiting for Godot at the Brussels World's Fair, Mayor George Christopher headed a citizens' committee to raise money for their trip. The State Department asked the Workshop to leave behind their stage manager, a member of the Teamsters Union (he worked as a warehouseman by day), who was thought to have unsavory opinions. Blau and Irving protested, but finally went without him "in fairness to the citizens of San Francisco." En route they played New York and drew plaudits from Brooks Atkinson. They were a hit in Europe. Without a doubt the Workshop had become the most prestigious theatre company in the hinterlands.

In 1959, the Ford Foundation had promised $52,000 a year for the next three years—with the stipulation that the city match the sum—so that the company could import ten Broadway actors at $200 a week. Identical grants went to the Phoenix Theatre in New York, the Arena in Washington and the Alley in Houston. Ford's dual purpose was to decentralize United States theatre by encouraging resident companies, and to call the bluff of Broadway actors who complained that they wanted to work in a variety of plays, especially classics, but couldn't earn a living at it.

Patrons of the arts in New York, Washington and Houston quickly matched Ford's outlay, but their San Francisco counterparts were tightfisted. With Ford's deadline a month away and $39,000 of the first year's $52,000 not yet raised, four prominent Bay Area businessmen pledged to raise the balance. Ford waived its rule about cash on the line and gave the big shots those easy credit terms they've given us all along.

As it turned out, however, Ford's first venture into theatre was about as successful as the Edsel. The presence of ten New York actors earning $200 a week didn't boost the morale of the old-timers who still earned from $40 to $80. Blau and Irving, juggling four shows a week between the large Marines Memorial Theatre and the tiny Encore, had to dispense with the traditional company meetings that Workshop veterans considered instructive and inspiring. Audiences grew—from 54,000 in 1959 to 85,000 in 1962—and Irving was told that the next Ford grant would enable the Workshop to build its own 600-seat theatre on tax-free land. But the company had lost its familial spirit, unity of style and the respect of some good friends.

Ron Davis, now director of the Mime Troupe, joined the Workshop in 1960. Mime being his first love, Blau and Irving let him stage his own shows at the Encore Sunday nights at eleven. Davis quit in 1962, not grateful enough to stick with a company he thought was exhausted physically, and almost defunct theatrically. "It was a case of overextension," he says in retrospect. "The Ford grant did it.

"But you can't just blame it on the terms of the grant," he adds. "There was a meeting, a midway meeting between a grant that was bad for the theatre and two men willing to accept that grant. It's never just the grant, or just the men for that matter."

Blau and Irving went to the big grant daddy of them all, Lincoln Center, early in 1965, and no one who had followed their financial travail was surprised. The public appeals for funds had grown increasingly desperate as the production schedule became more and more ambitious. A few parochial citizens regarded the departure of the Workshop directors as an insult to San Francisco, a throwback to the days when this was a Triple-A minor-league town and the stars, like DiMaggio, all disappeared to New York. Ralph Gleason, a Chronicle columnist who is in close touch with the city's artists, had to remind his readers: "It is the constitutional prerogative of Messrs. Blau and Irving to quit and take a better job."

By way of consolation Gleason observed: "The Workshop, while it may be a big thing with the Chamber of Commerce handouts, has been a good deal of a bore over the years. . . . Actually the last thing the Workshop did that was absolutely essential was the Ronnie Davis mime presentation at the Encore." Gleason suggested turning the Encore over to Davis, who wouldn't have accepted it, he says, because "the audience I want goes to the park on Sunday, but wouldn't go to the Encore."

Davis is so keen on going to his audience artistically as well as geographically that he incorporated words and music into the Mime Troupe routine. Last year the troupe played to some 50,000 people in the parks, although the Parks and Recreation Commission wouldn't let them drop their platform on the most favorable sites. Davis hopes that the Artists' Liberation Front will take a cue from his own group and "distinguish the people of San Francisco from the Peninsula people. That's what the Workshop forgot to do. Their audience was 60 per cent Peninsula people: college graduates, professionals who live down there where it's warm all the time, near Stanford, near the electronics companies."

When Blau and Irving left they took their staff and leading actors and actresses with them. Ken Kitch, who had joined the Workshop in 1959 as an actor, became managing director. As artistic director he hired John Hancock, whose credentials included a successful Off-Broadway version of A Man's a Man. The two young administrators found that former backers, Ford included, would not contribute until the Workshop proved itself. But how is that done with no money to stage shows?

Hancock, trying to keep the deficit down, assembled a company of people willing to work for less than $80 a week. He directed them in the United States première of Edward II and a widely praised Midsummer Night's Dream. His co-worker, Marc Estrin, staged A Man's a Man. All three productions were well attended. Even so, when Hancock made an emergency plea for $150,000 to erase the deficit and provide operating capital for a new season, only $49,500 was forthcoming. The city offered $25,000 of this sum from its hotel-tax fund. (Hancock thought it all should have come from the hotel tax, which was created specifically to support cultural activities. The fund has been used crassly to promote tourism. The artistic event of the decade, the 1964 Republican Convention, was lured with $200,000 from the hotel-tax fund.) Another $22,500 was promised by the federal government, and only $2,000 came from private patrons and local corporations.

Hancock has now left San Francisco for Pittsburgh. His budget for the 1966-67 season will be $700,000, and almost all of it comes from corporate sources. After a year of begging by the Bay, Hancock was so stunned by this beneficence that he asked a Pittsburgh city father to explain it to him. "We need to attract engineers, scientists, top executives," he was told. "When people think of Pittsburgh they think of smoke. So we've got to do something to make people want to live here."

"San Francisco doesn't," says Kitch, following the Pittsburgher's line of reasoning. "People will always want to live here for the view."

Kitch has ample reason to be bitter. The Chamber of Commerce refused to meet with him for months; then it issued a statement, after the Workshop's finale, saying if only Kitch had come to them sooner they could have saved his company. Mayor Shelley won't do anything on behalf of culture except promote a Lincoln Center type of construction project that few artists want. Governor Brown was "actively unfriendly," according to Marc Estrin, when the Workshop made a last-ditch appeal for his help. Estrin says he would like to see Ronald Reagan elected governor on the theory that things must get worse before they get better.

Leaders and rank and file of the ALF share this apocalyptic feeling. They see the traditional backers of the arts as their present enemies; and they identify these backers with the liberal establishment. They are convinced that art can thrive only by ignoring and inevitably offending the establishment.

Davis holds up the progress of the Mime Troupe—which is as popular and as broke as the Workshop was eight years ago, but vastly different in its attitude toward patronage—as a test case for the ALF approach. Instead of seeking subsidies when the troupe needs money, Davis will take them out of San Francisco on tour. One such jaunt is scheduled for this fall. It will enable his actors to pay their milkmen, and might even remind people that politicians who harass artists make the city a duller place in which to live.

Art and Argot at Karamu

BENNETT KREMEN

Mr. Kremen is a free-lance writer and an associate editor of Holiday magazine. He was both a teacher and social worker in East Harlem.

When I told the cab driver at the Cleveland airport to take me to a hotel near Karamu House, he spun toward me from the wheel: "You don't want to stay around there, mister!" As he looked over my tweeds, my typewriter, his voice became emphatic: "It ain't safe around there. Why don't I take you to the Statler?"

"Near the Karamu House," I repeated, and he pulled away silently toward 89th and Quincy, toward that "nigger theatre" on the east side of Cleveland. As we drove on I kept watching for the decay and squalor, brassy bars and red-eyed Negroes shuffling in doorways that had been implied in my driver's reaction. The center of the community, a place of joyful gathering — Karamu! The Swahili word seemed an irony. If it were really another Brownsville, another Bedford-Stuyvesant, I had no expectations of joyful gatherings. As we moved deeper into the city, I kept watching for the symptoms.

But the hotel where I stayed faced a block of small houses with large lawns and dogs barking in the back yards. There was nothing rich along that street, but it was solid, stable, homes of churchgoers, civil servants — people who paint their fences and try hard not to get involved when the youngsters threaten the peace with pickets and demonstrations. Like many others I met in Cleveland, the cab driver had simply failed to discriminate among Negro neighborhoods.

This time I was puzzled and disappointed by the error. For Karamu, the oldest Negro, now integrated theatre, art school and dancing group in America, with former members on Broadway and television, in the opera and the movies, seemed on those bland side streets cut from its sources and abandoned. Karamu had begun in 1915, when a settlement house was opened by Russell and Rowena Jelliff in an area of Cleveland called the "Roaring Third." Most of Cleveland's Negroes lived there in uneasy harmony with Italians, Bohemians, Irishmen and Jews. The Jelliffs established themselves in two old cottages, one of them used as a neighborhood center. When it filled too slowly, Russell Jelliff would play his guitar on a park bench, thus drawing his neighbors around him — the beginning, perhaps, of the arts at Karamu House.

But very early, when Karamu was still called the Playhouse Settlement of the Neighborhood Association, the Jelliffs became convinced that the Negro had unfettered expressiveness and unique "natural body movements." They decided that, through exploitation of these gifts, the Negro could demonstrate his worth, find elevated values and make his way into American society. A program was soon shaped by the Jelliffs around the arts. And despite their daily experience with swarms of children in dance classes, many of them awkward, certainly, or fumbling like children anywhere, the "natural body movements" of the race

C-L PHILIPPE'S
BUBU of MONTPARNASSE
(the unexpurgated edition)
Nobel Prize author T. S. Eliot helps to dry the tearful eyes of the little street-walkers of Paris. $3 postpaid.
BOOK AWARDS, 458 Broadway, New York, N. Y. 10013

FOR WRITERS!
Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to
PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. N

COMMENTARY
WORLD'S BEST MAGAZINE?
SEE FOR YOURSELF
☐ 7 Mo. Trial $4.79
☐ 12 Mo. $8.00
COMMENTARY, NA
165 East 56 St., NY, NY
☐ Bill me.
☐ Check enclosed.
Name....................
Address....................
Zip....................
Outside USA + $1/yr.

remained an idée fixe for the Jelliffs — a disquieting echo of "Yeah, they sure can sing and dance." But their beliefs were sincere, and they wanted to help.

For more than fifty years they did so, their labors culminating in today's Karamu House built at a cost of $500,000 in 1949, ten years after a fire destroyed the original, a rat-infested poolroom converted into a theatre. But the brown-brick institutional buildings of the new Karamu House don't stand in the "Roaring Third" or the Hough area, a scene of utter poverty, violence, rioting and defeat, in desperate need of "a place of joyful gathering."

Describing the settlement program at Karamu, Mrs. Jelliff said pointedly: "We serve all of Cleveland, but not as a settlement house—we're an art center." This confused me, for despite its drama program, opera, art studios, concert dance group, quartet, poetry workshop, its children's theatre, musical instruction, photography club and art galleries, Karamu is listed as a member of the National Federation of Settlements. Each year it submits a budget to the federation and receives funds from the Red Feather Drive to run a nursery, a golden age club, a club for the blind — these services all explained at Karamu in settlement-house jargon.

When I asked, "What are you trying to do at Karamu?" a theatre technician, warbling in the same key, explained: "We're concerned with the growth potential of people — with the total personality." "Art to define goals and values" was stressed by a dancer resting off-stage; "the creation of a therapeutic milieu," said a vocalist; "aiding the Negro," added one of the principals in an opera; "advancing integration, social mobility, helping people actualize themselves," recited a boy moving props.

This argot, a hybrid of social psychology and the civil rights movement, staggers the ear, but it plays back in modern idiom the same religious humanism, sentimentality and zeal that sent young Oxonians in Victorian times off to London's Toynbee Hall, the first settlement house. They too set out to help the neglected find elevated values, their worth, a way upward in England's society. Success drove Karamu out of the slums and ambition keeps it away. Like old baggage, the settlement-house title was left behind, but its habits and language went along to the new project on 89th and Quincy — to the art center.

As far back as the twenties, the theatre at Karamu began to draw attention. A group called the Dumas Dramatic Society was formed in 1920 in the Jelliff's Playhouse Settlement. In 1923, after a visit by Charles Gilpin, a Negro actor acclaimed for his role in O'Neill's Emperor Jones, this group of amateurs took the $50 he gave them and changed its name to the Gilpin Players. Without a theatre, with little money and no wages, they managed to perform in borrowed halls and school auditoriums. When a poolroom near the settlement became available in 1926, the Gilpin Players, the Jelliffs and their neighbors worked late into the night, gutting, painting, hammering it into shape with nails drawn from a donated keg. The lights were shaped from alcohol tins cadged from the local bootleggers. They named this little theatre Karamu.

The all-Negro casts avoided plays on racial themes — the reality of the black man in America was too painful, too embarrassing for the Negro of that time to illuminate it on stage. Except for a few musicals, the only openings that the commercial theatre of the twenties had for the Negro (and then only when he wasn't forced out by burnt cork) were the "singin' and dancin' " of vaudeville and the minstrel show. At Playhouse Settlement, these too were avoided. White plays were done, one of them set in Russia, the cast hidden behind long beards.

The old, bone-wearing church pews seating 120 were often filled for the 160 plays produced during the next thirteen years. And in the security of this new home, the Gilpin Players began to chance the anger of Cleveland's Negro clergy and press by offering plays on contemporary Negro life. In 1935, after the opening of Stevedore, an editorial in the Gazette accused Karamu of catering "to a class of poor whites who enjoy seeing and hearing our people ridiculed, derided or 'made monkeys of.' "

Karamu flourished in this cross wind, its players unique in America: all of them Negro, none of them paid, performing constantly. Cleveland reviewers and novelty seekers began to notice the playhouse in the "Roaring Third," then theatre magazines and the carriage trade. Many of the plays offered in that period were humorous and accurate accounts of his fellow Negroes, written by a young Karamu playwright, Langston Hughes.

But Karamu was not limited to the theatre. Painters, sculptors and print makers made their way to the settlement, one of them from a Mississippi chain gang. They, too, brought fame to Karamu, exhibiting in 1934 at the annual May Show, Cleveland's major art competition. Eight years later, Karamu artists dominated the largest exhibition of the work of Negroes ever shown in an established New York gallery. The critics were enthusiastic and other cities quickly invited Karamu's artists to exhibit.

The ultimate success had come two years earlier, when Karamu was written up by Time and photographed for Life by Gjon Mili, the occasion being a performance by the Karamu Dancers at the New York World's Fair. Their program reflected Negro culture from its African roots to the jitterbug. It excited the critics and brought Billy Rose and Katherine Dunham on talent raids. Yet for the Jelliffs, now veterans of twenty-five years down in the quarter, that presence on the fair ground was another attempt "to weave the Negro body movements in dance forms and symbols." However, they were caught by the vision of success, and decided not to rebuild the theatre that had burnt out the previous year, but to move on to a better neighborhood. In 1949, the move was finally made.

Sixteen years later, A Streetcar Named Desire was revived at Karamu. After walking through hallways like hospital corridors, I was surprised by the rough-bricked elegance of the Proscenium Theatre, its walls hung with tapestries in mute African motifs. Modern equipment, an ample stage and 223 well-placed seats make it a theatre of unusual excellence. The tickets that night were $1.50; a cast of eleven, a theatre and production staff of forty-six, were announced in the program, which also carried advance notices of a dance concert, a musical, a Pinter play and two chamber operas.

As the lights dimmed, social work and settlements were almost forgotten. I thought only of an art center, a theatre — like the old, masterful Habimah, the pride of every Jewish tailor yanked by the beard in Russia. Why not a Negro Habimah? What an argument, a tool, a weapon it could be! It is cruel that it's needed, perhaps, but it would be crueler still to neglect that need. If not a Habimah recruited in the black ghettos, then an integrated Karamu, as now, but a brilliant one in which leading ladies, white or black, but talented, could fight it out at casting for a role opposite a Romeo from Harlem or an Oedipus from Hough. If the genius could be dug out of the neglected creases of the country, then money could be raised for salaries, scholarships, a touring group, an Off-Broadway theatre. . . .

Then the curtain went up and the stage stood in semi-darkness, its New Orleans set lost in the gloom. For more than twenty minutes, Blanche and Stella struggled with their feelings, and their lines. And no wonder, for the long-parted sisters were meeting again in a tenement even Williams couldn't imagine, lit as it seemed to be by candlelight, its windows painted with tar. When one of the forty-six theatre and production staff managed to bring the lights up, Stanley was on stage, fuming and exploding, his lines coming out like buckshot. After the intermission, the pace slowed, the faces softened, and I was reminded of how good a play Streetcar is. At the final curtain, the audience and the cast, an interracial one, adjourned for coffee and conversation to an art gallery, its show of oils on animal hides so impoverished that I wondered what had palsied at Karamu in the twenty-three years since those pioneers coming from the old settlement had made their mark in a New York gallery.

I had hoped an opera by Seymour Barab called Little Red Riding Hood—a Karamu discovery—would dispel the critical cloud growing each day darker in my mind. The performance I was able to attend was given before patients at a mental hospital, its cast of three supported by a single piano. A Chaliapin would have stuttered before members of that audience, trapped in worlds of their own. But even so, the antics of a too lively Wolf and a Red Riding Hood with a voice as timid as her soul seemed better suited for children, the few naughty lines intended to lift this flimsy vehicle to the level of satire being entirely expendable.

More than any of the other arts at the new Karamu, the opera theatre has gathered praise from professionals and the press. But it also suffered the most when talent scouts descended on Karamu during the casting of a Porgy and Bess company that toured Russia in 1955. The opera program began with the arrival in 1948 of Benno Frank, a small, talkative man with a Reinhardtian temperament. Before fleeing Germany, Frank had worked at Hamburg's Schiller Oper, and though his imagination is often excessive, his theatrical instincts are correct. His first production, Karl Orff's Die Kluge, set a precedent for doing unusual and original chamber operas. Since then Gluck's Pilgrims of Mecca, Benjamin Britten's Let's Make an Opera, Kaufmann's Robe of Pearls, Debussy's Prodigal Son and Hayden's Foolish and Fickle have all had their American premières at Karamu's Arena or Proscenium theatres.

The musical director, Helmuth Wolfes, is a huge, blue-eyed man, devoted to wit and the classics. He would be a musical master anywhere; at Karamu he is a colossus. After conducting at L'Opéra de Monte Carlo, and later doing scholarly work leading to the uncovering of a Rossini opera, Un Turco in Italia, which he adapted for the stage with Boris Goldovsky, Wolfes came to Karamu in 1952, where he helped train Elizabeth Foster, now with the Viener Volk Oper, and William Ray, the Oberon recently in an East Berlin performance of Britten's A Midsummer Night's Dream. In 1949, Wilhelm Furtwangler asked him to assist at the Berlin Philharmonic, but Wolfes, unable to live again in a country that had done its best to disgrace him, turned it down. It was painful to watch him playing at that lone piano for Little Red Riding Hood, the Wolf and Grandma.

Karamu productions, some skimpier even than the Barab opera, have been handled gently by Cleveland's reviewers, who are restrained, perhaps, by concern for a cultural asset or by awareness of Karamu's noble ends. Nonetheless, the box office has been slipping, and for an obvious reason. But why this dearth of excellence at an institution that has given us Clayton Corbin, recently the General in Royal Hunt of the Sun, and Ivan Dixon, the lead in Nothing But a Man?

The question was answered by Reuben Silver, a husky, generous man, university trained as a director: "I've had some trouble with Streetcar—with Stanley. It's not easy for any of them to work all day at jobs and rehearse at night like professionals. But our purpose is not to create professionals at Karamu; it's to help people grow." Each word he spoke resurrected the settlement buried in Karamu. And settlement-house goals are no justification for a poor theatrical performance—not if that performance is sold at a box office and open to the critics.

The soaring and plunging of Karamu's artistic achievements is not unique. Since the first piano was moved into Jane Addams' Hull House, those settlements that involved themselves in the arts have seen their staffs divided in conflicts between social work and artistic ambition—the artist often being the loser. Settlement houses use music, painting or theatre to heal; the artist uses them to achieve an excellence that is at once impersonal and imperiously demanding. Between the two, Karamu must choose.

Stratford and Ypsilanti

JULIUS NOVICK

Mr. Novick recently completed a survey of the American National Theatre for The Nation, based on a Ford Foundation grant.

Before July 13, 1953, the Shakespearean Festival at Stratford, Ontario, was the crazy idea of a small-town civic booster. This year it offers five plays, an opera, a full-length ballet, thirteen classical concerts, two jazz concerts, two exhibitions and two seminars. Located in an unpretentious town containing a population of 23,000, the festival expects this season to sell upwards of 300,000 tickets.

I cannot speak for the jazz concerts or the seminars, but I can testify that as a theatre the festival deserves its success. It offers a well-chosen repertory of plays based on but not confined to Shakespeare. It has one of the most exciting theatre buildings in the world (and also maintains a second theatre with a conventional proscenium stage). Its acting company is remarkable not for one or two stars but for an extraordinary number of extremely talented, highly versatile performers (fourteen of whom have been with the festival for five years or more). Its directors are men whose abilities seem to be stimulated by their respect for their material, and who have long since justified the once revolutionary thrust stage by their skill in the use of it. And its management is ambitious, audacious and practical.

At Stratford, in Stanislavsky's phrase, they seem to love the art in themselves, and not themselves in the art. Because producing plays is always a perilous business, fiascoes happen at Stratford as they do elsewhere. (I remember a Comedy of Errors three seasons ago. . . .) But even aside from the potent charm of its surroundings on the banks of the Avon, I would rather spend an evening in the Festival Theatre than in any other theatre on this side of the Atlantic.

In the summer of 1965 the great event at Stratford was the North American première of Mahagonny by Bertolt Brecht and Kurt Weill (still unperformed south of the border, except in concert form). This summer's great event is an even less familiar work: Shakespeare's Henry VI, which the festival is presenting in John Barton's adaptation. (The Barton version, made for the Royal Shakespeare Theatre at the English Stratford, condenses Shakespeare's trilogy into two plays, which Mr. Barton calls Henry VI and Edward IV. The first of these is being given this year in Ontario, as a companion piece to Henry V; the second will be done next season along with Richard III, as the festival completes its four-year progress through the histories.)

The Henry VI trilogy was probably Shakespeare's first work for the stage, and it has traditionally been dismissed as a

AT 35

Father, what would you make of me? I wear your face.
I hear my cough and think the worms have sent you home.
Here at my table in my insubstantial house,
your myth of hope,
the piece of man you left,
I live your death stroke for stroke.

There are no vows you did not keep I will not break.
I leave no darkness unacknowledged for your sake.
You are the school I teach. The course I take.
I move toward age, and you become my son.
Along the path ahead
you lift aside
the branches.

BARRY SPACKS

piece of juvenile hack work. It does contain a good deal of blunt, splenetic language—"Presumptuous prelate!" "Saucy peer!"—from which I personally derive great pleasure, but which is difficult to take altogether seriously. But as edited by Barton and directed by John Hirsch, without gimmickry or updating, it is a powerful and lurid picture of a world in chaos, startling in its contemporaneity.

In a program note, Hirsch quotes Yeats:

> Things fall apart; the centre cannot hold;
> Mere anarchy is loosed upon the world . . .
> The best lack all conviction, while the worst
> Are full of passionate intensity.

The 20th-century poet has provided an exact description of this 16th-century play. Poor Henry VI, the weak son of a hero-father, is a good youth, but his goodness is no match for the passionate intensity of his self-seeking barons, each of them eager to chance the wreck of the kingdom in order to gain control of it. Henry lacks even enough conviction to save his most loyal servant, the good Duke Humphrey, from men who are the enemies of king as well as duke. And so the kingdom, the social structure, falls apart, and anarchy is loosed upon the world.

Shakespeare's vision extends further than the political and military arenas; in one brilliant scene, he brings on a crippled peasant who proclaims that his sight has been miraculously restored after lifelong blindness. King Henry, poor saintly boob, immediately begins thanking God for His goodness. But Duke Humphrey, who knows how the world is, promises to perform another "miracle," and "restore this cripple to his legs again." "Now, sirrah," he says, "if you mean to save yourself from whipping, leap me over this stool and run away." The poor fellow protests piteously, but as the beadle brings the whip down on him, the supposed cripple springs up and runs off like a hare. It is a world where nothing is sure.

As a boy, Hirsch spent the years of World War II in the chaos of Eastern Europe, barely surviving, and that perhaps gives him a special closeness to this material. He contrives particularly vivid images of cruelty and violence, not with the nasty ingenuity of a Bond movie but in order to evoke a cruel and violent world. His production is unflinching, vigorous, swift and extremely well acted.

There is always the danger, as with several of Shakespeare's histories, that this play will dissolve into a welter of more or less interchangeable mail-clad lords with geographical names, but at Stratford most of the characters in Henry VI are quite sharply individualized: bluff Duke Humphrey (Tony Van Bridge), whose goodness is not weakness; tough, clever Suffolk (Leo Ciceri); the openly villainous Bishop of Winchester (Powys Thomas); York (Barry MacGregor), a surly boy, easily manipulated by insidious, subtle Warwick (William Hutt). Briain Petchey makes an affecting King Henry — young, self-doubting, transparently eager to please. Frances Hyland, as Queen Margaret, is both attractive enough to make credible the young king's sudden infatuation and strong enough for Margaret's bloody-minded plotting and hysterical grief. This is the play that contains Shakespeare's portrait of Joan of Arc as a screaming, cursing upstart whose power comes from witchcraft; Martha Henry plays her with sympathy, but without whitewash.

Henry VI, with its unexpected pertinency and power, somewhat overshadows Michael Langham's fine production of Henry V. Langham's program note suggests that he meant to show us the seamy side of war, instead of stressing the play's romantic, recruiting-poster aspects. And in fact his battle scenes, like the ones staged by Hirsch for Henry VI, make fighting look like the sweaty, ugly, agonizing business it is.

But Langham presents Henry V as sincere in his belief that his war with France is just, and the seamier elements in play and production are not strong enough to overbear this view of the matter. It is in this respect a conventional production, but admirable in its way, forthrightly staged and strongly acted. My only serious reservation is that Douglas Rain's personable and soldierly King Henry lacks the animal magnetism to make the most of his great speeches.

The third of this year's Shakespeare productions at Stratford is a lyrical, light-footed Twelfth Night, directed by David William, about which I have no serious reservations whatsoever. William has a lively comic imagination; he has hung a swing in Olivia's garden, for instance, and both Malvolio and Sir Andrew tangle hilariously with it, each in his own distinctive and characteristic fashion. He makes clever fun of the love-stricken Orsino, but is never insensitive to the poetry of the play; and though a newcomer to Stratford, he uses the thrust stage with authority and boldness.

While the three Shakespeare plays share the main theatre, the festival presents a varied repertory on the proscenium stage of the Avon Theatre in downtown Stratford. Strindberg's The Dance of Death opened after I left Stratford; so did Rose Latulippe, a new full-length ballet, based on a Quebec legend and performed by the Royal Winnipeg Ballet. The festival's production of Mozart's Don Giovanni, directed by Jean Gascon, had its shortcomings, but still made a good deal more sense dramatically than most productions of this difficult work. And, as it has not often done in the past, the festival also presented a new play, The Last of the Tsars, commissioned from Michael Bawtree at the last moment, after another new play about the Russian Revolution was tried out (in Winnipeg) and found wanting.

Bawtree has been influenced by A Man for All Seasons, and by the work of Wilder and Pirandello; his characters constantly stop what they are doing to address the audience directly, and the play keeps jumping backward and forward in time. These devices increase the facility with which the author can control and comment upon the action, and Bawtree uses them often effectively, often self-consciously, sometimes clumsily. He also uses documentary technique, bringing political and military events into his picture by the simple and effective device of having someone announce them, headline style. Bawtree is a witty and promising writer, full of ideas, working on significant and highly charged material.

Yet his play is not, I think, a generally viable script. He concedes that the Romanovs had to go, but he is in love with their glamour; he believes that something splendid, like Cyrano's white plume, went out of the world with them. But the language in which he writes about the Romanov glory is often hackneyed, and in spite of all his rhetoric he shows us an empire lost not through grand, splendid, outdated chivalry but through mere petty stupidity. Furthermore, Bawtree's protagonist, the Grand Duke Michael (who became the last of the czars when his brother Nicholas abdicated), never comes into focus. He has much to say but little to do, and he reveals little of himself.

In Michael Langham's splendid production, however, The Last of the Tsars makes an interesting evening. Leslie Hurry's sets and costumes are spectacular but not oppressive, and the acting (as usual at Stratford) is excellent.

It is good to see the festival putting its tremendous resources at the service of a new playwright, for a change. Bawtree has had his problems with The Last of the Tsars, but this is his first full-length play, and as such it is a remarkable achievement. As with any new playwright, it is an open question whether or not his defects will end by crippling his qualities, but the qualities are there. If the festival continues to encourage him, it may some day turn out to have made yet another significant contribution to the English-speaking theatre at large.

In Ypsilanti, Mich., a small and hitherto undistinguished city near Detroit, some people seem to have taken note of what has been done at Stratford. A Mrs. Clara Owens decided that Ypsilanti ought to have a festival of its own, devoted primarily to Greek drama; and, like Stratford, Ypsilanti determined to have the best. The Ypsilanti Greek Theatre was launched with a budget of $800,000. The new organization hired as its artistic director Alexis Solomos, for fourteen years the artistic director of the National Theatre of Greece; it recruited a distinguished company headed by Dame Judith Anderson and Bert Lahr (unfortunately the two do not appear in the same play); and it spent $100,000 to convert a small baseball stadium into a reasonable facsimile of a classical Greek amphitheatre, with the traditional circular space marked out as the main playing area, and the traditional rectangular platform behind it. Finally, on June 28 and 29 of this year, it unveiled the two productions that comprise its first season: the Oresteia of Aeschylus and The Birds of Aristophanes.

If the Ypsilanti festival survives, it will be the only professional theatre ever to give sustained attention to the difficult question of how—and whether—Greek drama can make great theatre in English.

It may be that W. H. Auden's view — that the Greek classics in English have more historical and anthropological than aesthetic interest — applies especially to the theatre. Having been raised on Shakespeare, we love particularity in our dramas, details of character, quirkiness even, but the Greek plays are remorselessly general. We love swift action, but the Greek plays are stately and slow (being frequently brought to a dead halt by choruses with a fatal gift of platitude). The plays deal cogently with questions that are highly pertinent to our own lives, but the symbols and conventions by which they deal with them have had 2,000 years in which to lose their ability to rouse our emotions. And, in addition to all this, there are the difficulties of translation, which Greek speakers tell us are well-nigh insuperable.

Solomos' two productions this year are interesting as curiosities (so this is the Oresteia . . .), but as aesthetic experiences they are less than overwhelming. The Oresteia is by far the better of the two productions, but even so I was reminded of the dictum of that great critic Christopher Sly: "This is a very excellent piece of work; would 'twere done." Solomos has condensed Richmond Lattimore's translation of the trilogy into a long evening's playing time; it was half over when Karen Ludwig as Electra recognized that Orestes was nearby, and I was touched by emotion for the first time.

Miss Ludwig is 23 years old, and a find; she plays Electra with plenty of strength and an appealing girlish awkwardness. Donald Davis makes an imposing Agamemnon, and Richard Mangoode brings a welcome touch of ordinary humanity as a breezy Herald. Dame Judith Anderson, with her splendid bearing and her defiant air, appears in all three parts of the trilogy as Clytemnestra, but her reputation led me to hope for a great explosion that somehow never came.

The Chorus of Elders in the Agamemnon was a bit of a washout, since behind their beards the Elders were obviously very young; the female chorus in the other two parts of the trilogy was much better. (The Furies, however, could hardly have scared a child, though we are told that in the first production of the Oresteia they were so terrible of aspect that a woman in the audience had a miscarriage on the spot.) Helen McGehee, the choreographer, evidently felt more at ease with the women; Miss McGehee is a member of Martha Graham's company, and the Graham idiom is quite appropriate to Aeschylus. Solomos' staging is dignified and formal, with no directorial hocus-pocus, no attempt to get the play even part way down from its pedestal, or to transpose it into terms more comprehensible to the 20th century. And perhaps that approach is what Aeschylus needs.

It is without doubt what Aristophanes needs. He is the most topical of dramatists; were he writing today, The Birds would be full of LBJ and Elizabeth Taylor. Solomos' efforts at topicality are few and feeble, and so are his attempts at

WORLD'S BEST ?

TRY IT AND SEE

☐ 7-month subscription —$4.79 (reg. $8 per year)
☐ Commentary Card catalog—10¢ (handsome reproductions of historic Jewish art)

COMMENTARY NA
165 East 56th Street
New York, N.Y. 10022

Name
Address
City State Zip

you work hard for that dollar all your life..

make sure you reap the rewards!

Let us send you information about our exciting retirement plans. Call or write giving us your date of birth and the age at which you want to retire. We'll introduce you to a rather startling concept which may change your attitude about saving for retirement. You'll love the rewards of our retirement plans.

Jafco Life
AGENCY, INC.

INSURANCE SPECIALISTS
431 Fifth Avenue, N.Y., N.Y. 10016
MU 4-5779

slapstick; if the play meant anything to him at all, there was no trace of it in his direction. The scenery and costumes by Eldon Elder and the choreography by Gemze De Lappe are similarly unimaginative; much of the acting is merely annoying. Bert Lahr bravely gives his usual performance, but even he cannot make much headway against so many obstacles. (William Arrowsmith's unidiomatic translation, full of painfully bad jokes, is another obstacle.) The play is short enough, and the whole experience is odd enough, so that the proceedings never become entirely boring; but surely a better case can be made for Aristophanes than this.

Blowup in Cincinnati

ROBERT PASOLLI

Mr. Pasolli worked at the Tyrone Guthrie Theatre in Minneapolis on a Ford Foundation grant and was later associated with the Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center in New York.

> Mrs. Murray: All men are a challenge, Mr. Price.
>
> Price: They may be to you, Mrs. Murray — in fact, I can well imagine it — but this one's a dare.

Price is talking about Valentine Brose, the hero of Eh?, a wonderful play by England's newest export, Henry Livings. What plagues Price in the play is what plagues me about the play. Eh? is as nonconformist as its hero and keeps breaking the molds I put it in. More precisely, it keeps breaking the molds it taunts me to put it in. Rather than delineate the frustrating argument I've been conducting between the play's claims for farce versus comédie de caractère, and for serious intent versus idiot's delight, I'll let it go by saying that Eh? is a mix of these and an original.

I met Mr. Livings on his way through New York to rehearsals for the American première of Eh? at the Cincinnati Playhouse in the Park, and remember his fondness for shaking up people's convictions. He calls it "surprising them with the truth." At the time I didn't realize that he had accomplished with the play what Valentine Brose accomplishes in the play.

Not that either playwright or hero goes about it very deliberately. On the contrary, it seems entirely natural and, in Val's case, even unconscious. Val is the night shift in the boiler room of a provincial English factory, the bane of the works manager (Price), the personnel lady (Mrs. Murray) and the local parson, a champion of smoke abatement. The boiler's demands are minimal—"Be here, watch the thing, press the button, oil the bearings," is the way Price puts it—but Val is too disoriented to cope. The opposition organizes to get rid of him, but Val has been cultivating some giant mushrooms which provide a hallucinatory diversion, and the untended boiler blows up as the play comes to its end.

The title of the play represents the characteristic tacit reaction to Val's behavior and suggests the most significant thing about him: his eccentricity unnerves the others as much as his incapability infuriates them. Unable to function in the world of operatives, Val represents the individual awash within the collective. He simply doesn't (won't?, can't?) play the game. Because Eh? is a comedy, he wins the immediate contest.

The outrageousness of the ending strikes me as something of a cop-out, but it is only one factor whereby the serious intention of Eh? sits uneasily in its nest of comedy. The play is really a constant surprise; just as you think you know what it's up to, it turns a new corner and you're lost again. But as Mr. Livings obviously believes in the salubrity of surprise, I won't question the play further on that point.

I do think that it must be produced with every concern for hilarity. Only if the action is uproariously funny will the audience overlook the fact that it really doesn't understand what's going on. The Cincinnati production, although generally good, tended to bog one down in the uncomfortable sense of how queer the play is.

The error lay in the direction, I think, which failed to integrate the play's disparate actions and which paced the action much too slow. A director has to contend with actors, of course, and a few in this company gave the impression that they couldn't have moved faster if director Melvin Bernhardt had snapped a whip. The speech, while admirably imitative of North Country English, tied up more than one tongue, and that also slowed things down. (I would like to see Eh? Americanized throughout for productions here; the regional locutions and topical references seriously diluted the impact of the play.)

Sam Waterston played Val with the youthful flair one expects of him, but his manner was somewhat light for the full articulation of the character. Although he succeeded in winning sympathy for Val, he didn't solve the main problem of the role: to integrate Val's disconnected, seemingly gratuitous outbursts into the characterization. But Mr. Waterston provided many delights, including a wonderfully facile movement that proceeded all in twitches and trembles.

Charles Cioffi was a superb Price, as one would expect of this impressive actor. Conveying the fullness of the gruff, pushy, but vulnerable character, Cioffi won good will for Price without alienating the audience from Val. Price is a beautiful character—Livings' best, I think—and it was a pleasure to see him done by Mr. Cioffi, who is a fine example of the young actor polishing his talent from the wide experience available in the burgeoning regional theatre. Among the other actors, I liked Linda Segal as Val's fiancée once I got used to her angular characterization. The production was cleverly designed for Cincinnati's tiny three-quarter stage by Douglas W. Schmidt, and Mr. Bernhardt made facile use of the area in blocking the complex action.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

Legalize Abortion
Humanitarians and libertarians desiring to take independent lawful action to quicken legalization of abortion are invited to contact:
LEGALIZE ABORTION
P.O.B. 24163, Los Angeles, Cal. 90024

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 9-19-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

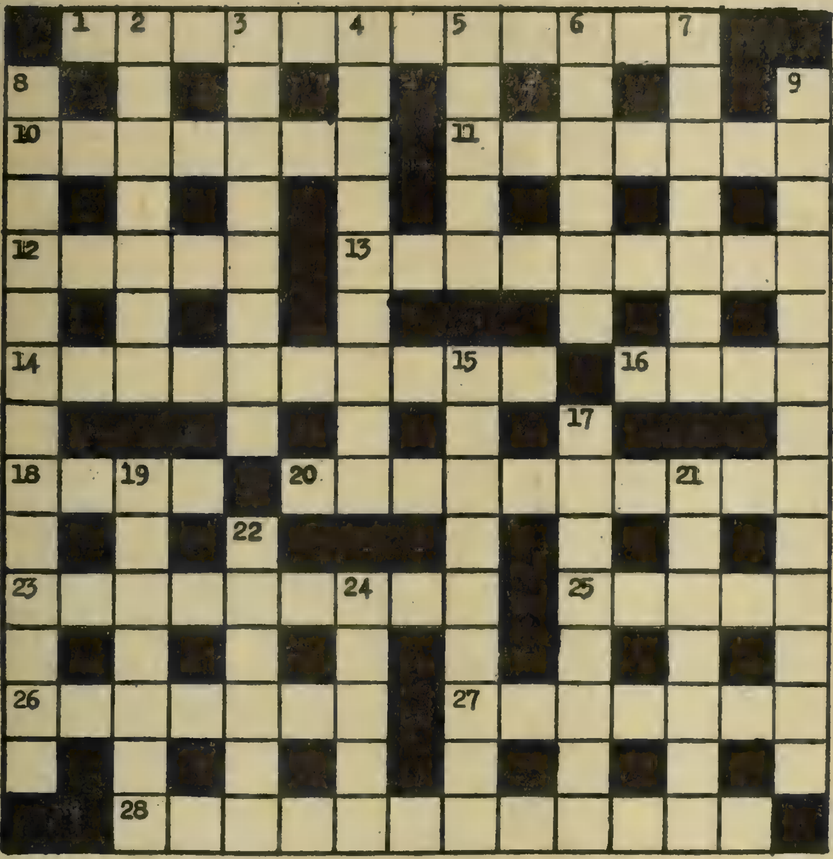
☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, [illegible]

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME ______
ADDRESS ______
CITY ______
STATE ______ ZIP NO. ______

Crossword Puzzle No. 1167

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 A fine lad in Ireland; Ireland rule is only relative! (7-2-3)
10 The half-size type, competing as the covetous might be. (7)
11 Bring back an animal boat in agreement with another animal. (7)
12 Evidently an occupied base of opera. (5)
13 The part of London where I throw a lot of weight. (9)
14 Where women pick up some of their habits. (5, 5)
16 Could be considered dead writing. (4)
18 Takes the starch out of fools, colloquially. (4)
20 and 7 down It might be suiting Schubert's work to get beaten. (10, 7)
23 Right there in some kind of trouble. (2, 3, 4)
25 Her early crossing may have been rough, but her newer vehicle ran very well. (5)
26 See 4 down
27 Things might turn on the way one carries himself. (7)
28 Not the ones lit by neon? (Their sentiments may be less dear, with less timely delivery.) (5, 7)

DOWN:

2 Bacon pronounced it a kind of wild justice. (7)
3 Spare property? (8)
4 and 26 across People eagerly competent, ready for a spin? (7, 2, 3, 4)
5 Press a sort of fruit with a soft center? (5)
6 Beating, or just tying? (6)
7 See 20 across
8 Movie travelogue featuring island dress? (7, 6)
9 For flag measurements, on the line? (8, 5)
15 Negative description, if good — and not too shocking! (9)
17 Former French D. C. native. (2-6)
19 A model of clever speech, right to the point. (7)
21 More like Ainu. (7)
22 Little Nancy takes little Margaret around the island. (6)
24 One in a secret plan — possibly the leader. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1166

ACROSS: 1 Source material; 9 Incites; 10 Radiant; 11 and 17 Clean-shaven; 12 Fineness; 14 Nursing; 15 Until; 19 Thorium; 21 In camera; 23 Shogun; 25 Eristic; 27 Deathless prose. DOWN: 1 Sailcloth; 2 Unclean; 3 Cut and run; 4 Must; 5 Tarkington; 6 Ridge; 7 Anapest; 8 Otis; 13 and 26 Historical present; 15 Uriah Heep; 16 Lorgnette; 18 Vaccine; 20 Magneto; 21 Ives; 22 Motet; 24 Apes.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address requests to Puzzle Dept., The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014

$2.95 each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF THE NATION

• Each file holds a full year's copies.

• Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.

• Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send check or money order.

MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

PUBLICATIONS

THE FIRST TIME I LIVE
by Will Slotnikoff
Discursive Introduction by Henry Miller
A romantic book about the writing of a book and the birth of a writer. Includes an exchange of letters with Henry Miller on the Creative Process in Action.
Paperback, $2.25 postpaid, 238 pp.
MANCHESTER LANE EDITIONS
1409 Nicholson St., N. W.
Washington 11, D.C.
Also available through Gotham Book Mart

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002

HOMOSEXUAL theme fiction, non-fiction listing available free. Trojan Book Service, Box 2121B, Philadelphia, Pa. 19103.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London. $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

Read THE TORTURE OF MOTHERS by Truman Nelson. Send $1. to: GARRISON PRESS, 15 Olive Street, Newburyport, Mass.

FOREIGN PAPERBACKS and Discount Books. Free lists. P. O. Box 767-J, San Leandro, California 94577.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

BUY YOUR BOOKS through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to The Nation.

Please address your orders to
THE NATION
Reader's Service Division
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

Composition by R.C.R. Publication Printers Corp., N.Y.C.

FREE!

With every new subscription to

THE NATION

THE FERVENT YEARS

by Harold Clurman, 302 pages; list price, $1.75

In this book, a classic in its field, The Nation's drama critic recalls the ideals, personalities, triumphs and errors behind the Group Theatre. That brilliant experiment in the American theatre brought together such then little-known talents as Lee Strasberg, Cheryl Crawford, Clifford Odets, Franchot Tone, Elia Kazan, John Garfield, Irwin Shaw; it produced such memorable and influential plays as Men in White, Johnny Johnson, Awake and Sing, My Heart's in the Highlands and Golden Boy. But beyond recapturing the excitement of those people and events, Mr. Clurman, himself a founder and director of the Group, has written one of the best social and intellectual histories of the 1930s—those tumultuous, tormented and fervent years that a new generation has just begun to discover with mounting pleasure and excitement.

> "Has the fascination of a novel. . . . Mr. Clurman's 'characters' . . . wander in and out of his pages as undraped as if, spiritually at least, they were at a nudist colony."
> —John Mason Brown
>
> "A tale of almost heroic struggle, of clashing vanities, of successes and mistakes, which will always have a place in the history of our stage."
> —Walter Pritchard Eaton, New York Herald Tribune
>
> "Light on the forces in the theatre and in the surrounding social and economic climate of the thirties that drew this wildly assorted collection of actors, directors, writers and eager aspirants into a vociferous effort to create a unity in which they could work and through which they might also live."
> —Theatre Arts

For your FREE copy of THE FERVENT YEARS, fill out subscription coupon below, and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of THE FERVENT YEARS.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME ____________________

ADDRESS ____________________

CITY ____________________ STATE ____________ ZIP No. ________

9-19-66

DRAGON TRAIN TO SINGAPORE WILLIAM EASTLAKE

THE NATION

SEPTEMBER 26, 1966 35 cents

SEP 23 1966

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.

THE AMERICAN NIGHTMARE

WHY WE FEAR PEASANTS IN REVOLT

BARRINGTON MOORE, JR.

THE INDIAN TESTS THE MAINSTREAM

D'ARCY McNICKLE

DEATH OF THE HERALD TRIBUNE

JAMES G. SMART

HAPPENING ON MADISON AVENUE

THE NEW WHITNEY

ERVIN GALANTAY

ADVENTURE IN PERU

EXPLORATIONS IN THE APOLITICAL

CLAYTON ESHLEMAN

S-22-67 PLS-801
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

NEWSPAPER I

LETTERS

good start

New York City

Dear Sirs: Ivor Kraft's article ["Head Start to What?," The Nation, Sept. 5] served to indicate that Mr. Kraft has never been in a slum. Indeed only the most naive would consider Head Start "a major means of salvaging Americans from poverty." Perhaps Shriver views Head Start in this way—but those running a Head Start program do not.

Mr. Kraft states that "we have no evidence that preschool contributes anything essential or particularly valuable to the child's development. . . ." Nowhere does he mention the role of parent education or parent and community participation in a Head Start project. Nowhere does he mention the role of the family workers, the family assistants ("indigenous workers"—yes, Mr. Kraft, probably some of those "welfare workers") who set up sewing and carpentry classes in the evening, who hike up and down stairways visiting, talking with parents, getting them interested and involved, or referring them if necessary to the project's social worker (God forbid!) or psychiatrist or psychologist.

If Head Start is a good project, it is much more than a kindergarten. Such a project can serve as a basis for organizing and mobilizing a slum community, and maybe saving some of the people in it. . . .

John Hill, Glickenhaus Workshop surface trap

Toronto, Canada

Dear Sirs: After watching the Minnesota Theatre Company production of The Dance of Death, Julius Novick concludes [The Nation, Sept. 5] that Strindberg's play is not really good. But from watching a production of that same play this summer at the Avon Theatre in Stratford, Canada, a theatregoer reaches exactly the opposite conclusion.

Having seen both productions, I suggest that Mr. Novick has fallen into the familiar trap for imperceptive critics of confusing the performance with the text. In simple fact, the actors at the Tyrone Guthrie Theatre and their director only scratched the surface of things. . . . In Stratford, where a group of actors repeated, in English, a production first given by them in French in Montreal . . . there was no doubt of the characters' reality, the intensity and enormity of the conflict between husband and wife, above all no doubt of the excellence of the play.

Nathan Cohen, Theatre Critic, Toronto Star living off the surplus

New York City

Dear Sirs: In his review of several publications on the New Left [The Nation, July 4] James O'Connor asserts that "for the first time in the history of any society, the economic surplus in contemporary America exceeds necessary costs of production. . . ." But however "economic surplus" may be defined, has surplus, small or large, not always exceeded necessary costs of production? Mr. O'Connor claims that many people today live off the surplus which, he suggests, raises the probability that the struggle between the "propertied and propertyless" must be pursued on basically different lines than labor conflict of the past. On what lines? The most basic fact of capitalism—the enormous inequality in the distribution of income, which Marx's concept of surplus value so masterfully explains—has not changed; if anything, the inequality may have become even greater than before. . . .

Otto Nathan

EDITORIALS

The 'Election'

The polling in South Vietnam on September 11 was a demonstration, not an election. In the September 13 World Journal Tribune, Bob Considine quoted a high-ranking American source in Saigon in a candid appraisal: "The people clearly decided that, in any contest between the government and the VC, they favored the government because it had more clout." (Italics added.) He should, of course, have limited his observation to the areas controlled by the Ky government. If an election were declared in areas where the Vietcong collect taxes, draft men, punish defection and are in effect the government, the people would as readily turn out at their behest and vote for their candidates.

There are other reasons for discounting the bipartisan elation that has greeted the surge of voters to the polls. Contrary to the impression created here that they were tasting the joys of democracy for the first time, they have been subjected to eleven elections prior to this one. In August of 1963, some 92 per cent of the electorate went to the polls to express their enthusiasm for Ngo Dinh Diem, a heavier turn-out than the 80.8 per cent which has made Nguyen Cao Ky so happy. The American press reported the results of the 1963 election with the same joy it has shown for the current test of strength, but soon thereafter Diem was on the skids and no one tried to save him except Madame Nhu.

The Ky government began to prepare for the test months ago. The techniques were described in detail by Robert Keatley in The Wall Street Journal (September 9). The aim was to raise what one analyst called the "anxiety level" of the people. Military commands were ordered to conduct a whispering campaign to the effect that "refusal to vote will someday cause a loss of civil rights." This was probably less of a threat than the impression that somehow, soon, citizens would be in trouble if they did not show up at the polls to select someone. Whom they selected was of little importance, since all the candidates had been hand-picked by the military. All VC sympathizers, neutralists, dissenters, et al., had been ruled off beforehand. Anti-Ky hard liners had been jailed with the suppression of the Buddhist campaign in the spring. The Ky government in Saigon, and the Johnson government in Washington, had nothing to lose and something to gain.

No issues were presented to the voters. The election, so-called, was totally nonpolitical. Among some 4.25 million voters it is likely that after twenty years of carnage a substantial number would have much preferred to cast their ballots against the American presence in Vietnam, but they could vote only for candidates whose lives depended on the American presence. Under these conditions, it was stupid for the Vietcong to contest the election by terror. In the government-controlled areas they could not succeed, and the conditions of the election could have been allowed to speak for themselves.

The military are now in a position to cloak themselves in legitimacy—how spurious it is does not matter. They are probably assured of control for a year or more. The assembly can convert itself into a parliament by so providing in the constitution it is to write, but the members do not have anything resembling a free hand—Ky and the generals saw to that. The military can offer any number of amendments to the constitution. Such amendments will take effect unless voted down by a two-thirds majority. The military have firm control of all but a handful of the delegates, so there is no possibility that the situation will get out of hand. Besides, if the debate becomes too lively and someone forgets his proper role, they can always resort to real muscle. This is Vietnam.

FEB 19

Beyond these immediate results, a thin ray of hope may be discerned. There is always danger in pretending to democracy—it may engender a desire for the real thing. Unless Ky and Johnson can produce a quick, decisive military victory (and the odds against that are little influenced by the results of the election) the yearning for peace will continue to rise, except, of course, among the direct beneficiaries of the war. As one diplomat put it, no one can tell at this juncture whether the assembly will function as a safety valve, which was Ky's intention in agreeing to an election, or as a pressure cooker. If the latter, the generals will have to dismantle it. But that would be a setback which might prove disastrous. On the other hand, even a slight measure of free speech could be dangerous. The generals and their American colleagues have gained something, but how much, and for how long, remains to be seen.

Secret Research at Universities

The question of whether universities should accept government grants to engage in classified research of a military character needs to be clarified. Such contracts are tempting. Financially they may be of substantial benefit to the university, and they are eagerly sought by career-minded professors, some of whom are more interested in research than in teaching. The less pleasant aspect of this academic opulence is that at some undetermined level of secrecy the institution ceases to be a university and becomes an adjunct of the military.

Faculties have become increasingly uneasy on this issue. It has been heatedly but inconclusively debated at Stanford. Recent action at the University of Pennsylvania holds out hope of advancing the discussion. Pennsylvania has come under faculty criticism for its involvement in research dealing with chemical and biological warfare. Now it has announced a new policy. Existing contracts for classified work will not be canceled, but a committee of eight will be set up to screen proposals. Four members will be selected by the university senate, four by the president; the eight will select a chairman. The guiding principle will be to avoid contracts that limit publication of the results of the research. This is calculated to rule out work dealing exclusively with weapons and seems like a step forward.

However, in a letter to The New York Times, Herbert J. Spiro, professor of political science at Pennsylvania, raises a good point. The Pennsylvania policy, as stated by President Gaylord P. Harnwell, is that "the results of all research must be freely publishable." Professor Spiro points out that publication may be a side issue. For a variety of reasons — decorum, consideration for living persons, scholarly cau-

IN THIS ISSUE

September 26, 1966

EDITORIALS

266

ARTICLES

270 Death of the Herald Tribune
James G. Smart

271 The American Nightmare:
Why We Fear Peasants in Revolt
Barrington Moore, Jr.

275 The Indian Tests the Mainstream
D'Arcy McNickle

280 Latin America V:
Economic Integration for Progress
Federico G. Gil

283 Dragon Train to Singapore
William Eastlake

BOOKS & THE ARTS

285 Explorations in the Apolitical
Clayton Eshleman

286 Like Swinburne to Sappho (poem)
Raymond Roseliep

287 A Class of Tormented Creoles
Gordon K. Lewis

288 Góngora Without Gongorism
Oliver T. Myers

289 Freedom's High-Water Mark
Frank J. Donner

291 Dying Like A True Rebel
Paul Cowan

292 Architecture
Ervin Galantay

294 The Landlord (poem)
Stephen Parker

295 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher
ANNE C. ABRAMOVITZ Assistant

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 203
No. 9

tion — researchers, including those in the humanities and politics, may choose to defer publication or not to publish at all. Their obligation is to promote the development of knowledge and, while publication is certainly an important means to that end, it is not the only one. Do we need to be reminded that teaching also promotes the development of knowledge?

Broadly, the development of knowledge is always a collegial process, and it is hindered when the university becomes the guardian of classified material and obligates itself to apply nonacademic standards, such as national security criteria, to its collegium. Those scholars—engineering professors, for instance—whose hearts are set on military research have a simple remedy. They can resign from the university and work for the military services directly, or for arms contractors. They will sacrifice job security, of course, but surely that is a minor consideration.

Spiro feels that academic integrity can best be maintained by establishing safeguards on the input side of research contracts rather than at the output. This is the Harvard policy. As stated by McGeorge Bundy (when he was dean) before the Senate Committee on Government Operations, except in time of all-out war, Harvard has engaged only in "open research on basic subjects," has avoided engagement in secret government research, and has declined to "accept responsibility for the administration of security clearances of any kind." This is clear-cut, and other universities would do well to follow Harvard's lead.

Backlash in the Bay State

Politics can make not only strange bedfellows but some pretty strange beds as well. Ex-Governor Endicott H. Peabody appears to have won the Massachusetts Democratic primary for Senator by being more agile than his principal rival, former Boston Mayor John Collins, at avoiding the major local issue of school desegregation. In view of Peabody's vigorous support of civil rights in the past, his failure to declare himself in this area may at first glance have seemed surprising.

But a possible reason is easy to surmise. The biggest vote getter in the Boston area for some time has been School Committee Chairman Louise Day Hicks, an implacable foe of integration, school busing, or any other gesture to redress the racial imbalance in quality of schooling, which Boston shares with other major cities. By his silence, Peabody wooed and won Mrs. Hicks's backlash vote.

Now he will have to change beds rather quickly. His Republican opponent, Edward Brooke, would, if elected, become the first Negro in the U.S. Senate since Reconstruction days. Whether he has other qualifications seems beside the point; in Massachusetts he is a showpiece of racial tolerance—a role he has played most gracefully as the state's attorney general.

The only exception to the bedfellow aphorism in this sad campaign was Thomas Boylston Adams. He ran principally as a "peace" candidate (we sometimes wonder if those who use that phrase pejoratively really consider peace a fringe issue), and was the only one of the three aspirants to express himself forthrightly on all the major issues. A political newcomer, he captured nearly 10 per cent of the vote.

Johnson and His Jewish Critics

It was a strange and disturbing story that American Jews read on the eve of the Jewish New Year. The President, they were told, could not understand why many prominent Jews were among the critics of his Vietnamese policy. One reason given for the President's mystification was that he knew Jews to be moral, compassionate and well informed in foreign affairs. This would seem rather to account for opposition to an inhuman course of action, as many Americans, Jews and non-Jews, have come to regard the Johnson policy in Southeast Asia. But to the President anti-communism justifies any and all measures, and since American Jews are predominantly anti-Communist, his feeling is that they should go along with him and not raise questions. More than that, the President was represented as feeling that Jews should be especially eager to have the United States fulfill commitments to small nations like South Vietnam, since they had a natural interest in the welfare of another small nation—Israel.

The first question is whether the President was accurately quoted, as in the story which appeared in the September 11 New York Times, beginning, "President Johnson had another opportunity this week to raise with Jewish visitors one of his persistent plaints about some members of the American Jewish community." The visitors were Malcolm A. Tarlov of Norwalk, Conn., the new national commander of the Jewish War Veterans, and several associates. After a vigorous debate at the national convention in August, the Jewish War Veterans had voted in favor of the U.S. Vietnamese policy and the delegation came to assure the President of this support. They came away, the story went on, determined "to persuade Jews that they could not expect the United States to live up to its commitments to Israel if they opposed respect for much more explicit commitments in Southeast Asia."

This blunt statement caused anxiety both in Israel and among American Jews. It seemed not only to question their right to differ with the President on a crucial question of foreign policy but it carried the implication of arm twisting, with Israel used for increased leverage. In a follow-up story by Max Frankel in the Times of September 13, Dr. William A. Wexler and Rabbi Jay Kaufman, president and executive vice president, respectively, of B'nai B'rith, reported that they had seen Mr. Johnson at the White House on September 10 and had found no justification for such an inference. The President was either misunderstood or poorly interpreted by other Jewish visitors, they said.

As far as Mr. Tarlov is concerned, the President was not misunderstood or poorly interpreted. Mr. Tarlov told The Nation on September 13 that the Times story of September 11 was correct. Mr. Johnson had held a press conference at which Mr. Frankel was present, he had said substantially what the story reported, and subsequently he had not retracted or qualified it.

That the President has been employing this tactic for some time can also be substantiated. Back in June, Marianne Means, a columnist for the Los Angeles Herald Express, reported that Mr. Johnson was speaking out on Vietnam in increasingly blunt, aggressive terms. As an example, Miss Means reported that, speaking to a friend, Mr. Johnson had remarked that he could not understand why those who were interested in another small country (Israel) that we were also protecting should be so critical of our policy in Vietnam. The friend was a wealthy Jewish businessman from New York. The President had related this conversation to a group of state legislators meeting in the Rose Garden.

Ambassador Arthur J. Goldberg is now using his good offices to smooth the matter over, if possible. He will hardly be able to remove the bad taste that the affair leaves in one's mouth. What Mr. Johnson has said publicly on this subject, not merely what others reported him to have said, is, as Senator Javits characterized it on N.B.C. September 14, truly "deplorable." And what he has said publicly—as to the state legislators in the Rose Garden—tends to confirm what Mr. Tarlov quotes him as having said privately. Because an issue has now been made of what the President has said, more is needed than private assurances relayed by Ambassador Goldberg. The President himself should confirm or deny the remarks attributed to him and he should then clarify what he intended to convey by these remarks. The best answer to Mr. Johnson was given by Dr. Abraham Joshua Heschel, professor at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America and an outspoken opponent of the Vietnamese war. Said Dr. Heschel: "If Abraham had no hesitation about challenging the judgment of God over Sodom and Gomorrah, lest it should sweep away the innocent with the guilty, should not an American have the right to challenge the judgment of our President when horrified by the war in Vietnam?"

The Limits of Horror

The New York Film Festival, now in its fourth season, has established itself as the opening non-event of the city's cultural season. It is that because the core of its offering, embellished with attractive shorts and glamorous personal appearances, is a group of foreign films which are in any case scheduled for early showing in New York and elsewhere. Offering them in a package at Philharmonic Hall produces an aura of excitement, much as does the annual showing of new car models at the Coliseum. It is probably good for the future box office of these pictures to be screened at Lincoln Center, but a showcase is not a festival.

An exception to the above this year was the American première of The War Game, made by Peter Watkins for the B.B.C. but suppressed by that agency as being too gruesome for the home screen. The festival screening may win the picture a theatre run in this country.

It is worth seeing, but perhaps more as a tour de force than as a warning. The form of the picture is a screened feature story — what is called in America a TV special — on the events leading up to and following for some weeks upon a Russian nuclear attack on Great Britain. The footage intersperses scenes of terror, destruction, crime, shock and hideous pain with official instructions and observations (used for maximum irony) from the world's spiritual leaders on the morality or necessity of war. It is certainly a harrowing fifty minutes. More important, it is utterly convincing: your eyes assure you that these frightful scenes could not have been faked, and you must rely on your mind to remind you that only cameramen with the gift of prophecy could have been so consistently at the right place at the right time (and immune to the devastation). Orson Welles was an amateur at this sort of electronic trickery.

But that it would have "awakened" the British public if the B.B.C. had dared to broadcast it is another question. Oddly enough, for all its excruciating detail and atmosphere of general devastation, the film is essentially hopeful. And that is because it must make certain basic assumptions in order to tell its story. It must assume that the B.B.C. withstands the attack, that enough of the forms of society are preserved for the camera teams to do their jobs, that survivors with intact receivers remain in sufficient numbers and in a state of sufficient sanity to make the broadcast worth while.

With sinking heart, one realizes that this picture is projecting the very kind of aftermath that Herman Kahn and the other high priests of the war game predict: yes indeed, a nuclear attack would be highly unpleasant, but civilization would survive (or, as this film suggests, Anglican priests would still pray over the condemned and Holy Night would be heard on Christmas Eve). And television itself has a softening effect on any horror: by the time you see it, it is over, and—more important—it didn't happen to you. The film never suggests what anyone looking at it might have done to prevent such ghastliness, and it evades the fact that an atomic attack on an industrially advanced country means quite simply annihilation. It projects a major disaster which is different in size but not in nature from, say, the bombing of Dresden or a volcanic eruption. It could not project the total deadliness of atomic warfare; that is something a man must evoke for himself in the sleepless hours of the night.

Condon for Regent

Colorado is in a position to honor itself, and advance its own comparative standing in the field of higher education, by choosing Dr. Edward U. Condon as a regent of the University of Colorado.

The post is elective and partisan, and Dr. Condon is running as a Democrat. Dr. Condon was formerly Director of the U.S. Bureau of Standards and scientific adviser to the special U.S. Senate committee which approved the bill establishing the Atomic Energy Commission. He is a world-famous physicist, recipient of many honors at the hands of his fellows, among them the presidency of the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

As president of the Colorado Scientific Development Commission established by the state legislature in 1966, he is leading the effort to bring the proposed $375 million National Accelerator laboratory to Colorado, where the state has offered a capacious site near Denver and other scientific facilities such as the National Center for Atmospheric Research.

Seldom has a person so active and able in science offered himself for a policy post in state education, and seldom has a state had such a chance to show the nation that it is in earnest in honoring and promoting the cause of higher education. The University of Colorado has a fine reputation among state universities; lack of means in a state of comparatively small population is perhaps the main reason why it isn't automatically mentioned among the foremost. A Condon on its board might make the difference.

Death of the Herald Tribune

JAMES G. SMART
Mr. Smart is an associate professor of history at Keene (N.H.) State College.

The death of the New York Herald Tribune, a fairly recent convert to some popular causes, was nonetheless not surprising. Reading habits change slowly, and the Herald Tribune had for too many years been the spokesman for conservatism and a too reluctant champion of underprivileged humanity. The result was a continually shrinking circulation, which usually means a decline in advertising; and without ads a paper cannot function.

The original Tribune, under its founder and first editor Horace Greeley, was the symbol of popular causes. It was that identification with suffering and struggling humanity that made both Greeley and the Tribune great. One could, and many did, make fun of Greeley for his socialism, his Fourierism, his spiritism, his vegetarianism and all the other isms with which he was connected. All his experiments, however, even when put together in conflicting array, could no more hide his general identification with the people than they could hide his exceptional talent as editor.

Greeley's interest in the West—"Go West, Young Man," the founding of Greeley, Colo.—was a manifestation of his concern for the underprivileged; people could better themselves in a region of greater opportunity. His Weekly Tribune carried a large section devoted to the problems of Western farmers, and the most authoritative agriculturists of the day contributed to it. The paper attained an unprecedented rural subscription of 200,000. No other paper could come within 150,000 of "Uncle Horace's Try-bune," the "Bible of the West." At Greeley's death, many newspapers commented on the number of poor people who paid their last respects to the humanitarian editor.

A short time afterward the Tribune abandoned popular causes for causes of wealthy, well-educated gentlemen like Whitelaw Reid, who became owner, publisher and editor of the paper after Greeley's death in 1872. Reid was talented and a hard worker. He was offered the editorship of The Nation in 1865, but chose carpetbagging in Louisiana instead. He was only 35 when he assumed control of the Tribune, but he had already spent his liberalism. An antislavery man in the 1850s and 1860s, he had decided by 1870 that Negro citizenship was a failure, should be called such, and that the South should be governed by its prewar and Civil War leadership. For the remainder of his long life he directed the Tribune to a vigorous, if monotonous, defense of conservative ideas, both social and financial.

Reid's actions confirmed the sincerity of his ideas, and no action was more to the point than his long battle with "Big Six," the typographical union founded by Greeley. The battle lasted fifteen years. Though Reid had to give in by 1892 because he was then Vice Presidential candidate on the Republican ticket, the struggle could hardly be considered a union victory. The battle was so protracted and filled with such hatred that the rancor caused by it would take a long time in dying. Perhaps it never died.

Reid began to struggle with "Big Six" in 1877, which was the fourth year of a six-year depression. He had already cut wages twice, which amounted to about a 20 per cent reduction. He had not thought of reducing them further until a slave-driving foreman named William P. Thompson came along. He promised a $680 per month saving in wages. It was enough for Reid, who fired his old foreman and hired Thompson. Scab labor and police were lined up in advance of the announcement for wage reductions so that there was no violence or interruption in publication. Reid's economic gains were impressive. After the first week of the strike Reid kept nearly $675 that would have gone to compositors' wages under the old contracts. "After we got these figures," Reid wrote friend Royal Phelps, "came the semi-annual meeting of our stockholders," to which it was a "pleasant feature" to report a "net profit of forty odd thousand dollars for the past six months, with good prospects of making better for the next six."

The first phase of the strike lasted six years, until 1883 when Reid went to his home in Ohio to visit friends and relatives. While he was away, the scab workers joined the union and forced demands on Thompson, who did not appear very brave in the absence of his employer. But Reid soon found cause for breaking the union contract; more scabs were recruited, the police were again notified, and four weeks later Reid kicked "Big Six" out of his offices. The strike against the Tribune was on again, this time for nine more years.

The paper had lost its catholic appeal and no longer even tried to identify itself with anyone it considered lower class. When in 1877 laborers complained that their children cried for bread, the paper's Bourbon-like answer was: "Now the man whose children cry for bread, when he is earning even one dollar a day, spends money in other ways and neglects his children." Really, the editorial concluded, "there is no end to the desires of men" (issue of July 24, 1877).

After its defeat in 1883, "Big Six" founded its own newspaper, The Boycotter, which had death "to the most pronounced opponent of the workingmen of America, the New York Tribune," as its sole purpose. The Boycotter claimed that 75,000 workers supported its actions against the Tribune. Reid was a close friend of James G. Blaine, Presidential nominee in 1884, and the very existence of The Boycotter was an embarrassment to the politically sensitive Blaine. Reid would not settle the strike for all of Blaine's pleading. "Big Six" had the satisfaction of believing it held the votes that defeated Blaine, for 1,200 votes in New York City alone would have given him the Presidency.

Shortly after "Big Six" struck in 1877, Reid had to uphold his circulation by a political deal with Boss Thomas C. Platt. The agreement was that Reid would treat Platt's friend, machine politician Roscoe Conkling, "fairly" and Platt would see that his political machine pushed sales, and even subsidized sales, of the Tribune as good Republican campaign literature. The Western circulation that Greeley built up had rapidly disappeared (due in part, it must be admitted, to a youthful and vigorous Western press) and by the early 1880s the Herald surpassed the Tribune in circulation. William Walter Phelps, another close friend of Reid, wrote in 1880 that he had seen only one reference to the Tribune in Europe and added: "But that is the only sign since New York of the Tribune's existence, for it's Herald everywhere. The Captain of the S.S. [Steamship], the travellers on it, the clubs and hotels here all have [the] Herald & nothing else."

Reid was able to keep up political deals and thus the circulation as long as he was actively editing the paper. When he retired in the first decade of the 20th century, he had to help finance the Tribune from his own personal fortune. After Reid's death in 1912—which was not noted for the number of poor people who paid their last respects—the paper was carried on by Reid's able son and daughter-in-law, Ogden and Helen Rogers Reid. The merger in 1924 with the Herald was successful; and the old Trib had another chance. But in World War II the temptation to make money, even at the sacrifice of its readers, was, as in the days of Thompson, overpowering. Newsprint was rationed. The Herald Tribune decided to use available space for ads and sacrifice the news content. Those interested in more details of the war had to consult the Times. The Times pulled ahead and the Tribune was never able to catch up.

A history of the Tribune, and the later Herald Tribune, would not explain the breakdown of negotiations in mid-August, 1966, between "Big Six" and other unions on one side, and Messrs. Whitney, Thayer, et al., on the other side; but the union's suffering and defeats of the past, and the paper's long alienation from the causes of humanity, are factors that must be taken into consideration when discussing the death of old "Uncle Horace's Try-bune."

THE AMERICAN NIGHTMARE

Why We Fear Peasants in Revolt

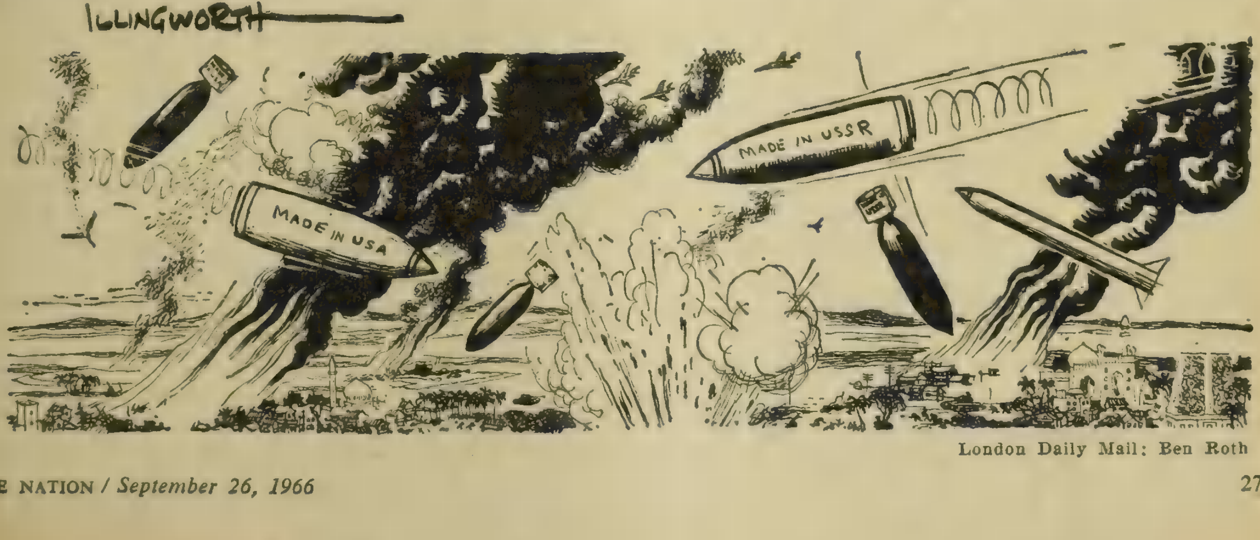
BARRINGTON MOORE, JR.

Mr. Moore is a senior research fellow at the Russian Research Center, and a lecturer on sociology at Harvard University. His Social Origins of Dictatorship and Democracy: Lord and Peasant in the Making of the Modern World will be published by Beacon Press in October.

Not so long ago, it was possible to claim that the United States, for all its shortcomings, was at least trying to solve the main problems of the 20th century without resort to massive cruelty against its own population or that of other countries. This seemed to be the characteristic that most sharply distinguished American democracy from totalitarian regimes and even from those European democracies that held remnants of a colonial empire. If the American capitalist machine showed some tendency to charge around out of control, at least like no other in history it had solved the problems of pressing material want.

Meanwhile, in response to popular demands, the government from time to time took measures, so it appeared, to bring the capitalist machine under control and soften very considerably its impact upon its victims. Intelligent people knew that America had an ugly race problem, but there was obvious, if painfully slow, progress in that area too. Slums, billboards and television furnished America's critics with an ugly and depressing spectacle. Yet it seemed that the ugliness, perhaps even some of the continuing injustices, might be a price worth paying for a society that attacked its problems without deliberate cruelty. By moving slowly, and it was hoped steadily, the United States had at the very least avoided the fate of Nazi Germany, of Stalinist Russia.

With the first Cuban crisis this comforting view of America's behavior in the world began to seem dubious. It became apparent then that the United States would use its military power to try to crush regimes that made revolutionary demands for a better life, if it deemed these regimes a threat to its own interests. Vietnam and a number of other related events, among them American action in Guatemala, the Dominican Republic and Brazil, revealed the United States as the military bastion of counterrevolution, willing and able to rain fire upon those made impatient by hunger. So far, the main victims of the American way of life have not been Americans (though our casualty lists are beginning to grow). They are foreigners, but they are victims of

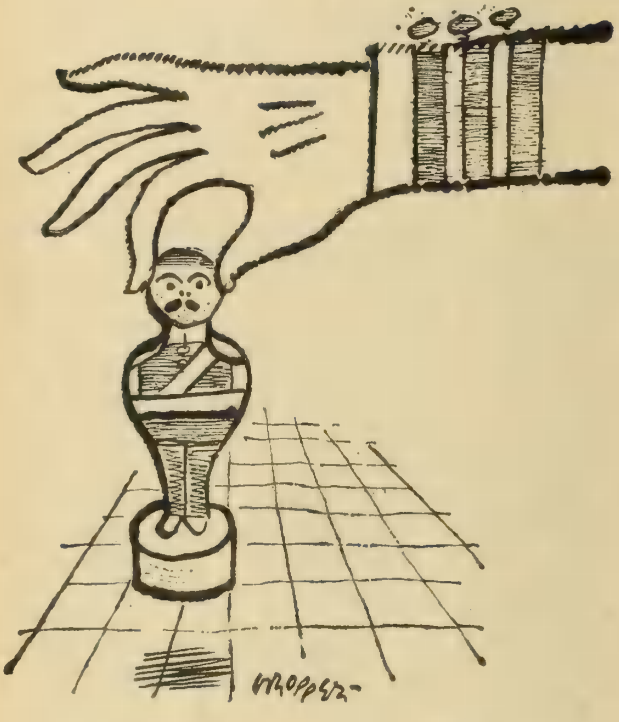


London Daily Mail: Ben Roth

American policy in exactly the sense that the inhabitants of concentration camps were the victims of Stalinist policy.

How has this come about? The key lies, I believe, in the great wave of peasant revolutions that has swept the world in the past half-century as part of the still larger sweep of post-capitalist industrialization, and in the American decision to resist that wave with armed might.

After the Russian Revolution, and even more after the Chinese Revolution, it became impossible to speak in neo-Marxist terms about the idiocy of rural life or to regard the peasant as a mere object of history, something acted upon by historical forces but contributing nothing to them. Nevertheless, it remains true that the main contribution of the peasants to these great events was a destructive one. Agrarian distress furnished the explosive that brought down the old order in both Russia and China, and enabled the Communists to usher in a new phase of history. To the work of constructing a new social order the peasants have been allowed to contribute little or nothing. Instead they have been its major victims.



Furthermore, the peasants' role has differed sharply from one country to another in accord with varying historical conditions. In Russia, still overwhelmingly agrarian in 1917, the peasants' part in the overthrow of the old order was immense. At the same time, the Bolsheviks had no following among the peasants and came to power on the backs of a segment of the industrial workers whose revolts in the big cities brought about the final collapse. Chinese Communists took power in a manner much closer to a pure peasant revolution. And in other cases, the peasants have not risen, though they had reason. In India, the peasant has remained mainly an object of history. Japan made the transition to a version of modern industrial capitalism without a peasant revolution, indeed without any violent revolution.

Because of the present tendency to regard Japanese industrialization as a success story, and for even more important reasons, it is necessary to look at this case more closely. In straight economic terms Japan's nonrevolutionary entrance into the age of industrial capitalism was indeed a remarkable success. So for that matter was the corresponding entrance that Germany made, after the abortive revolution of 1848. Politically, however, these victories may have been disasters, leading in time to fascism and World War II. Without claiming that the march toward fascism was inevitable, one can trace a connection between the survival of pre-industrial social formations and political habits, the corresponding weakness of the bourgeois impulse, and the ways in which Germany, Japan and other countries succumbed to fascism. Comparative historical evidence is not firm proof; nevertheless, it is suggestive that the three states where parliamentary democracy became most firmly established, England, France and the United States, went through a period of revolution (or civil war; the distinction is mainly verbal).

On the basis of this record it is possible to draw two conclusions. First, the widespread notion that a revolution is somehow a prerequisite to industrial growth is false. Before one can draw comfort from this point, however, it is necessary to take account of its corollary: for modernization to mean progress in human freedom a revolutionary break with the past seems to be necessary. Again, one cannot prove the necessity; one can only note connections between what has taken place with and without revolutions. Nor does a revolution guarantee success in establishing a freer society; it only creates some of the possibilities. However, with these limitations and qualifications it is correct, I believe, to regard the peasant revolutions of the 20th century as the successors to and even the continuation of revolutionary processes that established Western democracy.

The main propelling force behind modern peasant revolutions is often called parasitic landlordism. Political landlordism might be a better term because it suggests more clearly the central features. Over most of the Asian continent the native landed upper classes did not take up commercial agriculture. Their response to the coming of the modern world was almost the exact opposite of the one familiar to Americans, i.e., increased use of machines, bigger units of cultivation, a sharp reduction in human toil. In China and India, Western imperialism helped to prevent this kind of transformation, but geographical factors and social structures inherited from the past were almost certainly much more important reasons.

Throughout Asia the landlord antedates the coming of the West. Rising population, together with a lack of opportunities for work in the cities, under Asian conditions forces more and more land-hungry peasants to bid for the right to cultivate smaller and smaller plots of land. Where this happens, the landed upper classes are strongly tempted to avoid risky innovations, to sit back and allow the pressure of events to drive up their rents. In order to take advantage of this situation they must employ political levers, including customary sanctions inherited from earlier days, to keep the peasants working and paying. As traditional sanctions gradually lose their effectiveness, the landlords resort more and more to the police and the army until the government becomes little more than a vast rent-collecting agency, as was finally the case under Chiang Kai-shek.

The misery produced by political landlordism is obvious; almost as obvious is the fact that by itself such misery will not produce a revolutionary outbreak. In the past century the Indian peasants have suffered just about as much in a strict material sense as did the peasants of China. But in comparison with the Chinese peasant the Indian peasant has been docile. There is at least moderately good evidence that this difference extends far back in time. Some types of society and historical experience are likely to generate peasant revolts and eventually to favor a peasant revolution; others are quite unlikely to do so.

Among the factors most apt to be relevant are the social structure of the peasant community and the character of the institutional links between the peasants and the upper classes who live off their labor. Partly because the Japanese village was a solidary unit that muffled dissident voices among the peasants at the same time that it was penetrated by many influences from the upper classes, the Japanese were able to make political landlordism into one of the devices for what Marxists call primitive capitalist accumulation. The Japanese Government could make the peasants pay the costs of industrialization and still contain revolutionary tendencies, a feat that helped to produce the Japanese variant of fascism. In India, the caste system was the main mechanism through which the landed upper classes extracted an economic surplus from the countryside. Caste rendered a central government unnecessary from the standpoint of local elites; it was an excrescence and the product of intermittent conquest. In China, the central government did play an essential role in shaping the social order and extracting a surplus, and the different functions of government in China and India help to explain differences in the behavior of their respective peasant masses. To sum up these variations, although political landlordism has been a basic trend in many part of the world, it has produced major revolutionary upheavals only in Russia and China.

At least that is the case so far. Will the revolutionary wave continue? I do not know enough about the other underdeveloped parts of the world—Latin America, Africa, the Middle East—to speak with confidence. Still, there are persuasive general grounds for believing that the revolutionary wave may have passed its peak. Just as generals often base their strategy on the previous war, so may Chinese Communists now base their hopes and strategies on their earlier victory. The economically backward parts of the world today, including India, are politically and socially fragmented. This may mean that a revolution, even if it succeeded, would have vastly less world significance than did the revolutions in such potentially powerful countries as Russia and China. A revolution in Cuba is mainly important for Cuba; a revolution in Algeria important for Algeria, though of course there is some resonance.

Why then is the American Government quite literally trying to burn these revolutionary movements off the face of the earth? There are three possible answers. The first, accepted by both the Administration and its radical critics, is that these movements constitute, along with Chinese power, a mortal threat to American capitalism. A second possible answer holds that these revolutionary movements do not constitute a really serious threat, and that the moves to exterminate them are monstrous irrationalities of American policy. These aggressive reflexes can be interpreted either as a manifestation inherent in modern American capitalist society (as the radical critics say), or—and this is the third answer—as policies whose real causes are in large measure contingent and accidental.

An absolutely clear-cut choice among these answers is impossible. Though the weight of evidence points toward the conclusion that American policy is by no means the inevitable expression of American society, and that the threat it faces is no mortal one at all, there is small comfort to be had here. The longer these policies continue in force, the more will American society become dependent upon its counterrevolutionary role. Since there is no now foreseeable prospect that these policies will change, the radical image of the United States—despite any flaws in its analysis—is likely to become the correct one.

To dispute one version of the radical thesis, it seems highly unlikely that American capitalism depends upon imperialist exploitation. In particular, the American stake in the exploitation of backward areas of the world is probably far from crucial. It is well known that the advanced capitalist countries are one another's best customers. Though figures on these matters are far from dependable, the estimate of the French economist Robert Frossaert that imperialist superprofits form no more than 1 or 2 per cent of the national income of advanced capitalist countries helps us gain a perspective on the question.

May the revolutionary movements, on the other hand, be no more than preliminary skirmishes in a straightforward military threat from China? But the United States is desperately trying to establish vital interests close to China rather than to defend interests it already has. Under the conditions of warfare in the missile age, when the United States has bases on Guam and in the Philippines and a fleet of Polaris submarines, the notion that Americans need another base in Vietnam is hard to swallow.

But the fact that it is difficult, if not impossible, to explain American policy through any narrow conception of economic or strategic interests is not a powerful counter-argument to the radical thesis. If anything, it strengthens the most tenable of the radical arguments: that modern American society is inherently destructive. Behind such reasonings, too, are certain currents of Marxist thought. Baran and Sweezy, for example, conclude that American monopoly capitalism precludes any humane and constructive use of America's productive power that would go beyond mere sops to keep the underlying population in line with prevailing policies. To a non-economist their present diagnosis does not look very different from that of many liberal economists who have discussed the causes of stagnation in 20th-century capitalism. The key point is that under modern conditions the big firms have difficulty finding ways to reinvest their profits. (That this is not the case at the present moment does not damage the general argument.) Unlike the liberals, however, Marxists hold that no real solution is possible within the present framework of American society. Since serious constructive moves are blocked by the character of the system and the dominant interests it serves, the technological power that it nevertheless creates pours out in destructive ways: war and waste.

It is possible to agree with this radical description and condemnation of American society without being sure that the diagnosis of the causes is correct. A glance at the historical record is enough to raise serious doubts. Up to a point, the Marxist argument makes sense, but at a crucial point it collapses.

The Second World War, it is widely agreed, pulled capitalism out of the depression. Fascism too, one can argue, was in part a consequence of capitalism, though in my judgment, and for the reasons given earlier, a particular form of capitalism that had grown up as a result of a non-revolutionary entrance into the age of modern industry. This feature modifies the Marxist thesis considerably, though one still must agree that the Second World War saved democratic capitalism from the embarrassing task of having to find out if it could solve its own problems peacefully. Since then the United States has been almost continuously in some form of war boom. In The Postwar American Economy, Alvin Hansen, certainly no Marxist, asserts that between 1948 and 1963 "defense played twice as powerful an expansionist role as private investment." Clearly the economy was sick, and the war boom has been the main "cure."

The question nevertheless remains whether the illness of the economy, as the Marxist argument maintains, was the main cause of the war boom. To believe that it was it is necessary to deny that Stalinist socialism played any significant part in bringing on the cold war. From that it would follow that under Stalin the Soviet Union constituted a freer and more humane society than did the capitalist democracies in the years after the Second World War, and for a long time previously. It becomes necessary to believe that at the end of this conflict Stalinist Russia was so much a satisfied power that it would have made no moves against the West even if this part of the world had completely disarmed. It is necessary to believe that Western, and especially American, business circles forced through a rearmament program against a danger to democracy that was almost entirely imaginary. There are people who can believe such arguments, but doing so puts an enormous strain on the organs of credulity.

It is probably closer to the mark to hold that the conflict between capitalist and socialist states, rather than their domestic social institutions, has been the main factor behind the deformations of socialism and liberal democracy. This conflict may be seen as the modern manifestation of the age-old system of competing sovereign states. Under such competition the only way for a state to gain "security" is to become stronger than its potential rivals. Rivals that must be taken seriously are those that are themselves strong, regardless of their social structure and doctrinal predilections. Conflicts occur among states with similar social structures at least as often as among those with different ones. Hence the system of international anarchy itself often imposes "aggressive" policies upon states whose domestic structure might incline them in peaceable directions.

This explanation cannot be applied universally. Domestic factors played an important part in the aggressive policies of Germany and Japan in their Fascist phase, and in other times and places as well. My sense of the situation in the United States is that business interests did their best to climb aboard the defense juggernaut rather than set the monster in motion. Now, however, it is here and firmly entrenched, a major factor in the American political climate.

To put the point another way, both socialism and democratic capitalism in and by themselves might be a great deal more capable of change in the direction of a moderately decent and free society than anyone has ever suspected. But socialism and capitalism have never existed in and by themselves; hence we are unlikely ever to know what possibilities they contained. Stalinist policies helped to destroy affirmative policies in American society, to change the United States into the affluent version of the garrison state. In turn, the United States now blocks off the prospects for greater freedom which have begun to appear in Russia.

Now the conflict between the United States and the Soviet Union is gradually ceasing to be the main axis of international conflicts. Chiefly as a result of American policies, the international arena is becoming a stage for a conflict between those states that have achieved industrial civilization and those that seek to achieve it by revolutionary methods. As the latest comer to the industrial world, the Soviet Union balances precariously between the two camps, anxious to avoid the nuclear catastrophe that could destroy civilization. Each step America takes in escalating the war in Vietnam destroys whatever confidence remains that it will not be the first to resort to Armageddon for the preservation of "freedom." Every bomb that falls on helpless peasants destroys the clearest claim upon humanity's allegiance that Western democracy once could make: that it was no terrorist society, that for all its defects it was a way of solving problems peacefully, and for that reason well worth defending. At bottom, this was perhaps always an illusion. Now, at any rate, each day's headlines shatter it. Such talk no longer carries with it the hope of the future, but the stink of death.

The Indian Tests the Mainstream

D'ARCY McNICKLE

A member of the Confederated Salish and Kootenai tribes of Montana, Mr. McNickle is professor of anthropology, University of Saskatchewan, Regina Campus, Canada. He is the author of The Indian Tribes of the United States: Ethnic and Cultural Survival (Oxford University Press).

Throwing a commissioner of Indian Affairs out of office is not earthshaking news. It happens from time to time, without unsettling the stock market or diverting attention from the rising hem line. It happened only recently, when Philleo Nash, former Lieutenant Governor of Wisconsin and previously a member of President Truman's palace guard, was given the heave-ho.

But such an event, unnoticed elsewhere, can produce dismay if not trauma among the Indian people, particularly if the commissioner has won their esteem, as did Mr. Nash. When, in addition, the ouster of the commissioner is coupled with a Senate committee report in which it is charged that "the Bureau [of Indian Affairs] is more interested in perpetuating its hold on Indians and their property than in bringing them into the mainstream of American life," the Indians look anxiously about, wondering who their friends are and from what quarter to expect an assault. Attacks against the bureau in and out of Congress have been used to obscure efforts to gain access to Indian property or to diminish Indian legal rights. If Indians were not notoriously a patient people and a people given to consensus thinking, they would have succumbed to neuroses before now.

It is not by accident that in the two great social movements of our time—the civil rights revolution and the radical attack on the causes of poverty—the American Indian is the least involved of any ethnic or cultural group in the nation. Some would insist that of all groups Indians should be the most concerned because of their need and because of their anomalous situation in the economy. The fact that they are touched so lightly by these massive events must have a significance, if we can define it and account for it.

It is not that Indians are ignored or forgotten. Certain major newspapers—The New York Times, The Christian Science Monitor—frequently carry full-length descriptive articles on current Indian issues. A few years ago, before going on to ambush the automobile industry, Ralph Nader devoted an entire issue of the Harvard Law Review, of which he was then editor, to an examination of legal and political questions affecting Indians. Other journals in recent times have given over their pages entirely to Indian subject matter, among them The Annals of The American Academy of Political and Social Science, and Human Organization, the journal of the Society for Applied Anthropology. Various church bodies have conducted Indian studies and issued special reports. Soon after President Kennedy took office, a Task Force created by the Secretary of the Interior traveled extensively through the Indian country and issued a report of its findings and a body of recommendations, which appeared at about the same time that the Fund for the Republic released a somewhat comparable synoptic report. And finally, the Office of Economic Opportunity, within a few weeks of its establishment, designated all Indian reservations as "pockets of poverty" entitled to aid.

But to say that the Indian people have not been ignored is not to say that their situation or their aspirations have been understood. The Fall 1965 issue of Mid-Continent American Studies Journal, published at the University of Kansas, deserves special mention here because its collection of articles does attempt to let the Indian stand forth as a person and a group member in our contemporary industrialized society—to give some meaning to the values that operate in Indian life. The guest editor for this special issue, Nancy Oestrich Lurie, sets the theme for the several essays by asking: Is there an Indian renaissance? In posing the question she is asking for explanations of certain observed actions, attitudes and developments which especially distinguish today's younger Indians from their fathers and grandfathers. She remarks that notable changes seem to have occurred: Where do they lead? Toward absorption in the white man's industrial world? Or toward increased Indianness?

Whether or not the question is properly phrased — and some of the writers quarrel with the term renaissance — it is suggestive of what many observers have noted in other contexts: that Indians are more socially visible. The change may well be in the eyes of the observer, as Dr. Lurie herself suggests: "Perhaps in the last accounting, the renaissance is the change in the non-Indian world in regard to the Indian world rather than the reverse."

That the surmise is at least half true, the articles in this special issue demonstrate. The most perceptive of them reveal an acquaintanceship with contemporary Indian life and a sophistication in interpreting the observed event which was not encountered in the literature of the 1930s. When Murray and Rosalie Wax write on "Education for What?" they are looking at formal schooling from the Indian's point of view, and trying to determine, with the Indian, how education can serve an Indian group purpose. No one thirty years ago was looking at Indian education from any viewpoints but those of individual success and movement out from the group.

When Robert Thomas writes about Indian powwows, he is not concerned with the diffusion of dance types or music or costume, but rather with the psychic needs of the Indian people which pull them into urban neighborhood centers or on cross-country treks to meet other Indians. Until recently, few people were aware of the trails the Indians follow, whether on horseback in the back country or in a pickup truck on paved roads, to get to "where the action is" with other tribesmen. Indian visiting, even when cited in the ethnologist's field notes, was used as an example of time wasting and a regrettable survival of a dysfunctional culture trait.

When Henry Dobyns examines some of the developments in tribal self-government, he finds a dynamic which is "increasing the tribal share of benefits" and reducing "the degree of subordination of the tribesmen." The net effect of these experiences, he explains, has been to confirm the basic tenet on which John Collier founded his administration as Commissioner of Indian Affairs (1933-45)—"Responsible democracy is, of all experiences, the most therapeutic, the most disciplinary, the most dynamogenic and the most productive of efficiency." Dobyns remarks that "for all the attention that has been devoted to tribal people in the United States," no one previously has attempted to test the scientific validity of Collier's generalization.

These brief references will indicate somewhat the extent to which the scientific observer at least has developed his conceptual tools and his ability to see a people within its own cultural perspective. And this leads to the second half of the question: What are the indicators of change within the Indian community during the same period?

One such indicator certainly is that Indians are speaking out — in public hearings, in news media, and particularly through organizations of their own making. When thirty-odd tribes met in Denver, Colo., in 1944 to form the National Congress of American Indians they acted almost without precedent and certainly in no tradition. Indians have been tribal people, which is like saying a Frenchman is a Frenchman, except when he wants to embarrass an Englishman by calling himself a European. Even where they adjoined other tribes, they kept their boundaries neat and tidy. Now they are becoming "Indians" as well as tribesmen. Since the creation of the Indian Congress as a national body, intertribal councils have been formed within state boundaries and within geographic regions. The newest of these organized voices is that of the National Indian Youth Council which, as the name suggests, is made up of younger tribal members, many of them college-trained.

What are Indians saying, with their new-found voices? The phrasing is varied, reflecting the local environment and local experiences. The Canadian writer, D. G. Poole, reported on conversations he had last summer with Canadian Indians at a meeting of the National Indian Council, which is in some respects a counterpart of the National Congress of American Indians in the States. What he heard at that council meeting in Manitoba could as well have been said to him in Montana or Arizona.

A young man, a university student, commented:

> What frightens me most about white society is the terrible loneliness. What I mean is that you never seem so much alone as when you are gathered together. . . . What you call friendships are usually what we would call exclusive alliances of two or three or half a dozen against the world. Tribal people have an inclusive social sensitivity which no white person ever experiences. . . . It is funny to hear the isolated white man advocating integration for Indians. To us, he seems to be saying, "Come, join us and be lonely." It is dishonest to use the word integration. You have never wanted us to integrate, but only to conform. Why is it that any cultural difference—not only Indian but anywhere in the world—is an aggravation to white people?

At the University of Chicago in the summer of 1961, some 400 Indians met in a weeklong conference to find, if they could, common values and common bases for action. The experience of meeting in annual conventions of the National Congress of American Indians and in many state and regional meetings made possible this Chicago conference. It is unlikely that such a gathering could have occurred in the 1930s, or that consensus could have been reached to produce the Declaration of Purpose unanimously adopted in 1961. This declaration concludes:

> When Indians speak of the continent they yielded, they are not referring only to the loss of some millions of acres in real estate. They have in mind that the land supported a universe of things they knew, valued, and loved. . . . What we ask of America is not charity, not paternalism, even when benevolent. We ask only that the nature of our situation be recognized and made the basis of policy and action.
>
> In short, the Indians ask for assistance, technical and financial, for the time needed, however long that may be, to regain in the America of the space age some measure of the adjustment they enjoyed as the original possessors of their native land.

This Indian voice was heard on another occasion, in the words of the young executive secretary of the National Indian Youth Council, Mel Thom. Speaking just after Philleo Nash had been replaced as Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs had scolded the bureau for not turning more Indians loose (i.e., terminating federal responsibility), Thom commented:

> Watts is full of rural, uneducated people who have no homes and no chance. Now it appears that the United States Senate wants to create similar urban ghettos filled with uneducated, unprepared Indians. Indians need help in developing resources on their own reservations. The reservations are our ancestral homes, and we should be allowed to live on them peacefully. There is no sense in fighting for the rights of the South Vietnamese to determine their own future, and at the same time, forcing American Indians from their lands and denying them the right to decide their own future.

Clearly, the Indians have changed. In their meetings of thirty years ago, they talked mostly about "the big claims" — the folk term applied to land claims against the government, but which conveyed an overburden of distrust and hostility vis-à-vis the white man. When John Collier convened regional meetings throughout the Indian country to elicit tribal views about the then pending Wheeler-Howard bill (subsequently adopted as the Indian Reorganization Act of 1934), he received mostly complaints directed at local bureau personnel and local hardship conditions. The complaints were real, but they conveyed no sense of an "Indian" dialectic, of involvement in their own fate.

It is still said that Indians cannot agree on what they want, and the allegation is used to justify action in Congress or the Executive branch without waiting for or even seeking Indian consent. This was especially noticeable in the Eisenhower administration, when various dismembering laws were adopted because, as the herd-riding Senator Watkins charged, the Indians would never "make up their minds" (to accept tribal disintegration) if left to themselves.

The fact is that Indians do know their needs, as they always have. The problem has always been to get such outsiders as administrators and Congressmen to listen when they fail to hear what they want to hear. What has been happening in these later years is that Indians more and more are talking in the language of politics. "Give us home rule," they are saying, in effect, "and we will vote for you or your party." It may not be a renaissance, but the Indians have mounted an appeal to democratic conscience.

Thus far they have come, and there they hang — the least involved in and the least served by the social upheaval of our times.

The same Senate committee report referred to in the second paragraph found that "Indians remain at the bottom of the economic ladder, have the highest rate of unemployment, live in the poorest housing, and suffer chronic poverty." It quoted the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, who found that "in 1965, 16,000 Indian children between the ages of 8 and 16 were not enrolled in school; half of these were forced to forgo education because of lack of facilities . . . [and] the dropout rate among Indians is 50 per cent compared to a national average of 29 per cent."

The committee expressed itself as "shocked."

Two motivating factors need to be mentioned at this point, the first of minor importance but effective in its way. It was discussed by a young Montana tribesman, speaking at the annual convention of the National Congress of American Indians last year. He remarked: "We find it difficult to move some of our older people because they think if they show progress of any kind, the federal government will start termination proceedings against the tribe. . . . The fear of termination is impeding progress of Indians in this area rather than helping develop self-sufficiency."

Related to this state of mind is the hesitancy to accept grants for programs offered by the Office of Economic Opportunity. The Indians want to know whether the funds received from this source will later be charged against them if their tribe should be awarded a money judgment in a claims case against the government.

A more constant and pervasive factor in the Indian situation is the concern with identity. For a very long time, since in fact the first arrival of Europeans in the New World, the Indian people were told that they were an inferior human stock. Nothing that has happened in recent years — notwithstanding civil rights legislation — has indicated a radical re-evaluation by the white man of his racist ideas. Discrimination on grounds of race or creed has been found to be a drag on the economy and the cause of social unrest — and it makes America look bad in the eyes of the world — but the drive to eliminate racism can hardly be ascribed to a fundamental moral revulsion. And indications to the contrary are not lacking in Indian experience.

One of the supremacist objections to Indian landholding is that Indians make inferior use of the land. A kindred argument is used in the drive to abrogate treaty-guaranteed fishing rights in Indian waters in the Northwest — the allegation being that Indians are wasteful in the taking of fish, an allegation that ignores two sets of facts: (1) that Indians fish for subsistence primarily, not for sport; and (2) Indians followed conservation practices long before there were conservation laws.

The land-utilization argument has been especially effective in blocking the efforts of the Alaska natives to establish rightful ownership to areas on which they have subsisted since long before Russian occupation. Many such areas are now found to be mineral rich. If such lands should be vested in the Indians, as the treaty with Russia and subsequent acts of Congress promised, some natives might become wealthy, and some white men be denied. Senator Gruening is willing to let the taxpayer relieve Uncle Sam of embarrassment by paying for these inchoate rights, but he is vigorously opposed to passing title to the lands on which Indians and Eskimos depend for a living.

Ira Moskowitz

The Navajo Indians learned some years ago that they could not prevail against white men when they attempted, with the support of Secretary Ickes' Department of the Interior, to regain possession of the lands lying east of the present reservation which had been part of their original home territory. Some 8,000 to 9,000 Navajos were actually living in the area as squatters, renters or holders of individual trust allotments, as against fewer than 100 white families. But the white owners included some very large cattle and sheep men, heavily financed by local bankers, whereas the Navajos were subsistence farmers, who planted their little fields in the hollows of the land where spring moisture accumulated, and at other times followed their small bands of sheep and goats from dawn to dusk. Not an efficient use of the land, but it supported the people and their independence. Legislation designed to transfer the land to the tribe in 1936 was defeated single-handedly by New Mexico's Senator Chavez, who owed no political obligations to the Navajo people.

The Houma Indians, numbering some 2,000, remnants of various Muskogian tribes that once inhabited the Mississippi delta country and eastward, for generations followed their quiet ways, hunting muskrats and taking shrimp in the bayou waters of the delta country. They kept to themselves, molesting no one and only occasionally being disturbed by outsiders who found that trapping paid well and moved in to take over territory previously used by the Indians. In recent years, however, with the discovery of rich deposits of oil and natural gas, the situation is changing rapidly. Suddenly it is discovered that the Indians have no title to the lands, or cannot prove title. Roads are built in the area to reach oil fields, and the new accessibility makes it possible for many more outsiders to enter and pre-empt trapping grounds. Sludge from offshore-oil operations pollutes the waters, damaging fishing grounds and oyster beds.

The argument that Indians have a lesser claim to the land because they make less efficient use of its resources is as old as North American settlement. Neither the logic nor the moral tone of the argument has improved with age, and in its historical projection it has proved disastrous. The 90 million acres of "inefficiently used" lands, which were legally removed from Indian ownership in the forty-year period 1890-1930, made inevitable the dire poverty in which Indians live today. Now, a "shocked" Senate committee wants the damage repaired, or some lesser part of it — more jobs, more schools, more medical care. But, significantly, it also wants federal responsibility terminated. Hereafter if Indians continue to live in poverty it will be their own fault.

Most tribes need look no further than their own experience to find examples of contemptuous and even brutish treatment — Hopi Indians still remember that fifty years ago they were driven like cattle through dipping vats in a delousing campaign. When Indians are exhorted to abandon their peculiar tribal ways and join the "mainstream" of American society, it should cause no wonder if they question whether they will, in fact and in practice, be allowed to join that society as paid-up members. It is no exercise in academic jargon when Indians talk about identity.

They have a deep-seated conviction, rational or not, that once they cut loose from the past, abandon tribal ties, and commit themselves to urban-industrial existence, they will become a faceless people in an alien world. And that, in their instinctual thinking, would make their poverty unbearable. So long as they cling to a name, they have a destiny.

The recital of these details takes on significance when we turn finally to the reasons for the dismissal of Philleo Nash as Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The imminence of Nash's removal was rumored in the Indian country for several months, but never with any clearly stated reasons as to why this was to come about. When it did not happen at once, Indians became hopeful that the rumor would fade away.

They had learned to respect and to have confidence in Nash, the first commissioner of whom that could be said since John Collier resigned in 1945. An anthropologist by training, Nash knew what the people were expressing when they talked about tribal government, tribal resources, tribal identity.

Speaking before the Institute on Human Relations at Fisk University in 1965, Nash declared: "For those who prefer to continue tribal life, I stand firmly on the ground that they have every right to do so, and that the United States Government, at the same time, has an obligation to see that the penalty for being Indian is not abject poverty."

Possibly it was the wrong doctrine and the wrong timing, with powerful men in Congress still committed to a policy of dismembering the last of the Indian estate and unilaterally releasing the government from responsibility for helping the Indian people to achieve a tolerable accommodation in American society.

The reasons for the removal, when finally given to the public, were only faintly critical. Secretary of the Interior Udall, who made the decision, acknowledged that "the past five years in many ways have been good for the Indian people. We have had good leadership. . . ."

President Johnson, in accepting Nash's resignation, noted: "During your incumbency, the Indian people have renewed their confidence in government. . . . You led an early attack in the war on poverty before that war was formally declared. Your sensitive guidance of programs on Indian reservations furnished a valuable blueprint for the larger effort which followed."

Whatever the accomplishment, it was "not enough," in Udall's phrasing. Soon after the resignation, he called a meeting of top bureau officials in Santa Fe, at which he expressed what probably was his major concern: "Our country has moved into an unprecedented period of peacetime prosperity. The increase in our Gross National Product in the past five years has been larger than the total GNP of most nations in the world. . . . Yet in that period of rising economy the poverty question, of which the Indians are only a part, becomes more and more embarrassing. . . . This is an inconsistency that is intolerable in a country as rich and wealthy as ours. . . . The Indian people should be tied to the great things that have been happening."

Part of the answer Udall brought to the Santa Fe conference was more involvement by other areas of government, federal and state, by the universities and by private business. He asked, "What would IBM or A.T.&T. or Standard Oil of New Jersey do with the resources owned by the Indian people?"

And answered himself: "We may need some new laws and some new help. I think the Indian trusteeship way that we have operated in the past has been like having hobbles and handcuffs on at the same time. . . . I hope to get Congressional support for new ideas." He drew the thought out further by saying: "We could single out ten or twelve reservations with good resources, some of the best in the country, for development — and not a major corporation in this country that would not take resources these Indians have and increase the value ten or twenty times in the next twenty years."

While these ideas were being aired behind closed doors (in an Episcopal church building), Indians cooled their heels on the outside. An emergency meeting of the National Congress of American Indians had been called for the same time, in the hope that a dialogue might develop between the government men and the Indians whose affairs were being discussed.

It was perhaps a vain expectation. The conference was limited to experts, at which expert decisions would be reached. The Secretary satisfied himself of his fair-mindedness by agreeing to speak to the Indians separately on the second night of the two-day meeting and, according to a newspaper report, he "stayed to mingle and shake hands with Indians from all over the nation."

The outcome of these events cannot be casually estimated. The notion that what is needed to solve Indian problems is the determined use of power — the big push — is not new. It has been employed at various times — in forcing the division of tribal lands, in kidnaping Indian children for distant boarding schools, in insisting that tribes such as the Klamath and Menominee divide up their assets and release the government of further responsibility. Whenever force has been used, it has been necessary to go back later and try to repair the damage inflicted — and the problem which called out the show of power remained unsolved.

It is not suggested that the Administration is contemplating new power plays in its relations with the Indian people. But there is an indicated impatience with the pace at which Indians are moving. A Philleo Nash who takes account of that pace and tries to accommodate to it, is out of a job. The Senate committee wants more termination legislation. The Secretary wants more involvement by outsiders who would know what to do with Indian resources. The circumstances and personalities involved lend themselves to hurried decisions and hurried methods which, if Indian consent is not forthcoming, will prevail in the absence of consent.

The difficulties which burden the Indian will not yield to mere pressure, and the proposal to involve men talented in market operations, who wouldn't know a powwow from a pogo stick, is less than reassuring.

The odds are strictly against solution by government, whatever pressures or gimmicks or legislative attacks are invoked. The Indian Bureau is usually pictured as a monolithic structure moving mindlessly through time when, in fact, it is not self-contained and is not a continuity. Its commissioner, the nominal head, cannot move independently of the Secretary of the Interior. The latter cannot move independently of the Bureau of the Budget. And all are subject to the policies of Congress, whatever they may be.

In the area of program administration, starts and stops come with every new commissioner, with every change at the Area Office level, with every transfer of an agency superintendent. Even the promotion to a bigger job of an effective schoolteacher can subvert the entire relationship between school and community. These changes at the field level, where contact with Indian people is immediate and critical, are frequent and are built into the system.

The inevitable conclusion is that government is not structurally or functionally designed to work out solutions. The men who operate within the system cannot stay long enough to learn their jobs, and in any case men are selected for these jobs within a classified system which is related to law and procedure, not to communities of people.

But if government cannot perform, that leaves only the Indians. They are the ones who remain in the community and seek answers while all others, government men, missionaries, traders, come and go.

It is obvious what must happen. The function of decision must be taken from the expert administrators and the wielders of power and put into the community, where decisions belong. This will need public support. The Indians are ready, as their own statements suggest—statements, as we have tried to show here, which grow out of consensus thinking, in the way of Indian tradition.

When decision making is restored to the Indian people (they were making decisions as living societies long before Columbus blundered into his first landfall), they can be expected to become involved in their own fate. It will be appropriate after that, and in due course, for them to become concerned with the fate of the larger society and with their place in it.

LATIN AMERICA V

Economic Integration for Progress

FEDERICO G. GIL

Mr. Gil is professor of political science and director of the Institute of Latin American Studies at the University of North Carolina. As a consultant to the Inter-American Development Bank, he participated in the establishment of the Institute for Latin American Integration at Buenos Aires in 1965.

During the last few years, technicians and economists in Latin America have been advocating regional integration as the most feasible, indeed, the only viable instrument whereby their countries can develop. After World War II, industrialization was thought to be the answer, but as the early drive in that direction has slowed, many specialists and political leaders have come to realize that industrialization by itself was not enough. To be sure, advances in industrialization have brought profound social and political adjustments, but they have not eliminated the region's problems. Frequently lacking natural resources, as well as the techniques required to develop heavy industry, these nations have also been faced with inadequate financial means and a continuing dependence upon foreign sources of capital. The countries which made the most impressive postwar advances, such as Argentina, Chile or Uruguay, are precisely the ones most plagued today by oppressive economic stagnation.

The industrialization process has stagnated from inherent limitations of domestic markets and an inability to compete in the world market. It can scarcely expand beyond a fairly rudimentary stage as long as the Latin American economies are based on raw-material exports which fail to produce income sufficient to pay for the capital goods required by industry. Postwar shortages, import substitutions, the liberal use of government funds have spent themselves. In spite of some impressive strides along the road to economic growth, the rate of increase for gross product is still well below that of the developed nations, and is to a large extent offset by the spectacular population explosion.

The view that the present stagnation can be overcome by expansion of markets to a regional basis, thereby meeting the cost of new basic industries, was held at first only by the technicians; recently, it has begun to permeate the circles of the political elites. Integration is attracting the interest and concern of political parties, trade union leaders, industrialists, businessmen, intellectuals and other segments of Latin American public opinion. Foreign observers have, generally speaking, dismissed this new current as a modern manifestation of the century-old dream of a united Latin America, entertained by Bolívar and other liberators of the era of emancipation. But these observers may well be underestimating the vigor and dynamism of what is gradually becoming a hemispheric movement.

Acceptance of the idea of interdependence and the need for a regional approach to economic development has been made easier by a number of factors. First, a burgeoning middle class demands progress and access to higher economic development, as do a growing industrial proletariat and a recently awakened mass of rural workers. These segments of Latin American society have been the principal victims of inflation. They constitute the core of newly emerging political forces.

The appeal of integration is heightened further by consideration of the international scene. Many Latin Americans see today's highly stratified international system as one divided into two camps—the developed and the underdeveloped. In terms of power, prestige and economic status, they find their respective nations grouped with the have-not Asian and African states at the lower levels of international society. Champions of integration argue for the creation of regional social, economic and political structures as providing the only substantial hope of raising the status of Latin America and obtaining adequate participation in the decision-making process of the world. If Latin America wants its voice heard within the council of nations, it must speak as a single bloc. In further support of its position, integrationists point to the strong trend toward regionalization of socio-political relations in Europe.

Although these arguments are persuasive, exceedingly baffling obstacles exist. Many of the difficulties are economic, but some are closely tied to geographic, social or political conditions. Natural barriers—mountains, jungles, vast expanses of wasteland—prevent the development of transportation and communication. Region-spanning roads are practically nonexistent on the continent; only 3.2 per cent of the world's permanent highways and 8 per cent of the world's railways are in Latin America. Its own merchant marine transports only 6 per cent of Latin America's ocean freight; the result is a $650 million deficit in the balance of payments for transportation and handling charges. Air transportation, although more advanced, is handicapped by inability to meet the cost of technological advances and the competition of foreign enterprises.

Among the social problems is the historical dualism of societies in which the interests of propertied landowners clash with those of the rural masses. Despite the gradual emergence of the middle sectors, this dual nature of society prevails in most countries. Conservative landowners and businessmen reject change as inimical to their interests; regional integration, in their view, would be change on a most alarming scale. Aside from illiteracy, roughly 50 per cent for the area as a whole, Latin American education, formalistic and therefore not geared to practical national needs, has failed to produce the professionals and technicians demanded by development. For example, some 26,000 agricultural engineers were active in 1962, but by 1970, agrarian reform programs will require a minimum of 60,000, and all Latin American universities combined are producing only 2,000 agricultural engineers a year.

Another force working potently against integration is xenophobia. The intensification of nationalism in the past century and a half is definitely an obstacle to integration. It will therefore be necessary to redefine nationalism in regional terms; for without the emotional or psychological commitment that political ideology can engender, it is doubtful that regional plans can gain general acceptance.

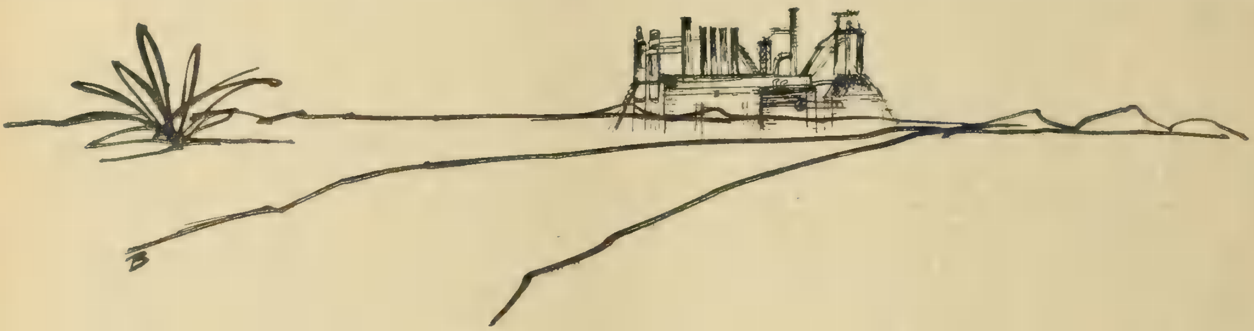
Economic obstacles are even more obdurate. In the midst of significant political and social change, Latin America's traditional trade relations persist. The pattern in all countries is basically the exchange of raw material for foreign manufactured goods. Despite industrial advances stimulated by the desire to substitute domestic for imported consumer goods, agriculture continues as the economic activity of the majority of Latin America's labor force. Foreign trade has progressively weakened, while agriculture employs obsolete methods for low returns. And trade among nations is insignificant compared with intercontinental trade.

A further handicap is the unevenness of development among the various nations. While some are at least moderately developed, others continue in archaic conditions. Fiscal aspects of the economic situation are also a stumbling block in the intended drive for unity. The lack of coordination of currency policies, as well as of financial and investment sources, the chronic insufficiency of public savings, the difficulties of mobilizing the existing wealth, and the reluctance of private capital to invest in anything but land and tangible property, are additional weaknesses which, although not irremediable, can nevertheless retard progress toward integration.

In spite of such varied and complex obstacles, the urge for unity is strong. European thinking on economic integration and the establishment of the European Coal and Steel Communities have convinced many Latin American leaders that the day of national sovereignty is over. However, while Latin American advocates of regionalism are clearly heartened by the success of the European experiment, they also know that this experiment is not wholly adaptable to their situation. Latin Americans simply do not have the highly developed system of communications, large productive capacity, or advanced technology that facilitated European integration. Moreover, considerations of defense and of peace-keeping responsibilities do not weigh upon them as they did upon the Europeans. Perhaps even more significant are the differences in United States policy. The Europeans were permitted to work out their policies and establish their markets by themselves; toward Latin America the U.S. policy is very emphatically bilateral.

Two projects undertaken in recent years—the Central American Common Market (CACM), and the broader grouping known as the Latin American Free Trade Association—have been responses to the need for regional unity. The former has proved in many ways the greater and more rapid success. Established by a treaty concluded in 1960 by Guatemala, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Costa Rica and Honduras, the CACM intended to create a free trade area for the region within five years, and to adopt common tariffs on goods from other countries. The treaty established an administrative machinery for governing the market with headquarters at Guatemala City, and a Central American Bank for Economic Integration at Tegucigalpa. A number of supporting regional organizations for industrial research, public administration, nutrition, banking and commerce were founded. In less than a decade the CACM has cleared a sizable list of products from the tariff rolls; tax incentives for foreign investors have been systematized and rationalized; and by the close of 1966, all but a few agricultural products will be covered by the common market. Industrialization is being promoted to decrease imports, to provide employment for the swollen urban population, and to attract foreign capital. An admirable move by CACM has been the promotion of new industry that will serve the entire region rather than individual countries. Progress toward integration has been successful beyond expectations. Intraregional trade increased from $3.6 million in 1950 to $66 million in 1963. Furthermore, 75 per cent of this intraregional trade now involves industrial goods.

The relative success of the Central American integration effort is not hard to explain—it was desperately needed. In an area approximately the size of France, Central America has a population of only some 12 million, with 65 per cent of the active population devoted to agricultural pursuits. The region's economy is dependent on four commodities; coffee, cotton, cocoa and bananas account for 90 per cent of its exports. Moreover, the five republics have at least a loosely similar historical development, and share many characteristics. On at least six occasions in the past century and a half, the Central Americans have sought to revive a first regional federation that collapsed in 1838. Federalism failed and regional unity was destroyed by internal dissension; Central America, as Sarmiento put it, "made a sovereign state of each village." Today, as common economic progress is achieved, concomitant political improvement also becomes more probable.



The same pressure for economic integration has produced in South America the Latin American Free Trade Association (LAFTA) which came into being when Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Mexico, Peru and Uruguay signed the Montevideo Treaty in 1960. The signatory nations, rather than seeking inspiration in the European conception of integration or a customs union, proceeded along Latin American lines to the creation of a free-trade zone. They wisely adopted limited arrangements, selecting a number of commodities from industries about to be established which required expanded markets, and trying to establish systems of industrial reciprocity on the basis of limited schedules. European style of integration could have foundered on the rivalries and jealousies of the countries involved.

The economic potential of LAFTA is impressive. About 140 million people (72 per cent of the population of Latin America) live in the cooperating countries and occupy 79 per cent of the territory. The LAFTA countries are also the most highly industrialized on the continent and have a Gross National Product of between $4 billion and $4.5 billion. However, the early record has not been encouraging. During the first two years, intraregional trade grew more than 40 per cent, but the total value of such trade represented only 8.5 per cent of the international trade of LAFTA members. In addition, 80 per cent consists of products which have traditionally been exchanged by these nations. LAFTA is perhaps moving too slowly toward the liberalization of trade, and should give its attention to economic integration through such measures as the interlocking of Latin American capital markets, the establishment of regional investment companies, and a regional securities exchange. If Latin America is to become an industrial power, its industries will have to compete in world markets. It can compete successfully only through large industrial complexes. LAFTA, now that it has shown the advantages of lowering tariff walls, should take one more step and supply imaginative mechanisms to hasten regional integration.

Thoughtful Latin American leaders, although they know the dangers of pursuing visionary goals, envisage a broad conception of integration that extends beyond the purely economic sphere to matters of social and political development. The conviction grows that integration demands structural and institutional changes of the broadest implications. The present set of structures is not adequate for even the intermediate stage between tentative cooperation and the goal of full-fledged integration.

A major instrument for integration is the Inter-American Development Bank which studies and finances regional projects and programs, supports national industrial projects having regional ramifications, gives technical and financial assistance for improvements in the economic infra-structure, and investigates regional integration projects in border regions. Recent examples of this kind of activity have been the bank's technical assistance to Bolivia, Colombia, Ecuador and Peru for the projected highway skirting the edge of the eastern jungles in those countries; its special mission was sent to explore possibilities for integrating the neighboring Venezuelan and Colombian border region.

In 1965, the Inter-American Development Bank took an important step when it established in Buenos Aires the Institute for Latin American Integration (INTAL) to provide the training required for specialists who must lead and direct the march toward regional development. Important political decisions at the highest levels will be required in the future, and the strength of commitment must be supported by a force of technocrats devoted to integration.

After World War II, industrialization became the magic formula for attaining genuine economic and political independence. Spurred on by a generation of brilliant economists, the newly emerged political forces rallied and mobilized Latin America for the march to modernization. The continent paid a heavy price for its industrialization but it also saw the fruit of much of its dream. Today, Latin America appears to have found a new religion: integration, and the current belief is that genuine progress can prevail only if the Latin American nations make some important political decisions, set specific goals to be achieved, and provide the necessary institutional framework.

Advance toward regional unity is increasingly identified with socio-economic reforms in each country, the notion being that any benefits derived from integration should be shared equitably by all segments of the population. Regional unity, if it is to come, must therefore rest solidly upon national development. It is not considered an alternative to national integration but an indispensable part of a process which must include both regional and national progress.

There is also a growing realization that the institutions required for a successful drive toward unity are not solely economic or financial. Appropriate political bodies capable of making decisions at the regional level must be created. Cultural and educational systems must be coordinated, and the accelerating requirement for research and an advanced technology must be met. Finally, a visible ideology for the integrationist movement, one capable of creating a psychological and emotional commitment, must be found. Unless Latin America begins to think, act and speak as a unified continental power, it has no future in the world arena.

DRAGON TRAIN TO SINGAPORE

WILLIAM EASTLAKE

Mr. Eastlake, author among other books of The Bronc People (Harcourt Brace) and Castle Keep (Simon & Schuster), recently spent three months in Southeast Asia.

The Thai general was most solicitous. He bowed when he arrived and he bowed when he left our compartment. He thought we were English and he was disappointed when we were not. He had been educated in England and did not believe you could get a proper education anywhere else. But he was awfully decent about it. Did we love the Thai people?

"Oh yes."

"Thai whiskey?"

"Oh no."

We were drinking Thai Mekong, something distilled from delta water, rubber and teak.

He asked his aide to bring us a bottle of Teacher's Scotch.

"How is the war going?"

The Thai general thought about this and then said, "How do the Americans get their impressions of Thailand?"

"Hollywood."

"Pictures like The King And I?"

"Yes."

"The King And I was banned here in Thailand."

"Why?"

"The king didn't care for it."

There was a silence. I did not know what to say to a Thai general. It seemed to be a common predicament which the Thai general didn't mind.

"How is the war going?" I said.

"Splendid," he said, rising. "Splendid."

A turbaned Indian porter arrived with the Teacher's.

"This Indian chap will love you—will look after you when we are gone—when I am gone," the Thai general said. Now the general did not seem so sad that we were not English.

We were on the Thailand-Singapore dragon train that runs from the guerrilla-infiltrated Thai territory in the north between Burma and Laos through to the Thai-Malaysian border where there is another national liberation front which carves up people that disagree with it. Before they carve someone they have to catch him. This train would make a nice catch.

All this now because I was depressed, hot, tired, frustrated and covered with ashes from the wood-burning locomotive. The Parsee Indian porter, brilliant-turbaned, native-costumed, had abandoned his outfit only two days out, and he had run out of ice and Tiger Beer and was hiding from the passengers, concealing himself among the third-class Malaysians beneath a Sukarno-style lampshade hat. When we found him out he rode on top and hollered down in a clipped British accent, "I will revictual in Hua Hin." When we told him we wanted ice now he said, "But it will be much better in Hua Hin. Hua Hin is the king's summer palace you know. Better everything. These chaps can't get a job in their own country you know," he said, looking down at the Thai. "Their own government doesn't trust them. These chaps are all thieves, the lot of them. The Indians and the Chinese run this country, that is we did before the American chaps got here. Eton?"

"No."

"Harrow?"

"No."

"I thought I recognized the tie."

"What about some ice?"

But the Parsee had disappeared in a cloud of wood smoke.

At Hua Hin we did not take on anything but a saffron-robed, shaved-head Buddhist monk from Vietnam who distributed gold-tipped cigarettes to his two colleague monks. One was from Formosa, the other from Burma. The only language they had in common was English and they discussed the war and the price of eggs:

"High?"

"Very high."

"But they will go higher?"

"And higher."

"And higher?"

"And higher."

"And the Americans?"

"More."

"And more?"

"And more."

I said we took on nothing at Hua Hin but a Buddhist monk, but evidently the Indian Parsee porter had ducked out of a secret door and bought all the Schweppes in Hua Hin. He had "revictualed" and he was wearing his bright, turbaned costume again and acting as though he controlled all the ice and quinine water in Southeast Asia. The dining car, which had become a shambles piled high with garbage, now took on its former velvet and mahogany Victorian air again under the quick supervision of the Parsee.

The train began to pick up speed. At Hua Hin we had taken on a new locomotive with a new pile of wood and we raced toward Singapore like the wind, streaming a black pall of smoke that sped backward in our wake all the way to China. We kept this up all the way through the vast rubber plantations of the peninsula; then, before the first Malay state, there was an emergency stop. The sudden stop ruined everything the Parsee had done. The dining car was garbage again.

After we had stopped in the solemn, hushed and kind of deadly jungle for five minutes, they brought a boy's body on board. They lugged his body through our car as though for inspection. The Parsee told us the boy was a guerrilla and that he had gotten on board with a ticket at Hua Hin. The train police had an eye on him and when the train was going fast had searched him and found a sixteen-shot machine pistol concealed in his robe. The boy had struggled and jumped out of the train window to his death rather than be taken alive.

"But when we get to the border he will be surely punished."

"But he is already dead," I said.

The Indian porter, in his bright costume, looked down at three yellow-labeled bottles of Schweppes quinine water he had salvaged from the sudden emergency stop.

"Yes, already dead."

And he looked up at us straight in the eye, then away vacantly at the three Buddhist monks and, still thinking inwardly, still thoughtful, said: "Yes. That is a pity, isn't it?" And then he said: "Now that the train is stopped do you think I should nip out and get some more ice?"

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Explorations in the Apolitical

CLAYTON ESHLEMAN

Mr. Eshleman is a poet and translator of Spanish verse who teaches at New York University.

In the fall of 1965 I went to Lima, Peru, to complete a translation of Human Poems by César Vallejo. I needed money so I wandered into the Instituto Cultural Peruano Norteamericano (ICPNA), looking for a job teaching English as a foreign language, work I had done for two years in Japan.

I had bused and hitchhiked from Mexico City to Panama and was dressed for the road. But I felt less self-conscious than out of place as I watched Mr. Conrad Spohnholz, the director of the Institute, read my résumé. He sat behind a wide desk, flanked by his assistant, who chatted with me while Mr. Spohnholz read. Spohnholz had a tall lantern-shaped head which he held stiffly on his straight narrow shoulders; he responded to me as if there were fifteen years between us. I accepted this at the time as one of the contingencies of getting work, but noticed we were about the same age, early or middle 30s.

Spohnholz had been thinking of some sort of magazine or cultural review for a year (he had been director of ICPNA in Lima for two years and had previously served as an assistant director in San Salvador) and when he read that I had edited a magazine and was a poet and translator, our conversation turned to the possibility of my organizing and editing a bilingual literary journal, sponsored by ICPNA, while I was in Lima. Spohnholz said he would like to get the most out of me while I was there and from my viewpoint there was much more challenge (and more money) in editing a magazine than in teaching English conversation.

One of the first rules that Spohnholz introduced was that the magazine would have to be apolitical. The board of directors would not allow money to be put into a publication that had a political ax to grind. He told me ICPNA paid its own way on money earned from teaching English, but that he, his assistant and the woman who directed the language program, had been hired and were paid their North American-scaled salary by Washington. Spohnholz briefly described the board of directors (five Peruvians, five North Americans—all conservative businessmen living in Peru) and the Institute's activities, which he again emphasized were apolitical and cultural. He said that as director he was responsible to the board of directors, and that the relationship between ICPNA and the U.S. Embassy (I had gotten Spohnholz's name from a Peruvian who worked in the Embassy), was of a "social" nature. The image I got was that the culture attaché came over for lunch and that Spohnholz went to Embassy cocktail parties, etc.

It seemed good enough to try. Spohnholz had agreed that editing was to be my own, that no material would be forced on me, but that I should not overlook the possibility, since he was the publisher, of some censorship of political or obscene matter. He was sure things would loosen up after the first few issues; that if we cooled it at first, later we would be left alone. By whom, I queried? By the American community in Lima who would glance at the magazine, and by conservative, powerful Peruvians. Both parties might object if a "left winger" were printed, even if what was printed by him was essentially apolitical in nature. Spohnholz said that personally he was against that sort of thing, that most intellectuals in Peru were leftists, and if we didn't print some of their apolitical writings, how would Peru be represented in the magazine?

Spohnholz also told me that he thought the people at the Embassy would be happy with the idea because they were concerned that no one there knew any of these Peruvian intellectuals; intellectuals wouldn't attend Embassy cocktail parties, etc. The magazine could be a good way of showing both parties that everybody loved everybody.

So ICPNA lent me a typewriter, desk and paper, offered me $250 a month, and we were in business. A week later my wife and I were invited to the Spohnholz home for dinner. In the kitchen, while he mixed a drink, Conrad said something had come up that he had to tell me about, and that perhaps I would want to get out now. I was talking, he said, to Fred Barcroft at the Embassy today (Barcroft was the American Ambassador's assistant) about our idea and he thought it was fine. I mean, I put it to him that the idea was to print young unestablished writers from both countries, and he said "then of course you would not be printing someone like Pablo Neruda." Spohnholz declared that this was really no threat, for I had not intended to print Neruda, had I? (No—but not for Barcroft's reasons.) After an issue or two, when Barcroft saw that the magazine was essentially apolitical, he added, if we wanted to toss a poem or two of Neruda's in—on an apolitical subject, of course—why Conrad didn't see why we couldn't. After all, he was aware that Neruda had apolitical poems as well as political ones. I drank too much and performed, contesting the whole business, threatening to quit immediately; in short, I suffered the necessary conscience pangs for Spohnholz to see that I was authentic—that was important to him. Later, after a candlelit supper, over dessert, after a split second of felt silence in which anyone alive knows something official or from elsewhere than the heart is going to be delivered, Conrad told us how we must all fight against communism in Latin America, how important it was not to let it take over our world.

For the next month I didn't see much of Conrad. I chose a name for the magazine, Quena (the wood Quechuan flute), started looking for a printer, and spent much time reading, translating and commissioning translations of English poems into Spanish and Spanish into English. At Spohnholz's request, I began the difficult search for four Peruvian "intellectuals" to be advisers to Quena. This meant that they were to receive a small salary from ICPNA in return for a monthly meeting with Spohnholz and me—to suggest what to translate of contemporary Peruvian literature.

But when I talked with Peruvians about Quena, I found that they really weren't interested in North American poetry and that they viewed any potential product of ICPNA with suspicion, if not outright disgust. ICPNA was the Embassy, they said: it was a place where secretaries went to learn English after work; it was off-bounds for anything serious or friendly. And who was I? I have a distinct image of Peruvians looking at me curiously as I outlined what I wanted to do. Their expressions asked who is he more than what is this idea. Such an approach seems genuine in the abstract; you face the man of which his ideas are but a part. But such was not the direction of the Peruvians' look. When I approached Blanca Varela, a poet, in her office in

LIKE SWINBURNE TO SAPPHO

You take me
apple picking,
kick me from your branch overhead and supple as a child, step sharply into the black bark crotch where my sneakers park,
dizzy the limb I ride and wound.
September whips night full of night, and apples swirl
in cider web smell
to the brownpaper sack or ground of my ascent to your keen bruised point on Helicon.

RAYMOND ROSELIEP

the Ministry of Housing about being an adviser for Quena, she told me that she wanted no literary involvements beyond her own writing. I said it would mean a luncheon once a month. She refused. Some time later I met the U. S. writer, Seldon Rodman, who was in Peru for a few months to write a book about the country under a grant. Rodman told me that he was being escorted around Lima by Miss Varela, that in fact she had arranged a meeting for him the following week with the widow of César Vallejo. This coincidence occurred often enough for me to realize that the lack of interest in being an adviser — of translating Charles Olson or Louis Zukofsky, for example—into Spanish for the first time, was tied up with my having no "name" or "grant." I was not affiliated with an organization that could boost the Peruvian into a trip to the States, which means for an artist in Lima an assured place (Robert Kennedy's friend, the painter Ferdnando de Syzslo is a good example of this). The risks of being involved with ICPNA and me (which is chicken feed compared to the American Embassy) were greater than the reward.

But I did manage to get some advisers, and two months after its inception Quena equaled nearly 250 pages of manuscript material. In the first two issues sections in English of Vallejo, Germán Belli, Vargas Vicuña, Salazar Bondy, Antonio Cisneros, Washington Delgado and Javier Heraud were planned: in Spanish, most of them for the first time, would be Charles Olson, Louis Zukofsky, Robert Duncan, Jerome Rothenberg, Ted Enslin and Cid Corman. Many of the English-to-Spanish translations had been done by an Argentine poet, Halma Cristina Perry, who was living in Lima and disliked ICPNA far more and for much clearer reasons than all of the Peruvians with whom I talked. But she was willing to read the work I showed her and to translate what she felt important to introduce to the South American reader. Both contributors and translators had been paid.

One Saturday afternoon two of my advisers, Belli and Sologuren, visited with me, and Sologuren quit. He said he would lose his job as a professor at the Agricultural University at La Molina if he took money from ICPNA. He claimed the student body was heavily Communist and had a vote in the hiring and firing of professors. So, I said, why don't you tell them about the idea of the magazine? It wouldn't do any good, he replied; two professors lost their jobs this past year because of North American affiliations. I looked at Germán Belli. And you? "Well, there's something I've been wanting to talk to you about. . . ."

I understood what ICPNA had to do with culture. I knew it the very first day in Spohnholz's office when I saw the "indigenous" painting hung by his desk, an Indian making bricks or carving something, cubistically pleasant in soft browns, grays and tans. That painting had everything to do with what came out of Spohnholz's mouth, a fact that Arevalo, the ex-Guatemalan President grasped in his Anti-Kommunism in Latin America. Arevalo speaks of the language of South American diplomatic circles, of a kind of non-Spanish, non-English jargon that in itself shows the lack of ground for relation, that perhaps before everything else gives away the lie. I heard Spohnholz speak Spanish, I heard all of the North Americans in the institute speak Spanish, and I heard the Peruvians reply—it is like replacing the truth with something we will call the truth.

In the later showdown on Quena, Spohnholz insisted that he was not against a particular issue being discussed. However, he said that while he would not allow it to be printed in the magazine, he would welcome a round-table discussion at ICPNA as a "cultural activity"; and he appeared to be amazed when the South Americans he was talking to failed to take him up on this. I knew why they failed to take it up: it was as if he were telling them: you are free to discuss anything as long as it doesn't make any difference.

Official language is but an extension of this "democratic" idea: create a language, or better a jargon, unbased in childhood and emotion, and you can say anything you like. There are not even any lies. There is no contradiction whatsoever in tacking up a cardboard reproduction of Jackson Pollock's "Blue Poles" over the table where the U. S. State Department Information Sheet on World News, rendered in Spanish for the Peruvian secretaries, is placed.

The issue on which Quena really foundered had to do with the violent death of a young Peruvian poet, Javier Heraud. Heraud, considered to be the most talented poet of his generation, went to Cuba in 1961 on a film grant, became a revolutionary there and returned to Peru secretly through Brazil, with a small band of guerrillas. They tried to invade a plantation near Puerto Maldonado, and in the fighting one of the plantation workers was killed. The guerrillas were chased back into the jungle where Heraud and another young man were separated from the others. The two men were then trapped in a canoe, supposedly adrift without oars, in the Madre de Dios River. Heraud tried to surrender to the Peruvian Civil Guard: he was naked and he stood up waving a white handkerchief. The police shot him, to bits the story goes, using dumdum bullets.

The story of Heraud's death rocked the intellectual community in Lima. In 1963, Javier Heraud / Poesias Completas y Homenaje was published. I was shown this book by César Calvo, a Peruvian poet and one of Heraud's close friends, and I sent a copy of it to Paul Blackburn in New York suggesting that certain poems be translated. As I continued to live in Lima I thought more and more about why Heraud's death had touched off such a response in Peru, and since the poems Blackburn was translating were written before his political commitment I decided it was unfair to the particular arc of Heraud's career to say nothing in Quena about the commitment and his death. I talked with Calvo about it and he suggested I translate an essay called "The Death of Javier Heraud" by a San Marcos professor and poet, Washington Delgado. I talked to others and they agreed. For the first time I felt a tremor of interest in Quena by Peruvians I respected, and after reading Delgado's essay I was surprised when Calvo told me: "They won't let you print that—but if they do, I'm with you all the way."

The essay says, in effect, that as an older friend of Javier, Delgado is shocked by the news and disturbed by the newspaper reportage that Heraud was a young misguided fool. Delgado says he wants to question this and also to question the usual criticism of guerrilla activity on the ground that it uses violence. Delgado says that violence is daily fare in Peru, in jungle and in city, and that the guerrilla introduces nothing new but attempts to lessen violence. Delgado admits that he is merely a little bourgeois professor of Spanish literature at San Marcos and thus not the man ultimately to defend Heraud—but that he does know that Heraud was not a fool, that he believed in what he was doing, and that he had the guts to live out his convictions. His death in this sense has meaning. I felt that the essay, besides its "news" interest to North American readers, raised an important question: what is the poet's task in a society where thousands are horribly oppressed? Can he sit in his study and type poems while Indians are dying of starvation out in the street?

I presented the first issue of Quena in manuscript to Spohnholz (it came to 150 pages of which the Delgado made up 5). He returned it two days later, smiling. "This is an excellent job," he said, "you have done what you said you would do." He added: "I wonder, however, why you have included this piece of journalism by Delgado, since Quena is a literary journal."

We argued and I apparently convinced Spohnholz that the Delgado essay was not a political piece of writing, that while it dealt with a political event, it was valid as literature and that its inclusion in Quena would prove something to Peruvian artists about ICPNA. The following night Spohnholz came to my apartment and said the issue would go to press with the Delgado essay in it. The next day, in his office, he told me that he had shown all of the Heraud material to the U. S. Embassy officer, Fred Barcroft, and that Barcroft had told him the Delgado piece could not be printed. I told Spohnholz that I would not withdraw the essay. Spohnholz then consulted with members of the board of directors and Barcroft again, and the next day told me that all plans for Quena had been canceled.

I thought at the time that if there had been one Peruvian of importance (Calvo was not considered important by ICPNA since he was only a poet) who had stood by me in my refusal to withdraw the Delgado essay, at least the first issue of Quena might have been saved. (Here I think of my futile attempt to meet the influential critic Alberto Escobar. At a crucial point in Quena's unfolding, a friend of mine tried to arrange a meeting. Escobar, on hearing who I was and what I was doing in Lima, said we would meet soon enough.) Today I don't believe that it would have made any difference because ICPNA, as a State Department-directed agency, could not back writing that deals with any activity not in support of American foreign policy. When Spohnholz said "apolitical," what he meant was castrated art: "art" that reflects the official line. In the manuscript that I presented to Spohnholz were six of my translations from Human Poems of César Vallejo. There were no objections to these translations appearing in Quena. Spohnholz knew that Vallejo was a Communist and if he had read the translations carefully he would have known that the matrix of Vallejo's thought is violently anti-capitalist. However, Spohnholz (or Barcroft) did not object to printing Vallejo because Vallejo is a national hero (mainly because the Peruvians haven't read him either), a monument—dead.

A week after the cancellation I went to the institute for a pay settlement. Spohnholz told me that according to Peruvian law if I quit I would receive one month's pay, but if I was fired the institute would have to pay me for three months. So, I said, pay me for three months. But really now, Spohnholz said, you didn't hold up to your end of our arrangement and besides, it is not a clear matter whether you quit or were fired — don't you think three months' pay is asking too much? After I told him I would settle for two, Spohnholz left the office and returned with a check that had previously been made out for the three months' salary. I really wasn't playing with you, he said; it's just that I'm still trying to find out who you are.

A Class of Tormented Creoles

THE CENTURY AFTER CORTES. By Fernando Benitez. Translated by Joan MacLean. University of Chicago Press. 296 pp. $7.50.

GORDON K. LEWIS

Mr. Lewis is professor of political science at the University of Puerto Rico and the author of Puerto Rico: Freedom and Power in the Caribbean (Monthly Review Press).

This English translation of Fernando Benitez's brilliantly sketched Vida Criolla en el Siglo XVI comes as a happy addition to the new radical scholarship on Hispanic colonialism in the hemisphere—Gibson's Aztecs under Spanish Rule, for example, and Simpson's edition of the English translation of Chevalier's monumental Land and Society in Colonial Mexico. Working, like those other scholars, from a massive base of archival and printed sources, Benitez re-creates a representative cross section of Mexican experience in the 16th century. Gibson was concerned with the vast trauma of severe social dislocation worked upon the Indian-Aztec culture in the three centuries between the Conquest and Independence. Benitez is concerned primarily with the subtle formation of the class of tormented criollos, the second-generation conquistadores who were faced with the tremendous task of forging a New World culture-focus which could become the crucible of Mexican nationalism.

If the semi-mythical warrior-heroes of the pre-Colombian empire have been enrolled in the national Mexican Pantheon as the first Mexicans, Benitez persuasively argues that the title more legitimately belongs to the creolized sons of the original conquerors, forced, despite themselves, to hammer out a Spanish-American consciousness under the terrible pressures of their grotesque anomaly.

For the book is an account, at times overly melodramatic but basically historically correct, of the Mexican Creole tragedy. The Creole psychopathology was one, at bottom, of cultural ambivalence. It belonged to the new Mexican society, but it did not own it. It was the child of the conquistadores but it had lost their capacity for fierce action and merely retained their more decadent features: the fondness for narrative, for the anecdote, a Hispanic fascination with the world. It hated the outsiders, the manos blancas—a sure index of Creole sentiment—but its aristocratic bias could not lead it to a social-political alliance with the Indian and mestizo masses whose slavery, indeed, it accepted. Its typical figure, as Benitez analyzes him, was a creolized nobleman whose breeding conflicted with the constitution of his new society; he wrote epic poems celebrating wars about which he knew only by hearsay, or composed Petrarchan sonnets about things that never belonged to the New World.

Not the least fascinating aspect of the book is the detailed annotation of this general human disease. It is there, as Benitez shows, in the mannered elegance of a decadent prose and poetry, Juan Suarez's Tratado, for example, still living in the archaic, enchanted world of West Indian chivalry untouched by Cervantian caricature. It is there in the Creole historians, like the Dorantes de Carranza whose florid post-mortem on his own class of worn-out Creole gentlemen is in marked contrast to the vital passion of the conquistador historians like Bernal Diaz. It is there in figures like the Martín Cortés who shared with the local Indian nobleman class all the typically Creole anti-Spanish prejudices, but also shared its class hostility to the Indian poor. Both shared a common hostility, as poor claimants in viceregal antechambers, to the nouveaux riches flooding in from Spain to replace them, as well as a common aversion to plebeian employment. It is there, finally, in the tragic incapacity for effective revolt. To read the account of the collapse of the conspiracy of the Marqués del Valle in the 1560s is to be made forcefully aware of how defeatism can easily overwhelm a social class that has inherited power and privilege but not created them. Its members inherited from their fathers greed, a sense of exile, a pathetic obsession with aristocracy, but had lost their raw courage, so that, as Benitez phrases it, they weep over their own martyrdom and plan their own funeral.

The contrast with the later developments in the young United States is instructive. Unlike Spanish colonialism, British colonialism was comparatively inoppressive; its historical time span, in its impact upon the New World society, was shorter, especially in the American case; above all, the colonists' struggle against the metropolitan power was not fatally compromised by the presence of a vast native slave-proletariat potentially fit for social revolt against both the Creole and the imperial oppressor classes. In much the same way, the planter class of the old regime in the West Indies sugar islands failed to follow the example of the American Revolutionary War against Britain, because the fear of a Haitian-like slave rebellion stayed their nationalist-Creole instincts. Whereas in the American democracy after 1787, Crèvecoeur's "new man," the dynamic homo americanus, became the leading American hero-figure, in Spanish Mexico he failed to emerge, suffocated by the oppressive atmosphere of the Creole paradise.

Even more. Benitez notes, perceptively, the continuing power of the anachronous criollo mentality in contemporary Mexican life. The student of the contemporary Caribbean will recognize similar features there, what Rene Marqués has termed the puertorriqueño docil in Puerto Rico, for example, or the social anarchism and the negative attitudes to public authority of the Trinidadian picaroon society, summed up so well in the general temper of the carnival calypso. What is lacking, however, is first, a failure to explain why the inferiority complex of the colonial mentality thus manages to survive, for social attitudes and prejudices do not perpetuate themselves: they must be continuously nourished by present social forces; and second, a failure to identify the social forces in the contemporary situation that will finally crush the colonial mentality as decisively as a nationalist-intellectual like Benitez demands. We have, in this particular book, an impressive analysis of the disease; but it is unaccompanied by a persuasive prescription of cure.

Gongora Without Gongorism

THE SOLITUDES OF DON LUIS de GONGORA: A Text with Verse Translation. By Edward Meryon Wilson. Cambridge University Press. 131 pp. $3.95.

OLIVER T. MYERS

Mr. Myers teaches Spanish at the University of California (Davis). His articles and reviews have appeared in Hispanic Review, Modern Language Notes and other journals.

As long as the 17th-century Spanish poet Luis de Góngora is thought of merely as an exponent of Gongorism, much as de Sade has until recently been associated only with sadism, he will remain unread by those who might best appreciate him. Gongorism is a sneer term for the worst of literary perversities; it has become a convenient way to sum up empty affectation and convoluted style in a single term, and is now almost standard when one wishes to dispose of a certain type of posturing littérateur. Gongorism has been set alongside the extravagances of Euphuism and Marinism, as Spain's peculiar outcropping of that strange literary formation, the Baroque, which, it is said, is so typical of Spain because of the odd way Spaniards think. The trouble is that Góngora, the poet, is not very well described as Gongoristic, and as a poet is a far greater creative talent than any of the Gongorists, in Spain or elsewhere. The trouble is, too, that as a writer he is only a poet, which is a way of saying that he is not a philosopher, theologian, satirist, humanist or naturalist.

One should not expect in Góngora depth of thought (or indeed "thought" at all) or richness of human emotion. These are after all infra-poetic values. And despite the narrative framework of the Solitudes and the Fable of Polyphemus and Galatea, no one reads these masterworks for inventiveness of event and character. Góngora was not developing his special methods merely to ornament some stolid, conventional tale (that would be Gongoristic). He was creating a new world in pure poetry, where the realness lay in the unbroken chain of metaphor, symbol and trope; where ordinary events come to pass only as an excuse for poetic transformation, and where ordinary objects exist only in order to reveal their true, Neoplatonic essence. But it is precisely in this act of metaphorical transformation that his genius as poet reaches its heights. For in populating the pseudo-mythological world of the Solitudes he has room for only the most highly refined distillate of what people and things are, and they are brought into being as images two or three times removed from their original form.

Interpretations of the Solitudes along the lines just given are of quite recent growth, and were as novel in our times as were the Solitudes themselves in theirs. The 300th anniversary of Góngora's death marked the critical turning point. In 1927, Dámaso Alonso brought out his edition of text, prose rendering and notes, which has been called a "poetic manifesto" because of its effect on the young poets of the 1920s who are now often referred to as the "generation of '27." It was not Góngora's style in its difficulties and Latinizing that was to be emulated but rather the ideal of "pure poetry."

For English readers the Alonso edition yielded one special bonus, a translation in verse by Edward M. Wilson made in 1928-30 while he was a student in Madrid. Although published in 1931, this version has not become widely known in America, and just a year ago an unauthorized and mutilated reprinting came out in New York, precisely at the termination of the copyright. The present edition by the Cambridge University Press, revised from the 1931 printing and containing the standard Spanish text on facing pages is therefore the one to get, since Mr. Wilson has given nonreaders of Spanish a safe path to Góngora. (Those who read Spanish will also welcome the companion Poems of Góngora, Spanish text of the Polyphemus and much of the earlier, easier poetry, together with the First Solitude, with extensive introduction and notes by R. O. Jones, also published by Cambridge.)

There has been considerable discussion of the art of translation with rhetorical wonderings as to whether it is possible to translate poetry at all. What comes through the translator of a poet is usually the nonpoetic translatables, the philosophical musings, the narration, the baldly stated images and figures. Or the translator writes an original poem in his own language, employing devices and structures from his own literary tradition which are analogues to those of his model. This latter course, much to be preferred, is the one that Wilson has followed, and with considerable success. He has recourse to alliteration, not normal in Spanish, and to other techniques borrowed from our own poets of the 17th century, imitating their "conceits" rather than dully reproducing Góngora's chains word for word.

Despite the virtues of Wilson's translation, it is still doubtful that one can get from reading it the same sort of special pleasures to be had from the original. Góngora's Latinate syntax, almost possible in Spanish but ludicrous in English, is wisely avoided. But what can be done to suggest the mounting excitement one feels in the syntactic tensions that stretch over vast sections of verse? What can be attempted to reproduce the compression of multiple images into a short span of syllables by omission of articles and relators, leaving only the unadorned nouns? How could one achieve the same effects of gradual revelation of truth that are realized when words are placed in precisely the right order, without regard to the normal demands of sentence structure? This might be attained by falling into the 20th-century stream of freely flowing vers libre, which would certainly facilitate the translator's task. But then nothing would be left to suggest Góngora's virtuosity as metricist. What we can hope for is that the circumstances of republication will bring this pioneer of "pure" poetry to the attention of those who may have been put off by Góngora's notoriety before, and who will now have a chance to see for themselves whether there is justification for his fame, either as Baroque obscurantist or as brilliant prophet.

Freedom's High-Water Mark

EXPANDING LIBERTIES: Freedom's Gain in Postwar America. By Milton R. Konvitz. The Viking Press. 429 pp. $8.95.

FRANK J. DONNER

Mr. Donner is a New York attorney who specializes in constitutional law and civil liberties cases. He is the author of The Un-Americans (Ballantine).

Writings such as Dr. Konvitz's about the emergence or development of personal freedoms as reflected in Supreme Court decisions are risky ventures. There is the familiar danger of a foreshortened perspective. Investigators in the field of freedom are highly susceptible to the Hegelian spell of History as the Unfolding of the Idea of Freedom ("the quest for the dream"), filling the air with premature cries of Excelsior—in this case about "freedom's gains in postwar America."

The precarious fate of Supreme Court decisions in this area makes them difficult to handle in a short-term chronicle. Not every decision, no matter how rhetorically comforting it may be at the time it is handed down, is "expanded" into a "liberty." The Supreme Court has become a powerful instrument of public order because some of its decisions do more than resolve controversies between particular litigants; they play a policy-making, norm-enforcing role. The institutionalization of a decision is a complex, elusive process involving the interaction of law, society and politics. We are learning more all the time about why one decision produces a generalized impact—as in the case of the Court's decisions in the area of race relations, criminal justice and legislative apportionment—and why another turns out to have been writ in water.

The 1957 Watkins decision (not discussed by Dr. Konvitz) was hailed as "a landmark in the history of human freedom" and appeared to place the House Committee on Un-American Activities under a conditional death sentence if Congress did not give precision to its loosely drawn mandate. Congress did nothing and the Committee is alive and kicking. The Jehovah's Witnesses decisions in the fifties—protecting public communications against municipal invasion—appeared to have established a body of law as enduring as bronze, but their impact vanished with the controversies that spawned them. And even decisions which became nationally respected "liberties," such as the picketing decisions of the forties, lost their vitality with changes in the social and economic circumstances and in the composition of the Supreme Court.

The temptation to discover "gains" in this area becomes well-nigh irresistible because of the breakthroughs in related areas. Change is in the air; "freedom," broadly defined, is expanding. And it can no longer be questioned that a primary reason for the political acceptance of the enlarged role of the Court is that it is the only organ in our national life with sufficient power and prestige effectively to resolve the impasse between local prejudice and nationally shared values; minority groups, lacking other meaningful representation, have become the Court's special constituency. It is easy to substitute possibility for reality

The Wesleyan Poetry Program

"The series has maintained a miraculously high level."
—Robert Penn Warren

"Any library collection concerned with the life of poetry beyond mid-century should include the remarkable volumes of the Wesleyan Poetry Program." —CHOICE

Just Published

TURNER CASSITY:
Watchboy, What of the Night?

HARVEY SHAPIRO:
Battle Report

Selected Poetry Backlist

JOHN ASHBERY:
The Tennis Court Oath
ROBERT BLY:
Silence in the Snowy Fields
TRAM COMBS:
saint thomas. poems.
DONALD DAVIE:
Events and Wisdoms
JAMES DICKEY:
Buckdancer's Choice
JOHN HAINES:
Winter News
RICHARD HOWARD:
Quantities
DAVID IGNATOW:
Figures of the Human
VASSAR MILLER:
My Bones Being Wiser
W. R. MOSES:
Identities
DONALD PETERSEN:
The Spectral Boy
VERN RUTSALA:
The Window
JON SILKIN:
Poems New and Selected
LOUIS SIMPSON:
At the End of the Open Road
JAMES WRIGHT:
The Branch Will Not Break

Uniformly priced: each $4.00 cloth, $1.85 paper

THE WESLEYAN EDITION OF THE WORKS OF HENRY FIELDING

JOSEPH ANDREWS, Edited by Martin C. Battestin; Textual Introduction by Fredson Bowers

500 pages October 20 $10.00

Wesleyan University Press
Middletown, Connecticut 06457

and to transpose what has occurred in one sector of the broad field of human rights to a neighboring sector where change is still inchoate.

Dr. Konvitz has, in varying degrees, succumbed to all of the distorting enticements here outlined. His book, which purports to survey advances in First Amendment protections ranging from restraints on censorship to international conventions on human rights, is more persuasive as an argument for expanding certain First Amendment freedoms than as a demonstration that they have in fact been expanded. The Southern sit-ins do have a strong claim to protection as a form of communication; a cold eye should be cast on invasions of freedom of speech on the ground that they are violence-inciting; it is high time that international human rights enjoyed domestic recognition. Dr. Konvitz's discussion of these and other matters is first-rate advocacy but not an accurate account of our "expanding liberties." And it is the passion of advocacy alone which leads him to the conclusion that the Supreme Court decisions secularizing the schools are "among the great liberating works of the spirit," comparable "in importance with the work of Pope John XXIII," or that the Court's obscenity cases (discussed without the benefit of the recent Ginzburg decision) have "changed, and will continue to change, the inner life of every American" and are "revolutionary . . . and radically deep," or that the Court's decisions involving academic freedom mark the "emergence of a new constitutional liberty" (a singularly euphoric pronouncement of a constitutional summer with scarcely a swallow in sight).

Many of Dr. Konvitz's insights are valuable. He deftly synthesizes the "establishment" and "free exercise" clauses of the First Amendment, showing that state aid to one's own religion is coercive and an interference with its free exercise. A powerful chapter sketches the way in which the prior decisions of the Court, executive orders and state statutes forced breaches in the "separate but equal" citadel of Plessy v. Ferguson to make way for its final fall in 1954. The Brown case in that year desegregating the public schools was thus both an end and a beginning. The sit-in and protest movements which followed it not only overcame specific discriminatory practices but at the same time channeled pressures on Congress for passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The final legislation came just in time to abate criminal cases involving sit-ins in the Supreme Court and thousands of others pending in the state courts which, without the shelter of the Civil Rights Act, might have resulted in mass convictions and triggered wholesale violence and social crisis. Thousands who fought to make the statute possible were thus in the end the first beneficiaries of it. Dr. Konvitz tells this story with an almost religious compassion for the bravery and suffering of the participants. His account is resonant with Biblical overtones of a miraculous, divine deliverance.

One might profit from the book despite its diffusion and overheated prose simply by substituting his "ought" for the author's "is." But the profit is wiped out by the author's misleading treatment of the Court's decisions involving political dissent. Konvitz does not write about political dissent from the inside of his subject, as in his discussion of religious freedom, equal rights and censorship. He ignores the key relationship of political dissent to self-government (his "progress" thesis requires him to insist that religious liberty, not the right to political dissent, "transcends in importance and influence all other liberties") and fails to recognize the gravity of the Court's abandonment of an earlier constitutional standard ("preferred position" and "clear and present danger") and its replacement by a formula ("balancing") which rewrites and dilutes the First Amendment. The Court now assumes—virtually as a matter of law—that the nation is under a threat of internal subversion of such menacing proportions as to justify any invasion of political rights of claimed subversives (Aristotle's "invented terror"). This cold-war thesis is in turn systematically exploited at every level of our national life to handicap the achievement of vital national goals from desegregation to the elimination of poverty. And the Court's departure from precedent in cases involving supposed subversives is no mere puzzling inconsistency, as Konvitz would have it, but a refusal to give political dissenters the constitutional protections accorded to others.

The disaster of the Court's decisions in the Smith Act is, according to Dr. Konvitz, really a blow for freedom: "In an imperfect world, perhaps it has all come about as well as could be expected. . . . Sometimes things work out as if there were a pre-established harmony."

Even the McCarran Act—with its attainderlike "findings of fact," its built-in verdict, self-accusation, self-incrimination and detention-camp provisions—gets high marks because it provides "fair administrative procedures, subject to judicial review." Presumably, the McCarran Act is one of "freedom's gains" because, as Dr. Konvitz sees it, it "discredited" Executive Order 9835 (the Loyalty Order of President Truman) which failed to provide for hearings:

> In matters of this kind, the reverse of Gresham's Law should be operative; the superior and genuine [the McCarran Act and its 1954 Amendment] should drive from the field the inferior and false [the President's Loyalty Order]. Since Congress has provided for the former, it should bring to an end the latter. The needs of security do not require coexistence of the unfair procedures alongside the fair.

This face-lifting project in the name of progress needs only a final cosmetic touch to complete the transformation:

> The Congressional legislation we have examined is, on the whole, a tribute to the moderation and good sense of Congress. The statutes are not an expression of extremism and do not show a flagrant disregard of constitutional principles.

This conclusion finds no support in responsible opinion. Of the Smith Act, Zechariah Chafee, Jr., our greatest authority on the First Amendment, wrote that it imposes "the most drastic restrictions on freedom of speech ever enacted in the United States during peace." Equally forceful criticisms have been made of the McCarran Act by President Truman himself and even by Attorney General Katzenbach who is charged with its enforcement. The infiltration statute of 1954 with its quasi-outlawry of the Communist Party is wholly indefensible. For reasons which are hardly inscrutable, Dr. Konvitz has shunned the subject of the Supreme Court's response to legislative investigations of subversion. Perhaps it is just as well.

Of the overall performance of the Court in protecting political dissent, Prof. Martin Shapiro has recently written that, despite the First Amendment's "obviously crucial importance to the preservation of our system of government . . . the Court has committed itself less firmly to the First Amendment than to nearly any other of the individual rights specifically guaranteed by the Constitution." This judgment is shared by most students of the Court.

Dr. Konvitz has dealt with his own prefatory caution against optimism as cavalierly as he has the Supreme Court decisions about which he writes. A fresh cheer has been added to the chorus of self-congratulation and self-approval which has transformed freedom into a hoaxlike American ideology. In taking as his models Dr. Pangloss and Pollyanna, Dr. Konvitz has done a disservice both to freedom and to scholarship.

Dying Like A True Rebel

THE CASE OF JOE HILL. By Philip Foner. International Publishers. 127 pp. $3.50.

THE LETTERS OF JOE HILL. Edited by Philip Foner. Oak Publications. 96 pp. $1.95 paper.

PAUL COWAN

Mr. Cowan is presently with the Peace Corps. He has worked in Maryland and Mississippi with the civil rights movement and has published articles in The Village Voice, Dissent, Esquire and other publications.

Memories are short, history is often unkind, and the literary world's chief catalogue, Books in Print, which is used to arrange and locate books in most libraries and stores, lists Philip Foner's book, The Case of Joe Hill, under the heading: "Mysteries and Suspense, including true crime."

Yet in 1915, this celebrated case of a troubadour-organizer for the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) attracted national and international attention. Twice in the month before Hill's execution, President Woodrow Wilson mailed personal letters to the Governor of Utah asking that the death sentence be commuted so that the entire case could be reviewed. (Wilson's intervention was regarded by the Utah authorities as an outrageous invasion of States' rights.) Public officials and penal authorities were receiving thousands of letters each day requesting that Hill be released. In Sweden, where Hill had been born, a section of the government was involved in an effort to obtain clemency for the doomed IWW organizer. And tens of thousands of Australian dock workers, during that month, refused to load American goods.

But despite all these pressures, early on the morning of November 19, 1915, Joe Hill was killed by a firing squad in Salt Lake City. The night before his death, in a famous telegram to Bill Haywood, a leader of the IWW, he asked that the organization take care of his funeral: "I don't want to be caught dead in Utah." The ceremony was held in Chicago, and 30,000 people attended. One local paper reported: "The entire city is still wondering what kind of people they [the IWW members] are who mourn in brilliant crimson instead of somber black, and who march to the final resting place of a fallen fellow worker singing battle songs instead of dirges and lamentations." Joe Hill's ashes were scattered in all the United States, except Utah, and in parts of Europe. Another sentence he had written in the wire to Haywood became a rallying call for a variety of radical organizations: "Don't mourn for me—organize."

Yet if he had never become a cause célèbre, he still would have been an important American figure. As a vagabond song writer—jotting down on scraps of paper lyrics that would later be echoed by thousands of workers—he was the ancestor of such later folk poets as Bob Dylan and Woody Guthrie. As an organizer (to judge from The Letters of Joe Hill, all of which were written while he was in prison) he was, like some members of the New Left, uncompromising in his concern for people rather than bureaucracies—for principles rather than political expedience.

Hill was limited by his background. A semi-educated Swede who had sailed once around the world before settling in the United States, his letters speak of his love for music and his regret that he had never been able to acquire any formal training. In addition, the songs he wrote were often tailored to the narrow needs of the people who would be singing them. By setting sentimental rebel lyrics to the tunes of old hymns like Blood of the Lamb ("There's a pow'r, there's a pow'r/ In a band of working men/When they stand/hand in hand"), or of familiar songs like My Old Kentucky Home ("We will sing one song of the meek and humble slave/The horny-handed son of the soil"), he was trying, as he said, to "succeed in reaching a great number of workers who are too unintelligent and too indifferent to read a pamphlet or an editorial on economic science."

One of the songs Hill wrote while in prison, Rebel Girl, indicates how he might have developed if he had remained free to write for a more sophisticated audience. The song was inspired by Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, with whom Hill seems to have fallen in love after an hour-long visit outside his cell and the correspondence that followed. ("I would like to kiss you goodbye," he wrote her in a farewell letter, "not because you are [just] a girl, but because you are the original Rebel Girl.") While the song's lyrics are somewhat turgid, its melody, which Hill wrote himself, is haunting and complex. But the song was not as well received in the West as Hill's simpler numbers. "I guess . . . the Easterners have more 'Kultur' than the Western roughnecks," he wrote Miss Flynn.

Hill's letters show that he was always thinking of his art—he discusses his songs with much more intensity than he does his case—and that he spent a good deal of time musing about Miss Flynn. These lively concerns make his attitude about his execution even more astonishing: that given the chance to remain alive, he chose to die rather than compromise a principle.

The case against Joe Hill was built on the murder of a prominent citizen of Salt Lake City. For Hill, the central issue was the procedure governing his first trial. In a letter to the Salt Lake Telegram, Hill pointed out that "there had to be a 'goat.' " He felt that he had been chosen because he was a "friendless tramp, a Swede and, worst of all, an IWW who had no right to live anyway." It was the simple principle that a man is innocent until proved guilty, which he refused to compromise. He asserted that the evidence against him had been wholly contrived by the prosecution: that the anti-labor feeling in Salt Lake City—accentuated by a hostile press—made it impossible for jurors to judge him fairly. Testimony had been forged during the trial, time sequences changed, prejudiced jurors not challenged, motives manufactured by news reporters. Moreover, witnesses had changed their stories from day to day. "I am going to have a new trial or die trying," he wrote to the Utah Board of Pardons.

In the midst of the national furor, the Board of Pardons offered Hill clemency if he would agree to quit discussing his case publicly. He explained his refusal in a letter to Elizabeth Gurley Flynn: "I suppose they are going to give me life

Cuba!
A major American novel of the Revolution:
"THE YOKE
AND THE STAR"
by Tana de Gámez (Bobbs-Merrill, $5.95)
"A fascinating story written with great historical authority and the deepest sense of humanity."
—Maxwell Geismar

COMMENTARY
WORLD'S BEST MAGAZINE?
Commentary
SEE FOR YOURSELF
☐ 7 Mo. Trial
$4.79
☐ 12 Mo. $8⁰⁰
COMMENTARY, NA
165 East 56 St., NY, NY
☐ Bill me.
☐ Check enclosed.
Name.....................
Address.................
Zip.........................
Outside USA + $1/yr.

if I beg for it real nice. Now I'll tell you, Gurley, I never did like the ring of that word 'pardon,' and I think I'd rather be buried dead than buried alive. I never 'licked the hand that held the whip' yet, and I don't see why I should have to start now." It was an attitude that seems to have satisfied Hill aesthetically as well as politically. "I have lived like an artist and I shall die like an artist," he concluded in his letter to the Salt Lake Telegram. "I will die like a true rebel," he told friends in the IWW.

Hill's letters afford a view of the man's personality and life; but they raise human questions which only an imaginative historian can answer. Although Philip Foner, in The Case of Joe Hill, makes a strong case for Hill against the Utah courts, he does not choose to search beneath the old court records and the musty newspaper clippings to uncover the personality of the defendant. Was it entirely for his principles that Hill chose to be executed? In Wallace Stegner's novel, The Preacher and the Slave, based on Hill's life, the protaganist says: "'I want to die like a martyr. . . .' The words were like the striking of a light, for having said them he knew that they were true and had been true from the beginning." Can this be the truth about Hill? At 31, involved in his art, in love with a woman, was he moved by motives that were so crudely masochistic? Philip Foner notes the words of a Salt Lake Telegram reporter: "He believes himself a martyr. He feels that he is giving his life to advance the spirit of fair trial in Utah." Foner comments: "One is privileged, like some writers, to sneer at this. But there is little doubt that Joe Hill felt it sincerely, even though he did write to Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, 'I have absolutely no desire to be one of them what-ye-call-'em-martyrs!'"

Men like Joe Hill are dropped too quickly out of American history studies. Why are their stories so rarely discussed in the colleges and graduate schools, or by the professional writers? American historians do not treat an unflinching rebel like Hill with enough importance to look beneath his manifest anger for the complexities he represents, and thereby lose much of the subtlety of our history: the severe conflicts that split so many reformist or revolutionary groups, and the varied ideas of social change that led men to form so many competing organizations. In his preface, Philip Foner notes that though Alfred Hayes and Earl Robinson wrote a song, Wallace Stegner a novel, and Barrie Stavis a play about Joe Hill, accounts of his case are noticeably absent from standard American histories. That is a fault these two little books work to correct.

WORLD'S BEST?

TRY IT AND SEE

☐ 7-month subscription —$4.79 (reg. $8 per year)

☐ Commentary Card catalog—10¢ (handsome reproductions of historic Jewish art)

COMMENTARY NA
165 East 56th Street
New York, N.Y. 10022

Name
Address
City State Zip

BUY YOUR BOOKS
through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to The Nation.

Please address your orders to
THE NATION
Reader's Service Division
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

ARCHITECTURE / ERVIN GALANTAY

Mr. Galantay is an associate professor of architecture at Columbia University and practices as a consultant in urban design.

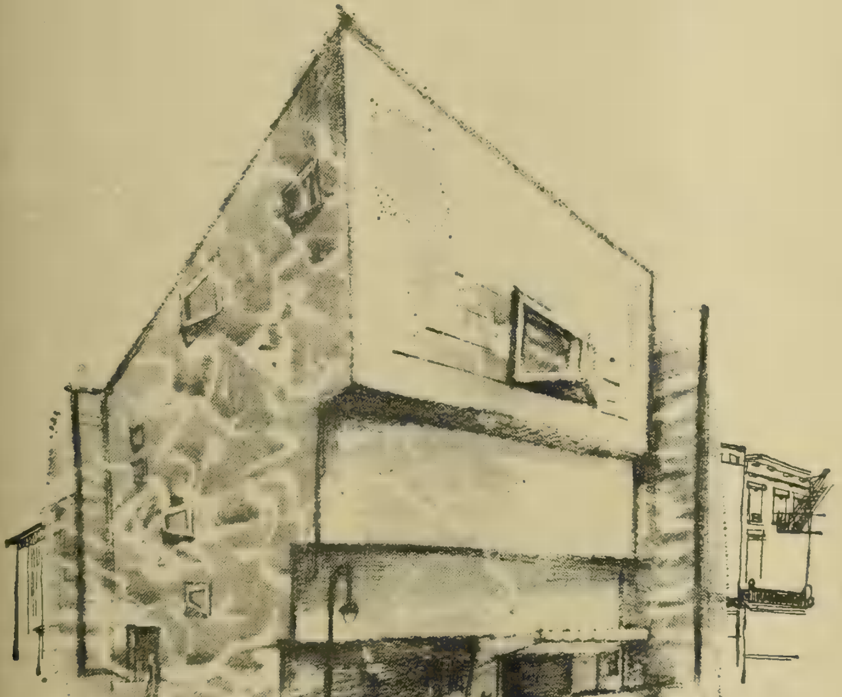
The decision of the Whitney Museum of American Art to erect a new building on Madison Avenue in New York marked its advance from adolescence to manhood among New York's museums. Having been thought of for many years as a promising nephew of the brilliant Museum of Modern Art, it now purports to become an independent force and a major component in the city's pattern of cultural institutions. The Whitney's rise will certainly be helped by its excellent location on a spine of galleries, antique shops and museums stretching from 57th Street to the "magnets" of the Guggenheim and the Metropolitan. This area has become the world's greatest art market now that Americans have discovered that "paintings can yield profit with honor," as Charles Abrams puts it in The City Is the Frontier. The new museum will strengthen the existing linear pattern and avoid fostering the Lincoln Center type of nodal concentration, denounced by Percival Goodman and other critics who would prefer a greater spread of institutions to enliven more sectors of the city. Too great a distance from the center would have cut the appeal of the museum, as witness the empty halls of the Brooklyn Museum during lunch hour compared, say, to the Frick Gallery. Easy access to office workers who can drop in for a few minutes is undoubtedly one of the keys to the success of the Museum of Modern Art (yet when the Whitney occupied the adjoining location it suffered from being second choice to its neighbor).

The appointment of Marcel Breuer as architect for the new museum may turn out to be an asset equal to the excellent choice of site. Hungarian born, an alter Kämpfer of the legendary Bauhaus, Breuer is a leader in the mannerist coterie of New York architects, and his design promised on paper to offer more than yet another exercise in the curtain-wall vernacular. Soon Madison Avenue's sidewalk superintendents were marveling at the outlandish structure slowly taking shape on the corner of 75th Street. Growing out of its moat, a concrete box boldly unfolded itself in three projecting shelves. The few orifices of the box were shaped into sharp-angled protrusions and the top shelf, facing the avenue, was outfitted with an enormous Cyclops eye that stared uptown as if to command the approaches from the Metropolitan Museum of Art.

As the structure neared completion, a facing of dark granite was applied to the concrete — to the undisguised relief of many neighbors — and the building now stands complete: a dignified if somewhat odd fellow, quiet, urbane, dark and virile, it invites comparison with the pseudo-Venetian frills of the Huntington Hartford, the somewhat bloodless elegance of Philip Johnson's galleries, or the dynamic arrogance of the Gugggenheim Museum. Breuer is a good-humored, fatherly man with true-blue eyes, his white hair cut in geometric fashion like the late Bertolt Brecht's. His speech is rich with the accents of his native Baranya Province as he explains his design: "It is the site that suggested this solution. Elsewhere I would build differently." He likes José Luis Sert's buildings for the Maeght collection in the Provence; flooded with light, white. "In the Mediterranean I also would design for sun, use lighter colors. Here the quality of light is not dependable. Concrete does not age well in this dirty air; that is why we used granite veneer." Lest someone accuse him of not building according to Bauhaus ethics, he hastens to add: "Note that the granite is clearly expressed as facing. It does not try to imitate masonry."

Breuer did not choose the site and he would clearly have preferred to design the museum as a free-standing building. In its actual location the formal problems of a corner lot, and the functional headaches arising from its small size are aggravated by the fact that the museum is a "happening" in the larger experience of Madison Avenue. Baroque architects excelled in shaping their buildings to enhance the contained activity and still fit harmoniously into the larger pattern of urban space. This skill has since been lost, and I feel that even Breuer's solution is only partly successful. The building has a corner site, yet the volume does not turn the corner but presents its flank to 75th Street. It faces Madison Avenue with a show of contrasting volumes, overhanging box and open space below, clearly implying the entrance. On its southern boundary the museum rubs shoulders with leftover little brownstones which will surely not survive for long, and whatever building replaces them is likely to outbulk the Whitney. To parry in advance this undesirable effect, Breuer has pulled up a concrete wall along the property line; it looks stark at present but may eventually prove useful. In addition, the main volume of the museum has been set off from adjacent buildings by recessing the width of a stairwell and thus creating a "quasi free-standing" effect. The main entrance is indicated by a concrete canopy above the sunken sculpture court. Seen from the street, the busy shape of this canopy intersects the horizontals of the main buildings and conflicts with the powerful statement of the stepped overhanging volumes. From above, the sculpture court looks deep and rather narrow, but Breuer points out that on its own level it is felt as an extension of the sculpture gallery. The court may lack the sheltered privacy one used to enjoy in the garden of the Museum of Modern Art before the visitor explosion, but this is offset by the dynamic interaction between indoors and outdoors — the interpenetration of street space and gallery. The incident of the sunken court certainly enlivens the avenue and entices passers-by to enter and explore further.

Any reservations one may have had about the building vanish at the entrance: inside, one is struck by the balanced proportions of the space and the masterly handling of materials and detail. The building was obviously planned from the inside and with sympathetic understanding of how a museum works. As I was being shown around by curator John Gordon, who displayed the affectionate pride of a new home owner, I could not fail to contrast his attitude with the history of bitter controversy between director and architect of the Guggenheim Museum.



I am not one of the dyspeptic detractors of the Guggenheim, which is the shell of the most memorable interior in the city. And speaking as a museum addict rather than as an architect, I find that the Guggenheim offers unique experiences: it is possible to compare several paintings across the well, from a distance where the large lines of composition are most eloquent; at the same time, one can advance to close quarters for a study of grain and texture. This twofold enjoyment is absent in a corridor-type arrangement like Johnson's Utica Museum, where one is either close to a painting or approaches it from a distorting angle. The Whitney's galleries are not experimental in the sense of the Guggenheim, nor can they compete with the spatial drama of Wright's building. Instead, they offer a total internal flexibility that calls for creative effort on the part of the curator in arranging the displays, rather than reducing his freedom to deciding upon a hanging sequence. The spatial quality of the Whitney's interiors is better than any space in the Museum of Modern Art. This is especially noticeable on the fourth floor, a generous 125 feet long and nearly 18 feet high, which can be subdivided at will by a system of movable panels into an almost infinite number of combinations.

The ceiling of the galleries is a heavy concrete grid hung from the beams, with general illumination projected upward and tracks for spotlights on the under side. This is a great improvement over the conventional luminescent ceiling, which has a thin, industrial quality. Natural light floods the sculpture floor but the painting galleries are designed for artificial light, since Breuer feels that for pictures natural light changes too rapidly with moving clouds, sun and the reflection from adjacent façades. Another function of windows, ventilation, is removed by air conditioning; nor is there much incentive to provide views, since none of the neighboring structures merit a glance. This is a pity, for the dialogue between good old and new architecture — as between the Racquet Club and the Seagram Building, or the new Chase Tower and the Federal Reserve Bank — provides the high points of the urban scene. Such windows as there are in the Whitney exist to provide orientation with respect to the streets, and to relieve visual fatigue by permitting an occasional glimpse of the sky. The large "eye" of the top gallery is remarkably successful in this, and its side-lit surface has something of the quality admired in Vermeer's interiors.

Breuer's superb treatment of materials and detail deserves special mention; they restate in specific terms the importance of the building as a whole. The black stone sales desk in the lobby is a work of art, and the splendid railings of the stair remind one of Breuer's background as a master of furniture design. Compared to the oily touch of painted concrete in the Guggenheim, or the sissy paneling in the Huntington Hartford, or even the cold perfectionism of Johnson's interiors, Breuer's textures are a delight to touch or to walk upon, as well as to see. This success is the more remarkable since the 82,000 square feet of the building cost only $3.3 million or just $40 per square foot — a figure well below the cost of comparable structures.

The 19th-century public museum was a temple of culture, elevated on a throne of steps to humble the citizens who ascended to view the communal treasures. The contemporary museum has become a community center emphasizing adult education; its methods of stirring interest and attracting visitors are somewhat in the aggressive manner of a department store. In view of this trend, the Whitney's plant seems a bit old-fashioned; it offers a cafeteria, a members' lounge and a small auditorium, but it lacks classrooms and its library is not available to the public. Its present loan policy is not directed to individuals and the building is not programed to provide for a future large-scale loan operation.

The major weakness of the present design may be that the building is patterned for a finite size; growth has not been considered. The Whitney now owns only a few thousand objects, but with the art boom and the rising interest in American art it is clear that the collection will balloon. More space will be needed unless the directors decide to keep the volume of the collection constant. This could be achieved by periodic revision and auctions, thus constantly upgrading the core of the collection. Yet unlimited acquisitiveness is a characteristic of Western civilization and curators are reluctant to dispense with any part of their collection. John Gordon feels that taste and value judgments change so rapidly that a curator needs the hindsight of at least fifty years before he can safely assume the responsibility of releasing an item. The inevitable result is storage, but one of the roots of art, surely, is the desire to communicate and it is strangled if the art work is not on display. Most artists would prefer their work to be enjoyed by a few rather than wait for rediscovery in a museum warehouse. Perhaps it would be possible to establish museum branches in smaller towns or universities or to revolutionize the loan policy by lending to individuals. Either policy would save an ever-increasing percentage of the collection from gathering dust in remote storage. On the other hand, if the policy is unlimited acquisition for display, the expansion problem should have been faced. This might have led to a more "open-ended" building. Breuer says expansion could not be studied since the Whitney has no control over adjacent property. We need some form of legislation to enable an institution of national importance such as the Whitney to exercise a right of "first option" when adjacent property changes hands. Also, the architect of such an institution should have a degree of design control over plans for adjacent buildings to insure visual coordination. This would serve the aesthetic welfare of the community, but the guarantee of orderly development would also, I am sure, enhance surrounding land values.

THE LANDLORD

The landlord, his horse's head in our window, is unmoved by the startled cries of my friends.
Go away, I yell. Have you no conscience at all?
Can't you see we're entertaining! My wife is stricken, the children weeping. And my friends angrily question me. How do I know who he is, I say, near tears myself. Then I say to them, It's the landlord,

relieved to be able to speak of it to others, at last. But my friends catch sight of the animal's huge flanks and forelegs; their rage is frightening. Have you no decency, one says, telling us a thing like that. Just some more of your kind of nastiness. It's a fact, I reply. All the worse, my other friend says, at the door. And they depart.
I confess

I understand their indignation, but what are we to do? Move out? Find a landlord more human? Is there such an animal? (I've heard stories I could tell you.) Winter was tolerable; but now he warms to us. Already he's slaughtered our garden and gra-zes by appletrees in the field behind our house, devouring the pippins, the timothy. All night he wheezes and snorts. Mornings, standing naked, shaving, I hear the stallion's snickering whinney. This afternoon

I found him, in an unspeakable state, eyeing my wife. It's no use talking to him. Meanwhile the landlord is rubbing on the porch, my wife's run outside, stepping carefully I hope, only to return, sobbing; and the great public humiliation has begun.

STEPHEN PARKER

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 9-26-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME ____________

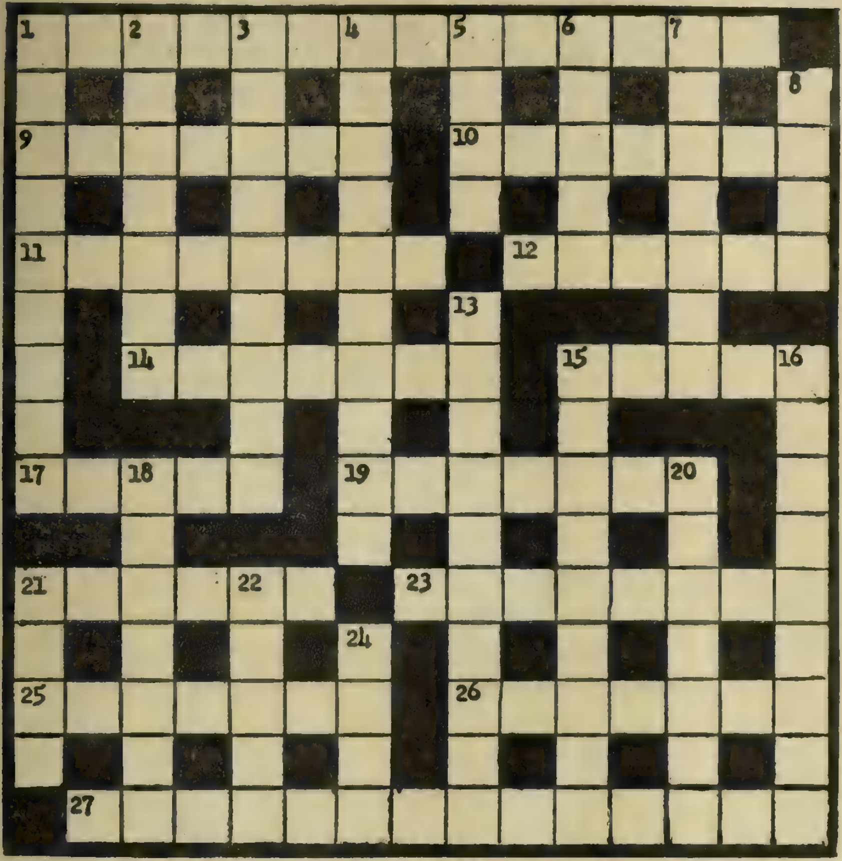
ADDRESS ____________

CITY ____________

STATE ________ ZIP NO. ______

Crossword Puzzle No. 1168

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 City-state, in short, with a certain amount of property for the revolutionary cause. (6, 8)
9 Its lens shows up what a joiner does, perhaps. (7)
10 See 15 across
11 Doesn't give a credit statement, obviously. (8)
12 Comes down quickly with a point touching two circles in addition to letters. (6)
14 and 23 Not one who counts on his fingers when the program calls for activity! (7, 8)
15 and 10 He is simply super, and certainly carries his point! (5-7)
17 The G.I. make-up of the crew? (5)
19 The quality of recent productions? (7)
21 Sounds asinine as a suggestion of one way to cook! (6)
25 Suggests some incredulity on the part of the non-professional, as money is commonly spent. (4, 3)
26 Come again? You'll recognize it in any writer, at ease! (7)
27 In the interim, impress political figures with it? (5, 9)

DOWN:

1 Many groceries have a fairly wide one, but it might be long in depression. (9)
2 Paid respects to the sealer in unhappy circumstances. (7)
3 Laughton's type of vigorous projection? (9)
4 Saying South Carolina is superior to North Carolina? (10)
5 Hit on the foot? (4)
6 One fell on unknown soil, poetically.
7 Shoots up periodically from this. (7)
8 Laid down by Ben Battle after a cannon-ball took off his legs. (4)
13 A rather drawn-out parliamentary procedure, but some shoot in it. (4-6)
15 The wakeful do, such as their nights might be! (9)
16 Bill may be unattached, when so like many a jumper after the hurdle. (9)
18 A cold mass usually has 13. (7)
20 Give a position to. (7)
21 One might be in uncomfortable position behind the 17 type. (4)
22 A Beethoven movement might be feeling after it. (5)
24 A 7 of the aspiring New York team?

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1167

ACROSS: 1 Brother-in-law; 10 Envying; 11 Packrat; 12 Manon; 13 Islington; 14 Dress shops; 16 Edda; 18 Saps; 20 and 7 Unfinished worsted; 23 On the spot; 25 Eliza; 27 Bearing; 28 Night letters. DOWN: 2 Revenge; 3 Thinness; 4 and 26 English on the ball; 5 Impel; 6 Lacing; 8 Bermuda shorts; 9 Standard gauge; 15 Printable; 17 Ci-devant; 19 Pattern; 21 Hairier; 22 Penang; 24 Pilot.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address requests to Puzzle Dept., The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London. $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002

HOMOSEXUAL theme fiction, non-fiction listing available free. Trojan Book Service, Box 2121B, Philadelphia, Pa. 19103.

HUMAN SEXUAL RESPONSE/Masters and Johnson. Send $10 to: J. Marle Brower, 7800 Essington, Philadelphia, Pa. 19153.

Antidote to Capote
History in the Open
Why fester in quicklime morbidness with his Dust-Bowl ghouls in locale of sodden dreariness when just beyond loom Rockies tops lit up gloriously (p. 85-87). Other episodes galore, all U.S. annals. PANORAMAS, concise text, unique insights. A real book innovation, its super-graphic pages absorbed at a glance.
$2 postpd., 200 pp., cloth
B. F. JOHNSON
Box 2306, San Diego, Calif. 92112

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), [illegible] Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

Legalize Abortion
Humanitarians and libertarians desiring to take independent lawful action to quicken legalization of abortion are invited to contact:
LEGALIZE ABORTION
P.O.B. 24163, Los Angeles, Cal. 90024

$2.95 each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF THE NATION

- Each file holds a full year's copies.
- Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.
- Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send check or money order.

MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

ADVERTISE YOUR NEEDS
IN THE NATION

FREE! With every new subscription to

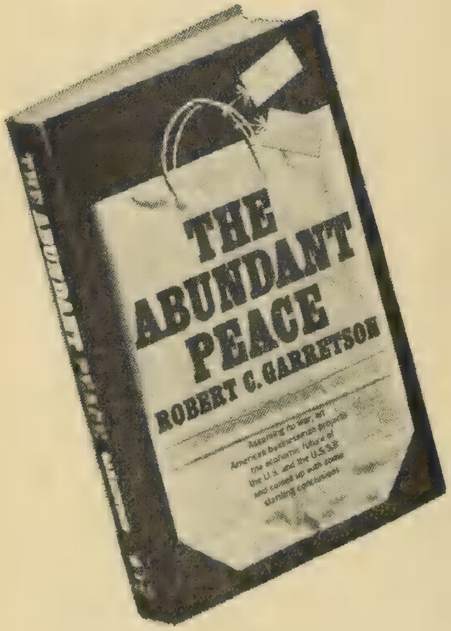
THE NATION

THE ABUNDANT PEACE



by Robert C. Garretson. World Publishing Company — 255 pp. — Hardback edition. Original price $5.95.

- Executive Vice President of the Carling Brewing Company, Robert C. Garretson spent many months in the Soviet Union in 1930 and 1931 as representative of an American manufacturing company. He has since kept in close touch with the industrial developments in the Soviet Union and on a recent return visit conferred with many Russian industrial executives and economists.

- Those who read Mr. Garretson's Nation article: "Why Fight? Ruble-Dollar Road to Peace" will want to read this provocative and highly original projection of parallel industrial trends in the USSR and the United States and the prospects for world peace through abundance which these trends open up.

"The real value of the book comes from Mr. Garretson's experience as a businessman in America who has also lived with the Russian system, helping to set up a canning factory in the Caucasian area in 1929. He therefore knows both countries at first hand. This leads to a sympathetic view of what the Russians are trying to do. . . . And more important still than this is the vision of the future Mr. Garretson has distilled from his experience of the American economy."

. . . The Economist, Feb. 5, 1966

For your FREE copy of THE ABUNDANT PEACE, fill out the coupon and start receiving America's oldest weekly journal of opinion (founded in 1865)—a truly independent, critical weekly that week in, week out, questions the assumptions and analyzes the implications of issues that concern the democratic conscience.

THE NATION, 333 6th Avenue, New York 10014

Herewith my order and payment for a NEW subscription to THE NATION. Please send my FREE copy of THE ABUNDANT PEACE.

☐ 1 Year, $10 ☐ 2 Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

Name ……………………………………………

Address ……………………………………………

City …………………… State …………… Zip No. ……………

9-26-66

LAMBERT'S MONSTERS JOHN RECHY

THE NATION

OCTOBER 3, 1966 35 cents

China TWO VIEWS AND A PROPOSAL

Visit to a Fourth of Mankind

KEITH BUCHANAN

The Enormous Revival Meeting

ROBERT S. ELEGANT

Between Goals and Dogma

I-KUA CHOU

. S. ELIOT As Critic & Playwright

:DERICK J. HOFFMAN CAROL H. SMITH

PDIKE'S RESONANT PLACE CHARLES T. SAMUELS

ER NEWSP
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

same script, same performance

New York City

Dear Sirs: The Nation [Sept. 19], discussing the current disaffection of certain "intellectuals" from President Johnson, says editorially that "intellectuals are trained to compare script with performance; more perhaps than others they resent deception." In the same paragraph, however, The Nation also says that "Almost all of them voted for him in 1964, largely in response to his repeated assurances that he would not escalate the war in Vietnam."

The fact is that President Johnson did escalate the war, right in the middle of the campaign, by ordering the bombing of ports and oil installations in North Vietnam. . . . The "intellectuals" today justify their own political shortcomings by charging that the President changed his policy after the election. But the President did not change either his policy or his script. Then as now his policy was escalation; his script was peace.

If the "intellectuals" wish to help the electorate to distinguish divergencies of official script from performance, they will have to begin by facing the fact that so far their record does not inspire confidence.

Helen Mears

Chicago theatre

Morton Grove, Ill.

Dear Sirs: Julius Novick's "Theatre: The Midwest" [The Nation, Sept. 5] is a comprehensive survey and, to my knowledge, a just appraisal, but for the sake of a complete record it should be pointed out that Chicago has a good though small repertory company in the Hull House Theatre. In the past two years the company has produced about a dozen plays, chiefly works of Albee, Pinter, Gilroy, Camus and Ionesco, all of them very ably directed by Robert Sickinger. Carl W. Condit limit to courage

Lafayette, Calif.

Dear Sirs: You commended California Comptroller Alan Cranston for his courage in blasting the John Birch Society [editorial, The Nation, Aug. 8].

But not long ago Mr. Cranston, with Governor Brown's enthusiastic support, was the leader in demanding successfully the ouster of Simon Casady as head of the California Democratic Council because of Casady's outspoken opposition to U.S. policy in Vietnam. Opposition to the war, the professionals had concluded, was a political liability for the party in an election year. Opposition to Birchism, even in California, is not yet a political liability. . . . Joseph A. King believers

Budapest, Hungary

Dear Sirs: Saul Bellow writes [letter, The Nation, Aug. 22] that I am "so wrong that we would have to go back to the beginnings of time . . . before reaching a single point of agreement." I am in perfect agreement with Mr. Bellow. It was really very wrong of me to believe that this distinguished novelist would read the whole of my article ["The View from the East," The Nation, July 17] and not only the paragraph about him. I can't believe ("Mr. Boldizsár is the wrong sort of Believer") that Mr. Bellow did read what I wrote, because, if he had, he would certainly have seen that there are many points of agreement between us, whether

(Continued on page 323)

EDITORIALS

Storm Signals on the East River

Storm signals flew on the East River when the twenty-first session of the General Assembly opened on September 20. The foundations of the United Nations, already softened by a slow deterioration in critical areas, were further undermined by the Secretary-General's announcement that he would not offer himself for a second term. It is still hoped in some quarters, especially in Washington, that U Thant will agree to stay on beyond the end of the year, which he has set as a limit for his services.

Paradoxically, U Thant has been openly critical of United States policy in Vietnam. Washington's expressed eagerness that he should retain his post can be explained in part by the Administration's attempt to make it seem that its aims for Southeast Asia are similar to those of U Thant. The Soviet Union, also criticized by U Thant for the restrictions it constantly imposes on the functions of the Secretary-General, fears any change in the status quo. In the forthcoming months, maximum pressure will be applied on U Thant by delaying a real search for a successor. It remains to be seen whether his determination to leave can be worn down by this campaign of inertia and whether the interests of the organization will be served in the process.

The question of Vietnam, as such, is not on the agenda of the session, but the priority given today to Asian problems by the nations of the world was symbolized by the election of Abdul Pazhwak of Afghanistan as President of the General Assembly and by the opening speech of President Marcos of the Philippines. The topic of the Vietnamese war will occupy as big a place in the Assembly debates as the many inscribed items on racial discrimination in Africa, and is closely linked to the question of Chinese representation, which is placed once again on the agenda.

The impotence of the UN with regard to the major conflict of today has been staggering and has provided a sobering background for the usual glitter of the session's opening. The continuation and escalation of the conflict have brought almost to a standstill the machinery of diplomatic intercourse which had started to roll between Washington and Moscow. Meaningful negotiations during the session could lead to a treaty desired by the two space powers on the internationalization and demilitarization of the moon and other celestial bodies. However, the expectation is that the Soviet Union will raise secondary issues to prevent an agreement, which would be hailed by many as a sign of renewed détente but is sure to be denounced by Peking and Communist parties the world over as another proof of Soviet "complicity with the American aggressors."

This new low in the ability of the UN to act as an instrument of peace may jolt the membership into making another attempt to bring the Vietnamese conflict to the conference table. The present rigidity of policies in Washington, Hanoi and Moscow seem to preclude that hope, but miracles do happen sometimes — especially if they coincide with the interests of some of the major powers. The UN has, on some occasions in the past, served as a catalyst for dramatic turns.

The need now is to abandon rhetorical slogans in favor of fresh appraisals and quiet diplomacy. The first days of the Assembly have already emphasized the desirability of clarifying the attitude of both Hanoi and Washington on U Thant's three-point program. In his opening address before the Assembly, Ambassador Goldberg elaborated around rather than on this plan without departing really from old positions, but the style of the propositions he put to Hanoi could result in a new step in the dialogue. Both the new President of the General Assembly and the President of the Philippines have announced their availability for renewed efforts toward a solution. A settlement by the UN, in the absence of both Hanoi and Peking, is unthinkable, but the nations gathered in the General Assembly could create the atmosphere needed for a new and candid search for peace. Perhaps the storm signals will save the UN ship from actually hitting bottom.

ANNE WEILL-TUCKERMAN

The Pattern

Malcolm S. Forbes, the publisher of Forbes magazine, is disturbed by the Pentagon's plans to add another 300,000 troops to the 300,000 already in Vietnam (not counting the 70,000 men in the Seventh Fleet operating off the coast). "How bloody dumb can we get?" Forbes asks. Is it impossible for us to stop escalating? "Why, why, can't we stand and hold?" He is also worried by the government build-up in Thailand. There we have only 30,000 at the moment, but up in the north the Communists are said to be active. Predictably the Thai government, and our present forces, will soon be menaced, and the ante will be raised in Thailand as it was in Vietnam.

As with Vietnam, the Administration is attempting to obscure the real thrust of American policy while, at the same time, it steadily increases the U.S. investment in men, materiel and installations. If no great public outcry is raised, it will soon be in a position to say of Thailand what it now says of Vietnam: "Withdrawal is out of the question; we are too thoroughly committed." Senator Fulbright, who remembers how the American commitment in Vietnam was achieved — by a steady, almost imperceptible commitment of troops under cover of an information policy which deliberately sought to minimize the increase — wants to prevent a repetition of the same pattern in the case of Thailand. To this end, he wants to hold public hearings so that the nation may know what it is that we think we are doing in Thailand.

The Administration, of course, has tried doggedly to prevent any hearings at all. In essence, this was the pattern followed in Vietnam. In his book, With Kennedy, and in a recent interview in U.S. News & World Report, Pierre Salinger tells how President Kennedy sought to minimize the public's awareness of the military build-up that began in Vietnam late in 1961. It was Salinger's view at the time that this was a mistaken information policy; in the end the facts would become known, as indeed they did — but not before the entire character of our presence in Vietnam had been transformed by precisely this build-up. It is already very late in the game to prevent a repetition of this pattern in Thailand, but Senator Fulbright is to be commended

IN THIS ISSUE

October 3, 1966

EDITORIALS

298

ARTICLES

China: Two Views & a Proposal

302 Visit to a Fourth of Mankind — Keith Buchanan

307 The Enormous Revival Meeting — Robert S. Elegant

311 Between Goals and Dogma: An Opening for Diplomacy — I-Kua Chou

315 The Supreme Court and the Bill of Rights I: Freedom of Expression — Leo Pfeffer

318 The Bomb in the Cellar — Sandy Morrison

321 Latin America VI: Education, the Baited Trap — Michael Chiappetta

BOOKS & THE ARTS

324 T. S. Eliot: The Poet As Critic — Frederick J. Hoffman

325 Eliot As Playwright — Carol H. Smith

326 Walk in Woods (poem) — Raymond Roseliep

328 A Place of Resonance — Charles Thomas Samuels

329 Mr. Keynes and His Age — James F. Becker

330 Pain (poem) — Paul Zweig

331 A Gallery of Monsters — John Rechy

332 Laughing at the Story of O — Alexander Laing

333 Theatre — Harold Clurman

334 Young Man (poem) — Carolyn Stoloff

335 Crossword Puzzle — Frank W. Lewis

Editor CAREY McWILLIAMS	Washington ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Managing Editor ROBERT HATCH	Paris ALEXANDER WERTH
Literary Editor HELEN YGLESIAS	Theatre HAROLD CLURMAN
Poetry Editor MICHAEL GOLDMAN	Art MAX KOZLOFF
Copy Editor MARION HESS	Music BENJAMIN BORETZ
Advertising Manager MARY SIMON	Science CARL DREHER

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher
ANNE C. ABRAMOVITZ Assistant

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.

THE NATION

Volume 203
No. 10

for trying to focus attention on Thailand before we find ourselves committed there, by the sheer magnitude of our investment, to ends and purposes which the Administration is reluctant to disclose to the members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, much less to the public.

Bigger Than Adam

Adam Clayton Powell stands out among his fellow Representatives on several counts. He is certainly one of the most intelligent, and his political dexterity is a marvel. He is a rogue, but such an engaging one that it is difficult to become indignant about him. And with all this — and a colossal record of absenteeism and neglect of duty — he is the chairman of what one of his critics calls "undeniably . . . the single most productive House committee in each of the past two Congresses."

Now by a vote of 27 to 1, with 3 abstentions, the members of his Education and Labor Committee have pruned the powers of the chairman in two key areas: selection of personnel and expenditure of funds. But Powell will remain as chairman. For obvious political reasons, such a compromise was foreordained. Probably none of the members wanted to chastise Powell so severely that his usefulness as a legislator would be ended. To Powell's credit, it should be noted that once he realized that this time he had pressed his luck too far, he acquiesced in the majority's decision with at least the appearance of good grace.

What is alarming about the incident in retrospect is the extent to which Powell could rally responsible Negro leadership to his support. When he saw himself cornered, he swung at once into action with the race issue, which he raises as glibly as a Birchite blames all the woes of the country on communism. That in some quarters there is some latent bias against him because he is a Negro — a very equivocal Negro in several respects — may be conceded, but to regard this as the gravamen of the complaints against him is ridiculous. There are too many perfectly sound and cogent reasons for Congress, and particularly the members of his committee, to be annoyed with him. To support him on this issue is a kind of racism in reverse, with every prospect of disadvantage to the Negro's struggle for equality.

It is understandable that Negro leadership should rally to Powell's support. There are not so many effective Negro Congressmen that a reduction in the status of one of them — and he by far the most powerful — can be regarded with indifference. Still, black or white, a Congressman is supposed to serve his constituency and also to serve a larger public, regardless of color. On balance, Powell has been a wretched Representative. Harlem is satisfied with him, and can return him for the rest of the century for whatever reason seems good to Harlem voters. It may be that his flamboyance and his payroll manipulations are political assets. An informed Negro quoted by Tom Wicker in The New York Times (September 21) says that many Negroes "feel he's been getting away with murder and they enjoy seeing him put it over on the white man." Nothing could be more natural. But to say, as Bayard Rustin does, that "we've got to put our foot down against racial discrimination in Congress, and this is the place to do it," makes no sense. Nor is it easy to follow A. Philip Randolph along the same line: "To single out Congressman Powell can only encourage the suspicion that Congress has a double standard."

Defense of Powell on this basis is as vulnerable as Powell himself has become through his own actions. His qualities are so mixed with misbehavior and demagogy that he is a poor prospect for a cause célèbre. Nor is it true that Congressional chairmen are never deprived of powers they have misused: it happened to Rep. Tom Murray (defeated in a primary this year), who represented the 7th Congressional District of Tennessee, and there have been other instances. If a case can be made for Powell, in this or some future controversy, let it be made on the merits and not on the ground that he is a poor, persecuted black man.

Making It Hurt

The resistance of Governor George Wallace and the Alabama legislature to the U.S. Department of Education's "mandatory" guidelines for integrating elementary and high schools has at least served to point up that in dealing with states that just don't care what happens to their Negro students the federal government has very little leverage outside the courts.

If the Alabama school districts—following the mandate of their legislature—refuse to integrate, what can the U.S. Department of Education do about it? Some $35 million, under Title I of the Education Act, could be withheld from the state as a whole. But this money is supposed to be spent for special education projects in low-income neighborhoods. In the South, that means Negroes especially. That is by far the largest amount that could be withheld under any of the programs, and since Negroes would be the big losers, what does Wallace care?

Alabama could lose another $1.7 million for library books, but that isn't enough money to faze a state. And it could lose about $1.3 million under Title III, for "innovative programs" such as bringing culture to rural schools. Last year 200 gifted high school students attended a music institute at Auburn on this money, and a string music project for pupils 4 to 6 years old was conducted after school and on Saturdays in five counties. It is the very sort of thing that the country people of the South need if they are to become civilized, but on the other hand a little less polish isn't going to bother the South one way or the other. The second largest amount that Alabama could lose would be about $6 million for aid to impacted school areas; that is, school districts that have to take care of servicemen's children without getting taxes from them. That will hurt, but it won't crush.

These programs could help bring Alabama into the mainstream of American education. The same is true of federal money that is going into other Southern states, which are regularly the most backward schooling states in the nation. But do they care enough to integrate on the threat that the money will otherwise be withheld?

It's doubtful. Al Alexander of the Department of Education's Civil Rights Division calls the present standoff a "cat and mouse affair." He says that acting on the so-called mandatory guidelines is "like applying Sunday blue laws — they're on the books, but how do we apply them?"

Even when it is discovered that school districts are not showing good faith at all in following the guidelines, the process of cutting them off federal funds is very involved and time consuming. Alexander admitted that it could be a year or more before Alabama was officially dumped. In the seventeen Southern and border states only thirty-nine school districts have been cut off.

A punishment that hurts impoverished children first is not the proper method to employ, and another lever must be found. It could be a blanket integration rider to all appropriation bills that contain money for the states. If no federal money could be spent on highways serving segregated school districts, if no federal money went into defense and allied work within a long commuting distance of segregated schools, etc., that would get Negro children into Southern schools — even Alabama schools. The federal government has kept an uncooperative South alive on highway, defense and pork-barrel money too long.

The New Group Leader

President Johnson took no chance after his distressing experience with Prof. Eric Goldman, who returned to Princeton with harsh words and an anti-Johnson book gestating in his head. The President's new liaison with the intellectuals is Prof. John P. Roche, who comes from Brandeis. Eager to rehabilitate the image of the intellectuals in the eyes of his chief, he started off by describing those who have bad relations with the Administration as "a small body of self-appointed people who live in affluence on Cape Cod and fire off salvos against the vulgarity of the masses." Another set of "alienated intellectuals" are the "artsy-craftsy" cabal represented by the Partisan Review, the New York Review of Books and similar publications. "'The West Side jackal bins,' I call them," said Roche, and "mainly high-class illiterates." All this was vouchsafed to columnist Jimmy Breslin, selected as the spokesman for the new apostle to the intellectuals.

It would perhaps have been better if Roche had waited until he could sit down at his desk in Washington. Nicely synchronized with his blast, Malcolm Forbes, the Wall Street publisher, as noted elsewhere, and Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., cracked down on Mr. Johnson's Vietnamese adventure. Schlesinger has had considerable experience in the halls of government, and so has Richard Goodwin, who has been publicizing similar views. John Kenneth Galbraith is another who has been keeping up a drumbeat of criticism. And George Kennan. And Dr. Spock. "Just a small group and it won't change," Roche summarized. Judging by this blast-off, before the President gets rid of Roche he may wish he had Goldman back.

Usury — What Else?

Long before economic truth emerges in American news media of general circulation, it is often to be found in the trade, industry and small media press. Such is the case with the roundup titled "10-City Check Finds Loans Are Costlier and Harder to Get," by Eileen Shanahan, in the September 6 New York Times. The real estate aspect of Miss Shanahan's piece is old hat for readers of McGraw-Hill's House & Home, which back in January was headlining, "Wildest Market Staggers Mortgage Men and Jars Builders." The sum and substance of it is that in realty financing, as in other money markets, usury has become a way of life. That it is not called usury, that it is legal or at least unpenalized, does not alter the fact.

The gimmick which makes usury respectable in the mortgage field is the "point" system, a point being 1% of the face value of the loan. As many points as the traffic will bear are levied as a lump payment preceding the execution of a mortgage loan. As Miss Shanahan discreetly puts it, "Where interest rates are held down, by usury laws or custom, 'points' go up as an indirect means of adjusting the interest rate to today's tight money conditions." The lower the interest rate, and the higher the risk the lender feels he is running, the more points he demands. Where the ostensible interest rate is less than 7%, the point charge is commonly 6 to 8. On FHA mortgages, where the legal interest rate is limited to 5.75% by federal law, a point charge of 10 to 12 is not unusual on older homes. If the neighborhood is not "particularly good," as many as 18 points may be added.

With a mortgage at 5.75% and a 10-point fee payable in advance, a $20,000 loan nets the borrower only $18,000 and so the interest rate is jacked up to 6.4%, which adds roughly $1,300 to the total interest paid by the borrower over a term of twenty years. In many parts of the country it is impossible to get a legitimate FHA mortgage, and borrowers pay the surcharge or do without the loan — which usually means doing without the house. Consequently the building industry has been hard hit.

But that is only part of the story. Getting a mortgage loan may also involve an "arrangement fee" of 2%. All these exactions are on top of the higher FHA interest rate, which has gone up from 5.25% at the beginning of the year to the present 5.75%, and is expected momentarily to rise to 6%. The cost of a 0.5% interest rise to the buyer of a house mortgaged for $15,000 increases the total payments over thirty years by $1,674.

Home improvement loans, which are relatively short term, are yielding an average of 10%. In many cases these funds are not borrowed to enlarge or improve the house, but to keep it habitable, as when a new roof must be put on because the old roof is leaking too badly to be patched—which may be because the builder had to pay so much for construction money that he used the cheapest shingles he could get.

It may be argued that the point system on mortgages is no worse than the system whereby a borrower ostensibly pays 4.5% on an automobile loan but in reality is paying 10% in true annual interest, or as much as 13% where money is especially tight. While mortgagors pay interest only on the unpaid balance as they pay off on the principal, on auto loans interest is charged on the full amount, even though it is progressively reduced by monthly payments of principal. The argument is valid, but it means only that the financial community charges all that the traffic will bear on any kind of loan, and the notion that limits are enforced by law or regulated by a sense of equity is just another comfortable fiction.

CHINA: TWO VIEWS & A PROPOSAL

China is still "on the dark side of the moon" not only because of the ancient myths and superstitions referred to by Robert Elegant but also because the United States has elected to seal itself off from vital sources of information in China. During the entire span of a period when China has been caught in the throes of a profound social revolution, we have been long-distance viewers of and listeners to what is going on there. True, we boast—and the boast may well be justified—that American studies are second to none if measured in terms of money and personnel devoted to the study of China. But vital dimensions of insight and understanding are lost when direct observation is lacking. A team of scholars poring over documents in a research institute, interviewing persons who have visited China, reading transcripts of radio programs and studying pronouncements of the Chinese Communist Party can no doubt piece together a fairly coherent picture of what is happening. But there is no substitute for on-the-spot, continuous, day-to-day observation. Nor should it be forgotten that our intelligence services have made some whopping misjudgments about China in the past, as for example the CIA's blithe assurances that China would not enter the Korean War even if we did waltz right up to the Yalu River.

Currently there is no more important subject than China but it presents obvious journalistic difficulties. American editors must perforce improvise, using the reportage of Canadian, British and French observers. We present here two views of China, and a proposal for responding to its international ambitions. Mr. Elegant is the Los Angeles Times correspondent in Hong Kong. He has been described as "one of the best of the hardy breed of second-hand news gatherers, the China watchers." Keith Buchanan, a geographer, is a member of the faculty of Victoria University of Wellington. Mr. Elegant is an outsider, a listener. Mr Buchanan is known as a sympathizer, but he has visited China recently and he has been there before. As a geographer, he has been particularly interested in rural China. In addition to differences in point of view and angle of vision, this circumstance accounts in part for the difference in emphasis and conclusions in the two reports. But it should be noted that apart from obvious differences in interpretation, both pieces stress certain developments—the fear of embourgeoisement, the attempt to create a new man, etc.

And these themes are echoed again in I-Kua Chou's proposal for diplomatic maneuvering, based on an unraveling of China's motives and goals. Mr. Chou is both insider and outsider: Chinese by birth and a graduate of Fuh Tan University, he received his Ph.D. from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, and now teaches in the Department of Government at Southern Illinois University.

Read together, the three pieces present a better picture of what is happening in China, and how the world might react to those events, than any one of them would provide separately. —The Editors

Visit to a Fourth of Mankind

KEITH BUCHANAN

In a masterly survey of the Vietnamese conflict, Les Américains face au Vietcong, the Swiss journalist Fernand Gigon makes it clear that to many who shape American policy, Vietnam itself is of secondary importance. Behind the tragic and cumulative horror of the struggle, the one word, China, is imprinted on the minds of the military. This fact was driven home to him by his visit to the monstrous base at Danang which, he observes, "has scarcely any relationship to the Vietnamese war." Rather, along with Okinawa, Cavite, Formosa and the Seventh Fleet, it is part of an enormous steel jaw opening on China. His visit to the aircraft carrier Coral Sea confirmed this impression: "in less than three hours the Seventh Fleet could wipe out fourteen years of superhuman efforts. . . . But afterwards?"

Yet, returning to China for the third time since 1958 in May and June of this year, I was impressed above all by the calm determination with which the Chinese quarter of humanity was going about its immense task of building a modern society and a modern economy. From the hotel window, the factories and power plants of Canton could be seen against a gold-hazed evening sky; below, in the vicinity of the hotel, the grass was soft and green, patched with the shade of young trees and dotted with groups of children and young people (some of them members of the hotel staff) sitting talking, playing football or dreaming in the shade of the trees. The atmosphere of quiet and peace seemed paradoxical in view of the progressive military encirclement of the country, the destructive capacity of the war machine poised off China's coast, and the reminders of this menace in the shape of United States air intrusions over southeast China. Yet the next few weeks, spent in nine of the eighteen provinces of what geographers call "Agricultural China," convinced me that this first impression was in no way erroneous; though it is obvious that the Chinese are aware of the destructive forces poised above them. Recent changes in China's superstructure (the "Great Socialist Cultural Revolution," as they term it) indicate this; such changes represent a "clearing of the decks" to meet the threat of war. The efforts to complete the present Five-Year Plan within three years is another sign of the sense of danger. Posters on the communes and in the factories remind the masses of the realities of war beyond China's southern frontier and what this may mean to China.

There have been major changes in the physical and mental landscape of China since my first visit in 1958. The differences in the urban landscape make the first and in some ways most dramatic impact. Much of the center of Peking had been rebuilt by 1958; now it has been remodeled once again: eight-lane highways fringed by belts of trees and shrubs cut through the city core, and major complexes of housing, scientific institutions, factories and offices expand far into the suburbs. Peking is, of course, the capital and a special case, yet the developments here are matched on a smaller scale in the other cities I visited—Loyang, Taiyüan, Sian, Nanking, to mention but a few. The Chinese leaders recognize an immense pressure of unfilled housing needs; given conditions in Old China, that is not remarkable. What is remarkable is the progress made in a program of urban development that involves not only housing and roads but also essential services, industrial plants and parks.

The countryside, no less than the city, has changed. Industrial decentralization has created new nodes of industry deep in the rural areas (e.g., the factories along the railroad from Peking to Loyang). The consolidation of a wide variety of small commune-run industries, ranging from oil pressing to jade working or electroplating, is a decisive achievement for what was one of the most backward rural societies in Asia. Flood control and water-conservation works in the delta lands of the Yangtze and the Pearl Rivers, terracing and tree planting in the subhumid areas of north and northwest China, are at once transforming the physical landscape and introducing a new security into rural life. Meanwhile, the individual peasant plot and the policy of agricultural diversification (most obvious in the dairy herds, the orchards and the vineyards on some of the Hopeh communes) are helping to break down the old carbohydrate-based economy with its impoverishing dependence on a limited range of food grains.

Changes in the mental landscape are less easy to assess because of the barriers of language. There is certainly a great emphasis on the necessity for self-reliance in economic developments. This stems partly from the abrupt cessation of Soviet aid and shows itself in attempts to find specifically Chinese solutions to problems rather than, as was the tendency in 1958, adopt uncritically the techniques that had succeeded in the very different conditions of Soviet development. The country now faces its socio-economic problems more realistically. Thus it acknowledges the "long haul" needed to catch up with the advanced nations, and sees the dangers of emphasizing quantity rather than quality in the output of industry and the problems posed by the rapidly expanding population. The nation is also driving to eliminate the relics of "bourgeois" ideology, its goal being designed to prevent the emergence of "revisionist" policies of the Soviet type and to forestall the possibility that the masses, having seized power, will forsake their revolutionary principles. And, as an element common to all these changes, China's time perspective is lengthening; it is becoming preoccupied with the emerging generation on whose shoulders the struggle to build a modern—and Socialist—China will fall.

An outsider on the scene who attempts to evaluate the general situation in contemporary China finds himself reaching conclusions drastically different from those offered by much of the Western press. The "purges" of intellectuals and of party officials that were making headlines in Hong Kong in late June appear as a normal continuation of the process of establishing a proletarian state that was formally initiated in 1949. In the years after 1949, the masses took over the economic bases of the country; they are now expanding the Socialist revolution into the cultural and ideological fields. The people's communes, dismissed again and again as gigantic failures by the Western press, appear to the observer on the spot as stronger, more flexible, more full of exciting prospects than at any time since their inception. As far as the internal economy is concerned, the supply of commodities and prices is in balance, many of the shortages of the early sixties (e.g., pork) have been overcome, the general price level dropped about 2 per cent in 1965, while the cost of some articles was reduced sharply (e.g., the price of bicycles was cut in half). The 1965 development plan was overfulfilled and the relationship between the various sectors—agriculture and industry, heavy industry and light industry—has been improving. In its foreign trade, China has a favorable balance of payments and a currency that has achieved a stability that might be envied by many countries; in 1965, the nation's major foreign debts (those to the Soviet Union, totaling 1,406 million new rubles, of which 1,000 million were for the supply of equipment in the Korean War) were paid off.

Chinese industry has recovered the momentum it had lost, partly as a result of the withdrawal of Soviet technical aid in the early sixties. Today industry contributes some two-thirds of the gross national output of China, and within the industrial sector heavy industry contributes about threefifths of the total. Chinese industry has gone a good way toward strengthening some of its weak links; thus, the country is now self-sufficient in petroleum products and the chemical industry increased its output of chemical fertilizers by almost one-third in 1965. The country now produces 90 per cent of the special steels needed in modern industry —an example of the emphasis on quality and diversification rather than on quantity. As for more sophisticated products, Kurt Mendelssohn reported in Eastern Horizon, Hong Kong, in July, that "the Chinese make their own electron microscopes and Chinese-built hydrogen and helium liquefiers have been operating for several years."

My trips to China in 1964 and 1966 were directed mainly to gathering information on developments in the rural sector; even so, to provide some basis for comparison with the situation in the countryside, I made a point of visiting industrial establishments that ranged from large-scale modern enterprises such as the China Foodstuffs cannery at Canton, the Number 2 Cotton Mill at Peking and the chemical fertilizer plant at Taiyüan to the tiny backyard enterprises which have become an important element in the Chinese industrial scene.

The equipment of the bigger units is largely Chinese (the Taiyüan plant was designed and partially equipped by the Russians but to complete it many of the big components had to be designed and made by the Chinese themselves). Technically, this modern industrial sector is impressive but perhaps even greater gains have been made in the social and welfare fields. Canteen and crêche facilities are excellent; the housing complexes associated with each major factory offer accommodation that is clean, comfortable (though austere to a visitor from an affluent society) and cheap. Rents appear to be approximately 3 to 5 per cent of the worker's salary; medical services for the workers are free, generous provision is made for the worker who is ill, and after retirement (55-60 in the case of men) pensions range from 50 to 80 per cent of wages on retirement. Wage levels are low by Western standards, but the "spread" is relatively narrow; thus the average at the Number 2 Cotton Mill at Peking is 60 yuan per month, with a range from 40 yuan to 150 yuan (this latter for the manager and engineers) while at the Shihwan pottery complex near Canton (employing 8,000) the average monthly wage is 56 yuan, rising to 110 yuan in the case of a limited number of highly skilled workers. One cattie (1.1 lbs.) of rice, for comparison, costs 0.13 yuan.

Perhaps more interesting than the big plants are the small back-street factories developed with slender resources by small groups of individuals, and the part-work, part-study schools which are turning out relatively complex equipment for the state factories. The "Butterfly" boot polish factory at Taiyüan illustrates the type of industrial development that contributes importantly to China's industrial output. It was started in 1958 by a group of eleven women and four old men. The buildings—scarcely distinguishable from the local old-style house—were built by the group with "borrowed" timber and bricks from the old walls of the city; the wiring was put in by a couple of members of the group who had a rudimentary knowledge of electricity. Today it employs thirty-four workers and produces annually some 60,000 dozen tins of polish for export to West Africa and the Middle East. Wage levels are based on the workers' needs: the average is 28 yuan per month, the director (a woman) gets 45 yuan, one of the older workers who has five children gets 60 yuan. In seven years the enterprise has "delivered" 120,000 yuan to the state and accumulated 90,000 yuan; this has been used to expand production and build houses for the workers.

A small electrical plant in Nanking was organized by the local street committee as a unit employing seven youths; today it employs eighty workers, mainly girls under 25, and produces a range of electrical control gear, including mercury switches. Four-fifths of the equipment has been built by the workers themselves; the total cost was thus a fraction of what it might have been had all the equipment been purchased (17,000 as against 100,000 yuan).

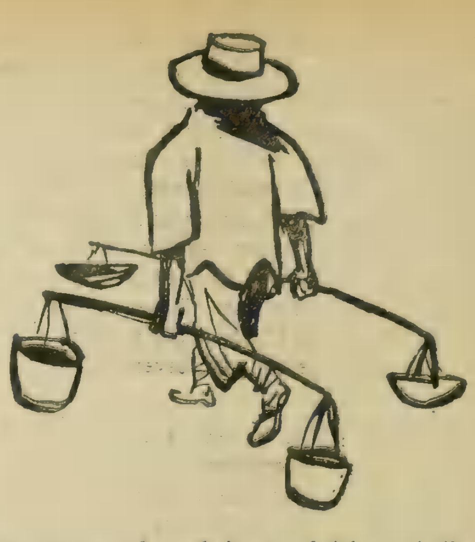
The part-work, part-study schools, developed as part of the new education policy, also contribute to the country's industrial output at the same time that they educate a new generation of technicians. There are 110 such schools in Peking, offering a four-year course which includes politics, Chinese, mathematics, physics, engineering designing, structural engineering, welding and specialized courses (e.g., principles of metallurgy). In the later stages of their study the students are able to build such complex items of equipment as lathes and power presses, and these are supplied to the state. Such schools practice that integration between mental and manual work which is one of the basic aims of Chinese educational policy today.

I visited a dozen people's communes in late 1958, half a dozen in 1964 and some twenty in 1966. By 1964-66, it had become clear that the commune, in its revised and more flexible form, was here to stay; it is the fundamental unit of organization in the countryside, in other words, of 80 per cent of China's population. From an original 26,000 in 1958, the number of communes has risen to approximately 80,000. This increase appears to be due largely to the subdivision of communes in the upland and interior areas which, owing to topographical conditions, proved too large for successful management. The average population of a commune today is 7,500, though there is a considerable range: There are 55,000 people in the China-Korea People's Commune near Peking, while the average in Shansi is 10,000, in Kiangsu 24,000, in Kwangtung 30,000. The three-tiered structure, commune-brigade-production team, is firmly established, though there is little uniformity in the size of the subordinate units; the number of brigades on four communes near Peking ranged from five to twenty-one, and the number of teams to a brigade from five to thirteen. In this tiered structure the commune as a whole retains control of activities demanding large-scale units of organization for their proper functioning (e.g., the more specialized industries, the tractor station, hospitals or certain sectors of education), while other productive activities are decentralized and the team becomes the basic accounting unit. Along with these changes, a small individual sector is now permitted. The cultivated area in individual use ranges from 3 per cent to 7 per cent according to commune. In addition, a considerable part of the poultry and pig production is carried on as an individual activity.

In its present form, the commune enabled the peasant population to weather the difficult years of the early sixties. It has subsequently played a major role in reshaping the Chinese countryside. Collective measures of water conservation, such as the digging of wells and the construction of storage dams and irrigation and drainage systems, are continuing on a large scale. By virtue of such projects, the planned rate of agriculture increase was somewhat exceeded in 1965, in spite of local droughts. More than 40 million people were engaged in water management last winter.

The commune has also provided the framework for a continuing expansion of the terracing that is changing the face of many parts of China. In south China, the red lateritic hillsides are terraced for the growth of nitrogen-fixing green manure crops which are composted for use on the cultivated lands of the valleys; this practice has spread with remarkable rapidity since 1964. The eroded loess country of Shansi and Shensi in north China has achieved spectacular results with terracing to control erosion and create new "microplains" suitable for the intensive farming of China. An outstanding example is on Dachai Commune in eastern Shensi, where figures of 2,400 man days to create 1 acre of terraced land are quoted. The case of Dachai is important in two respects: first, it involves an investment of labor on a scale unthinkable in Western farming economies; second, the development has been completely self-reliant in that the people of the area, ravaged by drought and flood, have themselves, with nothing but their own resources, carried out a remolding of their environment which eliminates these old sources of disaster. It is the "self-reliance" of Dachai that Chinese commentators most strongly emphasized as a model for other rural areas.

The commune has also provided conditions for industrializing the countryside. The range of industries varies: most communes produce their own bricks and tiles, most have workshops sufficiently well equipped (and a labor force sufficiently skilled) to build simple machinery and manufacture all save the most complicated items of replacement needed to keep their tractors and lorries in operation. Many operate food-processing industries, some produce relatively sophisticated pottery or other crafts, most make simple farm tools and have the resources and the expertise to design and build pumping and irrigation stations. Much of the industrial employment is seasonal (and this overcomes one of the great problems of the past—the underemployment or unemployment resulting from a highly seasonal cropping regime); and on exceptional communes the proportion employed in such seasonal industry may reach one-third of the labor force.



The "technical transformation" of China's countryside is still in its early stages and there can be no doubt that the priority given to water conservation is correct. The second great need is for manure. As far as chemical fertilizers are concerned, my data show consumption levels ranging from about 5 to 750 pounds to the acre. At first sight, it would seem that China could use many times its existing output of chemical fertilizers, but the careful composting of all vegetable wastes, the use of algae and pond mud, the use of the hillsides as a source of green manure for the lowlands, and reliance upon night soil and pig manure suggest that it is not accurate to judge the country's needs for such fertilizers in the light of Western or Japanese agricultural experience. Third and fourth priorities are for better strains of seed and improved farming systems. Mechanization, by contrast, remains a long-term objective and poses a host of technical and economic problems; at present, while up to nine-tenths of the land is tractor-plowed on some unusually advanced communes, the average for China as a whole is about one-tenth.

Wages on the communes are based on a work-point system and they vary not only between communes but also among the teams within a commune. A cross section of a score of communes showed average wages ranging from somewhat under $60 to $160 a year; of this, the proportion paid in kind ranged from 17 to 50 per cent. The income from "side occupations," such as individual production of crops or livestock and the sale of manure to the collective, may add an extra 10 to 25 per cent to this basic sum. The extreme range in incomes, excluding side occupations, was of the order of seven to one; between the different teams on one commune the highest range noted was from two to one. Thus considerable differentials arise from contrasting soil and water resources and the type of agriculture (vegetable-growing teams earn considerably more than grain-growing teams on the same commune). The official attitude to this situation is that a more equitable redistribution of income, whether by taxation or other means, would be undesirable; that it is a more positive policy for the poorer team or commune to raise its level, aided by the experience and example of more advanced collectives. Applied to China as a whole, this means that the richer and more developed communes can be regarded as "oil spots" whose example will spread.

The wages quoted must be seen against a background of generally low prices for essentials, and of a peasant society in which housing, schooling and medical treatment are free and items such as electricity are cheap. The progress achieved must be judged not in the light of what we expect from our own affluent societies but in the light of conditions in other emergent countries. Rural housing shows great diversity and, on the communes visited, only a small proportion of the population was housed in newly built dwellings. Nevertheless, a start has been made and most communes have construction teams and allocate funds for the erection of new public and domestic buildings. But the task of rehousing almost 25 per cent of humanity is immense and will occupy decades; meantime, first priority must be given to food production and to welfare and education.

The progress in public health has been remarkable. Most of the larger communes have an adequate medical staff (the China-Albania Friendship Commune near Peking maintains forty-five doctors and medical workers for 25,000 people). These include some practitioners of traditional medicine, but the majority are trained in Western methods, though with an abbreviated course of training. Frequently each team includes one member who has received first-aid and medical training and who can cope with accidents and simple diseases, while some of the larger communes run their own hospitals. These developments have eliminated many of the old killing diseases and thus accelerated the population growth rates. On the other hand, the gradual dissemination of adequately equipped hospitals is making possible the control of population through clinical abortion and sterilization. On one commune in Kwangtung, 50 per cent of the wives or husbands in marriages which had produced two children had been sterilized voluntarily and abortion had become a socially accepted form of population control.

The collectivization of Chinese rural society provided a framework not only for economic development or the diffusion of modern medicine but also for a massive development of schooling at all levels. Again it is difficult to generalize, because the development of education has, as a result of reliance on the activity of the people themselves, varied in detail from commune to commune. All communes run numerous elementary schools (the numbers on the communes I visited ranged from eight to sixty-six), as well as middle schools and part-work, part-study schools. The state sometimes provides either elementary or middle schools, and some of these offer courses of high quality. An example was a middle school on a commune near Nanking whose laboratories were admirably equipped, which had a good library (including many foreign books) and which offered advanced courses in English. The most interesting and significant development, however, is the part-work, part-study school which aims to eliminate the distinction between intellectual and worker, and which may emerge as the dominant type of educational institute in the next decade. The rural schools of this type are as impressive as their urban counterparts; they offer a three-year course during which the students will work on the school land (one such school near Taiyüan has 150 acres of land, 530 students and 109 staff and cadres) and also go out into the countryside, offering their knowledge and acquiring experience by working on the communes in the district.

This diversity of institutions is unified under a dominant theory: the role of education is to create a new type of Socialist man. The proposition extends also to the visual arts, to the theatre, the film, the press, and to literature as a whole. To consolidate their revolution the masses must establish their control over the ideological superstructure as effectively as they did over the state and the economy in 1949. This means removing from office all those suspected of having used their influence — whether as the rector of a university or the editor of a newspaper — to inculcate "bourgeois" ideas, and it is this "cleanup of the dust left hidden" (to quote the People's Daily) that explains the "purges" of the last month or two. In the thousands of wall newspapers—on gray paper, white paper, paper of all colors—that I saw in the University of Nanking, in the streets, in schools far out in the countryside, posters criticizing, accusing, counterattacking; in the noisy, good-humored, gong-beating processions, there seemed to be little concern with the "struggle for succession," discussed in some Western newspapers, but rather a very great concern with the quality of education, the integrity of the educators and the ultimate objectives of education. The mounting wave of criticism by students and many teachers, of an education system that was an amalgam of mandarin-style teaching and Soviet and Western educational concepts, achieved its goal when, in mid-June, entrance examinations to universities were abolished and an interim period of six months was set aside to devise a new system of enrollment from the upper levels of the middle schools.

Just what form the education system will assume is as yet unclear; as a Chinese colleague put it to me: "Not even the Soviet Union succeeded in creating a truly Socialist education system, and we do not know yet what form it should take; that's what all these poster displays, processions and meetings are about." The repercussions of the present "cultural revolution" will extend into every sphere of life and thought and will doubtless be interpreted in divers ways by the Pekinologists of the West. To the Chinese it represents an inevitable unfolding of the events which began in 1949, and an essential prerequisite to the emergence of "the new Socialist man." To me it looms as a development whose importance—and global implications—will dwarf even the massive remodeling of their physical environment in which this Chinese quarter of humanity is engaged.

The Enormous Revival Meeting

ROBERT S. ELEGANT

Hong Kong

When I was a small boy, a favorite game left the grassy fields of suburban New York pocked with pits to trap the unwary. It was called Digging to China. We knew we would get there if only we dug straight enough and deep enough because China was exactly on the other side of the globe. We never did reach China.

Despite the frustration of our pioneering instinct, we knew a great deal about that contrary country. We knew that the Chinese wrote backwards, not only from right to left, but from top to bottom, instead of across the page. We knew that they began their meals with dessert and ended with soup, that they gave girls' names to boys, and that men wore skirts and women trousers. We knew many other things which also appear slightly askew in the light of more direct and, presumably, more mature knowledge.

Yet we knew a great deal more than we realized. Above all, we knew that the Chinese were quite different from the men and women of our comfortable American middle-class world. Weary of too much apparent knowledge and too much illusory certainty about China, I sometimes feel that that simple clarity, now almost three decades past, was the beginning of true understanding. The Chinese are different from us in their formal manifestations, even if they are not direct opposites.

The other side of the globe is commonplace today. Man-made devices have even circled the far side of the moon, though their exploration has enlightened mankind but little. As far as the opportunities for effective mutual observation have gone in the past decade and a half, the Chinese might almost live on the far side of the moon. Even less than the occasional Westerner who is conducted through China, deaf to the spoken word and blind to the intricate ideographs, have the Chinese, by direct observation, altered their preconceptions about either the outside world or their own nature. Nor does the prevailing darkness on the other side of the moon give off much light.

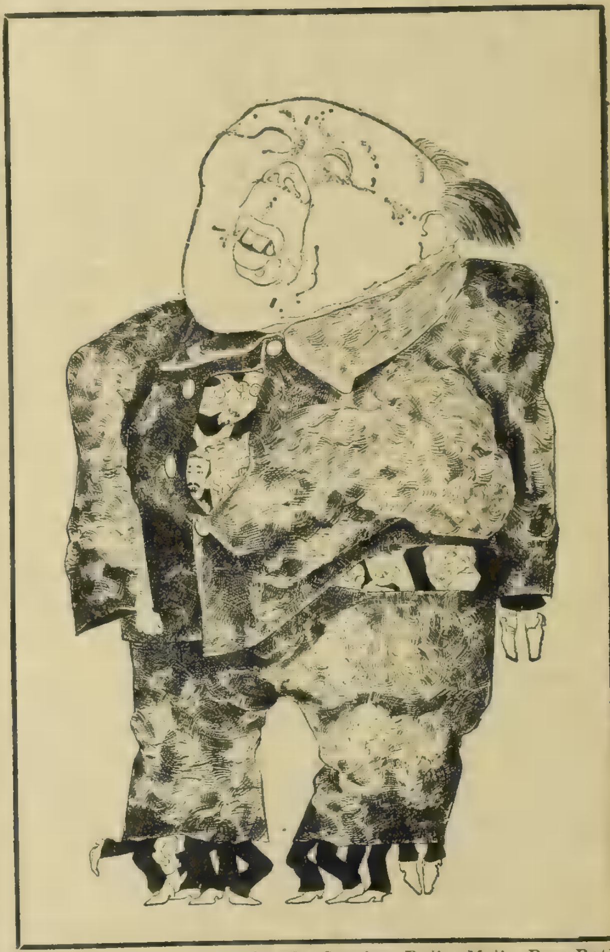
But the ether surrounding China has, since April, been charged with words, alternately bitter and boastful—and, often, as tantalizingly indistinct as the Herzian emanations caught by the astronomers' telescopes. Distorted not by time and distance but by passion, the words are intended for the Chinese. Still, any simple radio receiver will intercept them for the listener in Hong Kong on the edge of the far side of the moon.

Since the beginning of May there has been one chief theme, which has developed and widened. Waves of denunciation have resounded across China from the broad plains of Manchuria to the narrow, rock-bound farms set among the misty crags of Kweichow. Harsh male shouts have contended with sharp female cries above the dark muttering of throngs. The mass meetings have bellowed their spontaneous indignation at the "traitors, the anti-party, anti-Socialist elements, the devils with the spirits of snakes and the souls of oxen, the bourgeois agents, who plotted in coordination with international revisionism and imperialism to destroy socialism and bring back capitalism." Giving only perfunctory attention to their familiar antagonists, "Khrushchevite revisionism and American imperialism," all radio programs have hailed the "great new victory for the thought of Mao Tse-tung," which was won in Peking, the holy city of Chinese communism.

It was a strange victory.

At the beginning of June, a brief announcement noted the dismissal of Peng Chen, Mayor of Peking and first secretary of the Peking Municipal Committee of the Communist Party. The entire Peking committee was also dismissed because, for the first time in the history of the People's Republic, an erring group had resisted reformation en masse. All members of the committee were denounced as henchmen of a "black gang" which had deliberately set out to thwart the party's will and bring about the recrudescence of capitalism by curious means.

On the far side of the moon, the pen is, it appears, still more dangerous than the sword, and the pen was the chosen weapon of the anti-party group. In their journalistic commentaries, in their collections of essays, and in their historical plays, the writers concerned had sought to undermine the confidence of the Chinese masses in the canonical Thought of Mao Tse-tung, and to supplant it with "a bourgeois view of the world." Not only the ranks of the Communist Party



Scarfe, London Daily Mail: Ben Roth

Let A Hundred Flowers Perish

but the "power of the state" itself was shaken by the ruthless attacks of the squadrons of bourgeois penmen, the Communists averred. Even today, the immediate enemy overcome, the party continues to warn that socialism in China is engaged in a conflict with capitalism graphically described in Chinese as a "you live, I die; I live, you die" struggle.

The victorious legions of Marxist orthodoxy did not grow complacent with the defeat of the hapless Peking Committee and the suppression of its sinister publications. As its first official action, the new Municipal Committee removed other "bourgeois agents" from control of Peking University, the seedbed of the Communist revolution. In the provinces, vice governors, Communist Party cultural directors and newspaper editors were relieved of their duties to the accompaniment of "drums and dancing," as the Chinese has the term Peking usually translates as "fanfare." No drums or dancing have enlivened the quiet meetings of Regional Political Departments which are plucking dissidents out of the economic structure throughout China. But those sessions are an integral part of the process of removing from critical positions discredited professional writers, academicians, journalists, managers and technicians. The ultra-orthodox faction now in command has affirmed that the only wisdom which is valid in the new age is the wisdom of the "worker, peasant, soldier masses."

All persons possessing skills derived from higher education are in greater or lesser degree corrupted by "bourgeois thought." Even those who came of "pure proletarian backgrounds" have been contaminated by those "bourgeois scholarly authorities," their teachers. Many of the erring intellectuals are being dismissed; others are "struggled with," in the stark Communist phrase, until they recognize their faults. Seeking to escape the familiar pitfall of recalcitrance among the educated, the Communists have already been lured a long way along the road toward dependence on the "innate" technical skills of the masses, who are presumed to be ideologically pure. From 1958 to 1960, during the first Great Leap Forward, that road led not only to a great victory for The Thought of Mao Tse-tung but to economic and administrative chaos.

It is still not clear how far this new victory will be pursued. The Communists themselves display an uncharacteristic imprecision, in contrast to the certainty with which they announced the plans, at once detailed and sweeping, for the transformation of men and society by the first Great Leap Forward. But the tone of the mass meetings throughout China has already begun to shift from Marxist denunciation to Maoist uplift.

Having cast out the devils of revisionism and slain the monsters of capitalism, the enormous revival meeting which is China today is reaching toward new exaltation. The essential purge will continue and expand until all opponents who escaped all the previous purges are eliminated. But the emotional tenor in China now recalls the promises of transfiguration which heralded the first Great Leap. The Chinese press ecstatically predicts a "great new era in the history of mankind." The glamorous phrases of the earlier period are being refurbished: "the wisdom of the worker, peasant, soldier masses," subdued during the years of recovery; "the imminent transition from socialism to true communism," that state of secular bliss which Karl Marx so gingerly forecast and Mao Tse-tung later proclaimed could be achieved through spirit, rather than matter; and "the creation of a new kind of human being," Maoist man, whose advent will liberate mankind—and the Communist Party of China—from all difficulties.

In just one editorial the Peking People's Daily carelessly revealed the stinging reality behind those portents. "The cultural revolution now under way, on a scale never known before," the party's organ declared, "necessarily foreshadows a development of the Socialist revolution by leaps and bounds and a new Great Leap Forward in China's Socialist construction." Premier Chou En-lai having confirmed that the "national economy has entered a new, leaping phase," extravagant claims of industrial and agricultural productivity now resound.

China, it appears, is to be thrust into another great convulsion in a second grand attempt to bend the laws of material nature and human nature to the will of the Communist Party. China's organs of opinion quite candidly warn that the nation must be purified of "remaining bourgeois influence," which is strong and insidious. They are only slightly more reticent in their implicit admission that China's industrial base hardly qualifies it as a great power, and they have just begun to admit that China's population is now at least 700 million. Since the true figure is probably several tens of millions higher, population growth appears to be consuming, even before it is produced, whatever surplus the economy can throw off. External observers feel that only massive foreign aid could halt that self-consuming spiral. But the extremists who now hold power in China believe that a massive deployment of human labor inspired by the uniquely correct thought of Mao Tse-tung can accomplish miracles.

The concrete aspects of the new Great Leap Forward are still being shaped, for the newly purged Central Committee has been forced, by a combination of its own impetuosity and the intra-party power struggle, to move before its plans were fully cast. The Communists' awareness of their previous errors indicates that they will seek to avoid those specific excesses which aroused greatest popular resentment and contrived the greatest practical failures from 1958 to 1960. Mass compulsory labor, total social reorganization, separation of families, and the segregation of the sexes, the breakdown of the food supply, and the lavish, wasteful use of manpower on a host of simultaneous, grandiose projects simultaneously maladministered—all those disastrous aspects of the first Great Leap should be subject to greater restraint. But the Communist Party may find itself unable to stem the momentum of the new Great Leap. Excess has already appeared in the widespread purge—and even more general alienation—of precisely those men and women who are most essential to economic progress, the trained administrators, publicists and technicians.

The new Great Leap may also find itself incapable of avoiding excess because of its unique sponsorship. Despite their generous praise for their fighting forces, the People's Liberation Army, the Chinese Communists always adhered to the practice of traditional Chinese civilization, and kept the military in a subordinate political position. But the sword has now prevailed over the pen. Effective control of China now lies in the hands of the Liberation Army. Defense Minister Lin Piao, a field marshal before formal ranks were abolished last year, is the single most powerful man in the country and the heir apparent to Mao Tse-tung. The rough soldiers, who believe that they have always conquered all the enemies they have met, are imbued not only with bounding self-confidence but also with a simplistic approach to psychological and economic problems. In a recent joint declaration with their European—and sole—ally, Albania, the masters of China affirmed that stringent coercion and a militarized state would remain characteristic of true Socialist countries until they entered the blessed realm of total communism, when the state disappears. The Chinese Communists are now engrossed with the period of coercion, presumably feeling that the eventual paradise can see to itself.

The term Great Leap Forward, which slipped into the editorial in the People's Daily, has not been repeated. It is likely that the Chinese people will not for some time be told "with fanfare" that they are in the midst of a new Great Leap Forward. They were not told of the creation of urban Great People's Communes in 1959-60 until those new social organisms were a reality. The party obviously knows that the simple terms themselves arouse enormous antagonism and stimulate the opposition it is determined to crush.

The Chinese under communism, then, are strikingly different from most of humanity. Having just recovered from the shattering experience of the first Great Leap, they are poised for a new Great Leap. Disturbed by the persistence of opposition, though it is mild by comparison with the violent discontent provoked by the first Leap, they are adopting measures which appear certain to stimulate strong opposition. Having attained a reasonable standard of living, characterized by an adequate supply of foodstuffs and a growing trickle of consumer goods, they are about to hazard the newly attained stability of their economy. Having alienated a good part of humanity by their assertive statements and their intrusive foreign policy, they are intensifying their assertions and threatening more penetrating intrusion. It is tempting to shrug and wearily concede that things are simply upside down in China.

But there is a consistent pattern in the news from the far side of the moon. In terms of their own logic, developments in China display a definite internal order. Whatever understanding is possible unfortunately requires an examination of first premises.

A state of contentment, gradually expanding, is unacceptable to China's ideologues because it leads to embourgeoisement. They recognize that nearly seventeen years of intensive effort have by no means wholly destroyed that Chinese civilization which endured for more than 2,000 years, and they fear that civilization's creeping back to cover all their works. The Chinese hierarchy is dismayed by the example of the Soviet Union under Nikita Khrushchev and his successors, "who are worse than Khrushchev." They believe, with much justification, that increasing material gratification inescapably engenders demands for even greater material gratification. They admit that they fear above all else the "recrudescence of capitalism" in China as a result of such demands, which compromise the selfless dedication that is the essential quality of a "true Marxist-Leninist." Their fundamental belief has, in fact, evolved beyond dialectical materialism into a creed which can most concisely, if clumsily, be described as dialectical spirituality. Continuing conflict between opposites they exalt as the fundamental condition of nature, but the essential conflict for them takes place in the realm of the human spirit.

Juhl, Copenhagen: Ben Roth

Down With Culture

Political life has now engorged all other aspects of life in China. In their political life the Chinese have, for at least two millenniums, been wholly ideological in a manner unknown in the Western world. Their church has always been dedicated to a mundane purpose—the establishment of utopia here on earth through the creation of the perfect human being. The conscious ideal of creating the "new man" was first enunciated in a collection of aphorisms called The Great Learning, which appeared almost half a millennium before the birth of Christ. From approximately 200 B.C. until the beginning of the present century, Confucianism, the state ideology which delineated the political structure, the individual's personal behavior, and his relation to the supernatural, sought to create the perfect man in the perfect society. Even the reformers who fought to remake Confucianism at the end of the last century, the rebellious "Westernizers," took as a guiding principle the shaping of a new man to meet the new times.

It is hardly remarkable that the Chinese Communist regime is captivated by the traditional ideology it so vehemently rejects, for all revolutionaries are shaped by their origins. The present hierarchy consciously seeks the creation of the perfect Communist man in the perfect Communist society. Feeling that they will have failed fundamentally unless they can impose their own new morality on the Chinese people, the hierarchy seeks to compel the Chinese to that transformation by forced emulation of heroes varying in quality from the omniscient Chairman Mao himself to self-sacrificing private soldiers. Emulation was the Confucian way.

The Communists are also impelled to reassert the dominant political and cultural position China enjoyed in the world known to it before the onslaught of the West in the 19th century. The perfect society and the perfect human being must, they feel, be created everywhere in the world under their own "uniquely correct" tutelage. Marxism's assertion of universality has combined with the Confucian ideal of bringing order to t'ien-hsia, "all that is under the heavens," to confirm them in that wider purpose.

The Chinese lack the material resources to carry out their inspired mission, while they find their human material within China increasingly intractable. They have won no striking victories in their campaign to remake the world by substituting dedicated human beings guided by an inspired ideology for the weight of metal. "People's war," the employment of guerrillas and subversion to overthrow established governments, has proved unsuccessful in South Vietnam and disastrous in Indonesia. Lesser Chinese reverses have occurred in Africa.

But the Communists are mesmerized by their own obsessions. They cannot abandon their purposes without negating their lives' endeavors. They are, therefore, compelled to one more attempt to remake both the Chinese people and the Chinese economy through another Great Leap Forward. Because Mao Tse-tung tells them so, they know that all things will be possible once they have "completely remade the thinking of the masses." Because they have no choice, they must believe that they can accomplish miracles of industrialization and agricultural expansion by the intensive application of human labor. Then China will be the compelling model for the entire world.

Despite its institutional uniformity, the glory of Chinese civilization has always been its protestant tradition. Under the most stringent repression of the Confucian empire, courageous men with independent minds always dared to challenge official obduracy and to speak out against oppression. They were often forced to make their points by indirection in the settings of novels or plays. They were often punished for their effrontery.

No more than was the empire is the Communist state a seamless unity. Despite the most intense intellectual repression China has ever known, courageous and independent men have managed to publish their reproaches. The party has now discerned a deep-laid plot in the works of a few writers who dared to follow the old tradition of criticism after the first Great Leap. It is more likely that they came together informally, drawn by their common concern for the future of their country.

Mao Tse-tung's withdrawal from the day-to-day business of the state, perhaps because his health is failing, transformed such opposition into a major crisis within the leadership of the party. Peng Chen, only fifth after Mao in the party, appears to have allied himself with the moderate group because it represented his best chance of attaining power. He seems to have felt that he enjoyed substantial support and that he had to act immediately or be swept away himself. Peng—and other leaders still unidentified—therefore joined with the men who cried against the prospect of another Great Leap Forward, arguing: "My God, not again! The people are reasonably happy, and the economy is reasonably stable. Let us build on what we have already built. Let us not essay another wild leap into chaos in pursuit of an unobtainable ideal."

So spoke the pragmatists. They challenged the most orthodox, who knew that the preservation of their own power required of them the strictest adherence to the extreme policies of Mao Tse-tung. Even in death, the shade of Mao Tse-tung is to protect his successors, who are aware that his personal prestige is a chief buttress of the regime. He has therefore been canonized in his lifetime, and his works have been enshrined as the highest expression of human wisdom.

Only one man enjoys adulation almost as intense as that accorded Mao Tse-tung. He is the winner in the power struggle and the present ruler of China. First Deputy Prime Minister and Vice Chairman of the Communist Party Lin Piao this year is exalted for his "creative application of the thought of Mao Tse-tung." The party's ideological Bible, Red Flag, has just instructed its readers: "The fundamental point is to learn how to consistently place Mao Tse-tung's thought in the forefront of all work and to absorb Comrade Lin Piao's highly important instructions on the living study and application of Chairman Mao's works." Such homage is reserved by the meticulous protocol of Communist China for the man in full command of day-to-day operations.

Lin triumphed in the brief power struggle because of his complete control of the People's Liberation Army, which is today hailed as "the chief pillar of the state." The military have now penetrated almost all the major centers of power, and they are, in truth, the driving force in China. The directives for the present purge have come not from the People's Daily but from the organ of the military, the Liberation Army Daily. The responsibilities of power may yet temper the rough-hewn zealotry of the military, but they now appear determined to pursue their chosen course to the end.

With the defeat of the pragmatists, China is now, once again, a scene of vast confusion. "Every counterrevolutionary restoration starts in the realm of ideology so as to remold public opinion," the dominant clique has warned. It has proclaimed a vast "cultural revolution," which it describes as the greatest, the most intense and most sweeping thought reform campaign China has known. The economic convulsion is about to begin.

This new climacteric will be the third and, almost without question, the most profound in the brief history of the People's Republic. Each such convulsion has been followed by a period of relaxation, and each such period of relaxation has lasted longer than its predecessor. Collectivization in 1955 and 1956 was followed by the relaxation of the brief Hundred Flowers Movement in 1957. The first Great Leap Forward of 1959-60 led to the gradual recovery of 1961-64.

The new Great Leap Forward bears every sign of being the most abrupt and most vicious since the Communists came to power. It may not be too much to hope that it will be followed by a period of true and lasting relaxation. The zealots will be discredited by the failure of the new Leap Forward that they are themselves contriving by their own extremism. The moderates who succeed them will possess all the evidence they need to demonstrate that China cannot possibly triumph in a continuing confrontation with both the laws of nature and the nations of the world outside.

Then the messages from the far side of the moon may become more intelligible, and the logic that prevails there may become more like the logic that prevails elsewhere.

BETWEEN GOALS AND DOGMA

An Opening for Diplomacy

I-KUA CHOU

Communist China currently concentrates all its foreign policy efforts on denouncing Soviet revisionism, and that, in effect, reflects its inability and unwillingness to see the need to modify its hostility toward the United States. It has adjusted its relations with all other nations in order to strengthen its anti-Soviet and anti-American strategy. In doing so, however, it has breached one of the tenets it accuses the Soviet leaders of having violated: that of drawing a clear-cut line between the "imperialist" powers and the Communist countries. It has increased its trade significantly with such countries as West Germany, France, Great Britain, Japan, Canada, Australia and Argentina. It maintains a hybrid relationship of trade and cultural exchange with many countries whose ties with the United States have prevented them from establishing normal diplomatic relations with Peking. It has begun to shift its sources of modern machinery from the Communist bloc to the capitalist countries of the West. It cannot hope for long to persist in a policy of noncooperation and of fomenting conspiratorial violence in non-Communist countries if its program of modernization and industrialization is to be realized through trade and collaboration with the world at large.

Therefore, in the long run, a further relaxation of the Chinese Communist rigidity is in prospect. This may take place regardless of what group succeeds to political power in Peking. Even if there should be an ideological reconciliation between Moscow and Peking, China's total dependence upon the Communist countries has become a thing of the past. Were it not that Vietnam posed the danger of a wider war, the non-Communist world could really have sat back and watched the unfolding of the Sino-Soviet clashes, enjoying the full benefit of a disintegrated Communist camp.

While, for the time being, the danger of a direct collision between China and the United States over Vietnam has been averted, it is by no means certain that an ever-widening war, which has already engulfed Laos and Thailand, will not produce a military confrontation between the Chinese and the United States. It is true that both Peking and Washington have repeatedly stated that they intend to make no war upon each other; but it is also true that Peking insists upon its "just action" in supporting "the revolutionary struggles of all oppressed peoples and nations abroad" and that the United States is equally determined to apply, in Secretary Rusk's words, "a counterweight of real power to Chinese Communist pressures." Thus, a situation of permanent crisis prevails between China and the United States, and there is no indication that the tension created by the policies of both sides in the past sixteen years will soon subside.

The sources of conflict are diverse and profound, but the most fundamental and everlasting of them is the fact that both China and the United States seem to endorse a doctrine of intervention that is almost universal and all-inclusive. Since Peking claims (as does Moscow) the right to speak for mankind, the United States, in addition to the security arrangements concluded with some forty-two countries, acts generally to defend the existing system of the non-Communist world and to put into effect countermeasures against possible Communist take-overs. The justification for the Chinese Communist doctrine of intervention is that since, according to Marxist-Leninist doctrine, the "bourgeois" system of any country must be overthrown, it is Peking's "internationalist duty" to give a Communist revolution unconditional support. The justification for the American doctrine of intervention seems to be that any form of social change is permissible except that which is promoted by the Communists. As interventionists, both sides propose to sit in judgment on the legitimacy of the political processes of a given country, to determine the form and the speed of its social change and to remold its political institutions.

The United States policy toward China was not at first geared to Peking's strategy of promoting the world revolution through "people's wars," launched by indigenous elements in a given country and assisted by military and political aid from outside. It was geared, rather, to the traditional concept that an aggressive China might seek territorial aggrandizement at the expense of its neighbors, and to a large extent that view still holds. However, the recent emphasis on counterinsurgency and the Johnsonian doctrine of stopping "guerrilla aggression" with the superior fire power of a mobile tactical force, indicate gradual adjustment of a strategy originally conceived for preventing Soviet expansion to a strategy for halting Communist uprisings inspired by the doctrine of Mao Tse-tung.

There is now general agreement on what Chinese communism is. It looks for a Communist revolution in every land, sees progress only through conflict, and identifies itself with the nationalist yearnings of the developing nations. In the National Liberation Movement, it envisions a process for the emancipation of mankind. It equates a country's independence with its complete severance of economic and political ties (not necessarily diplomatic) with the United States. It operates on the assumption that either all the Communists must strive at all times in a "continuing revolution" to bring about a world "without imperialism and capitalism," or they will lose whatever ground they now hold. There is no middle course, and there is little room for compromise with the adversary.

However, there are divergent views as to what Chinese communism is not. And the fact that in China nationalist objectives are sometimes intertwined with Communist objectives has made it difficult to determine what exactly Peking is trying to achieve at a given moment. I believe that it is possible to sift out the elements which are generally associated with Chinese communism but which really have nothing to do with it, and to distinguish the nationalist from the Communist goals. A successful separation of these problems, it is hoped, will contribute to a better understanding of Chinese communism and, more important, to the adoption of more effective and realistic policies toward it.

Piciel, Calcutta: Ben Roth

Global Strategy

Chinese communism does not propose to use the homeland as a base for marching Chinese troops into neighboring states and converting them to communism. (Both the Nationalists and the Communists regard Tibet as an integral part of China and no international tribunal has established it as an independent country.) No country along China's borders has turned Communist since the Chinese Communists came to power in 1949. North Korea and North Vietnam went Communist by virtue of the Allied occupation policy agreed upon at Potsdam at a time when China itself was still in the hands of the Nationalists. The Russian occupation army converted North Korea into a Communist state; and, after having taken over Vietnam from the Japanese, Ho Chi Minh's Independence League (Vietminh), supported by Chiang Kai-shek and blessed by the United States, began to win a victory over the French. It was only after the Chinese Communist intervention in Korea, a decision which may very well have been made by Stalin, and the subsequent reversal of the United States policy, that these countries were regarded as the outposts of an enemy.

The Chinese Communist foreign policy objectives are not limited to a Communist Asia. Nor are they confined to a Communist sweep of the Middle East, Africa and Latin America. They are aimed at uniting one-third of the world's population — those people living in the less developed lands — as a starting point for the world revolution. On the grounds that Moscow had assigned only a minor role to the tasks of the National Liberation Movement and that Moscow's enthusiasm came only after Peking had protested that it was lacking, Peking has sought to discredit Russia by attempting unsuccessfully to exclude it from Communist activities in these countries. This, in turn, has brought on the vindictive Soviet charges of Peking's "racism" and "hegemonic plans" to dominate the NLM, which have found ready support in the West. But there is no evidence that the rulers in Peking give priority to communism in Asia over Communist enterprises elsewhere. They, like all Communists, view communism as a global system rather than an occasion for military conquest in geographical terms. A strike in Lima, a demonstration in New York, a "peace" march in Stockholm are greeted with the same enthusiasm that is engendered by an uprising in Bagdad, an armed coup in Somalia or a switch-over in Havana.

Regional hegemony presupposes limited goals and a recognition of the regional hegemony of other powerful states in other regions. There is nothing in the entire body of Chinese Communist doctrines, official pronouncements and the party-controlled press to indicate that Mao and his supporters would be happy with the 19th-century technique of dividing the world into "spheres of influence." Indeed, the question of whether the relationship among independent nations ought to be one of subordination or equality is a principal issue of the Sino-Soviet dispute, and Peking has championed the independence of Communist countries from the control of Moscow. To the countries of the Third World, Peking has persistently preached that equality and economic independence are the only true tests of sovereignty and that political independence qualified by either American or Soviet control of economic life is the essence of neo-colonialism.

Cultural influence is not equivalent to political domination. Whatever the form of its government, China has always had and always will have a significant cultural influence in Asia, ranging from food, costume, medicine and etiquette to arts, religion and social mores. But politically China faces the most difficult tasks in countries where the Chinese minority is the largest, such as Indonesia. A Communist government in North Vietnam, for example, cannot be regarded automatically as an extension of Chinese control over that country, and the absence of American control does not necessarily mean the presence of Chinese control. Burma and Cambodia are able to maintain their independence by refusing to identify themselves with either China or the United States. Indonesia virtually destroyed the Communist movement without foreign reaction. It might not have succeeded in doing so had outside military power been involved.

Chinese communism as such has little popular appeal in the developing nations. It merely attempts to rally these states around certain common denominators — beliefs, policies and sentiments shared by all the backward countries, China included. It identifies itself with their nationalist aspirations as a first step for an eventual Communist seizure of power. Through anti-colonialism, Peking seeks to dissociate the new nations politically from the advanced countries. Through anti-capitalism, Peking preaches the virtues of public ownership of land and industries and the need of the poor nations to budget through planning, to protect their own inexpensive resources and manpower and to insulate themselves by a protective wall (closed society) against such deleterious effects of world capitalism as wage and price spiral, inflation, depression and monopolistic control. Against the common desire for modernization and industrialization, it invokes the danger of imperialist servitude hidden in aid from the great powers.

In practice, Peking has had little success in gaining adherents to its revolutionary theory; and its anti-Soviet and anti-American propaganda has usually boomeranged. If some new nations are willing to heed Peking's expostulations, they usually recoil from its grand scheme of world revolution. The overall performance of Chinese communism has, therefore, been a dismal failure. Peking's impatience and its attempts to shorten the stages of revolution, from the bourgeois democratic to the Socialist revolution (to use Marxist terminology) in Indonesia, for example, have brought only disaster. If the main thrust of the Chinese Communist challenge lies in the realm of ideology or what may be called "verbal aggression," and if Peking elects to support indigenous Communist groups and their allies anywhere in the world regardless of geographical location, what is the most effective way to cope with it? Is containment really the most appropriate policy? Containment was meaningful in the forties when the Soviet army under Stalin posed a threat to Western Europe and when the United States enjoyed a monopoly in nuclear weapons. Is it equally applicable to the current posture of Communist China toward other countries? The answer to this question depends upon whether it can be established that Peking plans territorial expansion into the neighboring states.

London Daily Mail: Ben Roth

Here, the Communist drive for world revolution can be separated from China's nationalist goals — goals which have been adhered to by every Chinese government since 1911 — such as the desire for international equality, the consolidation of frontiers and the establishment of effective control over Chinese territories, as in Taiwan. Peking sought Russia's help to achieve these goals, and, in each case, it was rebuffed. Moscow refused to give China more aid than it could afford to pay for, or to share with it Soviet nuclear technology. In regard to Taiwan, Moscow suggested that Peking might consider the two Chinas solution, and, in the Indian frontier dispute it sided with India, bearing in mind that it has its own frontier dispute with China to settle. These issues, exacerbated by ideological differences, have strained the Sino-Soviet relations to a breaking point. There is no doubt that Peking overplayed its hand along the Indian border, but the Chinese Communist Government learned, as did all the previous Chinese governments before it, that nationalist objectives cannot be achieved through the assistance of a friendly power, that only adequate national power will succeed.

Between 1962 and 1964, Peking concluded border agreements with all of China's neighboring states, except India and the Soviet Union, pledging to respect their political independence and territorial integrity. It still desires boundary treaties with India and the Soviet Union, although negotiations have broken down in an atmosphere of political vituperation. Peking could have settled all these issues had Mao Tse-tung and his associates not put the tasks of the Communist revolution before China's national interests, and had they not elected in 1949 to rely solely upon the Soviet Union for assistance and to sever all of China's relations with the United States. Despite repeated emphasis that China plans no territorial aggrandizement, its incessant cries for armed struggle against imperialism, however justified from its own viewpoint, have prejudiced the non-Communist world against the fulfillment of China's legitimate goals.

The notion that China must be contained is a legacy of the Korean War. The Chinese Communist intervention in Korea produced in the United States a military-oriented policy for Asia which includes trade embargo, security treaties and military bases along China's frontiers. The recent deployment of Soviet armed forces to Mongolia to prevent the pro-Chinese factions from seizing power and to the Sinkiang and Manchurian frontiers, together with the massive aid to India from both Russia and the United States, have created in Peking genuine fear of "encirclement." All these external pressures, plus the irritation of the Vietnamese war and the failures of foreign adventures, would have toppled any other government in China, but the Communists do exercise absolute control and the deified Mao, with the support of the military and the youth, has smothered all effective opposition. In foreign affairs, Peking now clings to two courses which it deems vital to its interests: through anti-revisionism it tries to salvage whatever prestige and support it can still enjoy among the Communist countries and parties, and through the development of nuclear weapons it hopes to produce a deterrent that will help it break through foreign encirclement in the manner of Russia in the late fifties.

The key to peace in Asia, and in the world, lies with the United States. Although this is not a propitious time for the United States to make a drastic change of its policy toward China, it holds two trump cards which, if skillfully played, may induce important changes in China by appealing to the country's nationalist interests.

First, in regard to Taiwan, some measure of agreement can still be reached without prejudicing the positions of the parties involved. Following thirteen months of bilateral negotiations in Geneva between 1955 and 1956, Peking had agreed to accept Secretary Dulles' proposal that China and the United States jointly pledge to use only peaceful means in settling international disputes. Mr. Dulles had suggested specifically that Communist China could renounce the use of force in the Taiwan area without having to give up its claim to the island. The negotiations became deadlocked when Peking insisted that its renunciation of force in Taiwan be contingent upon renunciation by the United States of its mutual defense treaty with the Nationalist government. Sometime in the future, it may be advisable for the United States to pick up where Mr. Dulles left off and negotiate with Peking a general declaratory agreement concerning peaceful settlement of international disputes and the settlement of rival Chinese claims over the island by peaceful means. Such an agreement would solve nothing, but it would contribute greatly to the easing of tension between the United States and China, and thus perhaps lead to agreements on other larger issues.

Second, Peking's recent proposal, that China and the United States conclude an agreement pledging that neither country will be the first to use nuclear weapons against the other, offers the United States a chance to deflate Peking's militancy in international affairs. The successful conclusion of such an agreement could mark the beginning of a new era in which Peking would seek to achieve such objectives as security and equality directly with the United States. Any move to increase Peking's freedom of action in foreign affairs will mitigate its belligerence. A non-first use agreement might make it easier for China to take part in disarmament negotiations and to accept other plans for world peace such as the proposed nonproliferation treaty. Any such development would have a moderating influence upon the anti-Soviet and anti-American campaigns in China and profound effects on China's political temper.

Since most of the issues involving the United States and China have been the results of the politics and ideologies of the two countries, grossly inflated by the missionary zeal of the Communists and the anti-Communists, there is little that other countries can do to alleviate the tension. The United Nations has been powerless in cases involving highly political and ideological conflicts, and the exclusion of Communist China from its bodies has forced Washington and Peking to pursue their policies toward each other without it. The more the two countries rely upon the bilateral approach, the less compelling for Peking is access to the channels of multilateral diplomacy. If the proposed two Chinas solution (keeping the Nationalists in the United Nations while admitting the Communists) should ever be adopted by the world body, it will become a new device to exclude Peking indefinitely, for it has made abundantly clear since 1950 that it will never pay such a price for entry.

Ultimately, Chinese Communist ideological intransigence can be modified only through the inter-party struggles within the Communist camp and through internal changes in China. Only the moderate Communists can tame the radical Communists. There is nothing that the United States can do to reduce Peking's ideological belligerency; political and military pressures will merely perpetuate it. What the United States can do, however, is seek limited agreements concerning China's nationalist objectives. When Washington and Peking can agree on the substance of China's legitimate national interests, peace in Asia, and in the world, will begin to move from dream to reality.

THE SUPREME COURT AND THE BILL OF RIGHTS I

FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

LEO PFEFFER

On October 3 the Supreme Court opens its 1966-67 term and its docket indicates that as in previous terms in recent years, its constitutional law cases will be almost exclusively in the field of civil rights and liberties. That has not always been the case: 1966 marks the 175th anniversary of the adoption of the Bill of Rights, and the Court took almost 150 years to recognize itself as guardian of that great document. This year thus provides an appropriate occasion to review and evaluate the Court's successes and failures in that role. Beginning with this issue we are publishing three articles by Leo Pfeffer under the general title, "The Supreme Court and the Bill of Rights," which seek to reach an objective and balanced judgment on the Court's performance in each of the three major areas of American liberties—freedom of expression, justice and equality.

Leo Pfeffer, special counsel to the American Jewish Congress and chairman of the Department of Political Science at Long Island University, is the author most recently of The Honorable Court: A History of the United States Supreme Court (Beacon).

The omission of a bill of rights from the document submitted to the American people in 1787 almost resulted in its rejection. The fifty-five men who gathered in Philadelphia, though recognizing that all authority ultimately came from the people, were hardly oversolicitous for the liberties of the people. On the contrary, most of them felt that the people could not be trusted with the liberties they already had, and looked to the Constitution primarily as an instrument for the restraint of some of those liberties. Madison, defending the omission, expressed skepticism as to the value of a bill of rights. Experience, he wrote Jefferson, had shown its inefficacy on those occasions when its control was most needed. Reflecting the consensus of his fellow delegates, he suggested that the greatest threat to civil liberties came not from government but from "overbearing majorities," and as to these a bill of rights was little more than a parchment barrier.

Ultimately, recognizing that unless a bill of rights were promised, the people would not approve the Constitution, he went along. A bill of rights, he agreed, does have some modest value against government. It could have a moral value in constituting a "good ground for an appeal to the sense of the community" in cases of abuse by authority. Moreover, if a bill of rights were inserted in the Constitution, "independent tribunals of justice will consider themselves in a peculiar manner the guardians of those rights."

The new nation's first encounter with a major violation of the people's liberties seemed to indicate that Madison was wrong on at least two of the three counts. The assault came from government, not from the people, and the tribunals of justice, particularly the members of the Supreme Court, were allies to the assault rather than guardians of the people's rights.

Barely seven years after the adoption of the Bill of Rights, with its First Amendment prohibition on laws abridging freedom of speech, Congress passed the Sedition Act for the punishment of anyone who uttered or published sentiments tending to bring the government or its officials into disrepute or to excite the hatred of the people. The Supreme Court itself never had occasion to pass upon the constitutionality of the Act (it was repealed after two years and all persons convicted under it were pardoned by Jefferson); but the individual Justices, in their enforcement of the Act as circuit court judges, left no doubt as to how they would have acted as a body. Individually, they not only upheld its constitutionality and enforced it vigorously but conducted trials under it with complete abandonment of judicial dispassion and impartiality.

It is questionable that Madison was right even with respect to his third prediction, that the Bill of Rights would serve as "good ground for an appeal to the sense of the community." The people were sufficiently enraged by the Sedition Act to sweep the Federalists out of office in the election of 1800, but the anger was motivated not primarily by the fact that the Act was a violation of the First Amendment but rather that it was a usurpation of power by the national government as against the states and was aimed against the opponents of war with France, who by 1800 were in a great majority in the country.

The truth of the matter is that in times of crisis our nation has had a low tolerance for political dissent, and appeals to the sense of the community have not proved of much help. The lot of political dissenters has been a heavy one, from the Tories in the Revolutionary War to the left of Center during the McCarthy period, and perhaps beyond. Nor have our political leaders, even the most liberal of them, acted much above the common sentiment. Jefferson's record on freedom of political expression was, as Leonard Levy has shown, at best ambiguous. Lincoln had no sympathy for the rights of the "wily agitator" and acquiesced in the suppression of the press by the military. Wilson refused to pardon Socialists and pacifists jailed for opposing our entry into World War I, and it was his attorney general who was responsible for the notorious Palmer raids after the war. Franklin Roosevelt authorized the detention and relocation of Japanese Americans during World War II; the loyalty programs and the attorney general's list were promulgated during Truman's administration, and only time will tell when escalation of the Vietnamese war will bring an end to Johnson's already strained patience with dissenters.

What has been the record of the Supreme Court in relation to political dissenters during times of crisis? On the whole, unfortunately, not very much better. The next encounter with political dissent the Court experienced after the Sedition Act of 1798 came out of the sedition acts of World War I, and while the participation of its members was less activist and partisan, the net result was the same. If the Court accepted for itself the role assigned to it by Madison as particular guardian of the people's rights, it failed miserably in playing that role. Apparently the only case in which the Court reversed a conviction arising out of opposition to the war was one in which the attorney general himself asked it because he became convinced that the defendants (some twenty-seven South Dakota farmers who had petitioned the government officials that the draft quota for their county was too high) should never have been indicted in the first place. What is particularly deplorable is that every one of the cases in which the Court upheld convictions came to it after the war had ended in victory, so that the Court would have taken little risk in challenging the still remaining passions and prejudices. As Justice Clarke, along with Holmes and Brandeis, one of the oft-dissenting trio in these cases, said in one of his dissents, the Court had and should have exercised the power "to correct, in this calmer time, errors of law which would not have been committed but for the stress and strain of feeling prevailing in the early months of the late deplorable war."

The first major case to reach the Court resulted in a decision that has been acclaimed almost universally as a landmark by constitutional historians, and upon which, in large measure, rests Holmes's reputation as a great, if not the greatest American judge and liberal. Some Socialists had printed and distributed to men who had already been drafted and were awaiting induction a leaflet stating that capitalist Wall Street was responsible for the war, that the draft was unconstitutional and that the government had no right to send American citizens to shoot up the people of other lands.

The most stringent protection of free speech, said Holmes, would not protect a man from the penal consequences of falsely shouting "fire" in a crowded theatre. The question in every case is whether words are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about an evil which Congress has a right to prevent. In the case under consideration there was a clear and present danger that some of the recipients of the leaflet would in fact be induced by it to resist induction into the armed forces, and therefore the defendants' conviction must be upheld.

Thus was the "clear and present danger" test born, and with it Holmes's reputation as a libertarian. Yet, ironically, it was first used to reject rather than uphold a claim of freedom of speech, and represented a substantial retreat from a position earlier taken by Jefferson and later espoused by Justices Black and Douglas. In his "Virginia State of Religious Liberty" Jefferson asserted that "it is time enough for the rightful purposes of civil government for its officers to interfere when principles break out into overt acts against peace and good order." Later, Black and Douglas were to assert that the First Amendment means what it says; that freedom of speech is absolute and no law may be made abridging it. What has most often been quoted from Holmes's opinion is not the phrase "clear and present danger" but the denial of the right falsely to shout "fire" in a crowded theatre, almost always with the critical word "falsely" omitted. When "clear and present danger" is quoted, it is practically invariably in a context that assumes that such a danger does exist. Indeed, "clear and present danger" has become something of a ritual incantation to be recited by a legislature, executive official or investigating committee about to engage in an assault on political unorthodoxy.

Of course, cases are decided by judges, not by legal tests, but "clear and present danger" has been a particularly slender reed for political dissenters to rely on. No sooner was it uttered than it was forgotten. All the other World War I convictions were upheld on the theory that Congress could outlaw and the courts could punish evil intent, and political dissenters could almost be presumed to have evil intent. When, in 1925, the Court upheld the conviction of Ben Gitlow for publishing the manifesto stating the causes that impelled the left wing to sever its independence from the Socialists and form the American Communist Party, it did so on the ground that if a legislature declares certain words or thoughts to be evil and their expression punishable, the courts must follow suit. Vainly, did Holmes, Brandeis and Clarke dissent plaintively that the clear and present test was being ignored in these cases.

It was not until the New Deal Court came into being in 1937 that clear and present danger was rediscovered and often applied. Yet rarely was it effective to uphold political dissent. Thus, for example, when in the late forties, a young Syracuse University student spoke to a group of some seventy-five Negroes in a well-policed hotel room and urged them to rise up in arms and fight for their rights, the Supreme Court upheld his conviction for disorderly conduct on the ground that there was a clear and present danger of disorder. Or, again, a straightforward application of the test would have required a reversal of the conviction of the Communist Ten for violation of the Smith Act, since even the most timorous of judges could not believe in 1951 that the government of the United States could be forcibly overthrown by the handful of Communist Party members who were not on the payroll of the FBI. Even when, in 1957, the Warren Court upset the conviction of the second-string Communists, it did so not by application of clear and present danger but by reading into the mind of Congress an intent it never had.

On the whole, the Supreme Court's record in protecting political dissent has been a sorry one. The Haymarket anarchists were liberated by Governor Altgeld, Mooney by Governor Olson, the World War I Socialists and pacifists by President Harding, Ben Gitlow by Governor Smith, and Sacco and Vanzetti and the Rosenbergs by death—in each case after the Supreme Court refused to intervene.

The record of the Vinson Court has been condemned as particularly bad; Prof. Fred Rodell, of Yale, for example, charged it with staging a "mass attack on civil liberties." But this condemnation is hardly fair; it ignores the truism that no agency of government, not even the Supreme Court, can protect the people from themselves. The brave and eloquent dissenting opinions of Black and Douglas were a luxury made possible by the fact that they were dissenting opinions and that Vinson's opinions represented the effective decisions of the Court. Had Black and Douglas each possessed three votes, so that their opinions would constitute the decisions of the Court, they would have spoken differently or the Court would not have survived. During the years from 1949 to 1954 the people of the United States would not have let anything stand in the way of their obsessive crusade against domestic communism. For the Court to attempt to speak reason to an irrational people would not have been merely quixotic, it would probably have been suicidal. During this period Herbert Lehman was almost alone in Congress in his defiance of Senator McCarthy. It was the liberals who, in 1954, shouted through an anti-Communist law so Draconian that even McCarthy doubted its constitutionality.

Since 1957 the Supreme Court's record in protecting political liberties has been splendid. With but a few exceptions it has upheld every challenge based upon freedom of political expression and association under the First Amendment. It has acted with a degree of caution (it has not declared unconstitutional the House Committee on Un-American Activities or the Smith, Internal Security or Communist Control Acts); but it has acted effectively. This new resolution came about not because the personnel of the Court changed but because the tenor of the times did. The explanation for these decisions lies in the termination of the Korean War, McCarthy's suicidal attack upon the Army, the growing détente with Russia, and the relaxation of cold-war tensions. Should the Vietnamese war continue to escalate and bring with it a return of the witch hunt, it is unlikely that the Supreme Court will be able to offer much protection.

The sum of the matter is that the limit of the Court's tolerance of expression can be only moderately higher than the people's. Its record in protecting political dissent has been poor because the American people, particularly in periods of crisis, have been intolerant of such dissent. On the other hand, the American people have been exceptionally tolerant of nonpolitical expression, scientific, religious and aesthetic. The one publicized assault on scientific expression, dramatized in the Scopes trial, made Tennessee the laughingstock of the nation and quite effectively discouraged all further efforts at restricting scientific expression. We have, throughout our history as a nation, also been widely tolerant of religious heterodoxy. Jehovah's Witnesses, the only religious sect which has suffered for its unconventional opinions (the Mormons were penalized because of their marital conduct) suffered because the expression of those opinions (by refusal to salute the flag) was considered basically political and anti-nationalistic and was treated as such by the American people. And notwithstanding our Puritan background, we have enjoyed, at least in recent years, a high tolerance for unconventional aesthetic expression.

As a result, Supreme Court tolerance in these areas has been even higher. Neither the Scopes case nor any other effort at restricting scientific expression has ever reached the Court; should it, we can confidently expect the Court to accord full First Amendment protection. After a number of false starts, the Court guaranteed the right of Jehovah's Witnesses not to salute the flag and protected other forms of their religious expression, particularly verbal attacks upon Roman Catholicism. (It was in these cases that the Court made the most effective use of the clear and present danger test.) It has outlawed religious tests for public office and has accorded nontheism all the rights enjoyed by theism. Notwithstanding its recent adverse decision in the Ginzburg case, its record in upholding the right of unconventional aesthetic expression has been almost perfect. In these areas, at least, it has fulfilled the hope, if not expectation, of Madison and made of itself in a peculiar manner the guardian of the people's rights.

THE BOMB IN THE CELLAR

SANDY MORRISON

Mr. Morrison, a free-lance writer, is at present completing a book on explosions.

At six o'clock in the morning of March 4, 1965, there occurred at Natchitoches, La., 150 yards behind a row of houses, an explosion so violent that it hurled one of its victims 60 feet from her bed. It tore a crater in the ground 70 feet long, 30 feet wide and 15 feet deep. Seventeen people died in the explosion and fire that followed.

Fifteen hundred miles to the north, on January 28, 1966, at 6:50 P.M., the basement of the Paramount Hotel in Boston blew up. The blast threw the floors of the lobby and the barroom against the ceiling and tore a hole in the sidewalk. Nine people were killed in that explosion.

Both explosions were of heating or cooking gas.

In Louisiana, the tragedy was the result of continual pressure of gas at 700 pounds per square inch against a weakness in the wall of the 32-inch pipe line carrying natural gas to the north and the east. But in the holocaust on Boylston Street the gas main had a pressure of only ¼ pound per square inch, and no internal stress burst the pipe. The break occurred first, and then the gas escaped. It collected in the basement of the nearby hotel and waited for ignition—the lighting of a match, the starting of an electric motor, even the ringing of a 6-volt doorbell.

Congressional attention has currently turned to the long-distance gas transmission lines because of a long series of accidents. Authorities are questioning the ability of these pipes to sustain the pressures they carry. According to a study prepared by the Federal Power Commission, in the period 1950 to 1965, more than 1,000 explosions or bursts occurred in these pipes. Sixty-four people have been killed and 222 injured.

Yet in this same period more people have died in explosions due to leaks in street gas mains than have been killed by high-pressure blasts. Official figures are not available, but a study of reports published by the National Fire Protection Association, a fact-finding body for fire departments, and the files of The New York Times, has produced a list of 170 deaths and more than 400 injuries in that same period. This is a minimum number, since the tabulation includes only explosions reported in the two sources.

The gas being sold to householders and industry today has no odor. A smell is added to make the gas recognizable should it leak, but as it seeps through the ground, the odor-forming substance is absorbed by the moist soil, and the gas continues onward undetected. Because it rises upward from mains, it tends to accumulate under basement floors, or to fill the hollow spaces in building walls. Thus, tremendous amounts of gas can accumulate before it is ignited. When such a pocket goes off, the result is as though the structure had been hit by an aerial bomb.

Gas flowing at a pressure of a mere ¼ pound per square inch is leaking from utility mains, yet the identical type of pipe carries water at pressure of 75 pounds per square inch, and without any leaks caused by internal force. What is wrong with the gas mains under our streets? Are they falling apart?

Some of the pipes in the gas utilities systems have been underground since they were laid out. Sixty-four major cities in the United States still use some mains that are more than 100 years old. These cast-iron pipes were sealed at the joints with jute packing overlaid with cement or lead. Originally, the plants manufactured their gas by the coking of soft coal. This gas was damp; it kept the jute packing swollen and tight.

Then the utilities discovered the virtues of the gas being burned off as waste at the oil fields. This natural gas, or methane, yields a heat of 1,000 B.T.U. as opposed to 500 B.T.U. of manufactured gas. By converting to methane, gas companies could double the number of customers they could serve without doubling the capacity of their mains. This was what they needed in the boom years following the Second World War. The sale of natural gas soared in the 1950s and has been rising ever since. Today, almost 99 per cent of our heating gas is natural gas.

But it wasn't long after the switch to pure natural gas that utility companies discovered their mains to be badly leaking. Methane gas is very dry. (It is so dry that 1,000 years ago the Chinese used it for drying the salt they took out of their brine marshes.) It shrank the jute packing and seeped out through the apertures. Some mains leaked so much that, as in the instance of a utility company in Kentucky, they were losing almost 60 per cent of the fuel brought from the transmission lines.

Gas enters a city at great pressure, usually at about 700 pounds per square inch (psi). Its pressure is brought down to about 25 pounds, and sent out in intermediary lines. The intermediary pipes tie into the city distribution mains by means of reducing valves, and gas flows into residential meters at about ¼ psi.

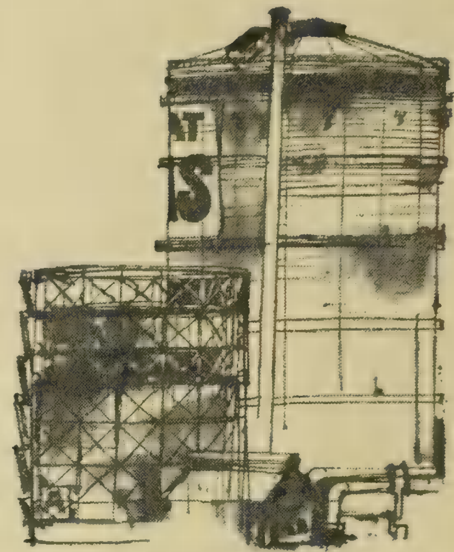
In Brighton, N.Y., a small town near Rochester, one afternoon in September, 1957, an explosion took place in a subsurface vault housing one of these reducing valves. The explosion itself caused no immediate harm to anyone in the vicinity, but it damaged the valve that converts the 25 psi gas to the ¼ pound pressure. The 25-pound gas, free of the restraint of the valve, raced through the low-pressure mains, seeking an outlet. It found it in all the gas meters in a twenty-five block area. Within minutes of one another, like timed demolition charges, forty-four houses blew up. Nineteen were completely wrecked and twenty-five were partially damaged. Fortunately, it was a time of the day when most people were out of their homes. Only three persons were killed and thirty injured.

Gas companies today employ a series of controls to eliminate the dangers of their modern product. An oil-and-water spray treats it as it enters the plants; it is humidified to prevent it from drying out the jute packing, and heavily odorized. Leaks and potential leaks are also prevented by fastening metal sleeves over the seams. Leaks from electrolytic corrosion are forestalled by attaching anodes to the mains; these anodes corrode instead of the mains.

Even leak-proof plastic tubes are available to fit like sleeves inside the pipe. Another method of leak prevention seals the seams from inside the main. A small machine, directed by long wires, is sent crawling through the main. It feels its way to a joint, stops, cleans the area down to bright metal, and then coats the entire seam with a pliable rubber coating. When finished, it crawls on to the next joint like a busy little mole. Runaway gas pressures are prevented by the installation of a second stand-by valve in the intermediary lines.

Gas utilities maintain a program of constant inspection. In Philadelphia, for example, a force of 200 men makes more than 70,000 individual inspections every year of the 2,800 miles of mains. Radio-dispatched trucks, always on the street, can answer within minutes any report of a suspected gas leak. There are many false alarms—they turn out to be just bad sewer odors—but the trucks answer all calls. Systematic inspection of gas mains is in many areas made more difficult by the fact that methane, unlike the old manufactured gas, does not inhibit plant life. It is no longer possible to walk a gas line in an unbuilt-upon section, spotting leaks by the telltale blight of grass and weeds.

Yet, despite all precautions, gas explosions from leaking mains still occur. Not long ago, a drugstore in Long Island blew up. In Charleston, S.C., a café exploded and killed two people. A canning factory in Indiana and a department store in Wisconsin both blew up with great loss of life. The bulletins of fire marshals tell why. At Merril, Wis., in July, 1960, a new building, housing a department store, suddenly exploded. The brick walls were blown outward and the roof collapsed into the interior. Ten people died.



No gas of any kind was used in the store, but investigation disclosed that a sealed-off service pipe leading up to the store had been broken in an area where a heavy bulldozer had been grading a parking space. The leaking gas crawled along the outside of the pipe toward the building, found a crack in the foundation, and filled the cellar.

Evidence of damage to a gas main has shown up in the street outside the Paramount Hotel in Boston. After an explosion in a 100-unit apartment house in Quebec in 1965, a broken gas main was found 15 feet away from the completely wrecked building. The main had been poorly laid by contractors. In the blast of a private dwelling in Pittsburgh, a gas pipe near the house had been damaged by an automobile only twenty-two hours earlier. A church in Washington, D.C., blew up early this year—someone forgot to cap a service pipe that led up to the building.

Damage to gas mains has become the greatest headache of the gas utilities. (Carelessness, incidentally, may be the prime cause in the bursting of that big pipe in Louisiana, and not a defect originally in the metal. According to a news report, investigators have disclosed that soda pop spilled on the pipe by workers may have started corrosion.)

With the growth of distribution mains in our cities and suburbs from 113,700 miles in 1945 to 204,700 miles in 1964, the amount of pipe vulnerable to carelessness or accident has almost doubled. The American Gas Association is aware of this increased danger and distributes to contractors great quantities of a booklet, "Before You Dig, Call." They hope that contractors will get in touch with local gas companies for advice before opening up a sidewalk or digging a trench.

Gas is as safe as you make it. You can say it is safer, for instance, than electricity, if you want to go by numbers. In the United States each year there are five to six times more fires due to bad electrical wiring than to faulty gas connections. What makes gas accidents so terrible is the overwhelming nature of the accident—tremendous noise, complete buildings blown skyward, great loss of life. As one fire marshal said: "Fires you can fight, but how can you fight an explosion? It is over when it happens."

An explosion of another type is now being prepared in Washington. The recent treatment given the auto industry by a lawyer turned author is being made ready for the gas industry. Ralph Nader, according to news dispatches, has been lecturing to engineers on the need for higher standards of safety in the construction and maintenance of transcontinental pipe lines. Claims have been made that many lines are constructed of pipes whose wall thicknesses cannot withstand the great pressures. An engineer from the Labor Department is reported to be working with Mr. Nader. The Labor Department is also believed to be interested because of the high number of workingmen injured each year at the test sites and at the pumping stations. Thirty-five gas company employees were killed and 135 injured from 1950 to 1965.

The gas companies are celebrating the year 1966 as the 150th anniversary of the birth of the industry in Baltimore. Today, 37.4 million customers in the United States use 120 billion therms of gas, and spend $7.4 billion for the privilege. The industry looks forward to 1975 when the present 748,000 miles of combined transmission and distribution pipes will have grown to 1 million, and the present 125 million gas appliances in use will have grown to 200 million. The companies don't want this trend checked by adverse publicity. They want to cover the country with their "total energy" package—a small gas-fed turbine in each home to provide house heat, cooking heat, air conditioning and electricity at a cost to the consumer lower than these items can be obtained separately. (See "The Big Blackout: Whooping Cranes & Power Failures" by Lawrence J. Hollander, The Nation, January 10.)

But unless there is some change in the nature of man, explosions caused by accidents to gas mains will continue to occur. Somewhere soon a heavy bulldozer will unknowingly rupture a main; a contractor working with gas pipe will forget a safety precaution. The gas will begin to leak, and the fuse of another time bomb will start ticking.

There's one good thing in the statistics. Suicide by gas inhalation is way down. Natural gas does not contain the up-to-30 per cent deadly carbon monoxide found in manufactured gas. All you can get these days by putting your head in the oven is nausea or a headache—or, if someone should ring the bell: BAM!

NOTE: Two weeks after the above was written, at 11:59 A.M. on August 23, the office building of the Phelps-Dodge Corporation at Fort Wayne, Ind., blew up. The explosion wrecked the two-story brick and steel-girder structure; it killed five people and injured twenty-five others. Fortunately, 140 other employees were out for lunch.

The cause of the explosion was natural gas. This has been ascertained by the Fort Wayne Fire Department. Gas had been smelled earlier in the morning by Phelps-Dodge employees, but not reported to the gas company. A private contractor was connecting a service line to the building, and the "bleeding off" of the line (to rid it of air and debris) was believed to cause the odor. However, not enough gas escaped in that procedure to produce the blast. The cause of the leak, and its location, have not been determined as yet, but the gas utility has been absolved of responsibility.

LATIN AMERICA VI

EDUCATION: THE BAITED TRAP

MICHAEL CHIAPPETTA

Mr. Chiappetta is chairman of the Department of International and Comparative Education at Indiana University. He is the author of the chapter on Latin America in Comparative Education, edited by Claude Eggertsen, to be published by University of Michigan Press.

Now and again, but ever more frequently, someone comes forward in a developing country to warn that foreign aid has turned out to be a modern form of colonialism—cultural, capital or technical colonialism. The result of such assistance, so the complaint goes, is a homogenized Western technology. Factories are factories, in Lima, Bangkok or Nairobi. Supermarkets are supermarkets, in Bogotá, Lagos or Kingston.

And why should there not be clean, efficient, productive factories? What's wrong with airy, well-stocked, reasonable merchandising? Monotony. Cultural monotony; behavioral monotony; aspirational monotony. The developing countries, so the complaint goes, purchase good health and more goods, both seemingly desirable, at the uniform going price: Western behavior, Western values, Western culture. If you want to sense also the flavor of anti-Americanism, read "U.S." for "Western."

In Latin America, where many proud protagonists of Iberian or criolla culture are to be found, there is great awareness of, if not protest against, the new Yankee colonialism. My purpose here is not to defend or attack the givers or the receivers in this exchange. However, "cultural homogenization" is occurring; it is U.S. in origin and direction; and it is making itself felt at an accelerated rate. This short essay has three purposes: to explain the process of homogenization; to challenge Latin American leaders to wage cultural battle against it; and to predict failure to reverse the process.

The status of education in Latin America reflects most vividly the homogenization process. The recent entry of OECD (The Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, a European body heavily influenced by the United States) into the counsels of Latin American governments testifies to the success of alien penetration. Educational planning based primarily on manpower requirements to staff rapidly industrializing societies is forcing the imitation of U.S. technical secondary and professional higher education. Schools of engineering and applied technology are fed by increasingly technical and scientific secondary schools. Shortly, the new generation of high school and university graduates will take their place in Latin American industry. Stanford- or Chicago-trained managers will guide the economic machinery of our modernizing neighbors. The point of all this is that engineers and managers look startlingly alike, in Santiago, Rio or New York. They are the new breed of international men. A well-trained Argentine could easily step into a corporate management job in Boston or San Francisco. These people are interchangeable because the system in which they work is universal.

I do not maintain that external penetration of technical and professional education is equivalent to a take-over of the entire educational machinery. It is true, however, that economic development requires specific educational outcomes which may deflect the system from other functions. Further, economic development puts demands on political and social institutions which may be inconsistent with cultural traditions and values. My argument is that economic development exerts a kind of determinism on all aspects of a culture, especially if its demands guide educational policy. Latin American education is, slowly in some sectors and rapidly in others, becoming more American and less Latin.

How can that be? How can the educational structure and content of one society be transferred almost intact to another? Presumably, an educational system reflects and serves the society in which it resides, and the goals of the system are derived from the society that surrounds it. Certainly no one would argue that Latin American societies are like the mid-20th-century United States. Can it be that economic development is so powerful an influence that all social institutions must bend to its pattern? Can it be that, starting from such diverse backgrounds, Latin America and the United States are converging fast toward a homogenized culture? Does not the weight of several hundred years drag against the changes being swiftly impressed upon many Latin American institutions and practices, especially on Latin American technical and higher education?

The answer to these question lies in two vacuums. The history of education in Latin America may not be as glorious as it is long. The present state of affairs has been described as difficult, disastrous, even catastrophic. The failure of Latin American countries to provide minimal education for their masses and quality education for their elites is well documented by the states themselves and the regional organization, the OAS.

In most of Latin America the vast majority of people are not reached by the educational systems. Something like one-fifth of the people finish elementary school, much less than 10 per cent get into secondary schools, and a much smaller percentage reach higher education. One can conclude that Latin American culture has not been created by and is not now being maintained through formal education. From the point of view of the masses of Latin America, therefore, there has been an educational vacuum.

If there has been a vacuum in mass education, what of the elites? In spite of the long history of universities in Latin America, they have not distinguished themselves or their products. In contrast to such institutions in Europe and the United States, few Latin American universities can lay claim to excellence in any field. Where are the renowned faculties of medicine, law, education, philosophy, even theology? In sum, Latin American education at its highest reaches has not fulfilled its mission, the training of an elite, the inculcation of the values and attitudes, the behavior and outlook that would give a culture its identification and distinction. Latin Americans themselves, especially their elites, have given and continue to give proof of this failure through their preference of European and United States universities for their sons and daughters. That is the second educational vacuum.

It is not surprising, then, that transplantations from abroad have found much space for growing in Latin America. One interesting aspect of the transplantation is that it is occurring from the top down rather than from the bottom up. North American forms are much more visible at the university level than at the elementary level of instruction. The result is that strengthened universities cannot count on a continuous flow of good students coming up from the elementary and secondary foundations. The system seems to be without roots.

If importation did not occur there still would have to be some formidable changes in educational organization and practice in order to serve the modernization needs of the region. Latin America faces revolutionary changes in its social, economic, political and cultural institutions. The crucial question is how and what will it choose.

Given the default of past and existing educational systems, what are the possibilities of educational change in the region? The course of events in the technical and professional fields is carrying Latin America rapidly toward the corporate, technical and professional structure of the United States and Europe; those portions of education which most directly supply technical and professional personnel, the universities and the institutes, are disturbing imitations of their United States and European models. This situation has led some people to think of Latin America as a complex of nations fifty or a hundred years behind the United States. It is precisely this point that Latin America should contest. Is Latin America a young, developing United States? Is it on the same development road? Aren't there any alternate routes, even to the same destination? Aren't there any other destinations, equally desirable, and as readily attainable?

That's the challenge. Latin American leaders, of industry, commerce, culture, education, find themselves in one of those famous "crucial moments of history." Latin America can become, if it is not already, the passive receptacle of a foreign aid which will impress a mold of Western homogeneity on the Indo-Hispanic clay. On the other hand, does not Latin America have any options in the matter? Must leaders rush headlong down the road to urbanization and "modernization" in spite of danger signs aloft in Los Angeles and New York? Is not this the time for Latin thinkers and writers to conjure their own utopias, to declare their "manifest destinies" in some independence from Europe and the United States? Certainly the expanse of land and its resources, the variety of cultural streams, the creativity of an imaginative people should produce some blueprints not to be found in Washington or Moscow.

This is not a plea to go back to nature, nor a polemic against Yankee or European culture. Neither is it a tirade against modernization, cars, medicines, T.V. It is a plea for a careful study of the society of the future, a study of the human relations that will obtain, the values to be recognized, the quality of life of tomorrow. It is a challenge to the leaders of Latin America to set a course such that Latin America doesn't just disappear in the anonymity of a universal tomorrow. Latin America can choose to preserve some of its Hispanic or Indo-American cultures. Or if it doesn't want to preserve anything, it can invent new forms for itself.

Educational expansion without serious examination of cultural and humanistic factors will produce and reinforce the economic pattern and structure of the United States and Western Europe. Technically competent people will flow from the more efficient systems to guarantee the process. I see no reason to believe that a protest against the development current in Latin America would be more effective ten years from now. On the contrary, time is on the side of the homogenizers.

Finally, I do not presume to warn anybody, especially since I am not a Latin American, but I can predict. And I predict that the United States and European programs of assistance to Latin America will be successful. Latin American economic development already shows signs of taking off. In the midst of discomfiting symptoms of tension I foresee staggeringly great, almost unimagined economic growth. I also foresee the homogenization. Cities are cities. Factories are factories. Supermarkets are supermarkets. It would take political, perhaps even religious bravery to stand before the juggernaut. To complicate matters, the alternatives are not at all clear. It is obvious that economic development à la Washington, D.C., means lots of goods, highways, cars, movies, TV, medicine, food; and all of those look terribly attractive to hungry and sick people. The options are not clear, partly because they have not been sought. In this uneven choice it is no wonder that economic development continues, and as it does it compresses other aspects of society into its mold.

In the last third of the 20th century I hold out two hopes for escaping an Orwellian future. The first hope is in a not well founded faith in the imagination and creativity of man; the second is that individualized development may be realized not through work in the developing countries but by an awakening in the developed countries to some fundamental questions about the Great Society of tomorrow. New thoughts about urbanization, human relations, computerized work, beautification, use of leisure time, may transform modern societies soon enough to make the exchange with Latin America open, if not reciprocal.

LETTERS

(continued from page 298)

he likes it or not. . . . It was precisely Mr. Bellow's novels that encouraged me to think that there are points of agreement between us: ending the cold war; deepening the understanding between intellectuals of West and East. Therefore I tried to point out how difficult it is for Western intellectuals to know something about our Eastern experiences during the last twenty years. It was equally difficult for Eastern (and perhaps some Western) writers to understand why Mr. Bellow chose an international meeting to attack America's "subculture of literary intellectuals," a wholly internal matter. . . . I perfectly agree with Mr. Bellow also that I "appropriated his speech for purposes of my own." I pressed my purpose in taking part in the International P.E.N. Congress and in writing on East-West meetings of intellectuals by quoting the summing up of Arthur Miller at the close of the P.E.N. Congress: "You and I should emphasize what is similar and isolate what separates us." I am sorry that I was wrong in supposing that these are not only my own purposes but also those of the distinguished author of Herzog.

Iván Boldizsár

new kind of witness

Brooklyn, N.Y.

Dear Sirs: Frank Donner's article ["HUAC: From Pillory to Farce," Sept. 5] about our confrontation with HUAC, while favorable to our style of demolishing the committee, misses or distorts the principal point of the hearings. Mr. Donner reports the "overnight" emergence of a "new kind of witness," who instead of cringing before the un-Americans "boils over with talk . . . attacks the committee, its premises and its claimed legislative subject matter. . . ." The tactic of militantly testifying before HUAC, of turning the hearing into its opposite by accusing the accuser, had been developed by the Progressive Labor Party (five of the six witnesses who testified were PLP members) at two previous HUAC investigations, after the 1963 and 1964 student trips to Cuba. It didn't spring up "overnight." This tactic flowed from our general line of openly and proudly advocating communism and putting forward the necessity of Socialist revolution in the United States, as opposed to the reformist and civil-libertarian stance of the Communist Party.

More important, our testimony was not primarily aimed at attacking the committee, as Mr. Donner implies. Our principal thrust was against the war in Vietnam, the imperialist system responsible for that war, and the Johnson Administration and the entire U. S. Government responsible to that system. The press correctly reported as central our statements about the war being unjust and against the interests of the American people. We felt that attacking HUAC was secondary because HUAC is secondary; in this case it was merely being used as one of several government tools designed to split the anti-war movement.

Rick Rhoads, President
CCNY Progressive Labor Club morality is the law

Mesquite, Tex.

Dear Sirs: "Christianity" is much esteemed in our society, but morality has been against the law from the time of Christ. Only the method of punishment has changed from throwing the moralists to the lions to sentencing them to years of hard labor and permanent disgrace in the eyes of self-styled Christians. . . . A man must never take seriously such Christian teachings as "Thou Shalt Not Kill" or "Love Thine Enemies" lest he be unable to revise his thinking at age 19, when killing becomes praiseworthy and hate is a virtue.

Henry Thoreau, a moralist, was jailed for failure to pay taxes to a government that condoned slavery. He was also guilty of saying such impractical, inflammatory things as: "The law will never make men free; it is men who must make the law free," and "It is the duty of the citizen to uphold the law when the government breaks it. . . ."

Mrs. Lee Dresh

BOOKS & THE ARTS

T. S. Eliot: The Poet As Critic

TO CRITICIZE THE CRITIC AND OTHER WRITINGS. By T. S. Eliot. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 189 pp. $4.95.

FREDERICK J. HOFFMAN

Mr. Hoffman holds the chair of Distinguished Professor of English at the University of Wisconsin in Milwaukee. His most recent book is The Mortal No: Death and the Modern Imagination (Princeton).

To have a book like this in one's hands is like revisiting a favorite cousin after several decades. Not only has the cousin grown old beyond belief but he is also a memento mori to one's self. In this case, literally so, since Eliot has died, having outlived his reputation by some years.

There were times when Eliot's word as critic was taken almost as oracular, as though a man who wrote such poetry could not fail in the slightest as a critic. The poetry remains (though almost the whole of it had been published by 1941); and, while our commitment to it has diminished from the 100 per cent of the forties and fifties, to a more modest 75 per cent (Stevens grows as Eliot diminishes, for reasons that it is beyond the scope of this essay to give), the initial enthusiasm for the Eliot of 1915-40 has somehow been justified and need cause no embarrassment.

What of Eliot as a critic? Of course, one needs to ask, which Eliot? Or, the Eliot of what time in his career? For he lived a long time, and his writing endured many changes. The final conservative, even fussily, mildly humorous old gentleman who can dilate upon the meaning of runcibles in Alice in Wonderland and elsewhere, is here; but strangely, so is the earliest Eliot (earliest, that is, aside from his reviews of philosophical work). His widow explains that the "Ezra Pound: His Metric and Poetry" and "Reflections on Vers Libre" (both of them dated 1917) are included in this posthumous volume "in response to many requests." It is with these two that we need to begin. The little booklet on Pound, published by the then very young Alfred Knopf in November, 1917, is an earnest of Eliot's early position. He was applauding the Pound of the early volumes, of the vivid discussions of Provençal and Chinese and French poetry (a selected group in each case), the Pound who had so recently started writing the Cantos that Eliot is able to mention them only in the last paragraph.

Above all, Eliot was discussing Pound the Imagist, the Vorticist, with whom he genuinely shared interests and convictions. These two words suggest the artist as an impersonal (but, somehow also perceptive, sensitive) agent, by means of which the image is communicated, so that, as he said in his famous essay on Hamlet, if a system, a structure, of images be somehow put together, "when the external facts, which must terminate in sensory experience, are given, the emotion is immediately evoked."

This is the Eliot of an assumed "objective," "impersonal" criticism. "Honest criticism and sensitive appreciation," he said in another famous essay ("Tradition and the Individual Talent," 1919), "are directed not upon the poet but upon the poetry." It was in that essay that he compared the mind of the poet to the catalyst, in an analogy that became so popular that he had to joke about it later, to shrug it off, as indeed he does in the title essay of this volume. The ambience of this analogy, however, was not to be ignored in these early years. Both Eliot and Pound were striving for what might be called a perfect aesthetic stasis, a formulation of the aesthetic moment that could stand up to the "accuracies" of science. They were not the only ones inclined to mistrust the fading romanticism of late 19th-century poetry and criticism. Criticism was engaged in an almost urgent search for the right, impersonal, nongenteel formulation. The only way in which the personality of the artist seemed permitted to demonstrate itself was in the areas of satire and irony.

Most of all, Pound and Eliot sought a justification of the poet-critic. They did not require that the poetry affect the criticism, though much was said by both about the taste of the poet, who would seek out the best and more unerringly find it than nonpoets. Eliot came close in 1923 to suggesting an "autotelic activity" in criticism, as though there were something automatic in the technicalities, both of its process and its results. He meant something else, of course: that the object of creation is "autotelic," and that criticism is about that object. This assertion implies that criticism and creation are and will remain separate, but also that the critic has no more right to intrude his personality than the artist has to assert his. The net result is a stringent, limited, technical, above all an objective criticism.

Northrop Frye said, in Anatomy of Criticism, that when a poet writes a critical essay, it must be judged not as a poem but as a work separate from his poetry. The criticism does not, or ought not borrow prestige from the fact that a poet has written it. This is true; or, if it isn't, much criticism of literature and art must be discarded. In fact, the most substantial work in criticism has been done by persons who have taken the act of criticism seriously, and who have the knowledges that enable them to relate literature to many other elements of a culture. Gradually, in the 1920s, Eliot grew to realize that this is generally true; and he also began to withdraw his rather austere notion of the poet's mind as catalyst. The real problem was the question of belief. The very issues with which Prof. J. Hillis Miller has recently been engaged (in a strange, though impressive book called Poets of Reality) were available to the Eliot of the 1920s: the sense of pure, essential reality residing in the image, the spatial dimension (as distinguished from the depth, the intensity and the emotional quality) of aesthetic reality. Miller discusses these as the surrogates of theological reality, and of course he includes Eliot among those who helped establish the point of view. But Eliot was the last person to satisfy himself with a reality which excluded a superintending God, and he objected also to a divinity as principle, derived intellectually.

So that his principal issue in the years following the assertions I have been discussing were really concerned with belief. At the moment, Eliot was not especially preoccupied with doctrine but simply with the matter of reinserting the emotional powers and values of belief (or, commitment) into the discussion of poetry. In his principal essay on "Dante" (1929), he included the famous debate with I. A. Richards (who in his pamphlet, "Science and Poetry," 1926, had stirred people like Eliot to examine some of the implications of what they had said). The long footnote at the end of Part II has these remarkable concessions: "Actually, one probably has more pleasure in the poetry when one shares the beliefs of the poet. On the other hand there is a distinct pleasure in enjoying poetry as poetry when one does not share the beliefs, analogous to the pleasure of 'mastering' other men's philosophical systems." In other words, Eliot began to introduce "irrelevancies," to allow personal choices, in the experience of "enjoying" poetry.

From that point forward, Eliot's criticism, as his poetry, moved further and further toward not only admitting belief into the emotional experience of art but explicitly signifying the doctrinaire terms according to which belief may be specified. The remark made in his Essays Ancient and Modern (1935), which Paul Elmer More was so delighted to find, should surely have surprised no one who had been aware of this trend: "The 'greatness' of literature cannot be determined solely by literary standards; though we must remember that whether it is literature or not can be determined solely by literary standards." The days of the "catalyst" analogy and of the stern warnings about the limits of criticism seem far away indeed; and they were to seem even more remote in the series of short books produced in the thirties and forties: After Strange Gods (lectures at the University of Virginia, published in 1934), in which the unwary first discovered the conservative Eliot, despite the great poet's disclaimer in the Preface, that he was not serving as a critic but as a kind of intellectual historian; Notes Towards the Definition of Culture (1939), in which the word definition meant limiting; and The Idea of a Christian Society (1939), concerned largely with Conservative politics and religion.

With the exception of the two essays rescued from the oblivion of almost a half century, the current volume simply carries on the tradition of these short volumes. Perhaps, in consequence, they are dull; but their dullness is not solely a result of point of view. The lectures given at the University of Chicago in 1950 and 1951 seem to me to demonstrate an ordinary mind that has lost much of its vigor and is in any case more the amateur than ever. Only the title essay, given at the University of Leeds in 1961, seems worthy among the recent pieces of having been "collected" in book form. Here he discusses kinds and types of critics, but often, again, in a coy "personal" way, as though the subject were really just "among friends." The essay is interesting as a memoir of the man looking at his career as critic: apparently, "it is my earlier essays which have made the deeper impression," he says, and he attributes this fact to "the dogmatism of youth," and—more important—in those days "I was implicitly defending the sort of poetry that I and my friends wrote."

In these remarks there are several implications for the history of modern criticism. Both Eliot and Pound were aware of themselves as having broken new ground in a very significant way in the years from 1908 to 1925 (the first date marks the publication of Pound's first book of poems; the second simply suggests the beginning of a later phase, in which opinions generally take the place of vigorous pronunciamentos). In Eliot's case, more so than Pound's, there is a retreat into a number of traditions, to which he yielded without doing very much to qualify the nature of them. This, among other reasons, explains the startling differences between the last two of the essays published in this volume and the rest of them. Surely, Eliot on education can have only an antiquarian interest; as, indeed, can many other aspects of this volume. But we do not leave this collection, however much it fails in terms of the requirements of a unified book, without being reminded that Eliot was at one time—and for a long while and for his own vital reasons—at the forefront of modern criticism. The effects are still radically seen by us, even though few of Eliot's later public statements suggest that he was fully aware of them.

Eliot As Playwright

CAROL H. SMITH

Mrs. Smith is an assistant professor of English at Douglass College of Rutgers University, and the author of T. S. Eliot's Dramatic Theory and Practice (Princeton).

To the theatregoer accustomed to the conventions of modern drama, the plays of T. S. Eliot are more likely to baffle than to inspire. Not only do Eliot's plays refuse to conform to today's dramatic modes but each play is theatrically different from the others. Moreover, a play which begins in one dramatic mood typically turns into another before one's eyes. The historical pageantry of Murder in the Cathedral is disrupted by jazz meters and the rhythms of 20th-century polemic; in other plays, occult and mystical touches intrude into the world of high comedy or Wildean farce. Eliot is quite capable of including in the same play the most sensitive lyric passages and wisecracking representatives of divinity or parodies of sacramental rites.

Behind these practical difficulties lies the more significant and difficult question of the relationship of Eliot's plays to his poetry. Are his plays to be taken as serious expressions in another medium of the religious position Eliot has presented in his nondramatic verse, or are they a thing apart, separate creations in a separate vein? Early critics of the plays generally expressed the view that Eliot was either writing plays with his left hand while concentrating his major efforts on lyric poetry, or that he was consciously trying to "take in" his audience. Today, in the light of the number of Eliot's plays and the fact that he spent the major part of his mature career in their composition, the seriousness of his intentions can hardly be doubted.

Eliot's interest in drama dates back to the beginnings of his career. His critical essays on Elizabethan and Jacobean dramatists, his use of the dramatic monologue in some of his best-known early poems ("The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock," "Portrait of a Lady," "Gerontion"), and the dramatic contrast of episodes in The Waste Land all testify to what Edmund Wilson called "the dramatic character of his imagination." But there is a further aspect of Eliot's interest in drama that is often overlooked, although it is a thread woven throughout his early essays and critical pronouncements—his interest in what he calls, in the title of an early essay, "The Possibility of a Poetic Drama."

Eliot's desire for a poetic drama for the 20th century is part of an interest shared by many of his generation: there is an unwritten chapter in the intellectual history of the period to be constructed out of the multiple threads of influence drawn from Henry James's and James Joyce's elevation of the dramatic method in fiction and the essentially dramatic idea of the mask with which Yeats transformed modern poetry. But in Eliot's case the implications of the dramatic form went far beyond aesthetic concerns, and was integrally connected with the religious and philosophical position which he was in the process of formulating. Eliot's much publicized announcement in 1928 that he had become an Anglo-Catholic reflected his religious shift from despair at the disorder of the natural world to acceptance of a supernatural order which transcends and harmonizes the world's apparent chaos. Just as a religious interpretation of existence was needed to order the world of nature and of man, so art, he felt, required a form which could impose order and meaning on experience. The form which Eliot came to see as most perfectly ordered and most complete as a microcosmic creation of experience was drama.

The drama offered the artist the chance to play God more completely yet less obviously than any other literary form, and it can be assumed that Joyce's famous comparison of the artist to the God of creation who pares his fingernails while his creatures play out their parts was not lost on Eliot. Moreover, Eliot had followed with deep interest the work of J. G. Frazer in The Golden Bough and the Cambridge school of classical anthropologists in their assertions of the ritual origin of drama. He found in the death and resurrection pattern, which Frazer and his followers discerned at the heart of both Greek tragedy and comedy, a theme which was perfectly suited to both his aesthetic and religious demands. What is found in all of his plays is his own variant of the resurrection pattern: the painful acceptance of God's controlling presence and light by an inhabitant of the natural world of darkness and disorder.

But for drama to provide the aesthetic ordering of experience which Eliot considered necessary, it had to be conceived as a unity of elements, a vehicle which could harmonize the seeming contraries of the natural and supernatural by its language as well as its form; it had to be, in other words, poetic in conception. His consistent criticism of dramatic realism can be understood in the light of his view that drama should be rescued from the secularism and "materialism" of the prose realists. One of Eliot's fullest statements of his position can be seen in Four Elizabethan Dramatists (1924):

> The great vice of English drama from Kyd to Galsworthy has been that its aim of realism was unlimited. [S]ince Kyd . . . there has been no form to arrest, so to speak, the flow of spirit at any particular point before it expands and ends its course in the desert of exact likeness to the reality which is perceived by the most commonplace mind. . . . In a play of Aeschylus, we do not find that certain passages are literature and other passages drama; every style of utterance in the play bears a relation to the whole and because of this relation is dramatic in itself. The imitation of life is circumscribed, and the approaches to ordinary speech and withdrawals from ordinary speech are not without relation and effect upon each other. It is essential that a work of art should be self-consistent, that an artist should consciously or unconsciously draw a circle beyond which he does not trespass: on the one hand actual life is always the material, and on the other hand an abstraction from actual life is a necessary condition to the creation of the work of art.

Eliot's desire, then, was for a dramatic form which would make drama conform to the criterion of all art: the harmonious relationship of the parts to the whole. He insisted that such a relationship could be achieved only by the abstraction of reality, a standard which realism could never achieve. Poetry, on the other hand, is by its nature an artistic abstraction of life; by the use of the language of metaphor and the rhythmic patterning of language, the poet draws the parts and the whole into a unified relationship which could never be confused with the "desert of exact likeness" to reality. Eliot's ideal of dramatic form was a work which would re-create in its theme, its form and its language the harmony which explained the untidy surface of life. The dramatist's mission was thus both artistic and religious, and it was envisioned as a process of transformation.

Eliot's pursuit of this concept of form can be seen in all his plays from his first dramatic experiment, the two scenes of Sweeney Agonistes, to his last play, The Elder Statesman. In Sweeney Agonistes, written from 1924 to 1926, Eliot used jazz rhythms and a "furnished-flat" atmosphere to convey the spiritual barrenness and corruption of the natural world. The scenes are ingeniously constructed as a restatement in modern terms of the quotations which stand as the work's epigraphs—the line in Aeschylus' Choephoroi which marks Orestes' first awareness of the Furies, and the instruction by St. John of the Cross to the novice who seeks to pass through the dark night of the senses: "Hence the soul cannot be possessed of the divine union, until it has divested itself of the love of created beings." The climax of the piece is Sweeney's description of a grisly murder where the girl's body was dissolved in a lysol bath and where the murderer, perhaps Sweeney himself, experiences the Christian paradox as a state where "death is life and life is death." In the symbolism of the murderer who carries out the divestment of the love of created beings in the most grotesque terms, the emphasis is upon the horror and pain involved in the discovery of the world of the spirit, and upon the in-

WALK IN WOODS

St. Vincent's

I go looking for Strephon and Chlora:
drawing my ribs tight, plunging my face in dark branchy places hinted by gossipy sparrow shocking
jay to raspy declamation.
November's bare for discovery,
air blood temperature,
woods untidy as mind
—tomorrow will be time to put the house in order—today is heady, keen, all within itself: I call on spice of fallen leaf, rain smell, moss feel, squashed redberry, wormwood and bitten bark, obbligato of a late grasshopper.
Here's continent for lovers,
plushland of Eros,
room for 'this endless
shadow, this manshape'.
Errors of dream cancel in prime matter of woodlight slanting into man's way.
Give me a big light, Eros,
I'm looking for my cousins,
milkwhite and nutbrown,
inevitable as flesh.
From searching, breath comes heavy,
I will hold my throat,
loiter beside this old nest
to be robined next year:
check a cavern of self unbothered by existence for essence of woods.
Sudden rainpoints fine as sorrow touch my scalp, rinsing brain and frozen stars
of relic dandelion fluff
I find in my gathered hand.
If I blow hard
I can star woods to brightness on my own terms, giving up all the pieces broken as looked-in mirror.
But where is my ghostly father who led me
in his alb and snow chasuble to this leafy confessional?
I could confess bless me father for I have wasted light under honest trees, by nettles hard and brittle,
near unblown milkweed.
Call Adonai, white father, he leans on your eye and on ghosts of lovers
I drape with wet tendril.
He may know the difference
if I'm back.

RAYMOND ROSELIEP

ability of the newly awakened soul to communicate his awareness to others. In Sweeney Agonistes, the price of awareness is very great, and the sacrifice of human love demanded by the spiritual world is forcefully symbolized by the tragic duty of Orestes who must commit matricide in order to avenge patricide.

In Murder in the Cathedral (1935), Eliot attempted a treatment of the theme of spiritual sacrifice in more timeless terms. While the portrayal of the martyrdom of St. Thomas of Canterbury is the spiritual center of the play, the role of the chorus of women of Canterbury is of equal importance. In Sweeney Agonistes, Eliot had used a jazz version of the Greek chorus, but here the chorus serves a more integral function by showing that God's choice of His martyr is not a private affair between the Deity and the saint, but an event with consequences in the lives of all men. The women are led through the painful process of awareness to the acknowledgment of their share in both the martyr's suffering and his glory. While the drama uses many of the ritual features, it has a closer and more appropriate source for the resurrection theme in the Passion and Resurrection of Christ; Thomas himself makes the parallel between the martyr and Christ quite explicit in his Christmas sermon.

In Eliot's careful avoidance of all but the most necessary historical references, the stylized quality of the characterizations, and the single-minded concentration on the eternal nature of the struggle between man's pride and God's will, he was clearly trying to lift the particular to a universal plane and thereby make the play of contemporary relevance to his audience. The introduction of the Knights's jazz chant in the murder scene and their direct address to the audience in the language of contemporary political debate were clearly intended to lead to the rejection of their view that the martyr be judged of "unsound mind." Despite the play's theatrical success, however, Eliot labeled it a "dead end," for he came to feel that its historical situation had caused his failure to convince audiences of the need for revision of their secular point of view.

So, in The Family Reunion (1939), he returned to a contemporary setting, but he replaced the furnished flat of Sweeney Agonistes with the English country house. Many features of the play, however, suggest that it is a reworking of the earlier piece. The situation is again based on a contemporary treatment of the Orestes story, even to the re-use of the cry of Orestes, the tale of a murdered wife, and the pursuing Furies. Again Eliot uses the method of turning a situation normally viewed in secular terms into one charged with religious meaning. Into the world of Wishwood where the Monchensey family has gathered to celebrate the dowager mother's birthday, the playwright introduces Harry, the son of the family, distraught, guilt-ridden and a possible "murder suspect." But gradually the Agatha Christie atmosphere, complete with police inspector, is translated into ritual terms as the guilt-laden Harry is led to a recognition of his election by God. In the symbols of the play, Harry rejects the obligation of the human family (thus, like Orestes, causing his mother's death) in favor of union with God.

In The Cocktail Party (1949) and The Confidential Clerk (1953), Eliot turned to comedy, a time-honored instrument for the disruption of expectations, in his attempt to reveal the divine plan behind appearances. His method in both plays was to create a surface atmosphere unlikely to suggest religious attitudes and then to bring the audience step by step to the awareness of the spiritual analogues in the situation. Eliot saw the possibility of exploiting for religious purposes the orderly and stylized comic world and the traditional comic resolution of all discord in the happy ending.

The Cocktail Party is in many ways Eliot's most ingenious play; by his own standards, his most successful one. The Alcestis myth, the story of Heracles' rescue of Alcestis from the realm of the dead, is re-created as a comedy of manners. Eliot exploits all the comic possibilities of misguided love affairs, double triangles, and cocktail party repartee, but behind the comic treatment of the several love affairs, the playwright examines the Christian assumption that the human condition without grace leads to misguided concepts of the meaning of love. With the help of Sir Henry, Eliot's priest-doctor who represents Heracles, Lavinia is rescued from the spiritual death of self-love and returned to her husband and her hearth; Sir Henry also rescues Celia from the secular world and sends her on the journey toward sainthood and martyrdom. The play marks a significant new emphasis in Eliot's attitude toward salvation; for the first time in his plays both the Affirmative Way of love in Christian marriage and the Negative Way of St. John of the Cross are presented as equally valid approaches to God.

In The Confidential Clerk, Eliot explored the religious possibilities in the favorite theme of farce, the foundling child's search for his true parentage. With a situation drawn from the Ion of Euripides, but with a comic surface suggesting Oscar Wilde, the play presents Colby's search for his true father which

CAMBRIDGE PAPERBACKS

The Art of D. H. Lawrence
KEITH SAGAR $2.45

An Experiment in Criticism
C. S. LEWIS $1.65

African Poetry: An Anthology of Traditional African Poems
Edited by ULLI BEIER $1.95

W. B. Yeats: His Poetry and Thought
A. G. STOCK $1.95

Poems of Goethe
Edited by RONALD GRAY $2.45

Poems of Góngora
Edited by R. O. JONES $2.25

Concise Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature, 2nd ed.
Edited by GEORGE WATSON $1.95

Kant's Analytic
JONATHAN BENNETT $3.45

An Experiment in Education
SYBIL MARSHALL $1.95

Mr Tompkins in Paperback
GEORGE GAMOW $1.95

The Concept of Nature
ALFRED NORTH WHITEHEAD $1.95

The First Industrial Revolution
PHYLLIS M. DEANE $2.95

Fabian Socialism and English Politics, 1884-1918
A. M. McBRIAR $2.95

Social Science and Political Theory
W. G. RUNCIMAN $1.75

AT YOUR BOOKSTORE

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS
32 E. 57 St.,
New York 10022

ends with his discovery of his Father in Heaven. Through the transparent surface of the farce and the underlying seriousness of the analogies, Eliot was able to avoid the dramatic disruptions of the play's surface and instead create a comic fable which could be read on two levels at once.

In The Elder Statesman (1958), Eliot's last play, he dispensed with the idea of discrepancy between levels altogether and allowed the meaning of the source to determine the mood of the surface. Even the verse, which some critics have found indistinguishable from prose, can be seen on close analysis to be carefully constructed to approach the natural rhythms of speech, while poetically exploring the relationship between the modern situation and the ancient source. The play is modeled on Sophocles' Oedipus at Colonus. Lord Claverton, like the aging Oedipus who finds peace through expiation, faces the ghosts of his past, and with the help of his daughter's love dies purified. Eliot's choice of Oedipus at Colonus for his source seems to suggest that he wished the play to present a final resolution of the theme of spiritual quest, for at the time of the first production of The Family Reunion Eliot had written to his director, E. Martin Browne, that "Harry's career needs to be completed by an Orestes or an Oedipus at Colonus." In its tone of acceptance and its emphasis on the saving power of love, his final play seems to be a fulfillment of that promise.

A Place of Resonance

THE MUSIC SCHOOL. By John Updike. Alfred A. Knopf. 260 pp. $4.95.

CHARLES T. SAMUELS

Mr. Samuels teaches English at Williams College. He has written for The Kenyon Review, The Yale Review, Commonweal and other magazines.

The Music School contains nearly all the stories John Updike has published in the past four years. As before, there are too many trifles; unfortunately, chronological arrangement places too many of them at the beginning of the book. Nevertheless, The Music School is Updike's best collection, with superior examples of every sort of story that he writes.

"Lifeguard" in Pigeon Feathers was a consideration of the ambiguities of secular life through the reverie of a divinity student who is earning tuition on the beach. With a contrapuntal technique that plays on its title, "The Music School" treats the same theme with greater poise. Though more audacious than the earlier tale, which managed to turn bathers into theological terms, this story does not mock its speaker's pain with a brazen virtuosity.

Other stories, formally less innovating, comprise Updike's clever portrayals of marital tension. Cleverness, however, is sometimes evasive here. As Updike showed in Of the Farm, a quarrel has its own rhythm. Artificially composed, the notes sound shriller than they need to be, frequently false. The short-story form, particularly as practiced in The New Yorker, forces Updike to impose structural neatness upon materials that seem authentic only when free from external restraint. So, in "Giving Blood," the precise oscillation of the Maples' love is cut short arbitrarily. In a restaurant where they go to share the moment of camaraderie, born while they donated blood, the husband finds he lacks money to pay for his affectionate invitation; and the wife, obviously punning, replies: "We'll both pay." Surfeited with cleverness, the reader now disdains the pun implicit in the whole story; what could have been a moving glimpse at familiar despair blinds us with a glossy surface to its underlying truth.

Two tales in The Music School manage to make slickness a virtue. "Avec La Bébé-Sitter" and "The Rescue" don't strain for outsize responses. The couples in them are either past the Maples' danger or their troubles are unreal. The first story is a sardonic anecdote about two people on the rocks who hope to cement their foundation by moving to Antibes. One afternoon while the wife is gone, the husband, manfully learning French from their baby-sitter-maid, blurts out the house's secret. Ironically, his confession creates an emotional order on these shifty Mediterranean sands which the family lacked back home. In the second story, a young woman who suspects her husband is unfaithful decides not to yield to disruptive anger. Faced with a fortuitous image of divorced self-righteousness, spread-eagled on an icy ski slope, she becomes certain that her husband must be innocent. Cleverness can capture only small ironies in human affairs, but it is the merit of both stories that their ironies precisely suit their treatment.

Updike's art is more polished in this volume than in his earlier collections, but The Music School would be a less resonant place were it not for one group of stories representing an advance in scope. One of these, Updike's best story to date, is another of those doctrinal debates which he presents as ordinary encounters, like Hook and Conner discussing the nature of virtue in the poorhouse sitting room, or Rabbit and Eccles defining grace on the golf course. In "The Christian Roommates" the essential Updike meeting of pharisee and would-be saint occurs at Harvard, an institution designed to train adolescents—thus, a perfect setting for Updike's theme. Not even Salinger has created so touching a display of that mixture of fear and bravado with which the college student approaches an adult role. The background of "The Christian Roommates" is crowded with young souls fixed in brittle postures of self-defensiveness, like the homesick colored boy who warms himself in the unfamiliar New England cold with nightly blowing on a trumpet mouthpiece, or the witty roommates who mask their enmity by collaborating on improvised musical comedies at the expense of all outsiders.

Against this background, Updike presents the engagement of Orson Zeigler, lanky, Midwestern, athletic valedictorian, who has mapped out his future as town physician and pillar of society, with Hub Palamountain, maddeningly arrogant, vegetarian, boor and yogi. Each moment of their conflict is finely rendered. When Orson first enters the room which will become their battleground, Hub dazzles him with those personal details—divorced parents, unpopularity, conscientious objecting to the draft, and arcane religious zeal—which give Zeigler his first glimpse of depths hidden in his own life. In the midst of this recital, Hub accounts rather solemnly for his summer job as gluer in a plywood mill. "It's a kind of excessive introspection," he intones, "you've read Hamlet?" Fresh-scrubbed Orson feels his soul challenged. "Just Macbeth and The Merchant of Venice," he pleads.

Definitive as it is, their contention is never expressed in moments less natural than this one. In his best work, Updike infuses his story with meaning not by commenting on the action but by always finding the right gesture or word for his people so that their significance is the satisfying accumulation of all they have said or done. Thus, for the final impact of Hub's god-lust on Orson's shallow correctness, Updike finds the perfect measured fact: when the boy becomes the man he had envisioned, he carries "a kind of scar . . . without pain and without any clear memory of the amputation. . . . He never prays."

Though "The Christian Roommates" is typical, it suggests the author's willingness to break the essentially domestic walls of his universe, a willingness best realized in two other stories: "At a Bar in Charlotte Amalie" and "The Bulgarian Poetess." The first tale is a rigidly controlled description of events witnessed at a bar in the Virgin Islands. The tableau is formed by the slightest shift in the arrangement of its components: a prim schoolteacher who by entering the bar starts the story is subtly drawn into its languid corruption as a finale. Nothing much happens, but we know this bar down to the last cloying drop of rum with which its inhabitants assuage their aimlessness.

"The Bulgarian Poetess" is the volume's emotive triumph just as "The Christian Roommates" is its triumph in human understanding. There is little fulfilled love in Updike's fiction; he is too aware of its contingency. But "The Bulgarian Poetess" creates a moment of love which is all the more precious for being fugitive. Its hero is an American novelist whose best work is behind him and whose life has dried for want of affection. On a feckless red-taped journey to Bulgaria, he meets a fellow writer whose female grace and tenderness give him sustaining proof of what he has had to live without.

In the course of this story, Updike needs to provide some informed literary chatter for his writers and cultural hangers-on. What he makes them say is intrinsically interesting. How many of our writers can demonstrate a character's intelligence? How many can find the right words for two adolescents who are taking each other's measure? How many can describe the exact sensation of feeling blood drained from your arm or the gradations of shadow as the sky darkens?

Updike's range of experience is both common and confined; he avoids those upheavals in which many of us like to think we find our true reflection. Some readers will persist in finding him trivial; they will miss separable and obtrusive "ideas": even fervent admirers must admit that his situations are often too slight. But within the ordinary moments he selects, his precisely expressive language always embeds an insight authenticated by gesture, a truth extensively portrayed. No one has ever denied his skill. But we ought to remember that in art, skill is not a dispensable adjunct to seriousness; it is seriousness: proof that the artist esteems his craft, his subject, his readers. Updike's reverence for life won't disdain small moments and won't compromise itself with inflated or pretentious language. His seriousness is chastened by modesty, his nostalgia is both joyful and unillusioned, his precision is both linguistic and dramatic. Is there another new American novelist who gives such continuous proof of the power of art?

Mr. Keynes and His Age

THE AGE OF KEYNES. By Robert Lekachman. Random House. 324 pp. $6.
THE CARTHAGINIAN PEACE OR THE ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES OF MR. KEYNES. By Etienne Mantoux. Introduction by Robert G. Colodny. University of Pittsburgh Press. 235 pp. $2.25 paper.

JAMES F. BECKER

Mr. Becker is associate professor of economics at New York University. He has published in professional journals as well as in Studies on the Left and Columbia Forum.

In this high noon of Keynes's renown, hardly a man is to be found who can face the record of that economist's conquests and doubt their impressiveness. To the elusive goal of putting our affairs upon a rational footing, his economics is generally conceded to have made a decisive contribution.

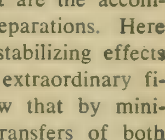
Yet Keynes has not always been regarded as a foe of disorder and, despite the majority opinion, the case for his greatness is incomplete. It is likely to remain so despite the evidence contained in these two volumes if only because Lekachman is too uncritical of Keynes's life and times alike, while Mantoux's famous study, though valuable by reason of its critical acuteness, encompasses too small a range of its subject's work.

Lekachman begins his study where Mantoux, the excellent scholar and Free French soldier, killed in action in World War II, begins and ends, with Keynes's Economic Consequences of the Peace and its sequel, A Revision of the Treaty. Lekachman accepts without question Keynes's view that the intent of the Allied principals at Versailles was too punitive, the terms of the Treaty reprehensible by the standards of sound economic judgment, and the peace too "Carthaginian." Surely the passage of time has shown that strict justice demanded more from the Germany of World War I than the young Keynes realized. As Mantoux shows us in meticulous detail, the dimness of Keynes's foresight was in his early work matched by the superficiality of his analysis.

As one marvels at Mantoux's annihilation of Keynes's argument for a lenient settlement for Germany, one wonders whether, had that Keynes the maturity of, say, a Veblen, his imagination could have responded to the simple yet stringent conditions for German pacification that Veblen proposed in The Nature of Peace. Keynes's spiritual sympathies might then have run with the "tigers" of Versailles whose demands he so ridiculed, and the phrase "transfer problem" that he invented to summarize his brief for magnanimity in the matter of reparations payments from Germany might never have arisen to confuse our thinking. We have Mantoux to thank for clarifying the essential nature of this example of Keynesian semantics.

The problem of reparative transfers, of which economic metaphysicians still incline to make a good deal, consisted of two parts. The first referred to the possible movements of goods and services required to repair the harm done by the aggressor. Here, however, the dictates of justice conflicted under competitive capitalism with the needs of the domestic producers of the Allies who could see their home markets undercut by Germany's reparative exports, and their foreign markets shrunk by her economic dieting at home. Such prospects have been known to weaken even a strong merchant's taste for justice. Mantoux reveals how Keynes would have limited Allied demands so as, in effect, to forestall such embarrassments; for example, by grossly underestimating the capacity of the German economy for "real" repayment.

In its second phase, the transfer problem embraced the international exchanges of money and credit that are the accompaniment to material reparations. Here Keynes perceived the destabilizing effects on money exchanges of extraordinary financial transfers. He saw that by minimizing the volume of transfers of both real and monetary kinds, one would minimize the stress upon mechanisms of international trade and exchange. Keynes thought, of course, that he had described the rather close boundaries of a reasonable and just settlement; what he had



COMMENTARY,
WORLD'S BEST MAGAZINE?
SEE FOR YOURSELF
☐ 7 Mo. Trial $4.79
☐ 12 Mo. $8.00
COMMENTARY, NA
165 East 56 St., NY, NY
☐ Bill me.
☐ Check enclosed.
Name................
Address................
Zip................
Outside USA + $1/yr.

actually described was a set of economic relationships that were not able to bear the weight of the demands of strict justice.

Though few of Keynes's more vengeful compatriots in business and finance saw the mercifulness to themselves of his reparations argument—as Boisguilbert long ago observed, the wealthy seldom know what is in their own best interest—his famous briefs did in fact support mainly the short-term, postwar needs of finance capital, which he so well understood. Indirectly, his argument served the long-term needs of German militarism, whose physical resources later went unchallenged because its social resources were strengthened by the Keynesian myth that injustice had been done at Versailles. That the basic rules of the game of transfers needed to be changed if justice were to be secured is the one possibility that Keynes refused to consider. We may conclude that his allegiance was to established rules and to the men who play by them, rather than to the needs of men in general and of justice in the abstract.

The thesis is not farfetched, though Lekachman fails to reach it, that throughout Keynes's career he restricted himself to the contemplation of possibilities for social adjustment that were consistent with the existing mores of trade and money and the power of those who live by them. So, in the twenties, while British officialdom struggled to re-establish the obsolete, prewar gold standard, Keynes sought to free these officials from their golden hamstrings, and to offer alternative guides for monetary actions along lines which had always been well within the administrative prerogative. Lekachman is right in saying that Keynes ". . . possessed a full measure of the intellectual's confidence in his capacity to produce alternative ideas," but he fails to see that the range of choice within which Keynes worked was always rather narrow. Mantoux was among the first to see that the narrowness had existed from the beginning.

The great consistency that one finds in Keynes's strategic objectives is to be found precisely in his recurring endeavor to reshape the processes of decision within the financial bureaus of government. No doubt Keynes believed—unquestionably he assumed — that intrastitial change would ultimately make for rationality within the social order at large upon which the bureaucracy so relentlessly impinges. Whether this vestige of a Victorian dream is itself rational is a question to which Keynes gave relatively little thought. History may yet name him the chief economist of the hope that dies hard.

PAIN

I

The woody fiber of the leaf; the stalk
With fingers spreading outward
Like an old vine-root, half-seen
In the dusty light, belonging
Half to sleep and half to knowledge.
Or is it a coat worn under the skin,
Wrapped closely around whatever lives?

II

When the sun went off against the windowpane,
Like firecrackers, my hands reached down
And touched your blurred life.
You moved inside yourself, fearing
For your words, and behind the silence
We touched each other with fingers
More than visible; practiced fingers,
Words made of the body, unlike pain
And yet filled with that strange blossom.

III

Shipwreck; the sides of the boat spread outward
Like petals; the columns of grey water
Lift up and dissolve; roofless temples,
Trees with foamy roots, desperate thoughts.

PAUL ZWEIG

Since publication in 1935 of The General Theory and the renaissance of its idea of effective demand, it has been difficult to see the importance of Keynes's persistent neglect of the main issue of the proper aim of social science. Because he never inquires whether the means to full employment in the short run are consistent with all else that is needed to insure in the long run the viability of the community (as he put it, "In the long run we are all dead"), and because he fails to relate full employment to other devices that promise to make our social life superior in time to what it now is, The General Theory promises to become the Bible of myopic bureaucrats. Thus Lekachman declares, without seeing the magnitude of the Keynesian defect:

> . . . it is possible to see at last that Keynesian economics is not conservative, liberal, or radical. The techniques of economic stimulation and stabilization are simply neutral administrative tools capable of distributing national income either more or less equitably, improving the bargaining position of either unions or employers, and increasing or decreasing the importance of the public sector of the economy.

How tools that produce such effects may be said to be "neutral" Lekachman does not explain, probably because it is inexplicable. Perhaps he meant to say that such tools would be neutral if men would refrain from using them, but he avoids that level of platitude. As the tools are now used, there is no neutrality in them if only because there are, and can be, no men who are outside of politics.

One may even doubt whether Keynes's economics is a social science at all. Social theorists of higher stature—Aristotle, Aquinas, Hobbes, Locke, Smith, Marx—have in common their effort to discover theoretically the political and economic conditions for integrating all social classes into one going concern—nor is there anything in that noble enterprise that precludes a thorough consideration of short-run problems, as their works demonstrate. By this standard, Keynes's is a mediocre economics. Embracing the short-term possibilities for full employment that fall within the confines of a given establishment, his economics leaves the selection among these possibilities—and the evaluation (if any) of their ultimate consequences—to the whims of those who dominate when the decision is made. Some will excuse Keynes's neglect for reason of our desperation to cure by any means the unemployment that confronted us in the thirties. Desperation excuses nothing, however, because it is always the essence of the human condition.

The political versatility of the "new" Keynesian idea—like his earlier idea of injustice at Versailles—accounts for its contemporary power. With "effective demand" one can be economically "scientific," keep one's eye on the main chance, and retain intact one's essential prejudices. This is the economics for which many have longed since Gopher Prairie first came to Washington. Its implicit assumption, that a series of economic patches will add up, eventually, to a piece of whole social cloth, saves the trouble of questioning the serviceability of basic institutions and of devising means for transforming them.

Furthermore, the patchwork school of social science and history to which Keynes belongs makes foolish demands upon science itself. Such a science must have heroes with a demonstrated capacity to grapple with emergencies if the validity of the thesis is to be maintained. At the moment, Keynes serves this exemplary function while Lekachman serves the thesis. This is why we do not have a definitive appraisal of Keynes, but receive in its stead the rhetoric of apocryphy with which some scientists dress their idols.

It is certainly fair to term this "the age of Keynes." But it has not been an age of triumph; nor are we yet done with the more sorry consequences of Keynes's work. It has been a period of precocious and fanciful nationalism. Its most famous lions have been members of the new administrative classes that seek to reconstruct the world in their own image. Our administrators have needed a rationale to justify and guide their handiwork so as to maintain the essential conditions for their own progress, and in answering to this need Keynes found his career. His life and work reveal the disappointments, the seeming victories, and the defeats for all of us that the dubious spirit of our age, the lack of wisdom of our governors, and the shortsightedness of our economists impose upon us now.

A Gallery of Monsters

NORMAN'S LETTER. By Gavin Lambert. Coward-McCann. 232 pp. $5.50.

JOHN RECHY

Mr. Rechy, author of City of Night (Grove Press), has just completed a new novel entitled Numbers.

In The Slide Area, an earlier novel by Gavin Lambert, someone draws a moral from a disastrous landslide that has swept some property away near Malibu: One shouldn't live too near the edge of a cliff.

Sir Norman Lightwood, the narrator in Lambert's new novel, has lived for long on the edge of a symbolic cliff and has surrounded himself with those only too eager to shove him over. His life, in fact, is a morbidly funny dying — an elaborately comic preparation for violence. With compassion never obviated by the deep laughter evoked, Lambert lets Sir Norman tell his own story, in the form of a lengthy letter (spanning 1936-43). Destined never to be sent — and, even if sent, never to be received — it is written to Ahmin, an Arab boy with whom Sir Norman had a furtive sexual encounter in Marrakech. The result is pitch-black comedy.

A wealthy baronet, Sir Norman chooses the Arab boy to write to because he's the only person who hasn't taken him; has, instead, given him something: a memory to cherish. All the others have seized advantage of Sir Norman's weaknesses: the sister who threatens him physically; the singer who marries him only to blackmail him; the woman photographer who may or may not have cunningly "lent" her male-model husband to him; the Santa Fe artist who cons him into commissioning her to do an outrageous mural in a fantastic tower Sir Norman has built à la Hearst in New Mexico; the sometimes sinister, sometimes wise, always crafty guru (most recently "from California") who will probably "inherit" the tower; and finally — and most chilling of all — the mother who leads Norman to a violent encounter with a sinister derelict in Vera Cruz.

But all this is accomplished not without Norman's help. Often a fool, Norman searches out his own violent destiny, crucially and significantly attracted (except in the case of Ahmin, and even with him who knows?) to those who will use him. Not the easiest ingredients for comedy.

Yet Lambert renders all this with just the right degree of exaggeration. Thus Norman's alter ego is Oum Salem, an Egyptian poetess invented by Norman, thereby himself achieving a certain literary success as her "translator" (and posing in drag for the back jacket of "Oum's" book of poems).

Lambert's portraits are subtle commentaries within themselves: In the dawn of a new, strangely inverted time, it is the woman who is the photographer and her husband who is the underclothes model; inevitably, then, it is the "other man," not the "other woman," who can threaten the marriage — through the husband.

In less artful hands, the portrait of Norman's sister — a Fascist — might have been patently offensive. By making her also a strutting, leather-bedecked,

100TH ANNIVERSARY ISSUE of
THE NATION

We have a small number left of The NATION's Centennial Issue, the big (336 pp.) book-length collection of original pieces by more than 40 leading writers.

This provocative appraisal of the country from Civil War to Freedom Now contains articles by Barbara Tuchman, Ralph Ellison, C. Vann Woodward, Dalton Trumbo, Louis Kronenberger, Howard Zinn, Nathan Glazer, A. H. Raskin among many others and includes memoirs by Freda Kirchwey, Mark Van Doren, George Kirstein; a piece on his career by the Editor, Carey McWilliams, and a complete history of THE NATION.

The big issue has attracted nation-wide attention and editorial comment, and has been used in classrooms across the country.

ORDER NOW!

THE NATION
333 Sixth Avenue
New York, N. Y. 10014

Please send me copies of the 100th ANNIVERSARY ISSUE, as indicated below. I enclose payment in the sum of $ ....

☐ 10 copies $10.00
☐ 50 copies $40.00
☐ 100 copies $75.00
☐ Single copy .... $ 1.25

Name ....
Address ....
City ....
State .... Zip No. ....

10-3-66

femme-chasing bull-Lesbian, Lambert, in a few expert strokes, turns her into a parody of Nazism. Now felicitously we can laugh at supermen who are really women in men's uniforms.

Lambert's outstanding achievement in his gallery of monsters is his depiction of the most vampirical of them all: Norman's incredible mother (Lady Dorothea, known as Lady D.), who tried to make him when he was a very young man. (In an outrageous understatement, she describes herself as "only a woman, a widow and a mother.")

After Norman's disastrous marriage has ended in sensational headlines, Lady D. proposes that he spend his time traveling with her. The thought of her sweeping across the world in technicolor while he trails obediently behind her in black and white upsets Norman so much that he passes out. But Lady D. can wait — and wait she does: until weakened by his life among the invited predators, and after a breakdown followed by a period in a sanitarium, Norman can be snatched away by her like carrion by a vulture.

Smothered in black mourning veils, in a somber moment in which Lady D. is brilliantly transformed into Lady Death and Lady Destiny, she leads Norman away to Mexico: "How can I convince my son that I'm no ordinary mother except by taking his hand, leading him like a horse to water and begging him, on my knees if necessary, to drink?" The previously underplayed note of sorrow takes over. Lady D. is leading her son to his inevitable ritual sacrifice. And so, Mom has won. Her surrogate seduction of Norman is terrifyingly complete. Lambert supplies a postscript by Lady D. (which unfortunately, however, erases some of the spooky effect of the last time we saw her through Norman's eyes); and now we see reality in multiple reflections as in mirrors facing each other. Did Norman tell the truth? Did Lady D.? Did either of them? At the end, Lambert lets us choose our own "truth."

Laughing at the Story of O

STORY OF O. By Pauline Réage. Translated from the French by Sabine d'Estree. Preface by Jean Paulhan of the Académie Française. A note on the Story of O by André Pieyre de Mandiargues. Grove Press. 199 pp. $6.

ALEXANDER LAING

Mr. Laing is professor of Belles-Lettres at Dartmouth College. His poetry has been published in The Nation, The New Yorker, The Atlantic Monthly and other periodicals. He is the author of The Cadaver of Gideon Wyck (Collier), the literary hoax referred to in his review.

Fourteen years ago, in Les Temps Modernes, Simone de Beauvoir published an essay uncommonly lugubrious even for her: "Faut-il-brûler Sade? . . . his books take a grip upon us as soon as we see that throughout their rigmaroles, clichés, clumsiness, they try to tell us of an experience which has the odd quality of refusing to be communicated." From this early statement, which reads like a conclusion, she struggled onward through 63 pages of Sartre's revue mensuelle to put her existentialist blessing upon the previously all-male effort, begun by Apollinaire, to refurbish the diligent 18th-century advocate of heterosexual buggery.

Two years later a publisher of Sade issued Histoire d'O, by Pauline Réage, a novel of today upon the Marquis' favorite theme. Combat's reviewer was cautious in his reference: "if there is a Pauline Réage." The use of a feminine pen name perhaps was encouraged by Beauvoir's recent essay, but the book's style has little resemblance to Beauvoir's except in its inordinate solemnity. Combat placed it with "the great classics of French eroticism," and here a distinction is in order. The word "erotic," throughout most of its own history, has defined the happy fulfillment of physical love, over which a gentle if capricious god hovers in approval. True erotic love never occurs in Histoire d'O. Its theme, explicit sadism, is not brutal either. Man shares many qualities with the brutes, but he alone devises the crueler corruptions of natural impulse with which this book concerns itself, and from which the maligned god Eros would flap off in dismay.

The protagonist, a dull-witted young Parisian fashion photographer, is given no name but "O" which evidently stands for orifice. Her story details the means, psychological and mechanical, by which a docile human being is reduced to a thing, a mere orifice. The main setting is the standard mansion of gothic nightmare, equipped with Sade's routine gadgets: masks, whips, collars, chains, corsets, branding irons. The literary trick, by contrast, is the use of a style of bogus loftiness to describe aberrant sexual outrages. There is none of Sade's forthright phrasing, nor of his occasional rowdy humor. The vocabulary is as circumspect as Fanny Hill's.

The first French critics were anxious not to be caught out. What if the author of this evidently pseudonymous story were a concealed academician? Why had Jean Paulhan, overdue at the time for elevation to the Académie, sponsored O? Had he invented her himself? Hence the mixture of evasion and absurd praise. Critique placed Pauline Réage "among the two or three true novelists of today." When an American translation appeared last March — the French secret having been kept for twelve years — the early reviewers were similarly ambivalent. One, of the sort who can perceive a Christ symbol in any literary patsy, sanctified O as a Christian martyr.

Judging only by internal evidence, I think the book is a spoof of its own genre. For one thing, how could so many critics have passed over the deliberate fun-poking in Paulhan's preface? With a tenuous reference to O's submissiveness in the process of dehumanization, he speculates upon a notebook recording the grievances of some freed West Indian slaves who petitioned for re-enslavement. This missing document of 1838 "has never been recovered," yet Paulhan discusses the significance of its contents with increasing assurance. He concludes that the compiler of a notebook he never has seen "was not telling the truth," and then proclaims what the truth really was. Paulhan either is warning the reader of more leg pulling to follow, or has forfeited his claim to credence. I credit him with the former.

It could be argued that Story of O is the vengeful fantasy of a neglected maiden lady, but a clearer case could be made for a Lesbian author, since the only scenes that even approach erotic tenderness are those between women. The men of the story all follow Sade's reiterated doctrine: that pleasure is the highest good, that the infliction of cruelty makes pleasure most exquisite, and that society should be disorganized so as to put no hindrance upon the right of the strong to enjoy inflicting the greatest torture upon the weak. In Les 120 Journées de Sodome, Sade pushed his theory to its ultimate inference in multiple orgiastic murders. Story of O is more circumspect. The deluded purchaser who does not scan the last page first will find that a final chapter "has been suppressed" (he is not told why or by whom) in which O is abandoned by her possessor in the gothic mansion of horrors. "There exists a second ending" in which O prefers death to abandonment. "Sir Stephen gave her his consent." Here again transparent spoofing replaces the ugly task of facing a resolution of the issue that has centrally been raised.

Despite Carrefour's statement that "the style is of an astonishing purity," many passages bespeak an unskilled author, but others are so crafty as to make these lapses emerge as the deliberate choices of a masquerader, contrived to mislead. Having been guilty in my wayward youth of a similarly solemn hoax (a spoof of the detective story, connecting demonology and monstrous births), I recognized in Story of O multitudinous symptoms: an incomplete manuscript of uncertain provenance, the plundering of esoteric originals for horrid rituals, the transplanting of antique atmosphere into modern surroundings, the tongue-in-cheek introduction, the well-wrought flaws. For example, Story of O begins in the present tense; but after 3 pages we read, "Another version of the same beginning was simpler." We are given it, in the past tense which persists to the end. A helpful editor would have told an amateur author to make up her mind; but the two beginnings, both given, are an arch balancing of the two endings, neither given: a sophisticated trick. The failure of Story of O as a serious novel reflects a likelihood that its author, of whatever sex, had no desire to write one. The theme, taken seriously, should clutch us in deepening pity and terror. Why does it not?

The chief artistic deficiency is a failure at once to establish any basis for concern over O herself. She begins as a docile nitwit and ends as a cipher; nothing significant is destroyed. Sade's Justine is an equally static, and equally dull, character; but she is presented with evident mockery all the way. O is neither a tragic nor a satiric creation. Another serious flaw is the absence of any motive, at outset, for the decision of her lover, René, to witness the ferocious abuse of O by other men. A repressed homosexual admiration for the "grizzled athlete" Sir Stephen, to whom René gives her midway in the account, is hinted at too late. This laxity in characterization of both O and René, moreover, is made more obvious by the hilarious treatment of solemn Sir Stephen, a crude caricature of the French popular notion of an imperturbable English milor'. Most of Sade's important characters, such as Dolmancé and Juliette, are valid satiric creations who monotonously recite their creator's serious beliefs; but the story of O is merely a bad joke.

Why bother with it? Because it reminds us of Beauvoir's question: must we burn Sade? Because, since its appearance in translation, a publisher has lost his final appeal against a stiff jail sentence upon an obscenity conviction? Because the American Civil Liberties Union's steady urging that there is no legal proof of a connection between sadistic books and sadistic crime has just been explicitly refuted by the Pennine Moors murder case?

If the proper study of mankind still is man, of course we must not burn Sade. A view of human nature that ignored the evidence of Sade permitted Nazism almost to inherit the earth. The record of aberrant man's desires and behavior must be kept available, and not merely to the well-to-do. Protection of our freedom to learn the worst about our species includes a defense of the right to read any book, even if it should turn out to be nothing but a bad joke.

THEATRE / Harold Clurman

It has been bruited about that I am nostalgic for the 1930s. This is libel: it is the 1830s whose memory I cherish, and even earlier epochs. Witness my fondness for the ballet.

Thus I welcome the City Center Joffrey Ballet in its first regular New York season on West 55th Street. After Balanchine's heavy guns one is exhilarated anew by the light artillery of Joffrey's youngsters. Balanchine has achieved mastery; the City Center juniors are on the exciting path toward that estate. They shine with mounting energy and the results of excellent training under their artistic director Robert Joffrey and their chief choreographer Gerald Arpino.

It is natural and proper to become enthusiastic over the emergence of such a group. "Capitalist competition" among the arts — abundance of production — is beneficial to creativity. (What the theatre needs is more bad plays to open the way for good ones!) But excessive praise is dangerous. It not only warps judgment but leads to later bitterness in those who give it as well as those who receive. Rave notices are good for business; they cripple appreciation.

Apart from its buoyancy, what immediately struck me about the new ballet company is the attractiveness of many of its individual dancers. Thus far I have not been bowled over by any single item of their repertory. Viva Vivaldi! is thoroughly pleasant; Olympics shows the handsome male contingent to great advantage. Cakewalk is an amiable frolic. Sea Shadow has a more than serviceable score by Michael Colgrass and two radiant dancers: the incredibly sylphlike Lisa Bradley and the finely wrought Richard Gain.

Among the novelties Lisa Bradley again excels. She is an ineffable creature of the deep in the earlier ballet, a predatory bird in Nightwings, and exquisite in both. But Nightwings as a whole is not particularly fresh. Nor was I much moved by Eugene Loring's symbolic These Three, which despite its topical subject matter — race riots and the heroics of the civil rights movement — possesses little specific impact or abstract grandeur. There is, however, one effective passage in which the three central male figures dance in concord, a motif repeated at the end by four men who resume the struggle of the martyred three. Loring's intention is bolder than what we actually see, which is surprising in view of the kinetic power inherent in his theme and the gift for incisive visualization he exemplified in Billy the Kid.

Moncayo 1, named after its composer, is easy to take, but neither fish nor fowl. The score did not seem to me, though it

WORLD'S BEST?
TRY IT AND SEE
☐ 7-month subscription —$4.79 (reg. $8 per year)
☐ Commentary Card catalog—10¢ (handsome reproductions of historic Jewish art)
COMMENTARY NA
165 East 56th Street
New York, N.Y. 10022
Name
Address
City State Zip

FOR WRITERS!
Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to
PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. N

$2.95 each
SAVE YOUR COPIES OF
THE NATION
- Each file holds a full year's copies.
- Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.
- Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.
Satisfaction guaranteed
Attractive and practical for your home or office
3 for $8.25
ORDER NOW — send check or money order.
MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.
FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

did to others, much more than routine Mexicana. But evaluations of ballet music must be modified by an awareness that the conditions of orchestral rehearsals are seldom what they ought to be.

The best compliment I can offer the new company at this moment is to say that after visiting it for three evenings I am eager to return for more, not only to reconsider the works I've mentioned and another première (Vitalitas) but to deepen the pleasure of seeing my favorite dancers again. These include, besides those previously cited, Luis Fuente, who glows with pride of vigor; Robert Blankshine, a sprite who makes one think of both Puck and Huck Finn; Margo Sappinton, whose womanly magnetism lends a special warmth to the third strophe of the Vivaldi number; Barbara Remington, whose elegant posture bespeaks breeding while her eyes twinkle cool wit. Finally, there is Ivy Clear, demurely funny in the light-minded mockery of Cakewalk. But I should not say "finally" for further acquaintance with this most engaging company will extend the list of discoveries.

PERSONALS

RETIRED N.Y.C. teacher, desires to live in country during winter, joined on weekends by husband. Essential there be pleasant walking available in woods or on back country roads. Various possibilities: caretaker for house, rental, boarder, etc. Box 593, c/o The Nation.

HEADMASTER WANTED. Private school property available. Large campus. Lake. Furnished. Lease $800 monthly. Sell $5,000 down. Box 402, Hague, New York 12836.

NEW religion for Catholics, Protestants, Jews, Atheists. Free details. L. J. Casselman, 1301 H Street, Sacramento, Calif. 95814.

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 10-3-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME ____________
ADDRESS ____________
CITY ____________
STATE ________ ZIP NO. ________

The organization that goes under the name of Theater 1967 and is really the partnership of Richard Barr, Clinton Wilder and Edward Albee at the Cherry Lane Theater has begun a festival season consisting of "elderly" American plays and some new off-beat ones. Each presentation will be limited to a four-week run. The first is three one-act plays by Thornton Wilder.

I was disappointed at the announcement of these plays because two of them are frequently done at community and university theatres. (The last time I saw the best of the three, The Happy Journey to Trenton and Camden, was at a performance in Tel Aviv by students of the English Department from the University of Jerusalem.) Therefore, I was agreeably surprised to find that for all their fragility the three plays held my attention. To begin with, they were in every respect ably staged: direction by Michael Kahn, scenery by Ed Wittstein, nice acting by Paula Trueman in The Happy Journey, by John Beal, particularly in Queens of France, by Bette Henritze and Guinevare Breeding in two of the three.

Two particular aspects in these short plays stimulated me to speculation. First, I always wonder when I see them (as I do at Our Town for which The Happy Journey is a sort of preliminary sketch) whether they truly reflect lower-middle-class American life before the First World War, or whether they simply represent the myth of that period. Were the times actually so unremittingly affable or is it just Wilder?

If the question is valid at all, I suppose one must answer that what Dreiser and his like saw and what Wilder reminisces about are both, though not equally, true. After all O'Neill wrote Ah! Wilderness, a sentimental aubade, as well as Beyond the Horizon which is all heartbreak. But there is hardly any pain at all in Wilder's The Long Christmas Dinner, the first of the three plays on the bill, even though it traces the life cycle of a family through several generations from flowering seed to dusty decay. Mark Twain's masterpieces grin and guffaw but there is bite, even cruelty, in them as well.

These plays (Queens of France is just a joke) were written in the early thirties, and the thirties were marked not only by bruises and battle cries but by a supply of healing unguents and mollifying plasters such as the Wilder plays. Then too the thirties was a time when writers sought solace by grazing in rural pastures.

An even more peculiar aspect of Wilder's plays is their endearing banality. Their content — and "content" seems almost too ponderous a word for it — is sheer platitude. Yet they offend no one, beguile many. The secret of their charm lies in an artistry that suggests more than it says. Details are scrupulously chosen but never insisted upon. There is a wily discretion in the plays; they are good natured without gush. Wilder wins by a tender tactfulness. He abates his seduction before you get a chance to cry "uncle!"

YOUNG MAN

He rushed to meet me falling sidewise at the stairs my red bell-boy
as I checked in at the desperate hour.
His need booms in my chest a cannon ball where in a Waldorf of swapped wives
I wait cow-eyed as he beats it with my bags.

CAROLYN STOLOFF

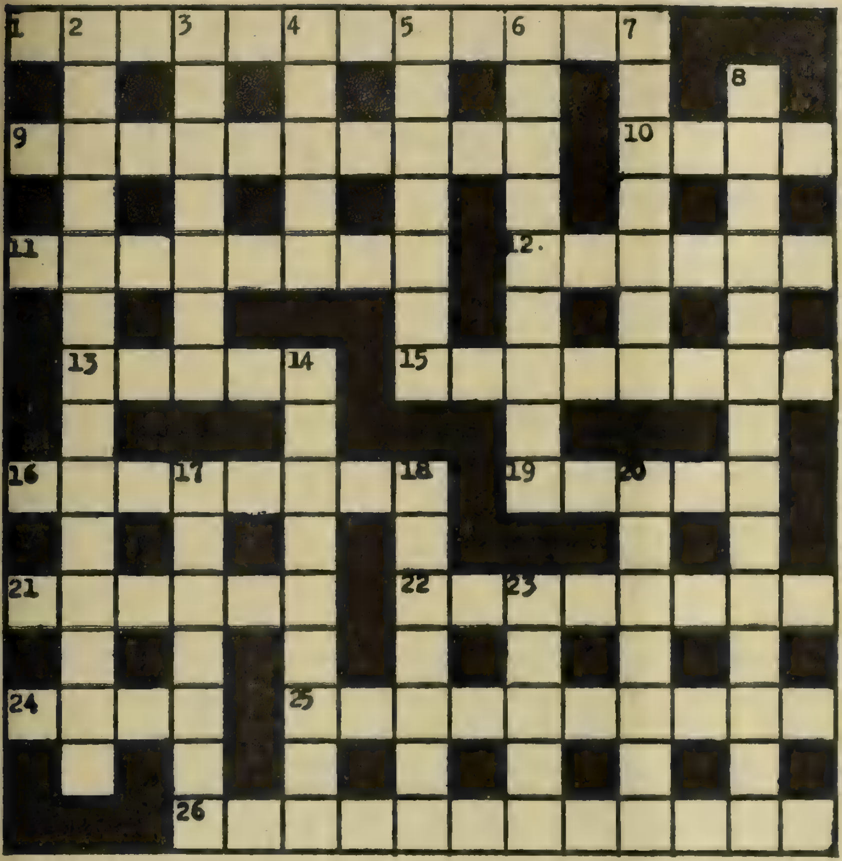
I have been absent from these pages since May, but not from the theatre. Besides a stay in Israel (where American, English and French plays thrive at the expense, so they say, of native playwrights), I saw both new and old plays in London. I refrained from reporting on these because they will certainly occupy a major place on Broadway stages during the coming season.

On my return I saw another British product that merited notice: Arnold Wesker's The Kitchen. I withheld discussion of this not only because it had become successful without my aid (!) but because I was due to supervise a seminar for new playwrights at Lenox, Mass.

I refer to The Kitchen now — it is scheduled to close on October 9 — because I was recently told an interesting fact about it. It attracted a large audience from the neighborhood — Broadway and 81st Street — where it is housed in a recently opened theatre. The vicinity is not usually associated with intellectual life or with the avant-garde, though it is sometimes wickedly referred to by its residents as "Needle Park." Still they flocked to see the play (its title refers to the kitchen of a popular restaurant where all the action takes place) because the occasion was worthy, the play's material and milieu compatible with its audience, the prices reasonable. I have always maintained that our best hope for the future lies in the "regional" theatre even within the confines of Manhattan.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1169

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Your kisser might be affected by a hang-over here! (7, 5)
9 and 20 down Implying a wolf's behavior might be comparatively smooth. (2, 5, 2, 1, 7)
10 Flag, often blue or green on a white background. (4)
11 Probably listed, and therefore possibly docked! (8)
12 The country sounds capable of making things 9 and 20. (6)
13 Wintered between this, when single? (5)
15 Fat in front of the stove? (8)
16 In certain stones it imparts regular motion. (8)
19 The direction a vessel goes is more with the current. (5)
21 A not as bad number? (6)
22 As a merchandiser, one might be useful after something has been 11. (8)
24 Are such utterances extremely native to North America? (4)
25 If there were no right in such commerce there would be no will. (10)
26 Might one consider them almost tractors? (Helps temper a violent outburst, too!) (12)

DOWN:

2 Implying those considered traditionally deaf can hear well enough for eaves-dropping? (9, 5)
3 Confident one might be able to get in later? (7)
4 Forty letters might seem equivalent, or even be superior. (5)
5 Evidently the small business establishment has been built to last a long time. (5, 2)
6 It could be the nag outran another beast! (9)
7 Belonging to both sexes. (7)
8 O, this might reach a lot of people! (8, 6)
14 Those who like the system in the service might adhere to it. (9)
17 What are usually described as running down, go differently with rips. (5, 2)
18 A minor injury implies no handicap! (7)
20 See 9 across
23 Short for 25, when untainted. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1168

